However the Negotiation still went forwards, and the Place agreed on for Confirmation of Articles was Troyes in Champaign, where King Charles and his Queen then resided; and to which Place the Duke of Burgundy, the Earls of Warwick and Kyme, and the Lord Ross and others, attended with five hundred Horse, were sent Ambassadors from King Henry. These arriving at Troyes, were honourably receiv'd, and amicably resolv'd on a final Peace; and there the Princess Catharine was attended as the English Queen, and particular Persons left to guard her by King Henry's Command. His Ambassadors being return'd, and his Affections inflam'd, he himself attended by his Brothers the Dukes of Clarence and Glocester, the Duke of Exeter, the Earls of Warwick, Huntington and Salisbury, and many of the Nobility, with a Guard of sixteen hundred Men, departed from Roan to Pontbois, to St. Denis, and so into Champaign, where he was met near Troyes by the Duke of Burgundy, and many other French Noblemen; and with the most magnificent Attendance conducted into the Town.

Reg. 7.

King Henry immediately after his Arrival, made a Visit to the French King, the Queen, and the Princess Catharine; to the latter of whom he made his Addresses, and presented her with a Ring of inestimable Value. There were afterwards many Assemblies of the King's Council fully to conclude the Peace and the Alliance; and King Henry having alter'd what he mislik'd in the Treaty, which before had been drawn up in Writing, it was at last intirely completed on the twenty first Day of May, 1420. The Articles of this Treaty were large and numerous, and very much to the Advantage and Honour of King Henry. By these it was agreed, 'That the said King Henry should marry the Princess Catharine, and allow her the usual Dowry of the Queens of England, forty thousand Crowns per Annum: That after the Death of King Charles, who was to hold his present Possessions during Life, the Crown of France, with all the Rights and Dominions appertaining to it, should devolve upon King Henry and his Heirs for ever. But because King Charles was indispos'd and incapable to reign, the whole Power and Exercise of the Go-

Government of France should immediately be transfer'd to King Henry as Regent of that Kingdom, to govern in Conjunction with the Council of the Estates of the Realm, according to the known Laws and Usages of it. To make which the more easie to King Henry, all the Nobility both Spiritual and Temporal, and all Corporations and Communities should be oblig'd to take particular Oaths of Fidelity to King Henry, both as to his present Administration, and future Inheritance. Then to preserve an intire Peace and Concord between England and France, whenever King Henry, or any of his Heirs should come to wear the Crown of France, the two Kingdoms should ever be united under one King, viz. under King Henry during his Life, and after under his Heirs in a continu'd Succession, and not at the same Time be govern'd by two Kings; and yet the Rights, Liberties and Laws of each Kingdom should be kept distinct and inviolable, without subjecting one to the other: The better to establish which, all Hatred, Animosities, Divisions and Wars, should cease between the two Nations, and the People be mutually united in Affections, Counsels, and Defence against all Enemies. But because the Dauphine and his Adherents still oppos'd the common Peace of both Kingdoms, King Henry should make use of all the Power of his Arms to reduce all Territories, Cities, Towns, Castles and Persons joining with him; and never enter into any Treaty of Peace with him, without the Consent of King Charles, the Duke of Burgundy, and the three Estates of England and France.

King Henry
made Regent of France.

These, and several other subservient Articles being confirm'd, the Princess Catharine, who had also the Title of Dutches of Bar, was affianc'd to King Henry in St. Peter's Church at Troyes. The King came attended with forty English Nobles and Gentlemen, and the Dutches of Clarence with her Train of Ladies; and the Queen of France and the Princess were attended by the Duke of Burgundy, and forty of his Council. King Henry and the Queen of France met in the middle of the Church, and went together up to the high Altar, where the Articles of Peace being openly read, were seal'd with the two Seals of both the Kings, and a solemn Oath taken to observe them; and the King and Princess joining their Hands, were contracted. Then the Duke of Burgundy took an Oath to obey King Henry as Regent of France during the present King's Life; and that after his Decease he would become his Liege Subject. On the other Side King Henry promis'd, that he would deliver to the Duke all the Murderers of his Father who should fall into his Power. In conclusion of all, the Peace was proclaim'd first in the French Tongue, and then in the English; and the Articles of it publish'd at Paris, and all the principal Citys of France. King Henry also in a Letter to his Brother the Duke of Bedford, gave him an Account of the Conclusion of this great Treaty, ordering him to proclaim the Peace throughout England, and instructing him about altering his Title in his Seals and Proclamations during the French King's Life, which was now to run thus: Henry by the Grace of God King of England, Heir and Regent of the Realm of France, and Lord of Ireland. On the thirtieth of May, the Nuptials were Solemniz'd between King Henry and the Princess Catharine, with extraordinary Pomp and Magnificence, and grac'd with the Presence of the Duke of Burgundy the Prince of Orange, the Count de Luxemburgh, and the principal Nobility of Burgundy and France.

The French Nobility join Fidelity to him.

King Henry being now proclaim'd Regent of France, all the Nobility that were at Troyes, readily swore Fidelity to him: For the Fame of his Heroic Actions in War, when his Person was unknown to them, had acquir'd him an universal Esteem, and they knew not which most to admire, his Courage, Conduct or Success; but now his noble Presence, happily join'd with Majesty and Affability, procur'd a greater Veneration. They knew him to be prudent in Counsels, experienc'd in War, undaunted in Danger, and prosperous in all Attempts; and therefore perswaded themselves that their Country would be happy under the Influences of his Government. Their good Opinion of him was confirm'd, when they heard him in a full Assembly thus express the Moderation and Temper of his Soul. My noble Lords, I do assure you, it is and shall be my perpetual Concern, how by all my Councils and Actions I may make both these Nations, now by the Favour of Heav'n so fortunately united, a great and flourishing Kingdom; and as it is at present the most glorious in Europe, so all Animosities and Factions extinguish'd, it may continue happy as well as great to all future Successions. To accomplish this noble Design, it is necessary that we all endeavour to suppress the Flames of those Civil Dissentions, which are alone kept alive by that Person whom you have justly depriv'd of the Honour of being Dauphine of France. That our Country therefore may flourish in Peace and undisturb'd Greatness, we must use our utmost Power to reduce him to that Obedience he owes to his Father and his Sovereign, and to oblige him to submit to that Government which has been establish'd by an Assembly of the States of the Kingdom; which if not effected, France will not only be expos'd to present Calamities, but the Fears of greater, from the Government of one who has already shown such Marks of Tyranny. After which he proceeded to declare his high Esteem for the French Nation, and urg'd them all to an Union of Hearts and Affections, as well as Nations, with such an obliging Gracefulness and Greatness, that they all departed with the utmost Reliance and Satisfaction.

V. The mighty King Henry had now in a great measure arriv'd at the Top of his Aims and Designs, obtaining not only an admirable Queen, but also the Sovereignty over a new Kingdom; yet still the Dauphine and his Followers vigorously oppos'd him, and resolv'd never to desist 'till they had brought him to their own Terms. Their first Counsel was how to preserve themselves in so imminent a Danger; they were sensible that to sit still would but increase the Success of the English, and to rise without sufficient Strength would plunge themselves into further Misfortunes. In this Distraction that Voice was best heard that spoke most for the Safety of the Dauphine, whose Breath alone gave Life to the after-Hopes of France, and for the fortifying those Places which might be of most Offence to the Enemy. This then was agreed in a Council of War, That the Dauphine should at no Time hazard his Person in the Field, and that Levies of Soldiers should be made, to be garrison'd in convenient Places, and leave the rest to Time and Opportunity; in which Resolution every Man took to his Charge, and all to oppose the Actions of King Henry. As these consulted for the State of the French, so at the same Time in Paris a Parliament of the three Estates was assembled, in which such as were guilty of the Duke of Burgundy's Death were sentenc'd, the Disinhering of the Dauphine confirm'd, and Forces prepar'd against those Towns that held for him.

In the mean Time the two Kings with their Queens, and the Dukes of Clarence and Burgundy march'd against Sens, a Town in Burgundy; which after twelve Days Siege surrender'd upon Composition of Life, those only excepted that were guilty of the Duke of Burgundy's Death. Montereau was the next Place, which was enter'd by Force, where the Body of the Duke of Burgundy, undecently bury'd by the Dauphinois, was taken up, and by his Son Philip sent in great Pomp to Dijon, the Capital of his Dukedom, and there honourably interr'd. The Town being taken, the Castle held out, under the Government of the Lord De Guitry, to whom were sent some French Prisoners under a Guard to persuade him to surrender, which they did with Tears and on their knees; but his obstinate Persisting, and his affronting the Herald sent to summon him to surrender, occasion'd the Hanging up of those Prisoners, as Rebels to the French King, their natural Sovereign. The Besieged held out eight Days longer, and then surrender'd the Castle on Condition of having Life, Liberty and Goods secur'd; but all Persons concern'd in the Duke of Burgundy's Mur-

Next the King undertook the Siege of Melun, a Town of great Strength on the Seine, and made more strong by the Valour of its Governors, who were the Lord De Barbasan and Pierre de Bourbon, the former an admirable Commander, and the latter a Prince of the Blood, whose Garrison consisted of seven hundred Dauphinois. These made so stout a Defence, that the Besiegers could not make their Approaches without great Difficulty and Danger; but the Cannon making a Breach, the English and Burgundians enter'd a strong Outwork, and built a Bridge of Boats over the River Seine, so that from either Quarter they had Communication with each other without Impediments. Both King Henry and the Duke of Burgundy fortify'd their Camps after an extraordinary Manner, and in this Posture the Siege continu'd eighteen Weeks, in which Time the Soldiers of the Garrison made some, tho' not frequent, Sallies. King Henry, impatient of Delays, press'd forward the Siege to the utmost, and made a large Mine underneath the Walls, which being perceiv'd, the Besieg'd countermin'd against him; where the King with great Resolution entering first into the Mine, and Barbasan likewise his within the Town, met each other with their drawn Swords, and nobly perform'd the Parts of private Combatants: 'Till at length they resolv'd to discover themselves, and first Barbasan made known his Name, then King Henry did his; whereupon the French Lord suddenly retiring, caus'd the Barricadoes to be clos'd, and King Henry return'd safe to his Camp.

The French King appears before the Place, During this Siege, King Henry often went to Corbeil, where the Court then was, which now consisted of French and English, the Dutcheffs of Clarence, and other Ladies of the highest Quality being the chief Ornaments of it. Here he perswaded the King of France to repair with him to the Camp, that his Presence before the Walls might influence his Rebellious Subjects to return to their Duty. But when they were summon'd to yield to their natural Sovereign, they resolutely answer'd, That they would joyfully open their Gates to their Monarch, but they would never obey an English King, the ancient and mortal Enemy of France. Tho' neither the Presence nor Authority of the French King could avail, yet he still continu'd in the Camp, to which the beautiful Queen of England likewise came with a shining Train of Ladies, for whose Entertainment a fair House was built at such a Distance as secur'd them from all Danger. To entertain them with martial Musick, eight or ten Trumpets were sounded every Morning and Evening before the Tent of the King of England, who had the State and Magnificence of a Court amidst all the Noise and Disorders of War; and yet with uninterrupted Diligence imploy'd himself in all the Business of the Siege. As there was a strong Party of Scots in the Garrison, the young King of Scotland, now in the Army with King Henry, sent to require them upon their Allegiance, that they should not employ their Arms against Troops where he was in Person, but come and fight under the Standard of their King. To whom they return'd this Answer, That they would not own or obey him as their King, who was in the Power of another; for which Affronts twenty of them were afterwards executed. About the same Time mandatory Letters were sent by King Charles into Picardy, to put all Places that held for him in those Parts into King Henry's Possession, and to take the Oath of Obedience to him as to the only Heir, Successor, Regent and Governor of France; the Execution of which was committed to the Care of several of the French Nobility.

Melun surrenders. The Distress of Melun now became exceeding great, as well upon the Besiegers as Defendants; the one afflicted and extremely weaken'd with Mortality, and the other violently oppress'd with Famine, and other Calamities incident to long Sieges. After eighteen Weeks Siege, the English were supply'd with Soldiers out of Picardy, the Sight of which at first put the Town in Hopes of Relief from the Dauphine; but the Garrison finding themselves unhappily disappointed, in Despair capitulated, and were forc'd to surrender upon hard Artcles, one of which was That they should be all made Prisoners of War, and that all the English and Scots should in a special Manner be left to the absolute Disposal of the King of England; and that all Accessaries to the Duke of Burgundy's Murder should suffer Death. The Articles being concluded, an English Garrison was put into Melun: The Men at Arms who adher'd to the Dauphine's Party, of whom the principal were Pierre de Borbon and the Lord de Barbasan, with five or six hundred Persons of Quality of both Sexes, and the greatest Part of the chief Citizens, were convey'd under a strong Guard to Paris, and there committed Prisoners to the Chastelet, the Bastile, and other Places. Two Monks, who were convicted of ingaging in Burgundy's Murder, were beheaded in the City, with a Gentleman of King Henry's Household, whose Name was Bertrand de Chaumont. This latter had renounc'd the Interest of France, and devoted himself to the Service of the King of England, and was highly in his Favour, as a Man of approv'd Valour. But clear Evidence being brought against him, That during the Treaty for surrendring the Town, for a Sum of Mony he had favour'd the Escape of one Aimerion de Lau, a suspected Accomplice in the Duke's Murder; the King, tho' with Regret to lose a gallant a Man, and tho' the Dukes of Clarence and Burgundy interceded for his Life, would not pardon him, but gave Order for his Execution, declaring He would have no Traitors in his Army: Yet to shew his Value for his Abilities, he was hear'd sorrowfully to say, He would have given fifty thousand Nobles that Chaumont had not been guilty of such a Crime. The valiant Barbasan was accus'd by the Duke of Burgundy as an Accomplice in his Father's Murder; but he in an open Trial defended himself, protesting, That tho' he was a Servant to the Dauphine, he was so far from consenting to the Fact, that he knew nothing of it till it was effected. Tho' the Evidence against him was not clear, yet there was so strong a Suspicion as not to admit of his being set at Liberty; so that he was continu'd a Prisoner nine Years. Some Writers inform us that he sav'd his Life by pleading it would be a Dishonour for King Henry to put a Person to Death, who was his Brother in Arms, and had signaliz'd himself in a single Combate with him; which by the Heralds was allow'd to be the same Thing as if he had fought with him in appointed Lists.

Melun thus taken, and the Government given to the Earl of Huntington, the two Kings with the Duke of Burgundy made a publick Entry into Paris, being met by the Citizens, who in great Solemnity came out to congratulate their Arrival. The Streets were spread, and the Houses hung with rich Cloath, while the People in all Parts express'd their extraordinary Joy in the highest Acclamations. The two Kings rode together under a rich Canopy, Henry on the left Hand, next to whom follow'd the Dukes of Clarence and Bedford, and on the other Side of the Way the Duke of Burgundy in deep Mourning; the Princes and Nobility in each Nation follow'd in Order, the Clergy with Processions, and their venerable Relicks, going before them to Notredame Cathedral. Rich Presents, Flags, Streamers and Conduits running with Wine, were all us'd by the Citizens to express how grateful the Peace was to them, and how much they exulted in the Honour of having two Kings resident amongst them. King Henry's Palace was prepar'd in the Louvre, and was most rich and magnificent, and King Charles's Court in the Hostel St. Pol, and much inferior in all Respects; for, as one Author observes, young Henry commanded all, and his Brothers exercis'd supream Authority, while old Charles stood as a Cypher, and the French Nobility had nothing to do. As King Henry had the Disposal of all Places of Honour and Trust, so the French Nobility and Gentry address'd themselves to him, and endeavour'd to raise their Fortunes by obtaining an Interest in his Favour. He made a great Alteration of the Officers, displacing many who had been put in by the old Duke of Burgundy or his Son, and conferring their Employments on others whom he accounted more firm to his Interests. As Regent of France he also redress'd Grievances, reform'd Abuses, and corrected all Miscarriages in the Government; and he caus'd a new Coin to be stamp'd, to express the Union of the two Kingdoms, in the Reverse of which the Arms of England and France were quarter'd together.

The better to establish all Things during King Henry's Stay in Paris, a grand Parliament was summon'd to meet at that City; in which was the final Agreement between the two Kings openly acknowledg'd by King Charles, as made by his Assent, and with the Advice of all the Council of France; whereupon it was there also ratify'd by the general States of the Kingdom, and solemnly sworn to by all the Nobility and Magistrates, Spiritual and Temporal, who also set their Seals to the Instruments of the Agreement, which were sent into England to be kept in the King's Exchequer at Westminster. But in this Parliament the Murder of the Duke of Burgundy was in a more special and particular manner examin'd, and the Actors, with all their Accomplices were solemnly sentenc'd; and Methods were us'd to oblige them likewise to build Churches, and perform several publick Acts of Charity, in order to expiate the execrable Fact. And the Assembly proceeded so far as to summon the Dauphine himself before the Grand Marble Table, with all the usual Formalities. Upon his Non-Appearance, he was publicly attainted and convicted of Murder, was declared unworthy of all Succession, namely of that to the Crown of France, and was banish'd the Kingdom for ever. From this Sentence, as given by incompetent Judges, and contrary to the Laws of the Kingdom, the Dauphine appeal'd to God and his Sword, and immediately transferr'd the Parliament and University to the City of Poitiers, at which Place the most illustrious Members of those two Bodies did not fail to appear. Thus almost everything was double in the Kingdom of France; there were two Kings, two Regents, two Parliaments, two Constables, two Chancellors, two Admirals, and so of most of the great Officers, not to mention the Multitude of Marshals of France, whereof each Party made as many as they thought fit.

King Henry having establish'd the grand Affairs of France, as well as these unsettled Times would permit, he resolv'd for a while to return into England, and there perform the Solemnities of his beloved Queen's Coronation; in order to which he first appointed for his Lieutenant of France his Brother the Duke of Clarence, a brave Prince inferior to none but himself, and also left the Duke of Exeter with five hundred Men at Arms to continue in the City of Paris; and so attended with great Magnificence he repair'd to Amiens, and then to Calais. But before he took Shipping, he adjusted several Affairs in Normandy and other Parts, treated with the Duke of Bretaign, and generously discharged the Count De Richemont, who had been Prisoner ever since the Battel at Agincourt. But for the Duke of Bourbon, who was discharg'd afterwards, he agreed for a Ransom of no less than a hundred thousand Crowns, besides other Advantages. From Calais, with a glorious Train the King cross'd the Seas to Dover, and made a triumphant Entry at London, the People receiving him as an Angel from Heav'n, with Torrents of Joy and Exultation to see their King return crown'd with new Victories, and with the Accession of another Kingdom to his own. But as he piously ascrib'd the Glory of all his Conquests to a Superior Power, so he gave all the Praise to Heav'n, and commanded the Arch-Bishop of Canterbury to appoint a publick Day of Thanksgiving.

Reg. 3.

VI. The mighty King Henry was now in the Height of his Grandeur, and at his Return into England he found the Nation flourishing and prosperous under the Government of Humphry Duke of Glocester his Brother, who had succeeded the Duke of Bedford in the Regency with equal Wisdom and Success. The Arms of the King had not only been successful in France, but also in Ireland, ever since his Accession to the Crown; so that he found no Disaster to cloud his Joy in the Possession of the most excellent Princess of that Age, or to disturb the Pomp which was preparing for her Coronation. The Day appointed for this great Solemnity was the twenty fourth of February; where after the Ceremonies of the Coronation in Westminster Abby, the Queen with her noble Retinue came into the Hall, where many Tables were spread, and a splendid Entertainment provided for the Nobles, Bishops, Ladies, Mayor and Aldermen of London. On the Right Hand, and End of the Queen's Table, were seated the Arch-Bishop of Canterbury, and the Cardinal Bishop of Winchester; on the Left the King of Scotland in his Robes, with the Dutchess of Tork and Countess of Huntington. The Earl of Marche holding the Royal Scepter in his Hand, kneel'd on the Right Hand of the Queen, and the Earl-Marshal in like manner on the Left; the Countess of Kent sat at her Right Foot, and the Countess Marshal at her Left; while the Duke of Glocester, as Overseer, stood before her Majesty bare-headed. The rest of the splendid Train had their several and distinct Tables in the Hall; and the whole Feast, tho' in the Time of Lent and furnish'd all with Fish, was great and pompous to the utmost Degree. After the Solemnities of the Coronation, the King, with the Queen and some of the Nobility, took a Journey to Tork, where they were joyfully and magnificently receiv'd, and the Citizens made them many rich Presents. The Queen continu'd at Tork, but the King went in Pilgrimage to Bridlington, where having paid his Devotions, he afterwards visited a great Part of his Kingdom; and in all Places where he came his Ears were open to the Complaints of the injur'd and oppress'd: He redress'd their Wrongs, punish'd the Corrupters of Justice, and reform'd the Abuses in Government. Particularly a great Abuse in the Church, arising from the Pope's Disposal of the vacant Bishopricks and Benefices, was this Year remov'd; and with that Vigour and Resolution, that it gave such a Blow to the usurping Power of Rome in this Kingdom, as greatly weaken'd, and at last intirely destroy'd it.

Queen Catharine's Coronation.

King Henry regulates Abuses.

In May the King met his Parliament at Westminster, and represented to them the State of the publick Affairs, the Conquests he had made in France, and the Supplies necessary to continue the War; that the Dauphine and his Party, who maintain'd some Provinces and Cities against him, being subdu'd, that Kingdom might be annex'd to the English Crown. The Commons cheerfully gave a Fifteenth, tho' a Petition was presented, fill'd with the sad Complaints of the Poverty of the People, and intolerable Burden of the War, fomented by some Persons more affecting their private Interest than the Prosperity of their Country, who regretted to part with any Money to advance the Greatness and Honour of the Government. At the same Time there was a Convocation of the Clergy at St. Paul's, who offer'd a Tenth to the King, and the rich Bishop of Winchester in Advance of the Money lent him twenty thousand Pound. At the same Time the King wisely took care to secure his Kingdom from any Invasion of the Welsh or Scots during his Absence. He compos'd the Tumults in Wales, and reduc'd that People to their Duty; and to make the Scots his Friends, he gave Liberty to their King to return to his Country and Throne ten Years after his being first taken by Henry IV. and detain'd in the English Court. But he did not return till a few Years after in the next Reign. He also establish'd a Peace with him, strengthen'd with an Alliance, by giving him in Marriage the Lady Ann his Niece, and Daughter of the Duke of Clarence. It was agreed that her Dowry should pay part of his Ransom; that for the Payment of the rest, he should give Hostages, and likewise ingage himself never to make War on England. Having taken all necessary Precautions, King Henry with a choice Army of four thousand Men at Arms, and twenty four thousand Archers, return'd into France to prosecute those Wars.

He calls a Parliament.

He sets the King of the Scots at Liberty.

The King now found his Presence highly necessary, for before he took Shipping, he was surpriz'd with the News of the unfortunate Miscarriage of his admirable Brother the Duke of Clarence, of which this was the Occasion. The Earl of Buchan, and the Earl of Douglas, and other Commanders, with seven thousand Scots had pass'd over into France to the Assistance of the Dauphine;

phine; and joining with his Party in Anjou, design'd to surprize the Duke of Clarence before he was provided: In which Enterprize, four stragling Scots, taken and brought Prisoners to him as he sat at Dinner, discover'd the Design and Strength of the Enemy, whose Approach was very near. Upon hearing of this News the Duke, all in a Flame, too suddenly took Horse, crying They are all Ours! leaving his Troops to follow him with what Expedition they could. His unexpected Appearance caus'd some of the Scots to take into the Church of Baugy for their Safety, where while they were defending themselves, the rest of their Forces took the Alarm, and the Earl of Buchan secur'd the main Bridge, to whose Assistance came Hugh Kennedy with a hundred Horse. The Duke of Clarence seeing no possibility to force his Passage with his slender Troop of Horse, dismounted with his Men, and made a noble Charge upon the Earl of Buchan; and the English, tir'd with Disdain to meet with their old Enemies, fought with the greatest Fierceness imaginable. But none was more brave and daring than the Duke himself, who being distinguish'd by his rich Armour, and a golden Coronet sparkling with Jewels, but more remarkable for his Valour, was singled out by John Swinton a Scotch Cavalier, who with his Lance wounded him on the Face. The Duke notwithstanding rush'd undauntedly into the Thickest of the Enemy's Troops, where the Earl of Buchan on Horseback struck him down with a Truncheon, which put an End to his Life. The English, dishearten'd at the Fall of so great a General, and being furiously attack'd by the whole Army, were soon routed with the Loss of fifteen hundred Men, after they had slain above a thousand of the Enemy. The Deaths of the Lords Ross and Gray, and Sir Gilbert Umfreville, and the Captivity of the Earls of Huntington, Somerset and Perche, the Lord Fitz Walter and Sir William Bower, caus'd a general Concern in the English Army; yet the Duke of Clarence had the greatest share in their Sorrow, who as he was generally lov'd for his Wisdom, Valour and other excellent Qualities, so his Death was universally lamented, not only by the English, but by the Enemy. His Body remain'd a few Hours in their Hands, who were carrying it to the Dauphine; but they did not long keep either that or the Field of Battel: For tho' the Body of the Army, which under the Earl of Salisbury had follow'd the Duke, could neither keep Peace with his swift March, nor advance Time enough to prevent his Fate and the Loss of so many gallant Soldiers, yet they came up soon enough to force the French to a disorderly Retreat, and to recover the dead Body of the Duke, which was convey'd into England, where it was interr'd with great Solemnity. The Earl of Buchan for his Valour was by the Dauphine made Constable of France.

King Henry both griev'd and irrag'd at the Loss of a Brother he so justly lov'd and admir'd, hasten'd his Expedition into France; and leaving his Brother John Duke of Bedford his Lieutenant, and his beloved Queen honourably attended, upon the tenth Day of June he landed at Calais with all his Forces, making now his last Entrance into France. On the Day after his Arrival he dispatch'd the Earl of Dorset and the Lord Clifford with twelve hundred Horse and Foot into Paris, to relieve the Duke of Exeter, who was straiten'd of Provisions by the Dauphinois, that harraisd the adjacent Country, and had taken Boneval, Galandon, and some other Forts, and after that march'd to Chartiers, and invest'd it with seven thousand Men at Arms, four thousand Cross-Bows, and six thousand Archers. King Henry, after a short Continuance in Calais, march'd to Monstrelet, and there quartering his Army, he found the Duke of Burgundy somewhat impair'd in his Health. Three Days being spent in Conference, the King march'd into Ponthieu, and the Duke to Abbeville upon Somme, to facilitate his Passage there to be made, of which they had some Doubt, by reason of the Dissatisfaction of many of the Inhabitants. Henry in his March took the Fort call'd La Perte, commanded by the Ballard of Belluy, which surrender'd upon Summons; but being committed to the Custody of Bocher.

Borflers of Picardy, was again betray'd into the Hands of the Dauphine. From hence the King pass'd the River at Abbeville, where he was spendidly entertain'd, and richly presented; from whence he march'd to Beauvois, Gisors and Bois-de-l'incennes, where King Charles and his Queen resided, and receiv'd him with great Honour, and lastly to the City of Paris, where he was receiv'd in Joy and Triumph. He enters Paris

But this Heroe, more regarding Laurels and Conquests than the delicate Pleasures of a Court, after he had concerted Measures, and levy'd French Forces to add to the English, march'd towards Meaux, resolving in Revenge of his Brother's Death to fight the Dauphine, who had now laid before Chartiers the Space of three Weeks. But he hearing of King Henry's Approach at the Head of a formidable Power, broke up the Siege and retir'd; upon which the King march'd directly to Dreux, and sat down before that Place. The Inhabitants and Garrison, apprehensive of their Danger, beat a Parly, and agreed to surrender the Town, if the Dauphine did not relieve them by a certain Day; which being expir'd, the Town was deliver'd, and eight hundred of the Dauphine's Party permitted to retire upon their Oaths not to bear Arms against King Henry for the Space of one Year. While Henry lay before this Place, Mezeray tells us, That an honest Hermit unknown to him, came and represented to him the great Evils he brought upon Christendom by his unjust Ambition and Usurpation of the Kingdom of France, against known Right and the Will of Heav'n; wherefore in the Name of God he threaten'd him with a severe and sudden Punishment, if he did not desist. The King took this Exhortation either for a visionary Fancy, or a Suggestion of the Dauphine's, therefore prosecuted his Designs with greater Vigour; and pursuing the flying Dauphine, he took Baugency and Vendosme upon the River Loire, with other Forts, but could not encounter that Prince who so industriously avoided Battel. And tho' he had the greater Army, and had engag'd himself by his Heralds to meet the King of England in the Field, confirming it also with an Oath, he contenting himself with wasting the Country, drew off to Bourges, as a Place of safe Retreat, both for the Strength of the Place, and the Fidelity of the People: And for his constant Residence there, he was by way of Jeer call'd The King of Bourges. King Henry finding it was in vain to attack him in that advantageous Post, first ravag'd the Country, and then resolv'd to besiege Meaux, the Capital City of the Country of Brie, a Place of great Strength and Consequence. Having provided Engines, and all other Necessaries, he sent his Uncle the Duke of Exeter, with four thousand Men, to possess himself of the Suburbs, to prevent the Garrison from firing them; and then following himself with an Army of twenty thousand Men, on October the sixth he invested the Place, inclos'd his Camp with an Intrenchment, and rais'd his Batteries against the Walls and Gates. The Governor of the City was the Bassard De Varus, who had with him many other Officers, and a thousand select Soldiers, besides the Inhabitants, who were also resolute to defend the Place to the last Extremity. And indeed they bravely held out for the Space of seven Months, while great Numbers of the English and Burgundians dy'd either by Sickness, Sallies, or the Shot from the Walls. He takes several Towns from the Dauphine.

During this tedious Winter Siege, the King had the Satisfaction of hearing that his Queen was deliver'd of a young Prince at Windsor on St. Nicholas Day, to whom he gave the Name of Henry sur les Fous. It is commonly related, that when he heard his Son was born in Windsor Castle, he rais'd a bad Omen from the Place, as foreboding some unhappy Fate; and, as Hall says, spoke these prophetic Words to the Lord Fitz-Hugh his Chamberlain: Henry born at Monmouth shall a small Time reign, and gain much; and Henry born at Windsor shall reign long, and lose all; but God's Will be done. A. D. 1422. Reg. 10. Henry VI. born Among those to whom the Care of this Royal Infant was committed, Jaqueline de Bawieri Dutcheß of Brabant had the principal Employment. At the same Time His Father's Words upon his Birth.

Time the Duke of Richemont, whom King Henry had releas'd without Ransom, came at the Head of a numerous Body of Horse to the Camp before Meaux, to serve him in the Siege, which was still prosecuted vigorously; tho' upon Notice that some of the Dauphine's Troops had surpriz'd Auranches, and kill'd and taken two or three hundred of the Garrison, the King order'd a strong Detachment to march to the Assistance of the Earl of Salisbury Governor of Normandy, who with those Recruits soon recover'd the Town. About that Time Jaques de Harecourt, in Service of the Dauphine, with seven hundred Soldiers harra's'd the Parts about Vimen, against whom some English Garrisons assembling, slew three hundred of his Men, himself hardly escaping by the Fleetness of his Horse. Likewise Oliver de Mauny invaded Constantine, notwithstanding he had solemnly sworn at the Surrender of Falaise never to bear Arms against King Henry; but in the midst of his Career he was defeated and taken Prisoner by the Earl of Suffolk. This perfidious Man being brought before King Henry, a true Observer of all Faith, he openly spoke thus to him,

You are an ancient Knight, and ought to have observ'd your Faith and Honour, which you have basely broken, and by the Law of Arms deserve immediate Death: But we give you your ignominious Life, and shall only send you into England, there to learn the Language, and truer Maxims of Honour.

King Henry's Forces being diminish'd by these Commotions in Normandy, and his Thoughts much employ'd that way, the valiant De Offemont, whom the Garrison of Meaux earnestly desir'd should be their Governor, found an Opportunity to approach the Walls with forty select Soldiers, in Order to enter the Town; but ready to be receiv'd by Ladders over the Walls in the Night, Centinels discover'd the Men, and he himself not being able to recover the Ladders, fell into the Ditch, where not being able to free himself from his heavy Armour, he was wounded, and then taken Prisoner, with most of his Followers. King Henry esteem'd the Taking of so brave and valiant a Commander as a Prize of great Importance, and push'd forwards the Siege with fresh Vigour and Resolution. At length the Defendants, hopeless of Relief, and finding themselves unable to hold out, carry'd all their Goods from the Town into the Castle; but the Beliegers discovering their Actions, and fearing to lose their Booty, made a sudden and furious Attack, and by Force made way into the Town with Sword in Hand. Then Henry planting his Cannons, began to batter the Castle, and shortly reduc'd it to that Extremity, that besides want of Bread, most of their Hand-Weapons were broken, and the Men dangerously wounded; yet they did not desist from provoking the English with opprobrious Words and vile Indignities, which caus'd harder Conditions to be laid upon them, than in any other Town taken the whole War. By which the whole Garrison and the Inhabitants were to be Prisoners at the King's Pleasure, only having their Lives sav'd; but the Governor De Varus, and some other Men of Note and Quality, were to be deliver'd up to immediate Execution. The City thus surrender'd, King Henry immediately sent eight hundred select Men Prisoners to Paris, Roan and England. The Governor was beheaded, and his Body hung on a Tree before the Town, call'd by his own Name, because he had formerly hang'd on it many English and Burgundians, and his Head was fix'd on a Pole upon the Top of the same Tree. This was follow'd by the Execution of several others of Quality in Paris, who had given more than common Provocations during the Time of the Siege; and all the Riches of the City was distributed by King Henry to his Commanders and most deserving Men. Orders being taken for the repairing the Breaches, and the City well garrison'd, Crespy, the Castle of Pierrepont, Merlau, Offemont, and several other Places submitted to the King's victorious Arms; while others were set on Fire to hinder him of the Fruits of his Conquests. When the Governors of Places in the Marches of Beauvais, heard how King Henry, by a Courage and Conduct which nothing could resist, had taken Towns and Forts which they thought impregnable, they had such an Apprehension of his Might, that they sent Deputies to treat about surrendring at an assign'd Time, if the Dauphine did not give them due Assistance.

Queen Catharine in England daily hearing of the King's Success, greatly desired the Sight of his Person, and for that End prepar'd for a Voyage to France, under the Conduct of Duke John the King's Brother, then Regent of England, who for the Time of his Absence deputed his Brother Humphry Duke of Glocester, and took Shipping at Southampton. The Winds being prosperous, on the twenty first of May the landed at Harfleur, and with encreasing Trains of Nobility by easie Journies came to Roan, and from thence to Bois-de-Vicennes, where her Royal Husband, with her Father and Mother, came in great Pomp to meet her with the utmost Demonstrations of Joy. From thence they all enter'd the City of Paris; and at the Celebration of the Festival of Pentecost, a magnificent Feast was prepar'd in the great Hall of the Louvre, where at one Table the King and Queen of England sat with their Imperial Crowns and Robes, and at the other many of the French and English Nobility and Gentry. The French Court at the Hostel St. Pol was at the same Time very thin, and King Charles saw himself neglected and abandon'd by those who were born his Subjects, who now ador'd their young rising Sovereign. The former had the Title of King of France, while the latter govern'd all; at which, tho' many of the French were uneasie, yet the English King was manifestly too great to be oppos'd. Here he made a bold Effort of his Power, in causing the Tax rais'd on the Marks of Silver for Minting his new Mony, to be collected at Paris, as it had been in other Places; and tho' the People murmur'd and talk'd out their Discontents, yet they were so aw'd, that they durst not break out into any Tumult. But their Resentments were abated, or rather turn'd into Affection, when they felt the kind Influences of King Henry's just and moderate Government, and observ'd his exact Administration of Justice in redressing Wrongs, and punishing the Actors without Partiality or Favour. By this just Conduct he especially gain'd the Love of the Common People, who regarded him not as their Conqueror, but as their Father and Protector.

The Grandeur of King Henry at Paris.

Tho' the Provinces of Champaign, Picardy, Brie, Normandy, and Isle of France, were in King Henry's Possession, yet all were not reduc'd to a quiet Obedience; for a great and strong Part still held out for the Dauphine, who with twenty thousand effective Men besieg'd La Charitie upon the Loire, and took it; from whence he march'd to Cone upon the same River, where the Besieged treated about a Surrender, and gave Hostages to deliver it up on the sixteenth of August, if they were not reliev'd before that Time by the Duke of Burgundy. The Prince and the Duke by Consent agreed to put the Cause to the Decision of a Battel, to be fought on the said sixteenth of August; and this was mutually declar'd by their Heralds. The Duke not only sent Orders to levy new Forces to augment his Army, but likewise begg'd King Henry's particular Assistance; to which the King gave Answer, That he himself would come at the Head of his whole Army, to join with him in the Battel. But as this mighty Conqueror prepar'd for his March, Heav'n thought fit to put a Period to all his encreasing Glories, and struck him with a Distemper that prov'd fatal to him; and all he could do was to command the Duke of Bedford and Earl of Warwick to give all necessary Assistance to the Duke of Burgundy. Tho' he was much weaken'd by his Disease, he was yet animated by a Courage natural to him; so that taking his last Leave of King Charles and the two Queens at Sens, he repair'd to Meun, with a Design to go from that City, and put himself at the Head of the Army. But his Distemper increasing, his Body was too feeble to answer the invincible Greatness of his Soul: And therefore tho' he went in a Litter, to be carry'd among his Troops, yet finding himself extremely ill, he was oblig'd to return and stay at Bois-de-Vincennes, while the Duke of Bedford by his Order march'd with the whole Army to join the Duke of Burgundy at Veselay.

King Henry designs to fight the Dauphine.

His last Sickness.

The

The Duke of Burgundy gratefully acknowledg'd the King of England's Kindness; and joining all the Forces, he took his March to Cone, which was besieg'd by the Dauphine, and encamp'd near the Town, preparing for that important Battel which was to be fought the next Day. The French Prince finding his Enemies to exceed him in Number and Strength, notwithstanding he had made a publick Denance by his Heralds, immediately broke up the Siege, and retreated to Bourges in Berry. The Duke having thus rais'd the Siege, and forc'd his Enemies to a most dishonourable Retreat without Fighting, return'd to Troyes with his Army. In their March the Duke of Bedford receiv'd the mournful News, that his Brother King Henry's Life was in Danger; upon which he left the Army, and attended with a few choice Friends, rod full Speed to le Vincennes. The brave King sensible that he was dying, gave Orders that the Duke of Bedford, the Duke of Exeter, the Earl of Warwick, Sir Lewis Robessart, and seven or eight more, who had the greatest Place in his Affection and Confidence, should stand around his Bed. To whom he spoke to this Effect. I am just now approaching the Period of my Life, which tho' short, has been glorious and conducing to the Good and Honour of my People; and tho' it has been spent in Wars and Bloodshed, yet since milder Methods have been ineffectual, and nothing less could vindicate my Right, the Miseries produc'd are not to be imputed to me, but to my Enemies, as the Effect of their Injustice. As Death never appear'd formidable in so many Battels and Sieges, so I can now without Horror behold its gradual Approaches in a Disease; and since it is the Will of Heav'n to put an End to my Days, I cheerfully resign my self to its Pleasure: Nor should I leave the World with the least Reluctancy, if two Things did not nearly touch me. One is, that I must go out of it when my Subjects are involv'd in the Confusions of a War, before I see the Enemy, who opposes the Peace and Glory of both Nations, intirely subdu'd by my Arms; and the Other is, that I see my self call'd from the Throne at a Time, when my Son is only an Infant, and incapable of filling it. Therefore to obviate all future Inconveniencies, he with the most pathetic and endearing Expressions urg'd them all strictly to observe his Advice and

His Instructions.

The Substance of which was, That they would take the most exact Care in the Education of his Son, and inviolably preserve their Loyalty to him; and that they would comfort his beloved Wife, now the most disconsolate Princess living: That they would keep strict Faith with the Duke of Burgundy, and never make Peace with the Dauphine, on any other Condition than that of having all the Dukedom of Normandy intirely secur'd to the English Crown: That they would preserve a strict Union among themselves, and not discharge the Duke of Orleans, the Count d'Eu, and some other noble Prisoners, till his Son was of Years to govern: That his Brother the Duke of Bedford, with the Assistance of the Duke of Burgundy, should manage the Kingdom of France; and that his Uncle the Duke of Exeter, with his Brother the Duke of Gloucester, should govern that of England.

The sorrowful Nobles observ'd in profound Silence, and with assured Promises gave their Approbation to these last Counsels so sensibly urg'd by their expiring Monarch; who having thus establish'd his secular Affairs, had his Thoughts wholly imploy'd about the Condition of his Soul now departing into another World. Ordering his Physicians to come to him, he demanded of them how long he had to live; but they declining a direct Answer, and flattering him with the Hopes of Life, the King with Dissatisfaction charg'd them upon their Allegiance to declare their Opinion in positive Terms. After some little Consultation among themselves, one of them kneeling down in the Name of the rest said, Sir, think upon your Soul, for as we judge, without a Miracle, you cannot live longer than two Hours. Upon which with the highest Devotion he proceeded to Confession, commanding his Priests to sing the seven penipenitential Psalms; and when in the fifty first Psalm they came to those Words, Build up the Walls of Jerufalem, he bad them stop, and with a loud Voice declar'd upon the Word of a dying Man, That after the Settlement of the Kingdom of France, he really intended, with the Will of Heav'n, to have made War against the Infidels, for the Conquest of Jerufalem. Having finish'd their Devotion, this great King expir'd at the Hour which the Physician had foretold, on the thirty first Day of August, in the Prime of his Years the thirty fourth of his Age, after a short, but most glorious, magnificent and triumphant Reign of nine Years, four Months, and eleven Days.

By the Gratitude of this Age his Funeral Obsequies were proportion'd to his Worth and Grandeur. His Body, embalm'd and enclos'd in Lead, was laid on a Chariot of State, richly adorn'd with Cloath of Gold; and on a Bed in the same Chariot was laid a lively Figure of his Person, with Imperial Robes, a Crown of Gold, a Scepter and Globe, like a triumphant Monarch; and over all was a glorious silk Canopy. The Chariot was drawn by six Horses in rich Harness: The first bore the Arms of St. George, the second the Arms of Normandy, the third those of King Arthur, the fourth those of St. Edward, the fifth the Arms of France, and the sixth those of England and France. James King of the Scots follow'd it as principal Mourner; and after him the Duke of Exeter, the Earls of Warwick, Marche, Stafford and Mortaigne, the Lords Fitz-Hugh, Hungerford, Bourchier, Fanhope and Cromwell, Sir Robert Robessart, and Sir John Cornwall. The Banners of the Saints were born by the Lords Lovel, Audely, Morley and Zouch; the Baron Dudley bore the great Standard, and the Earl of Longueville the Banner. The Hachments were carry'd by twelve Commanders, and around the Chariot rod five hundred Men at Arms all in black Armour, their Horses barb'd black, and their Lances held with the Points downward. Three hundred cloath'd in White, bearing lighted Torches, also furrounded the Chariot, with Lords bearing Banners, Bannetrels and Penons; those of the King's Household cloath'd in Black follow'd it, and after them the Royal Family in deep Mourning; while the sorrowful Queen with a noble Retinue follow'd at a League's Distance. In this solemn Manner the Body was convey'd from Bois de Vincennes to Paris, and so to Roan, to Abbeville, to Calais, to Dover, from thence through the City of London to Westminster, where it was interr'd with such pompous Ceremonies, such Mourning of the Nobility, Prayers of the Ecclesiasticks, and Lamentations of the Commons, as were never known before in the Kingdom of England. He was bury'd in the Abby Church, and his Queen caus'd his Image in Silver gilt, of the full Proportion, to be laid on his Tomb.

These were the last Honours done to this mighty Monarch, the Wonder of all Christendom, who was so highly reverenc'd and lov'd by all his People, that his Funerals were attended with an universal Sorrow. They saw all their Hopes of subduing France lost in the Death of a Prince, who only knew how to conquer it, and that with an Army never exceeding thirty thousand; so that some believe his Enemies took away his Life by Poison, which they could not destroy in open War. He had all the Accomplishments of Body and Mind which are requir'd to the finishing a great Man. His Stature was tall and majestic, his Body tho' lean and slender, had all its Limbs well proportion'd, and strongly fram'd; his Neck long, his Hair black, and a manly Beauty shin'd in his Face, as well as sparkled in his Eyes. His Strength and Agility was admirable in all the Exercises he perform'd; which was continually preserv'd by his being temperate, chaste, endur'd to all the Hardships of War, patient of Heat and Cold, Hunger and Thirst, and moderate in Sleep. He was a nice Observer of Justice, pious in his Religion, constant in his Devotions, a great Patron of the Church and Clergy, and abounding in Works of Charity; wise in his Counsels, magnanimous in his Designs, and resolute in pursuing them; great and somewhat reserv'd in his Temper, given to speak little, but all he said was like like himself. As to his Valour and Bravery his whole Reign was a continual and wonderful Instance of it; in the Exercise of which, his strictest Orders were so nicely obey'd, that he reviv'd the martial Discipline of the old Romans, by which they conquer'd the World: And never was the English Valour so gloriously display'd, as in this Reign. For his great Acts he has been compar'd to no less than three of the nine Worthies of the World; to David the Prophet, for Piety; to Cæsar the Invincible, for Glory; and to Alexander the Great, for Magnanimity: And with this Advantage, that he was not unchaste like David, vain-glorious like Cæsar, nor intemperate like Alexander; who while they conquer'd others, became Slaves to their own Passions. As he exceeded them in these Qualifications, so he was not inferior to them in his Fortunes, being neither so dejected as David, so much envy'd as Cæsar, nor so dreaded as Alexander; it being his good Fortune never to be distress'd, distrust'd or despis'd. But the unexpected Loss of this Prince in the Flower of his Youth, and in the Midst, or rather Rising of his prosperous Fortune, will serve for a pregnant Instance and Example to shew what slender Hold mortal Man has of Worldly Greatness and Glory, being continually subject either to the sudden Loss of it, or as suddenly to be taken from it: And indeed there seems to be something of the more immediate Hand of Providence in it, which now began to chastise the Progeny of King Henry the Fourth.

His publick Works.

His Works of Piety were shewn in erecting the Monasteries of Bethlem and Bridget, near his Manor of Richmond, as also his bounteous Gifts to the Works and Furniture of Westminster Church, besides the Fraternity of St. Giles without Cripplegate; and many other greater Things he had projected at Oxford and other Places. To leave a Testimony of his Affection to Arms, he first instituted Garter principal King at Arms; besides other honourable Augmentations to the Order of St. George. In this Reign flourish'd, besides the most renowned Soldiers, many Men of Note for Arts and Learning, as William Linwood the great Canonist of that Age, Stephen Pattington, Robert Mascal, Alain de Lyn, Thomas Otterborn, John Sherburn, John Leland, and many others.

The Reign of King HENRY the Sixth.

Containing 38 Years, 6 Months, and 4 Days.

A. D. I. AFTER God had depriv'd the English of the greatest King in the World, he thought fit that an Infant should succeed him, now but nine Months old, who upon the thirtieth Day of August was by the Sound of Trumpets proclaim'd King of England and France, by the Name of Henry the Sixth. But as the Wisdom of some supplies the Defects of Age in others, so his Father had by his last Will appointed, and now the Lords by their Consent confirm'd the grand Care of the Publick to his two brave and powerful Uncles, John Duke of Bedford, and Humphry Duke of Glocester: The former, joining with the Duke of Burgundy, had the Regency of France; and the latter the Government of England; and the Care and Tuition of the Royal Infant was committed to the two Brothers, Thomas Duke of Exeter, and Henry Beaufort Bishop of Winchester and Chancellor of England. This Appointment prov'd really advantageous to the English Nation; for they all carry'd themselves so upright and carefully in their several Stations, that it well appear'd the Trust repos'd in them by the dying King, had made a noble Impression pression of Love and Loyalty towards his Son. And indeed the Beginning of this Reign, like the fair Morn of a most tempestuous Day, promis'd nothing less than a Continuance of past Felicities. For the State of the English Affairs was great and flourishing; England without Tumult, the natural fierce Humours of her People consuming or encreasing themselves in France; and France her self, for the nobler Parts, together with the grand City of Paris, was at their Devotion. There wanted nothing but the mighty Henry himself to compleat the Work begun; for besides the valiant Duke of Bedford, there were the two Terrors of France, Thomas Earl of Salisbury, and John Lord Talbot, and Armies of veteran Soldiers, where almost each Man was equal to a Commander. Yet Providence in Time thought fit to change the whole Course of Affairs; and the first Disadvantage which happen'd to the English Cause was the Death of Charles King of France, who surviv'd King Henry no more than fifty three Days. This may be truly call'd the first Disadvantage, because the Inbecilities of that Prince were a great Strength to the English; and on the other Side the Infancy of young Henry was an Advantage to Charles the Dauphine, who by those of his own Party was now proclaim'd King of France, as the English in Derision us'd to stile him King of Berry, because he had not much more left than that Province.

Charles King of France dies.

In England a Parliament was assembled the better to establish the Crown upon the Infant, and to provide for the publick Uses and Necessities of the State; among which Mony was liberally granted, particularly five Nobles upon every Sack of Wool. It was a new and uncommon Sight to the English Nation, to see an Infant sitting in his Mother's Lap, and exercising Sovereign Power in open Parliament; for Queen Catharine, to illuminate that publick Assembly with the Presence of her Royal Babe, remov'd from Windsor to London, and with him in her Arms was carry'd through the City in a pompous and splendid manner to Westminster; where being seated upon his Throne, by the ordinary Mouth of that high Court, he saluted the August Body, and propos'd Matters of the highest Consequence to their most mature Consideration. As the Affairs of this young Monarch were wisely establish'd in England, so they were no less vigorously prosecuted in France by the worthy Regent the Duke of Bedford; who heartily joining with the Duke of Burgundy, fortify'd the Frontiers of their Possessions, assembled their Deputies and Representatives, and us'd all Methods to retain the Hearts of their own Party. In a publick Assembly at Paris the Duke of Bedford in a solemn Speech exhorted the Nobility of France, Not to violate their sworn Allegiance, nor endeavour by themselves or others to defraud their Sovereign Lord King Henry of his rightful Inheritance; nor to countenance any faithless Men who would revive the expiring Animosities between the French and English Names and Nations. That they would remember, how by the Bounty of Providence, the two Kingdoms of France and England were in perpetual League united into one glorious Monarchy, and lately establish'd beyond the Extent of all Human Force. That tho' they had been great Sufferers by the War, yet they would be no less Gainers, if they honour'd, lov'd and obey'd their lawful Sovereign King Henry, and according to their bounden Duty prosecuted his Enemies to the utmost Extremity. This Speech found plausible Admission; and young Henry was in Paris solemnly proclaim'd King of England and France, and such Noblemen as were present did their Homages, and took their Oaths of Fealty. The like Obligations and Oaths of Allegiance were in the same manner put upon all Frenchmen in the English Dominions in France.

gage his Castles and the best Part of his Demeasnes in pawn for them. But the greatest Strength of his Army consisted of some thousands of the Scottish Nation, who as true Enemies to the English, serv'd under his Banner. The first Attempt made by Charles his Forces prov'd unfortunate; for marching to relieve Cravant, which the English had besieg'd, they were put to flight with the Loss of two thousand of their Men. Charles and his Adherents were so far from sinking under the Apprehensions of so ill an Omen, that they resolv'd to encounter adverse Fortune with Encrease of Courage. Pursuing this Resolution, they in a short Time after repair'd the late Loss by an Overthrow which they gave to a Party of English, from whom, with the Slaughter of fifteen hundred, they recover'd a great Booty, especially of Cattle, which they had gotten in the Counties of Nugion and Main. Proceeding in this Course Charles took Meulan upon the Sein, and put the English Garrison to the Sword: But the Possession was short, and the Revenge speedy; for the Earl of Salisbury, whom Polydore compares to the old Romans for Valour and Bravery, taking with him John of Luxemburg, General of the Burgundian Horse, soon recover'd the Place, and kill'd all the French that were found in it.

The better to establish the English Affairs, at the City of Amiens in Picardy, the three great Dukes of Bedford, Burgundy and Breitaign, with the Earl of Richemont, met in great State; where they renew'd the former League, adding, 'That each should be the other's Friend, and that all of them should unite their Forces in the Defence of King Henry's Right. But for the better Confirmation of this profitable Alliance, the Duke of Bedford, then a Batchelor, marry'd the Lady Anne, Sister to the Duke of Burgundy; and the Earl of Richemont marry'd another of the Duke's Sisters nam'd Margaret. While the Regent was absent from Paris upon these just Occasions, the Parisians, who not long before had sent Ambassadors into England to acknowledge King Henry, now enter'd into a Design to deliver up the City to Charles the new King. The Regent had timely Notice of this dangerous Conspiracy, and with his Presence reduc'd them to their Duty, with the Execution of several of the chief Actors. Not long after there seasonably arriv'd out of England ten thousand fresh Soldiers, over whom for Commanders he appointed the famous Earl of Salisbury, William Pole Earl of Suffolk, Robert Willoughby and others; while he himself for the general Service led eight hundred Horse-men, and eight thousand Foot. With these Field Forces the main of the English Estate in France was supported and held together, tho' not without Difficulties and various Adventures; in which the Regent took from Charles several strong Towns and Forts, as Crotoy, Compeigne, Basas, and many others.

French at Ver-
nevil.

The Regent's chief Design was to draw Charles to a general Battel, hoping by that to finish his Work; to that End he march'd into Normandy, while the other muster'd his Soldiers in Tourain. To promote this Design, the Regent laid Siege to Ivry; whereupon the Duke of Alençon was detach'd at the Head of sixteen thousand Men, with Instructions to fight, if Occasion serv'd, but Charles himself was not permitted to hazard his Person. Not far from the Town of Vernevil, which the English had taken before Alençon and his Charolmes could relieve it, the two Armies drew up in Battalia. The Fight began with Arrows and Darts, which being not quick enough to dispatch the Work, the eager Combatants proceeded to Hand-Blows, where for some Hours they maintain'd a constant and doubtful Conflict with prodigious Fury. The English enur'd to the French Wars, having born the first and fiercest Attacks of their Enemies, by an uniform Courage intirely broke them and put them to flight: and the Regent himself with his Battel-Ax did Wonders, and won immortal Honour in the bloody Contest. In this Battel, which was fought on the eighteenth of August, were slain on the French Side five Earls, two Viscounts, twenty Barons, and above seven thousand Soldiers, besides two thousand seven hundred hundred Scots lately arriv'd; and the English took the Duke of Alençon himself Prisoner, with two hundred other Men of Note, besides inferior Soldiers; all which cost them the Lives of two thousand one hundred common Soldiers, and the two Lords Dudley and Charleton. After which, the Regent return'd to Paris, and the Earl of Salisbury with ten thousand Men took the strong City of Mans, the Town of St. Susan, the Fort of St. Bernard, and other Places; from whence, marching into Anjou, he there perform'd such Heroick Acts, that his very Name grew terrible to all France. The News of these Transactions arriving in England caus'd great Rejoicings among the People, both for the Victory in the open Field, and the gaining of so many considerable Places; for which general Processions and publick Thanksgivings were appointed.

Rejoicings in England.

In England, during these prosperous Proceedings, James the First King of Scotland, whose Ransom had been settled in the late Reign, was now fully set at Liberty: But before his Departure out of the Kingdom he did Homage to young King Henry in Windsor Castle in the Presence of many of the Nobility and Gentry in these Words, I James Stuart, King of the Scots, will be true and faithful to you Lord Henry, King of England and France, the Superior Lord of Scotland, and to you I make my Fidelity for the said Kingdom, which I hold and claim of you, and will do you Service for the same, so help me God, and these Holy Evangelists. But notwithstanding this solemn Oath, and the many munificent Presents that were made to him, he did not long continue in the English Interest, but afterwards became as firm to the French as any of his Predecessors. After Easter, in the Third Year of this Reign, by the Advice of the Peers, the young King call'd a Parliament; and going to the House himself, he was convey'd through the City upon a noble Courser, in extraordinary Triumph, the People thronging the Streets to behold the Child, whom they judg'd to have the lively Features and Countenance of his glorious Father, and likely to succeed him in all mighty Qualifications and Abilities, as well as Kingdoms and Dominions. During this Season, Edmund Mortimer the last Earl of Marche of that Name, and nearest Heir to the Crown of England, deceas'd without Issue, and his great Patrimony descended to Richard Plantagenet Earl of Cambridge, Son and Heir to the same Earl of Cambridge that was beheaded in the Beginning of the last Reign. In the Time of this Parliament also Sir John Mortimer, Cousin to the deceas'd Earl, either out of Desert or Malice, was impeach'd for High-Treason, and publicly executed; from whose Death there arose no small Murmurings among the common People.

In the mean Time the Amity and Alliance with the Duke of Burgundy, which the English had found so advantageous in their Conquests, having otherwise receiv'd some slight Flaws, was now in danger of being utterly broken upon this Occasion. Humphry Duke of Glocester, Protector of England, following Advices unworthy of his Person and Station, contracted himself with the Lady Jaqueline of Bavaria, Inheritrix of Holland, Zealand, Hainault, and of many other fair Dominions in the Netherlands, notwithstanding that the Duke of Brabant her Husband was then living, and that the Suit of Divorce commenc'd by Jaqueline was still depending between them. The Duke of Burgundy in this Affair join'd with Brabant; which soon rais'd the Indignation of the Duke of Glocester, who not being us'd to meet with Opposition, went over in Person with an Army to take Possession of Hainault in Right of his suppos'd Wife; but finding himself disappointed by the Succours which Burgundy sent to the Duke of Brabant, he proceeded to challenge the former in Combate, and to call him Traitor. This was accepted, but by the Duke of Bedford's Mediation the Challenge fell, and the Matter was accommodated; so that that the Duke of Glocester, without performing any Thing for which he came, left his Lady at her Town of Mons, and return'd into England. Here Mexeray is of Opinion that if this unreasonable Contest had not happen'd, the rest of France at this Time

Time had undoubtedly been subdu'd. Not long after the Duke of Glocester's Return, the first Marriage which had been made and consummated between the Duke of Brabant and the said Lady Jaqueline, was pronounc'd lawful and valid by Pope Martin the Fifth. Whereupon the Duke of Glocester, having fustain'd many Losses both of Friends and Treasure, in Punishment of his Crime of taking another Man's Wife, shortly after marry'd Eleanor, Daughter to the Lord Cobham of Sterborough; by which he is said to have made her Compensation for that unlawful Familiarity that had formerly pass'd between them.

Reg. 3.

A Dispute between the Duke of Glocester and Bishop of Winchester.

II. By this Time the Court of England began to discover the usual Effects of an Infant's sitting upon the Throne, by the dangerous Emulation of the two principal Men in the Nation, the Duke of Glocester and his Uncle the Bishop of Winchester, the one Protector of the Kingdom, and the other a Tutor to the King. Whether it was that the former hated the Riches and pompous Living of the latter, or that the latter envy'd the great Authority of the former; it is certain that the English Court, the City of London, and the whole Kingdom was disturb'd by this unhappy Contention: Alterations not to be wonder'd at; for as Thunder foreruns a Storm, so King Henry's Misfortunes were not to fall out without a Precedency of many Disorders, which tho' separately consider'd were of no great Moment, yet being join'd were such as at length caus'd his Ruin. The News of these Domestick Disturbances oblig'd the great Duke of Bedford to return from France, tho' the State of that Realm sufficiently requir'd his Presence. For the Duke of Bretaign, notwithstanding his late Renovation of the League with the Regent, growing jealous of the English Greatness, suddenly turn'd to Charles's Party; and with him the Earl of Richemont his Brother. This gave fresh Life to the declining Prince, who made Richemont Constable of his Part of France, in the Room of the Earl of Douglafs slain in the Battel of Vernevil; and he to show his Gratitude gather'd about twenty thousand Men, and suddenly invested St. Jean, a Town in Normandy, upon the frontiers of Bretaign, which the Duke of Somerset, Governor of Normandy had lately fortify'd and replenish'd with Soldiers. This unexpected Approach of the French at first much perplex'd the English; but upon better Consideration, they valiantly sallied upon them, both on the Front and the Rear, which struck such a Terror into them, that with the Loss of their Artillery, and many of their Men, they abandon'd the Siege. To redeem which Dishonour Richemont turn'd his Fury against the Country of Anjou, pillaging and depopulating many Places. The Regent having resolv'd to return into England, left behind him the valiant Beauchamp Earl of Warwick for his Lieutenant, who was lately arriv'd in France with six thousand fresh Soldiers. Having enter'd the City of London, the Duke was magnificently receiv'd by the Citizens, and presented with two Silver Basons gilt, and a thousand Marks in Money, as an Instance of their Esteem and Gratitude.

To reconcile which the Duke of Bedford returns into England.

The happy Presence of the Duke of Bedford, Regent of France, was highly useful to the State of England. For the Wisdom and Authority of so great a Prince, eldest Uncle to the King, and one whom many Actions had render'd famous, soon allay'd the Dissemper which he found at his Arrival. It was a Work worthy of his Labour, and he found it a Work not easie to be effected by a Labour and Power less than his own. The Differences were debated first at St. Albans, then at Northampton, and lastly in a Parliament at Leicester, which continu'd there till towards the End of June. The Duke of Bedford himself, to avoid all Marks of Partiality to his Brother of Glocester, here would not intermeddle otherwise than in general Words to encourage Amity, but had the whole Cause referr'd to the most considerable Men in the Nation, both for Birth and Wisdom. By the prudent Endeavours of these all their Differences, Grievances and Accusations were equally thrust into one Bag, to be seal'd up by Oblivion for ever; and without Mention of Compensations on either Side, Reconciliation made.

the

the Duke swore by his Princehood, and the Bishop by his Priesthood, truly to observe the Award, and were for that time fully reconcil'd. This pious and necessary Work of private Reconciliation was succeeded by several Acts of Fertility and Honour. For in the same Town of Leicester, the young King, not then five Years of Age, was at the high Feast of Whitsuntide solemnly knighted by his Uncle the Regent of France. Immediately after the King honour'd Richard Earl of Cambridge, Heir to the late Earl of Marche, with the same Order of Knighthood, and about forty more with him. This Earl of Cambridge was at this Parliament, by a fatal Error, not only restor'd to his Blood, tainted by his Father, but likewise created Duke of York; and he was the Person that afterwards caus'd the Extirpation of the Male Lines, both of his own and the House of Lancaster. And it was more than probable that he would never have made such a bold Attempt, had he not been promoted to this Honour, and to other Dignities and Places of Trust, that gave him Opportunity to effect his Purposes. But Providence governs Affairs here below by Means contrary to secular Reason; for while Men weakly imagine that good Turns will extinguish the Memory of past Offences, Examples manifest how often they have been superseded by Interest, Humour and Ambition.

The Earl of Cambridge, Heir to the Crown, made Duke of York.

Now the triple Cord began to be untwisted, and one of the great Supporters of the King's Infancy, the Duke of Exeter departed this Life; a Man of no small Wisdom and Abilities, who having no Sons, made the King his Heir, tho' besides the Bishop of Winchester his Brother, and the Countess of Westmorland his Sister, he had many Nephews. To supply his Room, Beauchamp Earl of Warwick was constituted Guardian and Tutor to the young King. But he did not immediately return into England, for being Lieutenant to the Duke of Bedford in France, he continu'd there for some Time, and perform'd many noble Actions. He enter'd into the Country of Main and took the Town of Chasteau de Loire, and after that the Castles of Maiet and Lude, in all which he put Garrisons and English Governors. Here he was inform'd that the French were gather'd together in the Country of Beaux, upon which he hasten'd to have given them Battel, but they understanding his Design, fled at the Terror of his Name and Nation. The Earl in his Return won the Castle of Montdu-bleau, where leaving the valiant Lord Willoughby, he return'd to Paris. It would be endless to take Notice of all the Sieges, Skirmishes, and Enterprizes in these Wars both foreign and domestick. There was not a City or Borough in France without Garrisons; Forts and Castles were built in all convenient Places, upon Hills, Rivers, narrow Ways and open Fields; every Lord had his Soldiers, or rather his Bands of Robbers, who maintain'd themselves by feeding upon the poor miserable Country People. During these Calamities, Means were us'd by the Duke of Burgundy for the Freedom of the Duke of Alençon, taken at the Battel of Vernevil; and now for the Sum of two hundred thousand Crowns he was set at Liberty; but nothing could induce him to acknowledge King Henry's Title in France.

His Actions in France.

The great Duke of Bedford having at length worthily establish'd the Peace of England, took Shipping with his Lady, and landed at Calais; where the Bishop of Winchester, who went over with him, receiv'd the Habit, Cap and Dignity of a Cardinal; which Promotion the late King, with a penetrating Eye seeing his boundless Ambition, had more than once defeated. But now the King being young, and the Regent his Friend, he obtain'd his Purpose to his great Profit, and the Impoverishment of the Spiritualities of England: For by a Legantine Bull, which he purchas'd from Rome, he gather'd so much Treasure, that he gain'd the Name of the rich Cardinal of Winchester. With the Regent there went over a great Number of select fresh Soldiers, under the Command of that renowned Lord Talbot, whose Victories, says Polydore, were so numerous, that his Name was not only formidable to the French, but famous throughout the World, even to this present Time. per and Fierceness, upon one Side of his broad Sword he had this Motto, Sum Talboti, and on the other this boisterous Sentence, Pro vincere Inimicos meos. Not long after his Arrival, at Montarges, near Orleans, a Party of English receiv'd an Overthrow with the Loss of about fifteen hundred Men; and in Bretaign the French sustain'd great Damages from a Commander under the Duke of Somerset. After which the Inhabitants of Mans in Maine had let in the French by Night, who barbarously massacred most of the English in the Place. William Earl of Suffolk, Governor of the Town, retiring with some Men into the Castle, sent to the Lord Talbot for Succour. He immediately came, and his Men unexpectedly crying out St. George a Talbot! the French were suddenly reduc'd to the last Extremity, and most of the Soldiers put to the Sword. All the rest were spar'd, only thirty Citizens and thirty five Priests and Religious were beheaded as Traitors, and the City remain'd in its former Condition; and it was hard to judge which of three Things were most commendable in Talbot, his Wisdom, his Celerity, or his Valour.

The Siege of

Earl of Salis-

The Earl of

The English
Affairs decline in France.

Above a Year after the Earl of Warwick had been declar'd Governor to the King, he left France and return'd into England; and the Earl of Salisbury succeeded him in his Charge, who went over with five thousand Soldiers. Consulting with the Regent, he bethought himself of some Action that might answer the Greatness of his own Name, and the publick Occasions; and the Siege of Orleans was by him propos'd in Council. The Credit of the Earl was a sufficient Reason to convince them how practicable it was; and was accordingly furnish'd with all competent Provisions. The Inhabitants of Orleans, dreading the approaching Storm, with great Diligence provided for their Defence; and the Suburbs, as large as some Cities, were levell'd to the Ground, that the Enemy might not annoy them from thence; and they wanted not Men, Victuals, Ammunition and a constant Resolution to fight. The Earl of Salisbury, the Lord Talbot, and a formidable Force under expert Commanders, in a short Time presented themselves before this large and beautiful City. No Enemies appearing abroad, the Earl approach'd near to the Walls; and finding Attacks fruitless, he intrench'd about the City, and to secure his Camp, he cast up Ramparts and other Works of Defence. He seiz'd upon the Fort which stood at the Bridge Foot beyond the River Loire, and surrounded the Besieged on every side, so that Charles of France could send no sufficient Relief to them. When Human Helps fail, God often interposes his Hand, which is generally most conspicuous in the Deliverance of Nations. The City was now reduc'd to the last Distress, the Siege having lasted sixty Days, not without great Bloodshed on both Sides. The valiant Earl of Salisbury, impatient of such Delay, propos'd to give a general Assault; and the better to consider of the Manner of it, he stood to take a View at a Window, barr'd with Iron, which over-look'd the City towards the East. Here Providence began to shew it self against the English Affairs; for a Cannon Bullet levell'd by a Boy against the Window, struck the Iron Grates, so that the Splinters so wounded the Earl, and one Sir Thomas Gargrave, that they both dy'd within a few Days. Here our Authors tell us That soon after this Man's Death the Fortune of War chang'd; and now both mortal and immortal Powers began to look favourably on the declining State of France. This to the English was said to be the Beginning of Misfortunes, for after this by several backward Steps they lost all their Possessions in that Kingdom; and tho' they sometimes gain'd after that, yet they usually lost three Times as much. For which Reason Polydore, after many Encomiums upon the Earl, calls him the Man in whom the Safety of the English State consisted.

A. D. However the Siege of Orleans did not end with his Life; for De la Pole Earl of Suffolk, the Lord Talbot and the rest maintain'd the same all Winter. 1429. The Wants of the Camp were reliev'd by a Convoy from Paris, under the Com- Reg. 7. mand of Sir John Falstolfe, and fifteen hundred Soldiers, who safely arriv'd, notwith-notwithstanding all the Endeavours of ten thousand French to intercept them: At length the City offer'd to surrender, but not to the English; the Besieg'd were content that the Duke of Burgundy should have the Honour: A subtle Artifice to break the Alliance between the English and him. The Regent and his Council being sent to, they concluded it unreasonable, since the English had been at all the Labour and Charge. The Duke of Burgundy secretly repented this Refusal, which ever after pall'd his Relish to the English Friendship: Yet the Regent's Answer was just and honest, That the War was made in King Henry's Name, therefore Orleans ought to be his.

In these Difficulties were the French Affairs involv'd: But while Charles of France grew more sensible of the miserable Straits of his beloved City, and ignorant how to remedy so near a Misfortune; at Chenon a young Virgin of eighteen Years of Age presented her self to him, call'd Joan of Lorraine, Daughter to James of Arck, dwelling in Damremy upon the Meause, an ordinary Shepherdess, who bad him not to faint, constantly affirming That God had sent her to deliver the Realm of France from the English Yoke, and restore him to all his Dominions. She was not immediately credited; but when the Wisdom of Ecclesiasticks and military Men had put many Questions to her, and she still continu'd to her first Words, uttering nothing but what was modest, chaste and holy, Honour and Belief was at length given to her Sayings. Upon which Joan arm'd her self like a Man, and requir'd to have that Sword which hung in St. Catharine's Church of Fierebois in Tourain; which Demand encreas'd their Admiration of her, since such a Sword was found among the old Donaries or Vestive Tokens of that Church. Thus warlikely accouter'd she rode immediately to Blois, where Forces and fresh Provisions lay for the Relief of Orleans; with which she and the Admiral and Marshal of France safely enter'd. This highly encourag'd the declining French; and Joan the Maid of God, as she was now call'd, wrot this peculiar Letter to the Earl of Suffolk then lying before the Town. King of England, do Justice to the King of Heav'n, in his Blood Royal; deliver up to the Virgin the Keys of all the good Cities you have forc'd. She is come from Heav'n to restore the Blood Royal, and is ready to make a Peace, if you be ready to do Justice: Yield therefore, and restore what you have taken, King of England. I am the Chief of this War, therefore I encounter your Men in France, and will pursue them; if they will obey, I will take them to Mercy. The Virgin comes from Heav'n to drive you out of France: If you will not obey, she will raise such a Flame as has not been known these thousand Years in France. And be assur'd that the King of Heav'n will send to her, and her good Men of Arms, more Forces than you have. Go in God's Name into your Country: Be not obstinate, for you shall not hold France of the King of Heav'n; but Charles shall enjoy it, the King and lawful Heir, to whom God has given it, he shall enter Paris with a noble Train. You Earl of Suffolk, Lord Talbot, Lord Scales, Lieutenants to the Duke of Bedford; and you Duke of Bedford, terming your self Regent of France, spare innocent Blood, and leave Orleans at Liberty. If you do not Justice to them you have wrong'd, the French will perform the greatest Exploit that ever was known in Christendom. Understand these News from God and the Virgin.

Joan of Arck appears in publick.

She arms her self in the Defence of Orleans.

Her Letter to the Earl of Suffolk.

This Letter was entertain'd by the English with Laughter, and Joan reputed no better than an Enthusiast or Enchantress; tho' to some it was thought more honourable to the English that they were not to be repell'd by Human Force, but by something extraordinary, if not Divine. Du Serres gives this Character of the Virgin, That she was of a modest Aspect, sweet, civil and resolute; her Discourse moderate, rational and reserv'd; her Actions demonstrating great Chastity, without Vanity, Affectation or Levity. Whatever her Qualifications were, by her Encouragements and Conduct the English soon lost their Hopes of Orleans, after they had suffer'd the Duke of Alençon to enter with new Forces, and with great Loss were constrain'd to break up the Siege. In all Actions she was one and foremost, and she made several fierce Sallies upon the English; in one of which being shot through the Arm with an Arrow, she courageously cry'd out, This is a Favour from Heav'n, let us go on; they cannot escape the Hand of God: The English lost in this Siege the Earl of Salisbury, the Lord Molins, the Lord Poynings, and great Numbers of inferior Persons, slain by the Sallies of this martial Virgin. The Lord Talbot march'd off in good Order with above nine thousand Men, whom Joan would not suffer the French to pursue. In Memory of this extraordinary Deliverance the City of Orleans erected a Monument, where Charles the Seventh King of France and Joan the martial Maid were represented, kneeling in Armour, elevating their Eyes and Hands to Heav'n, in Token of their Thanks and Acknowledgment.

delity.*

Now there was an interchangeable Taking and Recovering of Towns, and Places of Importance on both Sides. The Castle of Galiard was surrender'd to the French upon Composition, where in a grated Chamber they found the valiant Lord Barbafon, who having sworn to be a true Prisoner, could not be induc'd to come out of that Place, 'till Captain Kingston, to whom he had given that Oath, was upon safe Conduct recall'd to acquit him, which was accordingly done: A rare Example of Constancy in him, considering how little Regard the rest of the Nation at that Time had to Oaths. The Lord Talbot took Lavall, and the Earl of Suffolk threw himself into Jergeaux. To which last Place the Duke of Alençon with Joan and other great Commanders march'd, and forc'd it by Storm. Sir Alexander Pool Brother to the Earl of Suffolk was slain, with many others in the Encounter, and the Earl himself was taken Prisoner. After the Duke of Alençon had added some other Places to his Conquests, his Numbers were augmented by the Conjunction of the Constable of France, the Earl of Vandome, the Lord Dalbret and others; so that now their whole Army consisted of about twenty three thousand effective Men. With these they suddenly attack'd the valiant Lord Talbot, who had not above a fifth Part of their Number, at a Village call'd Patay, whom they charg'd so unexpectedly, that his Archers had no Time to fortifie their Stations after their usual Manner, by Palisadoes or Empalement of Stakes, so that they were driven to uncommon Difficulties. After three Hours brave Resistance, the English were put to the worst; and the Lord Scales, the Lord Hungerford, Sir Thomas Rampstone, and even the Lord Talbot himself, after a great Wound in the Back, were taken Prisoners. The Footmen forc'd to trust to their Swords, under the Shelter of such Horsemen as remain'd, retreated in good Order, and got to a Place of Safety, after they had lost about twelve hundred Men, and the French about half that Number. This Blow shook the very Foundation of the English Greatness in France, and awak'd Multitudes, even of those who had before sworn Fealty to King Henry; and now having a Colour of Divine Warrant for violating their Oaths, they readily join'd with the Victors for Recovering of the common Liberty. There succeeded an immediate Revolt of several Towns; and it was not long before Charles himself issu'd out in Arms, and recover'd the City of Rheims in Champaign; where, according to the Maid's Direction, he was solemnly crown'd King of France. Hitherto the might plausibly be thought prophetic and fortunate; and it seem'd that the chief Part of her Employment was accomplish'd, yet she flourish'd for some Space longer.

The Regent prepares against him.

The Duke of Bedford to prop the declining State of the English, upon the unfortunate News of the Relief of Orleans, and Captivity of Talbot, gather'd his whole Forces together, which amounted to about ten thousand English, besides certain Auxiliaries of Normans. With these he march'd out of Paris, and bravely oppos'd himself against the Current of Charles's new Prospects, who now design'd to have attempted that Capital City; being encourag'd by some of the the Citizens who held strict and secret Correspondence with him. But this Prince, knowing the Regent's Valour and Resolution, suspended the Execution of his Design, as yet having no Hopes to effect it; and being by Joan dissuaded from Fighting, the Regent return'd to Paris. Shortly after Compeign and Beauvois voluntarily submitted to the new crown'd King. The Regent having sealed the State and Garrisons of the chief City, pass'd into Normandy, to provide for a safe Retreat there, if the English should be constrain'd to quit their other Holds and Dominions; of which he began to be apprehensive, because he had Information of many secret Endeavours to win the Burgundians from King Henry's Side. While the Regent was absent upon this Occasion, Charles gain'd the Town of St. Denis, not far from Paris, but held it not long in Possession. From whence he sent the Duke of Alençon with the Maid of France, to try their Friends and Fortunes at Paris. Here they found none of their expected Success; for the English gave them so rough an Entertainment, that Joan herself was wounded, and the rest with great Slaughter repell'd. The Regent hearing of these Attempts; entrusted the Coast Towns of Normandy to the Care of the Duke of York, and Roan the Capital City to the Duke of Somerset, and hasten'd to Paris, where he highly commended the Soldiers and Citizens for not imitating the Disloyalty of their Neighbours.

New Supplies arriving out of England, the next Enterprize was to reduce Compeign to Obedience; to effect which John of Luxemburg with the Burgundians and some English Soldiers invested it. Here all the Glory of Joan the Maid of France came to a Period; for coming to relieve the Place, she successfully enter'd; but afterwards falling out, her Troops were beaten, and her self, as some say betray'd, taken Prisoner by the said Burgundian Knight, who for the Value of her Ransom, which was ten thousand Pounds Tournois, and three hundred Crowns annual Rent, deliver'd her into the Hands of the English. Notwithstanding the Siege was rais'd; after which they sent Joan to the City of Roan, where about nine or ten Months after she was burnt alive. The Roman Clælia was sav'd by Porfenna; and it is not to be doubted but that the Magnanimity of the English would have spar'd her, had they not found it necessary to deface the Opinion which the French to the highest Superstition had entertain'd of her. The English Writers show, how the Course of her Life being legally examin'd by the Bishop of Beauvois, in whose Diocese she was taken, and she being for Sorcery, Bloodshed, and unnatural Use of Masculine Habiliments, condemn'd to die, was notwithstanding, upon her solemn abjuring all her lewd Practices, pardon'd her Life, 'till again convicted of a perjurious Relapse, tho' acknowledging her self a Strumpet, and feigning herself with Child, she deservedly met with that Punishment which she thought to have deferr'd. Many of the French Writers show the highest Value for her Memory; and Mezeray says, that being on the Pile for Execution she foretold the English, That the Hand of God was ready to strike them, and that his Justice would not only drive them out of France, but pursue them into England, and make them suffer the same Miseries and Calamities they had inflicted on the French. However this is certain, that she was one of extraordinary Valour and Spirit, and the main Restorer of the Kingdom of France, and if she did not drive the English from thence, as she herself boasted, she was the chief, or at least one of the chief Human Causes why the English lost France.

The English Affairs still more and more declin'd; but to remedy these Misfortunes, it was by the wisest thought necessary for young King Henry to come over and be crown'd in Paris. He had the last Year with great Solemnity receiv'd the Crown of England at Westminster, being then about nine Years of Age, and ready to receive all Impressions either of Good or Bad. This Year resolving for France, before his Departure, Richard Duke of York was by a particular Patent made High-Constable of England during Life; which gave him a more sensible Taste of Greatness, and secretly whetted his ambitious Appetite.

King at Paris.

petite. The Affairs of England being settled, and new Supplies of Money granted by Parliament, the young King with a Noble Retinue took Shipping at Dover, and landed at Calais; from whence, after some Continuance, he remov'd to Roan, where he was receiv'd with all the Marks of Joy and Triumph. In the Month of November he departed from Roan in Order to make a publick Entry into the City of Paris; all which was magnificently perform'd in the Company of the two great Cardinals of Winchester and York, and the chief Princes of the Blood, Dukes, Earls, Barons, Prelates, the Flower of the English, French, Burgundians and Normans, with a select Body of three thousand Men for the Guard of his Person. It would be tedious to mention with what Honour and Pomp he was receiv'd into this glorious City, and what Pageants, Ornaments and Entertainments were prepar'd to render the Thing more solemn and triumphant. On the seventh Day of December he was publicly crown'd King of France in the grand Cathedral at Paris by his great Uncle the Cardinal of Winchester; and in his Return to the Palace he had one Crown on his Head, and another born before him, as likewise one Scepter in his Hand, and a second carry'd before him; implying that he was King of two several Kingdoms. The Duke of Bedford entertain'd the great Assembly with a set Speech, in which he declar'd King Henry his Nephew's undoubted Title to the Crown on his Head, and recommended the same to their Fidelities, adding large Promises both of Honour and Advantages. Such of the French Nobility as were then present did their Homage; the People had obliging and gracious Words given them, and Quantities of Money, Corn and Wine by way of Donative liberally bestow'd amongst them; and Proclamations made that all Frenchmen who came in by a fix'd Day, should be protected.

This great and splendid Feast did not pass without some Displeasure among the English Nobility; for the Cardinal of Winchester, who at this Time would suffer no Equal, commanded the Duke of Bedford to lay aside the Name of Regent, during the King's Presence, alledging, that while he was there in Person, the Power of a Substitute was at an end. The Duke of Bedford took such a secret Displeasure at this haughty Proceeding, that he never after favour'd the Cardinal, but oppos'd him in all his Actions; and this was the Root, as some think, of that Division among the English Nobility, where their Glory in the Realm of France began first to decline. After five Days Continuance in Paris from the Coronation, which were spent in publick Tournaments and the most splendid Entertainment, the King was advis'd to leave the Air of Paris and remove to Roan, where he kept his Christmases. Still Charles of France esteem'd himself no less a King, but daily pursu'd his Affairs; and his Men took the City of Chartres by Stratagem, and put the Bishop of the Place and others to the Sword. Nor were the English unemploy'd; for the Duke of Norfolk, the Earls of Arundel, Warwick and Suffolk, soon made up the Loss with much Advantage; which was increas'd by the Deliverance of the valiant Lord Talbot, who by vertue of an Exchange was now set free. It was observable among Foreigners, and not without Admiration, that the small and distant Country of England, under the Government of an Infant, should so long, and so successfully contend with such a potent and populous Kingdom as France. But at that Time such was the Valour and Martial Vigour of the English Nation, that they scarce knew any Medium between Death and Victory; always preferring an honourable End before a lingring Servitude. This mov'd Pope Eugenius, and all the Christian Princes, so often to make Overtures of Accommodation between these two contending Kingdoms, but 'till this Year could effect nothing, but a very imperfect Truce for six Years. Which being agreed upon, King Henry took his last Farewel of France, and landing at Dover, upon the twenty first Day of February he was triumphantly receiv'd at London.

A Truce with France.

III. Young King Henry being safely return'd from his Foreign Kingdom of France, his Uncle the Duke of Glocester gave a very faithful Account of his Government in England; of which, the Suppression of an Insurrection at Abington in Oxfordshire was not the least Service. A Weaver, the Bailiff of the Town, was the corrupt Head to which all the Contagion gather'd; who changing his Name, call'd himself Jack Sharp of Wigmore's Land in Wales. One of his main Designs was to have massacred Priests, whose Heads he said he would make as cheap as Sheeps Heads; for which he deservedly lost his own, and had his four Quarters hung upon Stakes. However his Pretensions were, the mentioning of Wigmore's Lands, the ancient Inheritance of Earl Mortimer, and now in Possession of the fatal Duke of York who from thence challeng'd the Crown of England, did insinuate and signifie something further. It is to be wonder'd the Council of State under King Henry, hearing that Title so often glanc'd at, provided no better against the Mischiefe; but the Eyes and Hearts of the wisest are blind, when God reserves a secret Scourge, or designs to hide that Fire which shall afterwards consume a Nation. Unquiet Humours were now abroad as well as at home; for the Soldiers of Calais, dissatisfy'd with their Wages, began to be very mutinous and troublesome. But the Regent going there in Person, soon put an end to the Tumult by beheading four of the Ringleaders, and cashiering and banishing a hundred and ten of the rest, as had been formerly done to six-score others. These were inconsiderable Affairs; but the Loss of France began to be more conspicuous, and it is worthy to observe the Steps that Providence seems to have us'd in depriving England of that Kingdom. In the Regent's Journey, King Henry's Interest was apparently depress'd; for being a Widower, and arriving at Turwin, without the Duke of Burgundy's Privacy, he marry'd the Lady Jaquet, about Seventeen Years of Age, Daughter to Peter of Luxemburg Earl of St. Paul, no Friend to the Duke. The Match was injurious to the English Affairs; for Anne, the Regent's former Wife, Sister to the Duke of Burgundy, a strong Ligament of Amity between them, weaken'd the same by her Death; and this second Marriage, unpleasing to the Duke, did still more and more diminish it.

Still the Accidents of War between the English and French were numerous and various, sometimes the one, and sometimes the other, getting and losing, as Opportunities serv'd; which Uncertainties produc'd the ordinary Effects of intestine Convulsions, great Outrages, an unrestrain'd Licentiousness, and a Scarcity of Necessaries for Human Life. It would be both tedious and endless to recount the particular lesser Actions, and almost impossible to describe all the Sieges, Surprises, Skirmishes, and the like, being so confus'dly related by Authors. Yet the Fortune of Reyner Duke of Anjou and Barre, is not to be omitted, because King Henry afterwards unhappily marry'd into his Family. His Wife was Isabel, Daughter and Heiress to Charles Duke of Lorrain, upon whose Death Reyner expected to succeed him in all his Dominions; but the Earl of Vallemont, Brother to Duke Charles, presuming he had a nearer Title, drove the Matter to be decided by War. Charles King of France was a steady Supporter of Reyner's Claim, in Consideration of the like Services done to him in Times of the greatest Difficulty; and the Regent and Duke of Burgundy oppos'd the Cause of the Earl. The Assistance of the latter prevail'd so far, that Reyner's Troops were beaten from the Siege of Vallemont, with the Loss of three thousand Men, and himself with two hundred others remain'd Prisoners to the Duke of Burgundy, one of whose Subjects commanded in chief in that Enterprize. The King of France might seem to have sustain'd a mighty Loss by the Captivity of the Duke; but the English gain'd no Advantage by it; for his Persuasions, and private Services on the behalf of King Charles, did not a little prepare the Duke of Burgundy's Heart in due Time to receive Impressions of Reconciliation. The French who liv'd under the Regency, or were

The Miseries of France. in danger of the English Power, made Choice of the Duke of Burgundy to protect them, from which they could not be fairly debarr'd, because as yet he appear'd to be King Henry's Friend. Indeed this Scene and unfix'd State of Affairs was full of Horror and Confusion, which Polydore describes after this manner. While the English and the French contend for Dominion, Sovereignty and Life it self, Mens Goods were violently taken by the Licentiousness of War, Churches robb'd, People in all Places murder'd, wounded or tortur'd; Matrons abus'd, Virgins torn from their Parent's Arms to be ravish'd, Towns daily taken, daily plunder'd, daily defac'd, the Riches of the Inhabitants us'd at the Conqueror's Pleasure; Houses and Villages on all Sides flaming with Fire; no Kinds of Cruelty unpractis'd upon the miserable French; omitting innumerable other Calamities, which all at once oppress'd them. Add to this, that the whole Republick, being destitute of the Benefit of Laws, which for the most part are silent in Times of War and Mutiny, floated up and down without any Anchorage of Right or Justice. Nor was England her self free from these Calamities, who every Day heard the News of her valiant Childrens Funerals slain in perpetual Skirmishes and Encounters, and found her general Wealth continually ebbing and decreasing; so that the Evils seem'd almost equal, and the whole Western World eccho'd the Groans and Cries of either Nations Quarrels, as being the common Foundation of Discourse and Compassion throughout Christendom.

A. D. 1434. Reg. 12. 13. The Methods at this Time us'd by the English did only faintly keep alive the general State of the Regency in France, without putting a Period to the War, either by finishing the Conquest, or establishing what was gain'd. Some Persons urg'd to have large Supplies of Men and Mony to be levy'd, that King Charles might have no Rest in any Place; of which Opinion was the Regent himself, with the two Dukes of York and Somerſet. This Counſel was not follow'd, but others in Appearance more frugal, which still fed the Evils, but redress'd none; which shew'd that present Sparings often draw after them infinite Wastes, and that no Husbandry is so pernicious as unseasonable Parsimony. In the mean Time, the Earl of Arundel and Lord Talbot rang'd about with victorious Forces, terrifying Anjou, Main, and other Parts, with their several Successes. In Normandy, nevertheless the common People gather'd together in great and dreadful Multitudes; of whom were sixty thousand rebelliously combining in Vex in Normandy, and twenty thousand in Caux. Their Design and Pretensions were to drive out all the English Officers, and to have favour'd King Charles's Interest; but what are a Multitude without Advice or Conduct? To stop their Insolency, and the Progress they made towards Caen, the Earl of Arundel with Robert Lord Willoughby, with thirteen hundred light Horſe and six thousand Archers, march'd against them, by the Direction of the Dukes of York and Somerſet, who had the chief Lieutenancies in Normandy. The Earl laid in Ambuscade with two Parts of his Men, while the Lord Willoughby drew the Rebels into it with a third. The Consequence was that a thousand of them were cut in pieces, before the Soldier's Hands could be stopp'd to spare the rest, who basely threw down their Arms, and begg'd for Mercy. The Multitudes were permitted to return home, but the Ringleaders lost their Lives by Execution; and all the World could gather from this popular Insurrection was That the Normans would gladly be freed from the English Government. Not long after, the Earl of Arundel, after several noble Actions perform'd during the Wars in France, receiv'd his Deaths Wound in a Skirmish at Gerberoy in Beauvoisin, where La Hire, a famous French Commander, won the Day.

A. D. 1435. Reg. 14. The Regency still continu'd, and the Miseries of France were no ways diminish'd; and nothing could put a Period to them while the Duke of Burgundy kept faithful to the English. Therefore to prepare Matter for a Separation between the Regent and the Duke, such of the Nobility as went over to the latter insinuated to him That King Charles had upon all Occasions spoke his intention rably of him, and inwardly wist well to him; and that he never hear'd the Murder of his Father nam'd, but it caus'd him with Sighs and Protestations to declare his Innocence. These and the like mollifying Allegations soon began to operate, when apply'd to the Mind of one whose Affections towards the English daily decreas'd, by means of several Jealousies and Aversions; so that there wanted nothing but an outward honourable Occasion to bring him intirely to the French Party. In the mean Time, to put an End to the general Calamity, the Deputies of the Grand Council urg'd the French, English and Burgundians to come to a Treaty; and the City of Arras was appointed for that Purpose. From the Pope and Council of Pisa came the Cardinals of St. Crasse and Cyprus, with twelve Bishops: For the King of France were the Duke of Bourbon, the Earl of Richemont, the Arch-Bishop of Rheims, and many other great and learned Men: For the King of England were the two Cardinals of York and Winchester, the Earls of Suffolk and Huntington, the Lord Hungerford, and several Doctors of Divinity: For the Duke of Burgundy were the Duke of Guelders, the Earl of Nassau, and such a Number of other Noblemen as were sufficient to shew that tho' in Title he was but a Duke, yet in Greatness he was equal to a King. Mezeray says that this was the greatest and noblest Assembly that had been known to this Age, where all the Princes of Christendom had their Ambassadors; and the Harbingers took up Stabling for ten thousand Horses. But notwithstanding all this Care, it prov'd ineffectual; for the English being in Possession strenuously urg'd the Right of Descent, and the Act of the late King Charles the Sixth, by which the Crown of France was settled upon Henry the Fifth, and the Issue of Catharine his Wife; and therefore they propos'd no other Conditions of Peace, but that Henry their King should have all, and Charles to hold under him. The French offer'd intirely the two Dukedoms of Normandy and Gascony; and the Assembly broke up without any further Agreement. King Charles therefore resolving to main the English Faction upon any Terms, tho' never so mean, sent the Duke of Burgundy a blank Paper, bidding him prescribe his own Conditions and Demands; which he did: And his Conditions, says a French Author, were so numerous as to fill a Volume, and so unreasonable, that it was amazing that so great a Monarch should stoop so much to his Subject and Vassal. But Necessity urging, they both join'd upon the twenty fourth Day of September; and the Duke, transported by Profit, declar'd himself an Enemy to all Opposers of King Charles, after he had caus'd the Deaths of three hundred thousand Men in his Quarrel, besides the Destruction of innumerable Cities and Towns.

The Treaty of Arras.

The King of France and Duke of Burgundy reconciled.

This may be said to have been the first parting Blow which separated the French Dominions from the English Sovereignty; and the Event declar'd, That the English had done more politickly, if they had accepted of Normandy and Gascony, but in those Circumstances they could not in Honour comply; and if Counsels were to be determin'd by the Event, the most foolish would sometimes pass for prudent. By this Conjunction King Henry lost not only a powerful Ally, but was constrain'd to rely upon his own single Strength, as well against King Charles his declar'd Enemy, as now against the Duke of Burgundy, who more than seem'd to have betray'd the Cause. To give a fair Colour to this Fact, the Duke dispatch'd Ambassadors into England to King Henry, to give the Reasons of his Treaty with King Charles, and to persuade him to rest satisfy'd with what had been transacted; which Embassy was so odious to the English, that they took the Liberty to call the Duke a Time-Server, a perjur'd Man, and a Traitor; and the popular Fury arose so high against the Duke's Subjects residing in London, that many of them were beaten and slain, before a Proclamation could put a Stop to it. The Ambassadors return'd with honest Admonitions to their Master, against which his Fears and his Senses were irresistably fortify'd; for King Charles had surrounded and loaded him with Royalties, Privileges, Honours, Money, Cities, Towns, and indeed whole Provinces, that that were confirm'd to him, only to oblige him to abandon the English. His extraordinary Munificence soon made the Duke a true Frenchman; and tho' he paid so vastly dear for his Alliance, yet it was worth the Expence, for Æmilius tells us, That the Cessation of his Anger redeem'd the French from a Foreign Government, as his first Assuming of it made the English Lords over France. But however the Duke's Indignation for the Murder of his Father had mov'd him first to embrace the English Interest, he afterwards, by way of Compensation, subtly converted his Revenge to the Enlargement of his own Riches and Power. After the Return of his Ambassadors, he sent back all Contracts to the Duke of Bedford at Paris, and renounc'd the Alliance of England, declaring That every Man should look to himself.

Upon this each Party made new and vigorous Preparations, in order to recover that by Force which they could not obtain by Reasoning: But all Things manifestly favour'd the French Designs; for this was the general State of the English Affairs. King Henry was scarce out of his Childhood, and after that not Man enough to deal with such turbulent Occurrences; the Princes of the Blood weakly united for the common Good; the Protector tho' vigilant over England, and the Regent careful for France, yet both privately envy'd; Richard Duke of York, encreasing in Strength, but ambitiously reserving himself for a select Day; many of the great English Warriors slain; and in Sum, a declining Inability through the whole Body of the English Forces; which tho' otherwise they might have prolong'd the War, and kept their Footing, yet the Death of the mighty Regent doubled the Difficulty, or almost the Impossibility. In removing this triumphant Hero, God made it manifest that he accounted the English unworthy and unfit to continue their Empire any longer among the French. This Prince, not long after the Revolt of the Duke of Burgundy, dy'd in the City of Paris, after a fourteen Years Regency; uncertain to some whether out of Grief for the Evils he foresaw, or of some other Distemper. How powerful this Prince was appears in some measure from his Titles, which were Regent of France, Duke of Bedford, Alençon and Anjou, Earl of Maine, Richmond and Kendal, and High-Constable of England. And what exceeded his Greatness was his being one of the best Patriots and Generals that ever sprung out of the Royal Stem of the Plantagenets. His Valour was not more formidable to the Enemy, than his Memory was honourable; for Lewis XI. the next King of France, being afterwards advis'd by certain envious Persons to demolish his stately Tomb at Reims, in which was bury'd all the good Fortune of the English, he generously return'd this noble Answer. What Honour can it be to Us, or You, to deface this Monument, and to disturb the Bones of him, who when living, neither my Father, nor your Progenitors with all their Power, were once able to repel? Who by his Strength, Policy and Conduct kept them all out of the principal Dominions of France, and out of this noble Dukedom of Normandy: Wherefore I say first, God save his Soul, and let his Body now lye at rest; who when he was alive would have terrify'd the Proudest of us all: And as for his Tomb, I think it not so worthy or convenient, as his Honour and Acts deserv'd. It is observable that none of the Sons of King Henry the Fourth did degenerate; a Thing not usual in so large a Family: Henry the Fifth dy'd gloriously in the Pursuit of his Conquests, the Duke of Clarence valiantly fighting, and tho' Bedford of a natural Death, and Glocester afterwards of a violent, yet they dy'd not with less Fame than the rest. So as Nature having done her utmost in them, if she fail'd in the present Henry, it is not to be admir'd; for having cloath'd him with the inner Garments of Piety, she was sparing in an upper Robe of other Virtues and Fortune.

A. D. IV. The Regent of France being dead, the late Treaty between King 1436. Charles and the Duke of Burgundy soon produc'd Effects most dangerous to the English Cause; for many Towns immediately revolted, and Multitudes of the Reg. 14. French, French, who through Fear had been restrain'd, falling away, all the English Dominions were fill'd with private Assemblies, Practices and Correspondences with the Enemy. Such English as were then in France were not altogether idle, but yet, through a fatal Security or Negligence at home, they wanted Recruits to support them. To supply the Vacancy of the great Duke of Bedford, Richard Duke of York, now a prevailing Favourite, was created Regent of France; and Edmund Duke of Somerset, his perpetual Rival, still continued Governor of Normandy. This latter violently oppos'd the Advancement of the former to this nice Station; wisely foreseeing more than the Protector and all the Council of England: Yet his Opposition was unseasonable and fruitless; for York's Carriage had won such a Party about the King, that notwithstanding the Disadvantage of his latent Title, which alone was sufficient to have excluded him from great Trusts in a politick Government, he prevail'd. But before he could arrive in France, the Capital City of Paris was lost. Robert Lord Willoughby was then Governor for the English, who had not above two thousand Soldiers with him; for in Case of Extremity, the Faith of the Citizens was presum'd to supply all Defects against a common Resistance. But on the contrary the Citizens, perceiving the Declension of the English, especially after the Regent's Death, conspired against them; and the Treason was carry'd on so subtly by some of the principal Magistrates, who artickled for a general Pardon from King Charles, that the Design took effect before it could be discover'd. The Lord Beaumont introduc'd the Loss with his own Misfortune; for the Earl of Richmont, Constable of France, hovering about Paris, in hopes to recover the Place, the Lord Beaumont with some hundreds of English, falling in with him about St. Denis, were worsted. While the Rumour of this inconsiderable Defeat was fresh, and much aggravated, the French advanc'd their Banners up to the City Walls, upon which a Gate was immediately open'd to them by their Partisans. And now the Citizens, who were lately Subjects, suddenly turn'd Enemies; and Women and Children attack'd the English from their Windows with all sorts of massive Weapons, and many were beaten down and massacred in the Streets. The Lord Willoughby, Governor of the Place, with many others fled to St. Anthony's Gate and the Bastile, Places which they had reserv'd for Defence in Times of Necessity. Many more had been sav'd in those Places, but the perfidious Citizens drew Chains over the Streets, and stopp'd their Passage. At length those in the Bastile, after some Shew of Defence, demanded a Parly, and agreed to depart with their Lives and Baggage. They were conducted about the Town beneath the Louvre, to embark upon the River Sein, and so pass to Roan; for they could not safely pass through the City. The People being advis'd of this ran to the Walls, and with great Shouts baited the English like Dogs, whom lately they had fear'd and honour'd as their Masters. Thus Paris return'd to its former Government, above sixteen Years after the Duke of Clarence had plac'd a Garrison there in behalf of his Brother Henry the Fifth.

The English Affairs decline in France.

The Duke of York made Regent.

Paris lost from the English.

Paris was lost in the worst Time to march an Army, which was wisely projected by the French, else their Design might have fail'd; for the Duke of York the new Regent, being hinder'd by the Badness of the Season, arriv'd afterwards, accompany'd with the Earls of Salisbury and Suffolk, the Lord Falconbridge, and other worthy Persons, and an Army of eight thousand Men. But this Regent never did any good Service in France; tho' still the English Affairs were not come to the last Extremity. In the late conquer'd Parts of France they held Normandy entire, but not without much Trouble; for the People again rebell'd in Caux, which Disturbance was quell'd with a greater and more mercyleless Destruction of the Authors and Actors, than the former. No less than five thousand of them were cut in Pieces and trampled on by the just Fury of the English, under the Conduct of the Lord Scales, the Lord Hoo, and others; who burnt all their Habitations, made Booty of their Goods, and drove the whole Body of them out of the Country. The Lord Scales not long after defeated La Hire and his Men not far from Roan. The War was manag'd on all Sides without full or compleat Armies; Skirmishes were the ordinary Ways of Fighting; and the French were cautious in venturing all upon a pitch'd Battel.

Calais besieg'd by the Duke of Burgundy.

The Duke of Burgundy as yet had not in Person given any Proof against the English of his Affection to King Charles; but now he set himself to an Enterprize worthy that Expectation, which was the Recovery of Calais; tho' he is believ'd to have been mov'd to this Action by a Desire of private Revenge. For the English, upon his forsaking their Alliance, had endeavour'd to stir up the Inhabitants of Gaunt, and other Flemmish Towns subject to the Duke, to rise in Rebellion; but the Opinion that King Henry's Fortunes in France were dangerously declining, made them unwilling to move. However the News of this successless Attempt excited the Duke to a Revenge; and caus'd him to bring an Army of forty thousand Men before Calais. The chief Commanders there for King Henry were the Lord Dudley, who had the Charge of the Castle, and Sir John Ratcliff of the Town. The Duke's Design was to have block'd up the Harbour by sinking Ships loaden with Stones; but upon the Ebb-Tide the Calisians easily remov'd those Impediments. King Henry being inform'd of the Siege of this important Place, the Protector the Duke of Glocester was sent over in Person with a powerful Fleet and Army, who bravely challeng'd the Duke of Burgundy to meet him in the open Field. Here Authors differ, yet they generally agree in this, That the Duke of Burgundy rais'd the Siege without any Battel. Some say that the very Rumor of the Protector's Approach drove him away, and that the Protector came the next Day after the Burgundians Flight; and others excuse him by alledging that the Flemmings grew mutinous, and resolv'd to return home. The Protector became Master of the Duke's Camp, and spent eleven Days in his Dominions, burning Poppering and Bell, and doing great Damages about Graveling, Boloign and other Places; then settling the Affairs of Calais, he return'd home with great Honour to his Charge in England. The English were thought to have created new Work for this active Duke in his own Dominions, where many great Tumults arose, in one of which his own Person was indanger'd at Bruges, where Lisle Adam the Captain of his Guard was slain. Hence it came perhaps that a Medium was found out, by Contracts made with Isabel the Dutcheß, his third Wife and an ingenious Woman, to hold a League with England, and yet make no Breach with France.

A. D. 1437. The following Year was memorable for the Death of three great Princesses, Catharine, Mother to the present King Henry, and Sister to the King of France; the old Dowager of King Henry the Fourth, Daughter to the King of Navarre; and the old Countess of Armanack, Daughter to the Duke of Berry, and Mother to the Duke of Savoy; who all dy'd within forty eight Hours of each other. The former of the three, not long after the Death of her Husband Henry the Fifth, secretly marry'd to Owen ap Tudor, a Welsh Gentleman and of the Court, the most noble and beautiful Person of that Nation, who drew his Descent from Cadwallader, the last King of the Britains; by which Husband she had several Children, two of whom, Edmund and Jasper, bear a Part in the Royal History. The former, (being afterwards created Earl of Richmond, and marry'd to Margaret, the Daughter of John Duke of Somerset, who was Grandson to John of Gaunt Duke of Lancaster) became Father to the famous King Henry the Seventh. In the same Year the Dutcheß Dowager of Bedford, Widow to the late Regent of France, marry'd also below her Degree to Sir Richard Woodvile, who became Father to the Lady Elizabeth, who had the Honour to marry King Edward the Fourth, and by this was both her self a Queen, and a Progenitress of those Kings and Queens that follow'd: For from her and this Match sprung another Elizabeth, the renowned Wife of King Henry the Seventh, as King Henry himself did of the former Match. Both these Matches provid prov'd most fortunate to England; but another happen'd which now threaten'd present Danger to King Henry, and that was what James King of Scotland made with France, who marry'd his Daughter Margaret to Lewis the Dauphine, and sent new Supplies of Men against the English. He design'd also to have attempted something in Person, but before he could effect it, he was most impiously murder'd by certain bloody Traitors at Perth, subborn'd by the Earl of Athol his near Kinsman, in hopes to attain the Crown; for which in part of his Punishment he had a red hot Crown of Iron put upon his Head. Tho' King James was a Prince of noble Worth and Virtues, yet this horrible Murther is by some Historians accounted as a just and deserved Punishment upon him, for that voluntary Breach of his Homage, Oath and Fidelity made to King Henry the Sixth, at the Time when he was set at Liberty after his long Captivity in England. And here an Italian Author makes this Remark upon the Scotch History, That among the numerous Race of Kings in that Nation, about one half of the Number met with untimely Deaths.

James King of Scotland murder'd by his Subjects.

In France, the new Regent the Duke of York continu'd active, but perform'd nothing memorable, tho' he wanted not Advantages and Opportunities of signalizing himself. For two thousand French Horsemen were mutinous, and rang'd about in great Disorder: Paris was dreadfully punish'd with Famine, and its usual Attendants, pestilential Distempers: The Countries adjacent lay open and desolate; and the Courtiers were discontented and divided. Still nothing of note was done by the Regent; which some impute to the Opposition he met with from the Duke of Somerset, who out of Envy and Disdain incommoded his Dispatches. However the Duke of Somerset, accompany'd with the Lords Talbot and Falconbridge, and other brave Men, and a competent Force laid Siege to Harfleur which the Normans in the late Rebellion had seiz'd, and maintain'd under French Commanders. King Charles upon this sent a Body of four thousand Men to relieve the Place, but not being able to effect it, Harfleur surrender'd to the Duke. Not long after the Duke of York was recall'd, and in November Richard Earl of Warwick was sent over to succeed him as Regent of France: He carry'd with him a thousand fresh Soldiers, and arriving at Harfleur, he from thence march'd to Roan, now the chief City of the English Dominions in North France, as Bordeaux was in the South; to which last Place the Earl of Huntington, with certain Troops of Soldiers, was sent as Lieutenant.

The Duke of York recall'd from France. The Earl of Warwick sent.

This new Regent vigorously apply'd himself to the Business of his Station; and under him the Duke of Burgundy and his Forces were driven from Crotoy, by the brave Lord Talbot: Abbeville was freed from the Danger of a Fort with which the Duke had bridled the Town; and the English for twenty Days together took their Pleasure in ravaging the Country of Picardy about Amiens and Artois. After this the Earl of Mortaign Son to the Duke of Somerset arriv'd at Cherburgh with four hundred Archers and three hundred Spears, and passing through Normandy into the Country of Maine, he besieg'd a Castle call'd Anian, in which were three hundred Scots, besides Frenchmen. He soon took this Castle by Storm, slew all the Scotch, and hung up the French, because they had been sworn to the English Government. After these, and many other inferior Actions of the like Nature, at the Sollicitations of the Dutcheß of Burgundy and the Pope's Legate, a grand Conference was held between Graveling and Calais, the Deputies of England and France, and those of Burgundy meeting to treat about a Peace. But the English not receding from that Condition, that Normandy and their other Conquests should be left to them in full Sovereignty, they parted without effecting any thing. Still the English Interest was retain'd in France, not only by means of King Henry's Ministers and Forces, but also by the Remissness of King Charles, who gave his Son an Occasion to raise a Rebellion against him; but the Fear of the English Power, and the wise Management of some, soon produc'd a perfect Reconciliation.

King Charles was now fallen into some Disfavour with his People, but to redeem his Credit, he attempted the Recovery of Ponthoise, near Paris, which the Lord Clifford had not long before surpriz'd by a Stratagem; and accordingly he sat down before it with ten or twelve thousand Men, while the Lord Clifford made a brave Defence within. The Duke of York lately landing in Normandy, as Regent assembled his chief Forces, consisting of seven or eight thousand Men, and offer'd the King Battel; but he kept himself within his Trenches. The Regent, agreeable to the Humour of the English, eager of present Action, unexpectedly pass'd the River Oyse, which ran between the two Camps; which caus'd King Charles to remove with such Precipitation, that the French could hardly excuse him from flying. The Duke having gain'd the Spoil of the French King's Camp, reforc'd Ponthoise, and attack'd a Fortress, where King Charles had left three thousand Men to maintain the Appearance of a Siege. But it was judg'd more advantagious to pursue the King who was arriv'd at Poisse; where the Duke again very nobly provok'd him to the Field. King Charles, finding the Hazards unequal, endur'd the Bravado; so that the Duke was constrain'd to return to his main Charge in Normandy. King Charles fell into such Obloquy and Contempt with his People by this dishonourable Retreat, especially with the Parisians, that if he had not a second Time attempted and prevail'd against Ponthoise, it might have endanger'd his whole Fortunes; for a Faction was then ready to make use of any false Step. He therefore return'd in a great Fury to the Siege, and took it by a general Assault, with extraordinary Bloodshed on his own Side, and the Loss of five hundred of the English. The King was one of the first that enter'd at the Breach, chusing to be rather thought rash than timorous; by which Exploit he re-establish'd his Reputation with his People.

The French King succeeds.

The Duke of Burgundy was a main Agent as to his Enlargement, designing to secure his own Greatness by Acts of Benificence: this high born Prince, for the Murther of his Father, being naturally the Head and Spring of that unfortunate Feud that had most mortally rag'd between the Houses of Burgundy and Orleans. The Duke of Glocester prudently foreseeing the Dangers like to ensue upon Orleans's Liberty, strenuously oppos'd it, and that upon important Reasons, which he requir'd to have Register'd, that they might remain on Record for a Testimony of the Discharge of his Duty. This great Duke had no better Success when he set about to reform the State of England, which suffer'd much from the Mismanagements of the two Cardinals of York and Winchester, especially the latter. For tho' the Duke was Governor of the King and Protector of the Realm, yet the Cardinal of Winchester, with the other acted many Things without the Consent of the King or him; in which being greatly offended, he in Writing declar'd to the King how much the Cardinal and the Arch-Bishop had offended both his Majesty and the Laws of the Nation. This Complaint of the Duke's was drawn up in twenty four long Articles, which chiefly imported, That the Cardinal of Winchester had continually, through his ambitious Desire of surmounting all others in Honour and Dignity, sought to enrich himself, to the great Damage of the King, as not only defrauding him of his Treasure, but also practising Things highly prejudicial to his Affairs in France, particularly by freeing the King of Scotland.

on such easie Conditions that his Majesty became a great Loser. Tho' these Things were heard and examin'd before the Council, yet the Cardinal found so many Friends, as not only protected him, but afterwards found means to effect the Duke of Glocester's Ruin.

Still the Miseries and Calamities of France continu'd, and the Wars were carry'd on with various Success, but yet after a more feeble and languid manner than formerly. The County of Amiens was ravag'd by the English under the Lords Willoughby and Talbot; the Regent and the Duke of Somerset march'd into Anjou, where they loaded their Carriages with much Plunder, and return'd into Normandy: After which the Duke of Somerset parted from the other, and perform'd several Exploits in and about Bretaign. Dieppe in Normandy being besieg'd by the English, was reliev'd by the Dauphine, to the great Loss of the former; while the French King gain'd some Advantages in and about Gascony. During these variable Transactions, John the valiant Lord Talbot, lately recall'd into England, was, for his approv'd Courage and Wisdom, both in England and France, as well in Peace as War, created Earl of Shrewsbury, and with a Body of three thousand Men sent over again into Normandy, for the better Defence of that Country. Not long after the Countess of Cominges dying, the King of France and the Earl of Armagnack became violent Competitors for the Inheritance. The Earl took Possession; but fearing the King of France's Greatness, offer'd his Daughter in Marriage to the King of England, with a large Portion in Money; promising also to deliver full Possession of all such Towns and Castles, as were by him or his Ancestors detain'd in Gascony, and had been formerly conquer'd by King Henry's Predecessors. The Ambassadors for this Affair were graciously receiv'd by King Henry, and honourably sent back: After whom were sent Sir Edward Hall, Sir Robert Ross, and others, to conclude all Things; by whom the young Lady was by Proxy affianc'd to King Henry. But the King of France highly disliking this Match, sent the Dauphine with a powerful Army, who took the Earl Prisoner, with his youngest Son, and both his Daughters, and gain'd the Counties of Armagnack, Louverne, Rouergne and other Parts, chasing the Bastard of Armagnack out of the Country; in which means the Consummation of the Marriage was deferr'd, and never effected.

In this Distraction of Christendom, many Princes, as the Kings of Spain, Denmark and Hungary, became Mediators for a Peace between the two Kings of England and France. Ambassadors on all Sides were sent, many Meetings were heard, and many Proposals made; but in Conclusion only a Truce for sixteen Months was agreed on. During this Negotiation, De la Pole Earl of Suffolk, a great Favourite and one of the Commissioners for this Peace, took from him a bold Thing beyond his Commission; and without acquainting his Associates treated of a Marriage between the King of England and Margaret the Daughter of Reyner Duke of Anjou, and Niece to the Queen of France. The Reyner now stil'd himself King of Sicily, Naples and Jerusalem; and the Earl of Suffolk was so active in this Affair, that it brought the Aspersions of Slandery upon him; and without his Master's Warrant he proceeded so far as to appoint an Interview between the two Kings, which was to be held between Reims and Chartres. Upon the Return of the Commissioners, the Earl of Suffolk set forth the Beauty and Qualifications of the propos'd Bride, and the Benefits of Peace that would redound to the Kingdom by this Match. The King, and many others were easily induc'd to credit the Relation, but the worthy Duke of Glocester bravely oppos'd it, partly because it was a manifest Injury to the Earl of Armagnack's Daughter, to whom the King had been solemnly affianc'd, which Match was honourable and advantageous; and partly because this latter might bring nothing with it but Loss and Dishonour, as the Delivery of the Duke of Anjou and County of Mazne, Bulwarks to Normandy, which now were especially to be retain'd in order to conclude a lasting Peace with France.

All Things being in Readiness, the new Marquess went over into France, with his Wife and great Numbers of Ladies and Gentlemen gloriously adorn'd, and Letters for the Bride's Father, who tho' he was rich in Titles of imaginary Kingdoms, was not able to send her honourably to her Husband; so that all the Charge, which was vast and extraordinary, fell to King Henry's Share. The noble Company being arriv'd at Tours, the Marquess marry'd the Lady in the Name of his Master, in the Presence of the King of France, the Queen, and a numerous Train of Princes and Noblemen, among whom were the Dukes of Orleans, Calabria, Alençon and Bretaign; and the Nuptials were solemniz'd with magnificent Feasts and Tournaments. After this the Lady in great State was convey'd into England, and at Southwike in Hampshire was solemnly marry'd to King Henry. From thence she remov'd to London, being met after a most pompous manner by the Duke of Glocester, and others of the Nobility; and the famous Poet John Lydgate Monk of St. Edmund's Bury compos'd the Speeches for such Triumphant Receptions as were made upon her Entrance into the City. A few Days after, on the thirtieth of May, she was crown'd Queen at Westminster with all the usual Solemnities. Polydore gives no improper Character of this beautiful Queen, when he says she was one sufficiently provident, ambitious of Glory, abounding in Discourse, Counsel, Officioufness and masculine Courage; in which appear'd much Ingenuity, Vigilance and Care; but not free from the Humour of Women, which, as he says, is usually vehement and apt to change.

The Beginnings of England's Miseries.

V. The Kingdom of France had for above thirty Years suffer'd all the Convulsions and Calamities of War, both Civil as well as Foreign; but those Miseries seem'd to be transferr'd by gradual Steps to England, and from this Time began the apparent Forerunners of the Nation's Misfortunes. Here some of our English Writers very freely tell us, That it appear'd that God was not pleas'd with the late Marriage: For from that Day forward the Fortune of the World began to fall from the King, so that he lost all his Friends in England, and all his Dominions in France: For in a little Time all was govern'd by the Queen and her Council, to the great Detriment of the King and his Realm, and the no less Obloquy of the Queen, who thereby became expos'd to many false Reports. All which Misery, says Fabian, arose from BREACH OF THE PROMISE made by the King to the Earl of Armagnack's Daughter, as most Writers agree: All which Misery, as he adds, will in some measure appear by the Loss of Normandy, and the rest of France, the Division of the Lords within this Kingdom, the Rebellion of the Commonalty against their Prince and Sovereign, and finally the King himself depos'd, and the Queen with the Prince forc'd to fly the Land, and lose the Government of it for ever. These and many other Evils were the Products of the succeeding Times. However still some Care was taken about the Affairs of France; and the Parliament granted Supplies of Money to carry on the War upon the Expiration of the Truce. The Duke of York was recall'd from his Regency, and the Duke of Somerfet, in an unfortunate Hour, was sent in his Place, with such Provisions as were reputed competent.

The Duke of Somerfet made Regent of France.

The renowned Protector, the Duke of Glocester, felt the first fatal Blow of the evil Angel that was sent to punish England, and root out her Nobility. This Duke had been a brave Opposer of the late Marriage, and was much hated by the Queen and her Faction, as the only Man who by his Prudence, as also by the Honour and Authority of his Birth and Place, seem'd to hinder that Sovereign Power which they pretended to settle in the King's Person, but design'd indeed, as is usual under soft Princes, to reign themselves in another's Name. The Marquess of Suffolk, and several of the Nobility, at the Time of a Parliament held at St. Edmund's Bury, were drawn on to concur to his Ruin; not perceiving, that by so doing they pull'd up the Flood-Gate, at which the Duke of York enter'd, overwhelming all of them in a Deluge of Blood. Whether they had any real Fear of Glocester himself, lest perhaps he should take Revenge upon some particular Persons among them, is uncertain; tho' it seems probable enough, that they had. Besides the Duke's frequent Contests with the Cardinal of Winchester, and several others, there were some former Accidents that concurr'd to make Way towards his Ruin. For about five Years before, Eleanor his Dutcheß was convented for Witchcraft and Sorcery, and afterwards indited for Treason before the Earls of Huntington, Stafford, Suffolk and Northumberland, and other Lords and Judges; of which Crime she was appeal'd by one Bolingbrook an Astronomer, and Thomas Southwell a Canon, which last was charg'd with saying Masses over certain Instruments, by which the Astronomer should practise Negromancy against the Life of the King. These being taken, accus'd her as an Accessary, and one who had desir'd the Assistance of their Art to know her Fortune; and Part of this she confess'd, for which she was put to publick and solemn Penance in London, upon three several Days, with extraordinary Shame to her Person, and after that she was committed to perpetual Imprisonment under the Care of Sir Thomas Stanley. The Duke of Glocester her unhappy Lord and Husband, whom by Love-Potions she was said to have enchanted, being provok'd with this Reproach, might reasonably be suppos'd to have stirr'd in this Affair. However it was, his Destruction certainly borrow'd Countenance from that Opinion. The Duke therefore being come to attend in this Parliament at St. Edmund's Bury, in the second Day of the Sessions he was arrested of High-Treason by the Lord Beaumont Constable of England, the Duke of Buckingham and others, and all his Followers taken from him, whereof thirty two were committed to several Prisons; and the Day after his Imprisonment he was found murther'd in his Bed. Yet he was expos'd the same Day with a Design to have it thought he dy'd of a Palsie or Impostume, tho' all that saw his Body found that he dy'd of a violent and unnatural Death; some say strangled; some that a hot Spit was thrust up his Fundament; and some that he was stifled between two Feather-Beds. His Corps was convey'd the same Day to St. Albans, and there interr'd. Five of his menial Servants being condemn'd to be hang'd, drawn and quarter'd, the Marquess of Suffolk, to affect Popularity, brought their Pardons, and sav'd their Lives, after they had been hang'd, let down quick, stript naked, and mark'd with a Knife to be quarter'd. By a Pardon granted to one of his Servants may be seen the Pretence made for committing the Murther, namely, he was one of the many Traitors who came with the Duke of Glocester to destroy the King, and set his Wife Eleanor at Liberty.

Such was the End of this great Prince, who, notwithstanding his Body was expos'd, and many Crimes pretended, was by the People of England thought to be doubly murther'd, in his Reputation, as well as his Person. His Death was much lamented by the whole Kingdom, from whom he deserv'd the Surname of Good, for he was a Lover of his Country, a Friend to Good Men, a Protector of the Learned, of which himself was one, and so great an Incourager of them, that he built the Divinity Schools at Oxford, a Work worthy to be admir'd in all Respects. King Henry's French Dominions was generally oppos'd by the Cardinal of Winchester, and some others, who altogether perswaded Peace, to which this Heroical Duke, nicely insisting upon the Honour and Majesty of the English Name, was a profess'd Enemy: From which Fountain of divided Councils flow'd innumerable Inconveniencies. Tho' he had many virtuous Qualifications, yet he has been blam'd for Incontinency and Ambition, one or both of which formerly caus'd a dangerous Breach with the Duke of Burgundy. After him the Title of Glocester was reputed ominous; for the four last Glocesters came to violent Ends: Thomas, Son to Edward the Third, was strangled at Calais; Thomas Spenser Earl of Glocester beheaded at Bury; Humphry the present Duke dy'd as now related; and Richard Duke of Glocester afterwards slain in Battel. The Death of the present Duke, prov'd the Queen, who was especially concern'd in it, not to have been so careful or politick as common Reason seem'd to require of her; for while he liv'd his Authority and near Relation to the Crown would easily have stifled the Duke of York's Claim: And here were the first Seeds sown between the House of Lancaster, whose Badge was the Red-Rose, and the House of York, who gave that of the White. And now, says Polydore, Good Men, apprehensive of their own Safeties, voluntarily forsook the Court, into whose Places succeeded many, who for the most Part seeking their own Interest, open'd an easie Way for new Factions. The Duke of Glocester was soon follow'd by his great Enemy the Cardinal of Winchester, the other chief Counsellor of the Nation; so that the whole Frame of the Government was laid upon the Queen, and such Favourites as the King, by her Recommendation, approv'd of. We are assur'd that when this rich Prelate lay upon his Death-Bed he cry'd out, Why should I dye that have so much Wealth? If the whole Kingdom would save my Life, I am able by my Policy to get it, or by my Money to buy it. Will not Death be brib'd, nor Money do nothing? Being dead, he was succeeded in his Bishoprick by a more worthy Person, William Wanfleet, so called from the Place of his Nativity in Lincolnshire, tho' his real Name was Patin; who afterwards founded Magdalen Colledge in Oxford, one of the noblest Foundations in Europe.

The Designs of the Duke of York.

The Marquess of Suffolk now the chief Favourite, was created a Duke, which render'd him a more conspicuous Mark of Envy than ever, beyond even the Protection of the King or the Queen. And now the Affairs of France, where Somerſet was Regent, were neither duly inspected, nor the Governors of the Country well advis'd; but the King and Realm of England, much more than France, lay expos'd to the deep and pernicious Designs of Richard Duke of York. He, by an Error of the State, being made great, and grown stronger by affected Popularity, perceiving the King to be a Ruler and not to govern, began secretly to allure his Friends of the Nobility, and privately declar'd to them his Title to the Crown; as likewise he did to certain Governors of Cities and Towns; which Attempt was so politickly and secretly carry'd on, that his Provision was ready, before his Purpose was disclos'd. The publick State of Affairs seem'd to favour this fatal Conspiracy: There was a milder King than England then deserv'd; a Council out of Favour with the People, numerous Losses and Dishonours abroad; a turbulent and unsetled Condition of all Things at home. Of all which, and many more Mischiefs, the Duke of York, having Henry the Fourth for a dangerous Precedent, made his pernicious Use, cherishing the popular Aversions, without seeking to redress any Evils, but representing them worse than they were, only to bring about his ambitious Purposes. His Removal from the Regency of France did not a little disoblige him, because the Duke of Somerſet gain'd it from him; but it was not long before Somerſet's ill Management of that Trust, and the declining Fortune of the English gave him Occasion to rejoice at the Foil of his dreaded Enemy. Which in short was thus.

During

During the Truce between England and France, one Sir Francis Surienne a Knight of Arragon, serving under the Regent, surpriz'd the City of Fougers, belonging to the Duke of Bretaign, where he met with a Booty of above sixteen hundred thousand Crowns. Upon which Reparation and Restitution was demanded; but the Duke of Somerset, a proud Man, contrary to good Discipline, cherishing his Soldiers in their Riots and Disorders, wilfully neglected the Justice of Nations in that Point. After six Months Delays the Duke of Bretaign began the Revenge, and by the French King's Consent surpriz'd Pont de Larche, and Town after Town, so many and so fast, that King Charles, after he found no Restitution would be made, uniting his Forces, soon became Master of Roan it self, of Caen, Bayeux, and indeed of all other Places belonging to the English in those Parts; to the great Dishonour of the Duke of Somerset and the English Nation. And thus was all Normandy regain'd by the French, or rather, as Mezeray says, help'd to recover it self, in one Year and six Days; after it had continu'd in the Possession of the English above thirty Years from the Conquest of it by Henry the Fifth. In this Dukedom were a hundred strong Towns and Forts, all tenable and of Consequence, besides those destroy'd in the Wars; and it also contain'd one Archbishoprick and six Bishopricks. Some are of Opinion that the English wanted Strength, either to man the Towns as they ought, or Numbers to inhabit the Country, which was the Reason they could not keep it. Others charge it upon the Avarice of the Duke of Somerset, who kept not half the Number of Soldiers for which he was allow'd, and those so ill paid, that he was forc'd to connive at all their Outrages. But the principal Cause, as most agree, was the fatal Divisions within the Kingdom of England, where every great Man desiring rather to be reveng'd on his Foe at home, than the common Enemy abroad, no timely Succours could be sent. Yet still if we consider the general Deportment of the English Nation, the Concurrence of Martial Men, their Counsel, Discipline and Designs, from the Beginning of Edward the First to this Time, which was a hundred and eighty Years; it must be acknowledg'd that they were Men of extraordinary Worth and Valour, and carry'd the Palm of Victory before them wherever they went

All Normandy lost from the English.

The Causes of it.

VI. After the dishonourable Loss of Normandy, the Calamities of England began to discover themselves more openly than ever: For while the French triumph'd in their new Acquisitions, three cruel Enemies, among many others, grievously urg'd on the Ruin of the Nation at home. One was Presumption in Governing, by some that were most unfit to rule, as the Queen with her Privy-Counsellors and Favourites; next the inveterate Malice and Pride, as well as insatiable Avarice in the States both Spiritual and Temporal; and lastly the general Discontents of the People, who began to sink under the Tediousness as well as Weight of their Burthens. These finding that by Misgovernment all Things were running towards Confusion, as well within the Realm as without, they began to exclaim against the Duke of Suffolk, charging him as the only Cause of the Delivery of Anjou and Main, the chief Procurer of the Duke of Glocester's Death, the very Occasion of the Loss of Normandy, the Devourer of the King's Treasure, the Remover of good and virtuous Counsellors from about the Prince, and the Advancer of vicious Persons, and such as were Enemies to the Publick. The Queen at this apprehending not only the Duke's Destruction, but also her own Confusion, caus'd the Parliament, which had met at London, to be adjourn'd to Leicester, thinking there, by Force and Rigour of Law, to suppress all the Malice and ill Opinions conceiv'd against the Duke and her self. At which Place few of the Nobility would appear; therefore the Parliament was again adjourn'd to Westminster, where there was a full Appearance. In this Session the Commons drew up many Articles of Impeachment against the Duke of Suffolk, consisting of several Crimes, as well Treason as lesser Misdemeanors;

demeanors; most of which he deny'd. But when he was charg'd with making the unhappy Marriage for the King, and the Loss of Anjou and Main, he alledg'd that the very next Parliament after the Consummation of the Match had so well approv'd of it, as to vote him Rewards for his Service. But notwithstanding all his Defence, the Queen justly doubting some Commotion if he pass'd with Impunity, caus'd him for a Colour to be committed to the Tower: Where remaining about a Month, he was again deliver'd, and restor'd to the King's Favour; which so displeas'd the People, that if extraordinary Care had not been taken, innumerable Mischiefs might have happen'd. For the common People in several Places of the Kingdom assembled in numerous Bodics, and chose a Captain for themselves, whom they call'd Blue-beard; but before they had perform'd any Enterprize, their Leaders were apprehended, and the Matter pacify'd without any further Damage.

After these Outrages were allay'd, the Parliament was adjourn'd to Leicester ^{Place} where the King and Queen appear'd in great State, and with them the Duke of Suffolk as chief Counsellor. The House of Commons not forgetting their old Resentments, petition'd the King that all such Persons as consented to the Delivery of Main and Anjou might be duly punish'd. And as privy to that Fact they accus'd the Duke of Suffolk as Principal, with John Bishop of Salisbury, and Sir James Fines, Lord Say, and divers others. The King perceiving that no common Methods would appease the Peoples Fury, to pacifie their inveterate Hatred, he first remov'd the Lord Say from being High-Treasurer, and some others of the Duke's Adherents from their Offices and Places; and after that ^{He is banish'd,} banish'd the Duke himself for five Years, as being the present Annoiance of the Nation. But he was now pursu'd by a more inevitable Vengeance from above: For embarking in Suffolk to go for France, he was set upon by a Man of War belonging to the Earl of Exeter, taken by the Captain, and brought into Dover ^{and then murder'd.} Road, where his Head was stricken off in a Cock-boat, and his Body ignominiously thrown upon the Shore; from whence it was taken by one of his Chaplains, and bury'd in the College of Wingfield in Suffolk. This was the remarkable End of William de la Pole Duke of Suffolk; a Person of very considerable Abilities, who had warr'd in France forty four Years without Intermission, in seventeen of which he never saw his own Country: When he was taken Prisoner his Ransom cost him twenty thousand Pounds, tho' then he was only a Knight; he was of thirty Years standing of the Order of the Garter, his Father was slain at the Siege of Harfleur, his eldest Brother at Agincourt, and his two younger in the same Wars; so that it cannot be deny'd but that his Prince and Country did owe much to him, since he spent his Life in the Service of the one, and his Reputation in the Service of the other. But after all, suffering himself to be guided by a prodigious Ambition, he fell into two dreadful Errors, his making of a State Marriage, not only pernicious in itself, but contrary to an expresse Contract before; and his contributing towards the worthy Duke of Glocester's Murther: For which he met with such a Punishment, as look'd more like the Hand of Heav'n, than the Hatred of the People.

The Death of this Minister was highly prejudicial to the King, who greatly ^{The Duke of York's further Designs.} stood in need of his Service and Support; and this Chance did much animate those of the Duke of York's Faction, who now spar'd no Pains to render the King despicable, and the Queen odious. They also insist'd upon the Duke's brave Management in Ireland, where at present he resided as Governor, and where by his Wisdom and Valour he had in a manner tamed a savage People, and reduc'd them to that Discipline and Obedience, that he thereby shew'd how much England wanted such a King. These Insinuations were not only privately whisper'd, but publicly dispers'd; and every Man had the Vanity to blaze 'em abroad, to shew their Wisdom, and their Affection to the publick Weal. The Duke of York before the Death

Death of Suffolk had wrought the End of Adam Molleins Bishop of Chichester, and Lord Privy-Seal; for fearing that a Man of his Integrity might oppose his Designs, he caus'd him to be assassinated by Fishermen at Portsmouth, that he might be thought to be slain by the outrageous Commotion of that baser sort of People. But these Things tending more to the ruining than the raising of his Projects, he design'd to begin his Work with some popular Sedition, which precipitating the Rebels into a Crime unpardonable, and the Fear of Punishment making them obstinate, he might use them either collected or diffus'd as Occasion should serve. For that End the common People of Kent were excited to take up Arms, under the Conduct and Command of Jack Cade, who had formerly been a Servant to Sir Thomas Dagre a Sussex Knight, and killing a Woman with Child, abjur'd the Land and turn'd French; and returning was an Instrument to hang out Mortimer's Name, as a Flag, to draw in a Party, feigning himself of that Family, and to be a Cousin to the Duke of York. A pestilent Contrivance to found the Affections of the Multitude, and to proclaim that Title to the Crown, which the Duke as Heir to the Family afterwards challeng'd: For who would not ask what should move him to use the Name of Mortimer?

This Cade, a Man of no small Courage, having drawn great Numbers together, encamp'd at Black-Heath by Greenwich, and in his Writings stil'd himself the Captain of Kent, and Captain Mendall; and his Pretences, like those of all other Rebels, were the publick Good of the Nation. The King and his Council being mov'd at the News of this dangerous Insurrection, this Captain sent a large Roll of Complaints and Demands to his Majesty. One of which was, That Richard Duke of York should be recall'd out of Ireland, and with the Duke of Buckingham and certain others be principally us'd in Council. Another was, That as the Duke of Glocester had been falsely proclaim'd Traitor, so the Authors of his Death might be punish'd. Besides these and other plausible Demands, great Complaints were made of many Grievances and Extortions, proceeding from the Courts of the Kings-Bench and the Exchequer, with many other Particulars too numerous to recite here. These Matters being insisted upon with extraordinary Insolence and Bravados, the King soon became sensible of the Indignity and Danger; and raising an Army of fifteen thousand Men, march'd in Person against the Rebels. Upon which Cade politickly withdrew his Forces into Sevenoke Wood; upon Notice of which the King retir'd again to London; but the Queen longing for a Dispatch, sent the two Staffords, Sir Humphry and William, with many fiery Youths of the Court, to follow the Rebels. But these were soon cool'd; for they found the Kentish Captain in good Order ready to receive them, and in the first Encounter slew Sir Humphry, and afterwards his Brother, and put all the rest to Flight. The King's Forces being at Black-Heath, could neither by Threats or Intreaties be oblig'd to march to their Rescue; but rather wish'd the Queen and her Favourites to meet with the Staffords Fate: Or that the Duke of York were in England, to assist his Cousin Mortimer; and many of them stole away to the Rebels, whose Numbers from Sussex and Surry daily increas'd. And now the Arch-Bishop of Canterbury and the Duke of Buckingham were sent to expostulate with the Rebels about their Demands; to whom Cade gave civil Language, but directly deny'd a Cessation from Arms, unless the King in Person would hear the Grievances of his Subjects, and pass his Royal Word for the Redress of them. This Resolution being made known to the King, who was not sure of his Soldiers Fidelity, he and his Queen retir'd to Kenelworth Castle in Warwickshire; having first committed the Tower to the Custody of the Lord Scales and the renowned Matthew Gouge, and the City of London to the Fidelity of Sir Thomas Charlton Lord Mayor.

The Kentish Captain taking Advantage of the King's Absence, march'd into the Borough of Southwark, where he quarter'd his Men, strictly charging them to commit no Outrage, nor do Injury to any; which was duely obser'd. The next Morning, being the second of July, he march'd to London Bridge, where without Resistance he caus'd his Men to cut the Ropes of the Draw-Bridge; and so in good Order march'd into the City, and coming to London-Stone, he struck his Sword upon it, crying, Now is Mortimer Lord of London! The Lord Mayor, standing by his Door, bad him Beware of attempting any thing against the Peace of the City; to whom he made Answer, Let the World judge of our honest Intentions by our Actions. And indeed this orderly Behaviour of himself and his Company gain'd him an extraordinary Opinion among the common sort of People. And now assuming to himself the Place of Chief, he sent out his Letters of safe Conduct to such as he thought fit to employ; among others he wrote to Thomas Cock, Woollen-Draper of London, commanding him to bring him a certain Number of Arms and Horse, and a thousand Marks of Mony at the Charge of the Genoese, Venetian and Florentine Merchants; and threatening to take the Heads of all that refus'd Payment: All which was perform'd by those Foreign Merchants. At Night he return'd into Southwark, where Robert Poinings, Esq; was his Sword-Bearer and Carver. The next Morning he return'd into the City, and immediately sent to the Lord Scales to bring his Prisoner the Lord Say to Guild-Hall, to which Place he summon'd the Lord Mayor and his Brethren. Before these he caus'd the Lord Say to be arraign'd, who desiring to be try'd by his Peers, was suddenly taken from his Keeper, hurry'd to the Standard in Cheap-side, and had his Head stricken off, which upon the End of a Pike was born before him to Mile-End, where he went to confer with the Rebels of Essex; and in the Way meeting with Sir James Cromer, High-Sheriff of Kent, and lately marry'd to the Lord Say's Daughter, he also caus'd his Head to be taken off, and carry'd before him in Derision. The next Morning he again enter'd the City; where after publick Execution done upon some of his Associates, who had acted contrary to his Proclamation, upon some Displeasure conceiv'd against Alderman Malpas, he sent and seiz'd upon all his Wares and Goods, and fin'd Alderman Horn five hundred Marks.

The chief Citizens now finding the intolerable Insolence of Cade, and that they had born too much before, secretly sent to the Lord Scales in the Tower for Assistance; and the brave Matthew Gouge with some Forces in the Night came to them. The Rebels in Southwark hearing that their Entrance would be disputed, ran furiously to Arms, and Cade endeavour'd to open his Passage by Force; but notwithstanding all his Power, the Citizens made good and defended London Bridge against him, tho' with the Firing of several Houses, and the Loss of many honest and valiant Men, for the Conflict continu'd all Night, till nine in the Morning. Among such as were slain on the King's Side were John Sutton Alderman, Robert Heyland, and Matthew Gouge himself: Which last, an Esquire of Wales, was a Man of admirable Virtue, Manhood and Zeal for his Country, and of great Renown in the Wars of France, where he had nobly serv'd for above twenty Years; and his Deserts at this Time merited a Statue in the City, for whose Deliverance he spent his last Blood. To give quick Dispatch to these Troubles, Impunity was proclaim'd for all Offenders, and sent them in the King's Name by the Arch-Bishop of Canterbury, Lord-Chancellor, under the Great-Seal of England. The Rebels were soon dispos'd with this Assurance of their Safeties, and every Man retir'd in Peace from following such a pestilent Impostor. Cade afterwards attempting new Troubles in Kent, a thousand Marks were promis'd to him who kill'd or took this counterfeit Mortimer; and Alexander Eden, a Gentleman of Kent, had the good Fortune to discover and kill him by main Force at Hothfield in that County. His Body was brought to London, and beheaded and quarter'd; his Head set upon London Bridge, and his Quarters dispers'd in divers Places in Kent; to which Country the King came shortly after in Person, where tho' five hundred were found found guilty, only eight were executed. Tho' London was the chief Stage of this Rebellion, yet other Countries were not free, especially Wiltshire; for the Rebels there proceeded so far as to draw William Askot, Bishop of Salisbury, from the High Altar, when he was saying Mass in Edington Church, to the Top of the Hill; and there in his Episcopal Robes most inhumanly murder'd him.

The Rebellion ended.

The Kentish Rebellion being thus pacify'd and ended, far greater and more dangerous Troubles succeeded, as it is usual to Human Bodies, which by Reverses are shaken more terribly than ever. All these Troubles had their prime Source from Richard Duke of York, the true Son of that Richard whom Henry the Fifth had created Earl of Cambridge, and loaden with Wealth and Favours; but as no Bounty nor Benefits can change a treacherous Disposition, so he contriv'd the Death of his Benefactor Henry the Fifth, as the Duke of York his Son labour'd to depose the present King Henry his great Advancer. The Humours of the People were in the last Commotion not obscurely discover'd; and the Commonwealth had really some Enormities, through the Mismanagement of great Officers, but yet such as the Malady was far less pernicious than the Remedy. Upon Intelligence of which the Duke of York came suddenly out of Ireland, and to begin his usurp'd Authority, he apprehended John Sutton Lord Dudley, Reginald Abbot of Glastenbury, and another, and imprison'd them in his Castle of Ludlow. Edmond Duke of Somerset was the Man, who after Suffolk's Death, most supported the King's Interest by his Vigilance, Hazards and good Counsels, endeavouring by all Methods to clear the Realm from Factions, and to preserve the Kingdom in Quiet. York seeing this, soon found that Suffolk perish'd in vain, if the same Favours were conferr'd upon Somerset; against whose Person he had a particular Pretence of Quarrel, because the City of Caen in Normandy, the Duke of York's own Charge, was by him delivered to the French, when the English Affairs became desperate in those Parts; Sir David Hall, then Lieutenant to the Duke of York, not allowing it, tho' the renowned Talbot was present at the Surrender, and became a Hostage for Performance of Articles. The Duke of York hereupon consulted with his chief Friends the Earl of Salisbury and his Son, the Earl of Devonshire, the Lord Cobham and others, how he might best get into the Throne of England, and how to ruin the Duke of Somerset, from whom they were to expect the greatest Opposition. At length they agreed to have recourse to Arms, but to smother the mention of the Duke of York's Title, they publish'd to the World, That they design'd all Honour and Obedience to King Henry, but only would remove certain ill Men from about his Person, who oppress'd the People, and made a Prey of the Publick. Which to gain the more Credit, and to blind the easie King, the subtle Duke in a Proclamation us'd these Hypocritical Words: God knows, from whom nothing is hid, I am, have been, and ever will be, his true Liege-man, &c. For Proof of which, I offer my self to be sworn on the blessed Sacrament, and receive it as a Pledge of my Salvation at the Day of Doom. Because it was the Misfortune of the Duke of Somerset, that Normandy was lost during his Regency, his Enemies had the more Opportunity to asperse him with the People, who forbore not at his Return to offer him several Injuries and Indignities, till upon Pain of Death they were restrain'd, for the Breach of which Proclamation one was beheaded in West-Cheap in London.

The Duke of York proceeds in his former Designs.

He takes up Arms.

Notwithstanding all the winding Artifices of the Duke, the King saw so much of his Designs, as not to rely upon his plausible Pretensions; but by the Advice of his Friends, and chiefly of the Duke of Somerset, he soon gather'd a more numerous Force than the Duke, and march'd against him towards Wales; in which the King acted wisely, but not so much as the Occasion requir'd: The Duke having Notice of the King's Approach, turn'd aside, and with the utmost Expedition march'd towards London; but that City, the vain Hope of all Rebellions, bellions, would not harken to them. Upon which he retir'd with his Forces into Kent, the Place of his greatest Interest, and incamp'd at Brent-Heath near Dertford, about twelve Miles from London, designing to fight the first Opportunity. The King with no slow Marches return'd back, and pitch'd his Royal Standard upon Black-Heath, with a full Purpose to teach his Cousin of York more Duty and Loyalty. Here we may see the Fate of England; when God had put an excellent Opportunity into the King's Hands of rooting out all Hazards and Dangers that threaten'd his Family, for the Duke was far inferior in Numbers. Such therefore as secretly favour'd him, fearing his Overthrow, were ready to advise the King to an Accommodation; and Messengers were daily sent between the two Armies. The Duke in a Letter to the King, after his usual Manner, pretended Loyalty and particular Injuries, as that the King's Servants, Sir John Talbot at Holt Castle, Sir Thomas Stanley in Cheshire, and others in other Places, were sent to be Spies upon him. That by two of the Norris's, Bulkley, Gurst, Bould and other Gentlemen, he was forbidden to land at Bewmaris, or to have any Refreshment, affirming to him that he was against the King's Intentions, and as a Traitor. The King condescended to answer this Letter, letting him understand, That the Suspicion universally conceiv'd of his Behaviour produc'd those Effects: Nevertheless, in regard of the humble Obedience he had lately protested, he, for the easing the Duke's Heart, does declare, repute and admit him as a true and faithful Subject, and as his well-beloved Cousin. The Duke upon this advanc'd one Step further, and wrote to the King, That Justice might be done upon all Persons of what Degree soever, which were guilty, or reported to be guilty of Treason; aiming at the Duke of Somerset in particular, whom he doubted not to overwhelm with Sights and Calumnies, as he and his Adherents had done to the Duke of Staffolk.

Reg. 31. The poor King, relying upon weak and treacherous Counsels, was contented that Somerset should be commanded Prisoner to his own House, and that the Duke of York, having first disbanded his Forces, should come in Person, and put himself into the King's Hands. All this being done, in the King's Presence he exhibited a grievous Complaint against the Pride and Avarice of the Duke of Somerset, and very artfully accusing none but him, he sought the Favour and good Opinion of all others: A most subtle Project, by which he threw upon his Enemy all the Envy of the People, and left him singly to stand against the Effects. Somerset, a Prince of great Wit and Spirit, resolving as well for his own Honour as the Interest of the Publick, not to endure such an Indignity, bravely presented himself before the King, Face to Face answer'd the Duke of York, and in express Terms accus'd him of the highest Treason, as having conspir'd to depose the King, and usurp the Sovereignty himself: Vehemently urging, That the Duke might be committed and arraign'd, that by his deserved Death, and the Incapacity of his Posterity, all civil War might be extinguish'd; finally praying, That Heaven would not suffer the Enemy of the Kingdom to escape the Hand of Justice. This in probability had been effected, but the publick Faith seem'd engag'd for the Duke's Indemnity, as having come upon the King's Word, and also that the Hearts of the People were not well assur'd to the King, which by executing the Duke might have been more unsettled, because they would have been ready to believe, that he was sacrific'd to Somerset's Repentments, and not for the Safety of the Nation. Upon these Considerations, and the Reports of the Duke's Son being ready with an Army to rescue his Father, the Duke was no longer kept under Restraint, as he had been by Somerset's weighty Accusations; but to assure the gentle and indulgent King of his Allegiance, he made a formal Submission, and solemnly took his Oath to be a true, faithful and obedient Subject. This was first done in St. Paul's Church in the Presence of the King and most of the chief Nobility, as the Dukes of Buckingham, Norfolk and Somerset, nine Bishops, two Viscounts, many Barons, both the Arch-Bishops of the Realm, and three Bishops. The Form of Words to which he swore and subscrib'd, were long, express and most solemn, and may be seen both in Hollingshed and Speed; which being afterwards reiterated by him at Westminster, and then at Coventry, the Breach of them do manifestly display the highest Degree of Perjury, Treachery and Treason.

As it were to divert these domestick Rancors and Disturbances, two French Noblemen came secretly over from Gascony into England, petitioning for an Army into their Country, declaring that Bordeaux and the Gascoigns would readily return to the English Subjection, if they were duely supported against the French King. Upon which an Army was soon decreed for their Reduction; and the renowned Talbot, first Earl of Shrewsbury, was made General in that Enterprize; who landing in Gascony, the Fame of such a Soldier caus'd several Places to yield. The City of Bordeaux it self secretly open'd a Gate to him, which the French Garrison perceiving, fled out at a Postern; but many being overtaken, were cut in pieces by the Lord L'Esparre and the English. After which new Supplies and Provisions arriv'd, under the Conduct of the Earl of Shrewsbury's younger Son; and Bordeaux being well mann'd and fortify'd, the Earl receiv'd Advice that the French had laid Siege to Castillon, a Place of Importance upon the River Dardonne. To that Place the Earl directed his March; but too adventrously charging the Enemy upon unequal Terms, he was there, together with his Son, unfortunately slain. The English Fortunes and Hopes which began to revive, with this Commander made an unhappy Conclusion, to the infinite Loss of the English, and the great Affliction of the Gascoigns, who generally mislik'd the French, and approv'd of the English, as having so long and honourably govern'd those Dominions. This was the End of that mighty Earl, in the eightieth Year of his Age, after he had serv'd his King and Country in the French Wars for twenty four Years with the highest Commendations; a most noble and valiant Man, by whose Virtue the English Name did principally become formidable to France. Bordeaux it self, and all other Places after this, were by Siege reduc'd again to the French King, who prosecuted those Affairs in his own Person. From that Time forwards the English never obtain'd any further Hold or Footing in those Parts, the Fortune of this Attempt breaking all further Combinations of the Gascoigns. This Dukedom of Gascony or Aquitain was a large Province, containing four Arch-bishopricks, twenty four Bishopricks, fifteen Earldoms, two hundred and two Baronies, and above a thousand Captainships and Bailiwicks; so that the World may easily conjecture how great the Loss was of such a noble Inheritance, which had continu'd English for about three hundred Years. Here in a great Measure ended all the English Sovereignty in France, when all the martial Men were recall'd from that Country, to carry on more unfortunate and calamitous Designs in their own. At this Time a French Captain scoffingly ask'd an English Man When they would return again into France? to whom the latter made this memorable Answer, When your Sins are greater and more crying than ours: A Sentence worthy the Notice of all English Men to this Day.

The Duke of York still pursues his old Design.

Foundation of them was the subtle and ambitious Duke of York, who ever restless in his Designs, now contrary to the most religious and solemn Oaths, resolv'd to mount the Throne of England. He doubted that King Henry's known Goodness and Piety would render the Business extreamly difficult; especially since he held the Crown not by any Usurpation of his own, but by two successive Descents from Father and Grandfather, and both worthy Princes. This Consideration so far prevail'd as long to keep him within the Bounds of Dissimulation; for knowing how dangerous it might prove if he made known his Designs, he thought it best to make the World believe that he acted for the publick Good, when he only fought his own Ends. He knew also that by reviving his Pretensions against the Duke of Somerset, he might revenge himself of a mortal Enemy, free himself from his greatest Obstacle, deprive the King of his greatest Supporter, and at the same time purchase the Love of all Men; the Love of the People, by ruining a Man detested for the Loss of Normandy, and the Love of the Nobility, by reducing him who for his exorbitant Authority was highly envy'd by most of them. But not contented with this, he forbore not to vilify the King Henry's Reputation, representing him to be poorly spirited, and affirming the Condition of the present Times requir'd a King that would not be govern'd by his Wife, or any Third Person, but by his own Judgment, a wise Man and vigorous, and Master of such Virtues as were not to be found in him. Having by these Means prepar'd the Peoples Inclinations, he firmly secur'd to himself two extraordinary Men, the Father and Son, the one the Earl of Salisbury whose Daughter he had marry'd, and the other the Earl of Warwick; the first celebrated for his wise Counsel, and the latter for his invincible Resolution. By the Assistance of these two, he caus'd the Duke of Somerset to be arrested in the Queen's own Lodgings, and sent to the Tower; to which he was more embolden'd by reason of the King's being at that Time sick; whose double Weakness both of Body and Mind encourag'd him, and assisted his working himself into the Government.

The Duke of York raises an Army.

But as soon as King Henry recover'd his Health, understanding that Malice and Design were the chief Causes of York's Accusations, he not only set the Duke of Somerset at Liberty, but also made him Governor of Calais with the County of Guisnes, the only Remainder the English had in France. This gave new Occasions of Disgust, and York finding that he had twice fail'd in his Endeavours to ruin him, retir'd into Wales, where having gather'd a considerable Army, he march'd towards London, accompany'd with the fore-mentioned Lords, and many others. The King so much distrusted the Fidelity of that City, that he would not stay for the Duke's coming there, but went and encamp'd with his Forces at St. Albans, where the Adversary presented himself to give him Battel. The King had in his Camp the Dukes of Somerset and Buckingham, the Earls of Ormond, Pembroke, Stafford, Northumberland, Devonshire and Dorset, with the Lords Clifford, Ludley, Berners, Ross, and others; and proceeding according to his pacifick Disposition, he sent some to the Duke to know why he came in that hostile Manner. The Duke in a Letter to the King requested That he would deliver up such Persons as he should name to deserv'd Punishment. The King, to let him know his Authority, return'd this Answer, That he and the rest of his Adherents were Traitors; and rather than they should have any Lord from him at that Time, he himself would live and die in the Quarrel. Upon this the bold Earl of Warwick unawares attack'd the Vantguard Royal, and disorder'd it before the Duke of Somerset could remedy the same; so that the Forces on both Sides falling in, a bloody Battel ensu'd; in which, on the King's Party were slain the Duke of Somerset himself, the Earls of Northumberland and Stafford, and the Lord Clifford, with about five thousand of the inferior sort, and about six hundred on the other Side. The King himself was shot in the Neck with an Arrow, the Duke of Buckingham and the Lord Scales in the Faces, and the Lord Dorset was so wounded, that he was forc'd to be carry'd away in a Cart. The King's Army being at length all dispers'd or slain, the King himself, unguarded, fled to a poor thatcht House not far off; of which the Duke of York having Notice, he with the Earls of Salisbury and Warwick, the Father and Son, approach'd him on their Knees, humbly craving his Royal Pardon; declaring, That since the common Enemy was dead, they had no more to require. Upon which the poor King with Trembling answer'd, Let there be no more Bloodshed, and I will do what you'll have me. This first Battel of St. Albans was fought upon the twenty third Day of May, and thirty third Year of this Reign; and the Bodies of the Duke of Somerset, the Earl of Northumberland and the Lord Clifford were bury'd in the Chappel of that Town. And now the Duke of York in the King's Name commanded a Cessation from further Hostilities, and with a great Appearance of Reverence convey'd the King to London, where they kept the Feast of Pentecost together.

sted.*

A Parliament was immediately call'd, in which all Things were decreed directly opposite to what had been enacted in former Parliaments, to testifie that the late Government had been unjust, and the King abus'd by the Malice of those who counsell'd him; Humphry Duke of Glocester was declar'd to have been Loyal to the King, and Faithful to his Country; all Grants whatsoever, whether by Patent from the King or by Parliament, beginning from the first Day of the present Reign, were revok'd as Things that impoverish'd the Crown and diminish'd its true Lustre. And that the late Insurrection, tho' condemn'd by all Laws, might be thought meritorious, Declaration was made, That the Duke of Somerset, the Lord chief Justice Thorp, and William Joseph, were the grand Occasions of it, by detaining a pacificatory Letter, which if it had been deliver'd to the King, it would have remov'd the Foundation of the fore-said Disorders; wherefore the Duke of York, the Earls of Salisbury and Warwick and their Adherents ought not to be blam'd for the future. These Pre- tences thus pass'd over, they proceeded more directly to their Business by framing a Triumvirate for the Groundwork of their design'd Monarchy; York caus'd himself to be created Protector of the Kingdom, Salisbury Lord Chancellor, and Warwick Governor of Calais; so that the Political Authority remain'd in the First, the Civil in the Second, and the Military in the Third: Whilst Hen- ry, King only in Name, was depriv'd of all Authority and Safety; all that had a Dependance upon the King were gradually remov'd from his Council, and from all Places of Trust and Honour; and John Holland Duke of Exeter was by Force taken from Westminster, whither he was fled for Sanctuary, and sent Prisoner to Pomfret Castle; a Sacrilege not formerly ventur'd on by any King.

*A Parliament
call'd.*

*The Duke of

The King was now in a very declining Condition, and the Queen so suspi- cious, that she durst only trust those, who being injur'd, were to run the like Fortune with her Husband. Yet the Respect due to the King was not so much diminish'd, nor his Majesty so much darken'd, but that the young Duke of Somerset, the Duke of Buckingham and other Lords, resolv'd no longer to en- dure the Injury done to him, and to quit themselves of the imminent Danger that threaten'd them: For every Man now saw York's Designs to be the Usurpati- on of the Crown, and that his Delays proceeded from the Apprehensions of Danger; for the King by Reason of his Piety being reverenc'd by the Best, he thought he could not suddenly compass his Designs without direct Scandal; and being oppos'd by the greatest Part of the Kingdom, if that happen'd, it might for the present ruin, and for the future totally lose all his Hopes. After a Consultati- on had with the Queen, who was of a high Spirit and impatient under Subje- ction, a great Council was call'd at Greenwich, wherein it was resolv'd, that since the King was no Child, and consequently needed no Protector, nor was so void of Understanding as to be govern'd by other Mens Discretions, therefore the Duke of York should be freed from his Protectorship, and the Earl of Salis- bury from being Lord Chancellor, and that he should surrender the Great Seal to whom the King should think fit. The Duke of York could not fence himself from this sudden Blow, being taken unprovided; and it was strengthen'd with Reasons not to be gainsaid without a direct Rebellion; so that he was now forc'd to endure it, but not without the great Dislike of his Adherents, who were not wanting to add new Fuel to the Fury of the People. This they did by causing them to rise in a Tumult in the City of London, occasion'd by a Dissention between a Merchant and an Italian; but tho' an Insurrection was made, yet Matters did not succeed as they expected; for after having pillag'd many Houses of the Venetians, Florentines and other Foreigners, the Tumult was appeas'd, and the Authors of it punish'd.

The Scots and French insult
the English.

The Duk of York left the Court confirm'd in his former Designs by this new Affront, while the Scots took the Opportunity to enter England in one Part, and the French in two other. The Scots having endamag'd the Borders, retir'd with their Booty into their own Country; the French pillag'd some Houses, surprized Sandwich, took some Ships and return'd to Normandy; but the Surprize of Sandwich did them no great Service, they finding it not tenable against so many Enemies. England was now like a Body oppress'd by a general Distillation, malignant Humours dispers'd themselves in every Part, and the vital Faculties the Laws had not Force enough to repel them; for while one Party endeavour'd to destroy the other, all Care of the Common-wealth was laid aside, and Justice and Equity clearly banish'd the Realm. Many Quarrels happen'd between the Nobility; particularly between the Baron of Egremont and the Earl of Salisbury's Sons, in which a considerable Number of People were slain and hurt. In the mean time the Queen, not being able to secure her self, the King and Kingdom, but by the Ruin of the Duke of York and the two Earls of Salisbury and Warwick, nor yet able to work their Ruin but by Fraud and Stratagem, caus'd the King to go to Coventry, under Pretence of passing away his Time in Hunting and Hawking, and of changing the Air. She found that London was too much inclin'd to support their Interests, therefore feigning some grand Affair, she sent for these three Persons by express Letters from the King, requiring their immediate Presence at Coventry, to which Place without Suspicion of Danger they obediently resorted. But being admonish'd by private Friends of what was design'd against them, they by Flight avoided that Danger, which otherwise might have been fatal to them. So without taking Leave they departed from Court; the Duke to Wigmore in the Marches of Wales, the Earl of Salisbury to his Castle of Midaleham in the North, and the Earl of Warwick to Calais. And tho' these Three were separated in their Persons, yet they continu'd firmly united in Hearts and Interests, and kept an uninterrupted and faithful Correspondence with each other.

The King proposes an Accommodation.

The good King was much displeas'd at these Proceedings of the Queen, being contrary to his pious Inclinations; wherefore returning to London he call'd a grand Council, where having stated the Condition of the Kingdom, he shew'd That the late Divisions had encourag'd both the Scots and the French to assault him at home, and therefore a Reconciliation was necessary, which if the Failings of particular Men, and those of his own Family were likely to obstruct, he for his Part would forget the Injuries done to himself, and would endeavour for his Relations Agreement with them, who in the late Contests had shed their Blood; promising That the Duke of York and his Friends should in this Affair have nothing to do, but barely to ask and desire. Upon this obliging Declaration, choice was made of proper Persons to be sent to the chief Men of both Parties, many of whom had forborn coming to Court since the Battel of St. Albans; and these were desir'd to come and treat of Things necessary and expedient for the publick and private Peace. The Duke of York accordingly came to London, and with four hundred well appointed Men lodg'd at his House call'd Baynard's Castle; the Earl of Salisbury with five hundred lodg'd at his House call'd the Herbour; the Duke of Exeter, lately released, and the Duke of Somerset with eight hundred more were lodg'd within Temple-Bar; the Earl of Warwick with six hundred, all in one sort of remarkable Habit, were lodg'd at the Gray-Friars; and the Earl of Northumberland, with the Lords Egremont and Clifford, with fifteen hundred Men were lodg'd in Holborn: Such was the Custom of that military Age. Upon the seventeenth of March the King and Queen came to London, and were lodg'd at the Bishop's Palace; and Godfrey Bolein, the Mayor and Ancestor to the famous Anne Queen to Henry the Eighth, having five thousand Men in Readiness, with a competent Number rod daily round the City, for the Preservation of the King's Peace. The Lords lodging within the City, held their Council at Black-Friars; the other at the Chapter-House in Westminster.

After a few Meetings, by the prudent and pious Exhortations of the Archbishop of Canterbury, and other worthy Prelates, the Parties offended were induc'd to a Communication, and afterwards to a final Agreement, upon several Articles in Writing, of which the King himself, as a Person of Impartiality and Integrity, was made the sole Arbitrator of their Differences. Certain particular Satisfactions were awarded to be made by the Duke of York, and his two Friends the Earls of Salisbury and Warwick, upon the Account of the Death of the Duke of Somerset, and others slain in the Battel of St. Albans. And the said Duke of Somerset, the Earl of Northumberland and the Lord Clifford, slain at St. Albans, were declar'd true Liege-men to the King at the Day of their Deaths, as well as the Duke of York, the Earls of Warwick and Salisbury. Many other healing Articles and Awards were made in order to reconcile and unite the alienated Hearts and Affections. The Rejoycings for this hopeful Accommodation were extraordinary among all good Englishmen, who in great Multitudes throng'd to the publick Celebration of it. For upon the twenty fifth of March, a most solemn Procession was made into St. Paul's Cathedral, where the King, adorn'd with his Crown and Royal Robes, went in Person, before whom walk'd the Duke of Somerset and the Earl of Salisbury in one Rank, the Duke of Exeter and the Earl of Warwick in another, and so one and one of each Party, 'till they were all marshall'd: And behind the King himself, came the Queen led by the Duke of York, with the most obliging Marks of Satisfaction on both Sides.

*The Solemnity
of it.*

VIII. The Affairs of the Publick for a short Time seem'd to have been in a peaceable and happy Condition; but Providence had still reserv'd far greater Punishments for the English Nation, which were to be brought about by the Head and Hands of Richard Duke of York. It is not to be doubted, but a Man of his profound Thought and restless Ambition, still continu'd his Designs for the Crown, notwithstanding all his varnish'd Pretences, and did only seem to lay it aside, because he presum'd the Time inconvenient. On the other side the Queen, who was the Head and Life of the contrary Party, in regard of herself, her Husband and Son, may probably be thought to have omitted any Thing rather than that Vigilance and Jealousie which former Perils, and the Enemy's present Power might justly keep alive in her. The thin Althes therefore which cover'd these glowing Coals were easily unrak'd and blown away, and particularly by means of this Accident. While the King and many of the Lords continu'd at Westminster, there happen'd, or perhaps was design'd a Quarrel between one of the King's Servants and an Attendant of the Earl of Warwick, who hurt the King's Servant. Upon which his Fellow Servants of all sorts, and with all Kinds of Weapons, in a great Disorder assaulted the Earl himself, as he was coming from the Council; in which Contest many were hurt, and the Earl with great Difficulty escap'd into a Barge, and gain'd the City. The Queen immediately commanded the Earl to be committed to the Tower, but he foreseeing the Danger, posted into Yorkshire, where he acquainted the Duke of York and his Father the Earl of Salisbury of all the Occurrences, with the Queen's inveerate Disposition, advising them to stand upon their Guard, and provide against the approaching Storm. The Yorkists directly charged the Queen with all this as a Plot laid for the Earl's Destruction; and Warwick hasten'd to Calais, and being then Lord Admiral, he took with him all the King's Ships that were in Readiness; and scouring the Seas, met with five great Carricks, three of Genoa and two of Spain, and after two Days Fight took three of them, which he carry'd into Calais. There unloading their Freight he found it worth ten thousand Pounds in staple Commodities, besides the Ships and Prisoners. Shortly after the young Duke of Somerset was sent to be Governor of Calais; but Warwick refus'd to resign, notwithstanding the King's Commands, alledging he was constituted by the Parliament. So that Somerset was rejected not only with Danger to his Person, but with the Loss of several of his Mens Heads, which Warwick commanded to be cut off. These were bold Proceedings in this Earl; whom yet the unskilful and impetuous Multitude highly extoll'd and applauded.

The Civil War begins.

The Duke of York in the mean Time, and Warwick with his Father the Earl of Salisbury, the Triumvirate of England, carefully consulted of their Affairs: Salisbury resolv'd with Sword in Hand to expostulate the Danger and Injury offer'd to his Son at Westminster. The Queen, a Lady of great Magnanimity and Penetration, being justly sensible, that now King Henry or the Duke of York must perish, and that one Kingdom was not capacious enough for both their Families, actively stirr'd her self to maintain the Possession of the Crown, and advance her own Son Prince Edward, by ruining the other's House, whose whole Building consisted of Lancastrian Beneficence. Therefore she daily consulted, sent, spoke, gave, and strengthen'd her self with Friends on all Sides, especially in Cheshire; causing her Son to distribute Silver Swans, as his Badge and Device, to all the Gentlemen of that County, and to many others throughout England. In a short Time Salisbury set forwards from his Castle at Mid-aleham with four or five thousand Men; but James Touchet Lord Audeley, by the Queen's Orders unadvisedly encounter'd him upon Blore-Heath near Muckel-

The Second
Battle at Blore-Heath.

John. The Fight was long and bloody, but at length King Henry's evil Fortune gave the Advantage to the Earl of Salisbury; where, besides the valiant Lord Audeley himself, were slain no fewer than two thousand four hundred Men; but the chief Loss fell upon the Cheshire Men, who wore the Princes Livery. This was the second Battel fought between the Families of York and Lancaster, which was the Chance that ruin'd both Parties, tho' for a while it was fortunate to York's Successor; for God, after having chastis'd one Side and the other, was pleas'd at length to appease his Anger, by uniting both the Houses, and putting a Period to the Civil Wars.

By this last Action the Earl of Salisbury open'd himself a Passage to Ludlow, where the Head of their Combination the Duke of York employ'd himself in gathering of Forces; and being met, they concluded, that since the Contest was become Mortal, they would act no longer in Clouds, but fight it out to the last Extremity. Men were drawn out of all Parts with large Hopes and Promises of sharing in their Fortunes; and the Earl of Warwick, leaving his Charge at Calais, with the valiant Captain Andrew Trollop, and a Troop of 1000 Men, came to the general Rendezvous of the Yorkists, at the Castle of Ludlow. The King in the mean Time, according to the Exigency of his Affairs, attended a great Number of faithful Subjects; and being attended by the Dukes of Somerset and Exeter, and others of his choice Friends, march'd against his Enemies. He began first with offering them a general Pardon; which they utterly refus'd, calling it a Staff of Reed, or a Glass-Buckler. Upon which the King commanded his Standards to advance towards the Enemy; but during this March a Letter fill'd with the usual hypocritical Pretences was deliver'd to the King.

The Duke of York's Letter to the King.

In which, among many other Insinuations, were these also: Most Christian King, right, high and mighty Prince, and our most dread Sovereign Lord, sent unto your good Grace by the Prior of the Cathedral Church of Worcester, and divers other Doctors, and among others by M. William Linwood Doctor of Divinity, who severally minister'd to us the Blessed Sacrament of the Body of Jesus, upon which we all of us depos'd of our said Truth and Duty. But the Letter made no Overture of any Conditions upon which they would yield to lay down their Arms, alledging, They would but make their Way to the King for Redress of Abuses; and that they were constrain'd to stand together for their own Defence, against such great Courtiers and Favourites as design'd their Destruction; meaning in Reality such Persons whose Vigilance and Valour might protect and guard him from their violent Practices.

The King now came in sight of his Foes, when the Triumviri, York, Warwick and Salisbury, being strongly intrench'd before Ludlow, design'd to attack him. Upon the Approach of the Armies, the King generously caus'd Proclamation to be made, That whoever would abandon the Duke of York, should be receiv'd into Mercy, and have Pardon. Upon this the brave Andrew Trollop, finding himself deceiv'd by the Duke and his Party, who pretended nothing but the King's Preservation, abandon'd the Duke's Camp at Midnight, and with all his select Men, not only presented his Service to the King, but also discover'd all the Duke's Counsels. This extremely discourag'd the Duke, who resolv'd to betake himself to flight; but whether it proceeded from his Fear of Trollop's Valour and Wisdom upon whom he had much rely'd, or from the Fear that his Example should induce others to follow his Steps, is uncertain. However, taking his younger Son the Earl of Rutland with him, he fled into Ireland: The Earl of Marche, his eldest Son and Heir, the Earls of Salisbury and Warwick, with much Difficulty escap'd to Calais; which Place, as Polydore observes, if Henry had in Time taken from his Enemies, they had without Question been irrecoverably ruin'd. The Multitude that serv'd under the Triumvirate found Mercy; but their Tenants were many of them executed, maimed, or for the most part pillag'd. The Town of Ludlow itself was plunder'd to the bare Walls, and the Dutcheffs of York depriv'd of all her Goods; and nothing less could be the Effects against the Friends of such Adversaries, upon so publick an Act and Advantage. The Cause was pursu'd more severely against the great Offenders in the next Parliament, which was held at Coventry: Where Richard Duke of York, Edward Earl of Marche his eldest Son, Richard Earl of Warwick, Edmund Earl of Rutland, Richard Earl of Salisbury, Alice his Wife, by whose Right he was Earl, two or three Lords, nine Knights, and certain others, were publickly and solemnly attainted of High-Treason, and their whole Estates confiscated.

The Duke and his Adherents disperse and fly.

They are declared Traitors in Parliament.

The Earl of Warwick keeps Calais.

Thus was Henry once more absolutely King, and Somerfet was made Governor of Calais, who with the Lords Ross and Audley were sent over with Forces to take it from Warwick and his Adherents. Their Success was unfortunate, for Somerfet was forc'd to fly, his Soldiers were pillag'd by Warwick's Men, the Lord Audley was taken into the Town, and the Lord Ross could hardly escape. Letters were hereupon written from the Court into Foreign Parts, desiring, That no Relief might be given to the Traitors that kept Calais against the King; and all Men at home were forbidden to transport any Victuals or Refreshment to that Place. The Duke of Somerfet being at Guisnes, a neighbouring Castle, daily disturb'd the Calisians; but Warwick's main Business was to contain the Duke of York in Ireland, who now had that Kingdom at his Command. But hearing that the King had certain Ships lying at Sandwich to transport Supplies and Succours to Somerfet, that he might not leave such Danger behind him, he sent away Sir John Denham with a Company of Soldiers more valiant than numerous, who with a Wind as favourable to them as contrary to their Enemies, enter'd the Haven and Town of Sandwich, which being unguarded and her Inhabitants asleep, he took the Lord Rivers and his son in their Beds, and tho' the Soldiers awakened, made head and wounded

His Success. Denham so as to lame him, he notwithstanding worsted them, and plunder'd many Houses; and being favour'd by the Mariners, he made himself Master of the King's Ships, furnish'd with all warlike Provisions, and brought them with several Prisoners into Calais. With these Ships Warwick convey'd himself into Ireland to the Duke of York; and in his going and coming, he was so favour'd by the Winds that he spent not above thirty Days in his whole Voyage. The Duke of Exeter was made Admiral, with Orders to intercept his Passage; but he fail'd in the Attempt, and many of his Men deserting him, he durst not attack the Earl, nor was he willing to attack the Duke, upon Pretence that he was of the King's Blood: Such was the Artifice and Subtlety of the Yorkists, to pretend Reverence to that Blood they most desir'd to shed. Five hundred fresh Soldiers waited at Sandwich, to be shipp'd over to the Duke of Somerset for his safe Conduct into England; but Warwick's Men came suddenly upon them, slew Montfort their Commander, with many others, and disarm'd the rest. Such was the distracted State of miserable England, through the Pride and restless Ambition of one or two presumptuous Men. And tho' nothing was more true, than that the Duke of York sought the Crown of England; yet nothing was more plain than that his Friends pretended the contrary: For the Veneration of King Henry's Piety and Purity was likely to turn greatly to their Prejudice and Disadvantage.

The Yorkists Remonstrance.

The King failing thus to gain the Person of the Earl of Warwick, or his Town of Calais, the Yorkists sent over certain Articles into Kent, in which they subtly complain'd of certain general Enormities concerning Injuries done to the Church, and the ill Administration of Justice, Abuse of Purveyors, the King's Poverty by the Corruption of his Officers, and other Things of the like plausible Nature. Where they mention'd the Person of the King, they freed him from all Exceptions, as being of as noble, virtuous, righteous, and blessed a Disposition as any Earthly Prince whatever. When they mention'd their Enemies, who were the King's faithful Friends and Subjects, they nam'd the Earl of Shrewsbury, the Earl of Wiltshire, and the Lord Beaumont, as principal Persons concern'd in the Attainders of the Yorkists at Coventry. Where they spoke of themselves and their Intentions, they profess'd all Sincerity and Loyalty to King Henry, and that they only meant to come upon their Guard to speak with him concerning the Common Good, and their own Satisfaction; and that now they would attempt the same again in the Name of the Land, and not suffer such Mischiefs to gain upon them. In the Conclusion of their specious Pretences they had these Words; Requiring you, on God's Behalf, therein to assist us, doing always the Duty of Liege-men in our Persons to our said Sovereign Lord, to his Estate, Prerogative and Preeminence, and to the Security of his most noble Person, to which we have ever been, and will be as true as any of his Subjects alive; whereof we call God, our Lady St. Mary, and all the Saints in Heav'n to Witness. With these treacherous and impious Proceedings they prevail'd upon the unthinking Multitude; and the Lord Fauconbridge was sent over to sound their Affections, and draw the purulent Matter to a Head; and shortly after, the Earls of Marche, Warwick and Salisbury landed in Kent. But the People were not the only deluded Persons; for the Arch-Bishop of Canterbury, and other venerable Men, believ'd they spoke Truth; which that they might do effectually, the Earl of Warwick publicly took an Oath upon the Cross of Canterbury, That they had ever born true Faith and Allegiance to King Henry. The King before their Arrival had quitted the City of London, as not greatly trusting the Affections of the Citizens, who hated several of his Ministers, and appointed the Rendezvous of his Forces at Northampton, where he resided. The Enemy advanced that way; and in the mean Time their Accomplices endeavour'd to take the Tower of London, in which were several Loyal Noblemen, as the Lord Scales, Hungerford, Vescie, Lovel, De la Ware, and others.

The King quits London.

In the mean Time the Queen, with the King in her Company, had gather'd a considerable Army at Northampton; and among other Lords in the Army were the Duke of Somerset lately return'd from Guisnes, and the Duke of Buckingham, who were no sooner arriv'd but they heard of the Enemy's Approach, therefore passing the River, they went and encamp'd in the neighbouring Fields. The Earls of Marche and Warwick, being deny'd Admittance to the King's Presence, proceeded to a new Piece of Subtlety, and order'd a Cry to go through the Field, That no Man should lay Hands upon the King, nor the common People, but upon the Lords, Knights and Esquires. Early in the Morning the Earl of Marche, urg'd on by his Youth and Valour, began the Battel, which was very bloody and obstinate for five Hours together, without any great Inequality. At length, the Lord Grey of Ruthen running over to the Earl's Side, the King was defeated with the Death of ten thousand Men; a great Loss, but not of such Consequence had he not lost himself; for being depriv'd of his Defenders who were slain round his Person, he fell into the Power of his Enemies. This dreadful Battel was fought upon the ninth Day of July, in which the King's Ordnance could not play by reason of the Rains, wherein were slain the Duke of Buckingham, Talbot Earl of Shrewsbury, who fighting valiantly did not degenerate from his Father, the Lord Egremont, the Vicount Beaumont, besides many other Knights and Gentlemen: And the Prisoners were very numerous, especially among the Knights and Gentlemen; for being alighted from their Horses to fight on Foot, they had no means to escape. The Queen, with Prince Edward her Son and the Duke of Somerset, fled to the Bishoprick of Durham. The Victors being return'd to London, inflicted such Punishments as usually attend the Injustice of Civil Wars; among such of their Adversaries as were found in the City, those who could escape had the best Fortune. Thomas Thorp, second Baron of the Exchequer, endeavouring to escape in the Habit of a Monk, was taken and committed Prisoner to the Tower, and after that by the Commons beheaded at High-Gate. Those in the Tower had yielded upon certain Conditions, which forc'd the Lord Scales to endeavour to take Sanctuary at Westminster; but being upon the Thames he was murder'd by certain Watermen belonging to the Earl of Warwick, and his Body wallowing in Blood was stript of all its Apparel, and left to the publick View of all Men. Yet still the two Earls of Marche and Warwick continu'd their usual Hypocrisy to the King, now in their Possession, and thus address'd themselves to him, Most noble Prince, be not displeas'd that God has granted us the Victory over our mortal Enemies, who by their inveterate Malice have unjustly excited your Highness to banish us from the Land, and would have put us to final Shame and Confusion. We come not to disquiet or afflict your Highness, but to please your noble Person, tenderly desiring the Prosperity of that and all your Realm, and to be your true Liege Subjects as long as our Lives shall endure.

The third Battel at Northampton.

The King defeated and taken Prisoner.

The Hypocrisy of the Victors.

In the mean Time Scotland, by reason of the late Affinity with the House of Beaufort, whose Head was the Duke of Somerset, descended from John of Gaunt, was a special Support to King Henry in all his tempestuous Adversities; but now that Refuge was much hazarded. For King James the Second, partly in Favour of King Henry, laid Siege to Roxborough Castle, then in Custody of King Henry's Enemies; where going into the Trenches to see the Lion, a famous Piece of Ordnance, and the other Artillery discharg'd, one of them broke, and with a Shiver of it slew the King, and dangerously wounded the Earl of Angus. This unfortunate Accident happen'd upon Sunday the third of August. The Queen of Scotland nevertheless maintain'd the Siege, and gain'd that Place as well as the Castle of Warke, both which she in Revenge had level with the Ground. James the Third, a Child of seven Years of Age, succeeded his Father, as well to the Support of the distressed English, as to the Crown of Scotland. The Death of the King of the Scots was follow'd by that of Charles King of France, which tho' it was not violent, was no less strange and unusual. Being sick, some of his Flatterers, to manifest their Zeal, put an Imagination into his Head that some Persons design'd to poison him; which caus'd him to abstain from all Sustenance for several Days. And when his Physicians told him that his Weakness proceeded from Want of Meat, and not from any Sickness, he endeavour'd to eat but could not; for the Channels through which his Meat should pass were clos'd up; whereupon he dy'd with Hunger, and left his Kingdom to his Son Lewis the Eleventh.

The Duke of York's Entry into London.

The News of the Battel of Northampton being convey'd to the Duke of York in Ireland, he now resolv'd to throw off the Mask he had so long worn, and with all Expedition came to London, where the Earls of Marche and Warwick had summon'd a Parliament to meet in the King's Name upon the Eighth Day of October. He made his Entry with numerous Troops of Men, and Trumpets founding before him; causing the Sword to be carry'd before him as Kings usually did, only with this Difference, that it was now carry'd naked, whereas in the Presence of Kings it us'd to be sheath'd. He alighted from his Horse at the King's Palace at Westminster, and entring into the upper House of Parliament, he laid his Hand a considerable Time upon the Throne, as if by that Act he had taken Possession of it; and when he remov'd his Hand, he turn'd to those that were by, as desirous to read his future Success in their Countenances; and, as it is usual for Men to flatter themselves in what they most passionately desire, he thought they approv'd of this Action. But the Arch-Bishop of Canterbury standing up and asking him if he would be pleas'd to go and see his Majesty, he chang'd Countenance and angerly answer'd him, He knew none in the Kingdom to whom he ought that Duty, but on the contrary all Men ought it to him. The Arch-Bishop going forth to acquaint the King with his Answer, who lay in the Queen's Lodgings, the Duke likewise went forth and boldly enter'd the King's Lodgings, and broke open all the Doors and Locks, to the great Indignation of many. After this, without any Reserve, he made his Claim to the Crown of England, notwithstanding the most solemn Oaths and Engagements to the contrary; and publish'd it in open Parliament, together with his Pedigree. Most of the House stood amaz'd, both to find him seated on the Royal Throne, and for this unexpected Challenge. But the Duke, tho' at first he fully design'd to have depos'd King Henry, and crown'd himself by the first of November, yet finding such Astonishment and Silence, he sent them his Pedigree and his Claim in Writing, that they might better consider of it; yielding, as he pretended, to submit to their general Determination.

*He claims the

The Substance of the Duke of York's Claim to the Crown of England was as follows. 'King Edward the Third had seven Sons, Edward Prince of Wales, William of Hatfield, Lionell Duke of Clarence, John of Gaunt Duke of Lancaster, Edmund Duke of York, Thomas Duke of Glocester, and William of Windsor. Edward the Eldest dy'd during his Father's Life, and left one Son, King Richard the Second, who dy'd without Issue, as also did King Edward's Second Son William. Lionell the Third Son had only one Daughter nam'd Philippa, who being marry'd to Edmund Mortimer Earl of Marche, she had by him Roger Earl of Marche, who afterwards had two Sons and two Daughters, of whom three dy'd without Issue; only Anne the sole Heiress of the House marry'd to Richard Earl of Cambridge, the Son of Edmund Duke of York, the fifth Son of King Edward the Third, which Earl of Cambridge begot Richard Duke of York the present Claimant. On the other Side John of Gaunt, the Fourth Son of King Edward the Third, and younger Brother to Lionell, had a Son nam'd Henry, who immediately after King Richard's Resignation, unrighteously enter'd upon the Throne; because Edmund Earl of Marche, Son to Philippa the Daughter and Heiress of the foresaid Lionell elder Brother to John of Gaunt, was then alive; and the said Henry, Son to John of Gaunt, and his Successors, had hitherto held the Crown of England unjustly, because the said Richard Plantagenet, the present Duke of York, was the lawful Heir, as being the Son of Richard Earl of Cambridge and Anne before mentioned.

This was the Substance of the Duke of York's Title and Claim, which as to Matter of Genealogy was undoubtedly true; tho' in Bar to this Claim King Henry's Friends, without denying any Part of the Premises, had not a little to plead for him; and among other Things they alledg'd 'That King Richard the Second resign'd up his Crown and Authority at large; and that no other male Claim but Henry Duke of Lancaster, Son of John of Gaunt, he was admitted to the Throne by the Consent of the three Estates of the Land: 'That Richard Earl of Cambridge was attainted of High-Treason and executed, and his Issue render'd incapable of any Inheritance; that Richard his Son now challenging the Crown of England, being restor'd and advanc'd by the meer Clemency and Goodness of King Henry the Sixth, had voluntarily acknowledg'd him for his lawful Sovereign, and solemnly swore to the same; and that the same Richard after that had been justly attainted for Treason, and adjudg'd incapable of inheriting. They further alledg'd several Acts of Parliament to establish the Right of the Line of Lancaster; the Succession of three Kings, Henry the Fourth, Fifth, and Sixth, the politick Government of the First, the noble Victories of the Second, and the pious Life of the Third; which three Kings Reigns contain'd no less than sixty Years, in which Number this was the thirty ninth of King Henry the Sixth, who was descended from the Male Line, and the Duke of York but from the Female, which Line had never been in Possession of the Crown. These were thought great and weighty Points, and the more considerable, because King Henry's Person being no better than a Prisoner, no Act of his to establish the Duke's Title could bind in Law or Conscience; and the less, because he had a Wife and a Son both at Liberty, and ready to free him by Force of Arms, or to hazard the Destruction of the English Name. But they who on the Duke's Behalf abstractedly disputed these high Questions, insisted upon a Rule of Law, That the Rights of Blood are not to be alter'd by Civil Powers; and the Lancastrians were not without their speculative and remote Considerations, to countenance the Particulars of their Cause. By which it appear'd that in Monarchies, tho' the noblest Form of Government, where Lineal Succession is the Rule of Inheritance, there sometimes happen as great and as indeterminable Difficulties, as where Election designs the Successor: Of which both France and England have been miserable Instances.

While this weighty Controversie was debating, there happen'd this surprising Accident: A Crown that was hung up for Ornament in the Parliament House, without the least Touch or Blast of Wind suddenly fell down; as likewise did another which for the same Cause was plac'd upon the highest Tower of Dover Castle: Which was generally believ'd to portend That King Henry's Reign was ended, and that the Crown should be transferr'd from one Line to another. The Lords forgot not the Duke's Demands, and to take the better Directions, divers of them both Spiritual and Temporal with many grave and wise Persons of the Commons, daily met at the Black-Friars, and other Places, to treat of this Matter, that was of so great Importance. During which Time the Duke of York, tho' both the King and himself were lodg'd in the Palace Royal, would by no Inducements once visit his Majesty, till some Conclusion was made in the Affair; declaring That he was subject to no Man, but only to God, under whom he had no Superior. After a long debating of the Matter, and deliberate Consultation among the Peers, Prelates and Commons, upon the Vigil of All-Saints it was thus concluded and determined, 'That sofar as Henry had been acknowledg'd King for the Space of thirty eight Years and more, he should enjoy that Name and Title, and the Possession of the Kingdom, during his natural Life. And if he either dy'd, or resign'd, or forfeited the same by breaking or violating any Point of this Contract, then the said Crown and Dignity should immediately be devolv'd upon the Duke of York, and the lawful Heirs of his Body, excluding all those of King Henry. This solemn Agreement being put into divers Articles, was ingross'd, sign'd, seal'd and sworn to by the King and Duke, as likewise all enacted in this Parliament. For Joy of this, the King, accompany'd with the Duke of York, on All-Saints Day, rode in solemn Procession to the Cathedral of St. Paul's with the Crown upon his Head. And upon the Saturday following, the Duke of York was by Sound of Trumpets solemnly proclaim'd Heir apparent to the Crown of England, and Protector of the Realm.

The Answer to it.

The Controversie determined by Agreement in Parliament

The Queen and her Friends stand out.

The active Queen, now in the North, would by no means allow of this Determination, so prejudicial to her self and Posterity; therefore when the King, at the Duke of York's Instigation, sent for her to repair to him at London, she relying upon the Dukes of Somerset and Exeter, and other Royalists, utterly refus'd; and Henry being still acknowledg'd as King, the Arms taken for his Deliverance had the greater Justice. The Duke of York missing his expected Prey, left the King at London with the Duke of Norfolk and Earl of Warwick; and taking with him his young Son the Earl of Rutland, the Earl of Salisbury, and five thousand Men, he march'd towards Wakefield in Yorkshire to pursue the Queen and her Son, sending Orders to the Earl of Marche to follow with all his Power. In the Castle of Sandall within view of Wakefield the Duke took up his Quarters upon Christmas Eve, waiting for the Encrease of his Army. The Queen being advis'd of this, thought it Wisdom to fight before the Duke grew too strong; and thereupon advanc'd with an Army of eighteen thousand Men, led by the Dukes of Somerset and Exeter, the Earls of Devonshire and Wiltshire, the Lords Nevill, Clifford and Ross, and in effect all the Northern Nobility. Part of the Army presented it self before Sandall Castle, in order to provoke the Duke to Battel; who fir'd with this Bravado, and perhaps ignorant of his Enemies Multitude, resolv'd to meet them, tho' the Earl of Salisbury and Sir David Hall earnestly urg'd him to stay 'till his valiant Son the Earl of Marche came up with his numerous Forces. But the Vengeance of Heav'n would forbear him no longer, but like a strict Master resolv'd to call him to an immediate Account; by which he might find whether all the Kingdoms in the World were worth the least Sin, much less a wilful Perjury.

The Duke of York slain.

The Queen therefore added Policy and Stratagem to her Power, that his Ruin might be inevitable; for which Cause, on the last Day of December, the Earl of Wiltshire upon one Side of the Hill, and the Lord Clifford upon the other, lay in Ambuscade to get between him and the Castle; while the Dukes of Somerset and Exeter drew up in open Field. This Design had its desir'd Effect; for the Duke issuing out of the Castle with his small Army down the Hill, soon found himself surrounded; and tho' he shew'd great Valour and Bravery, within half an Hour his whole Forces were defeated, himself with many of his dear Friends beaten down and slain. There lay dead about him the Lord Hartington, Sir Thomas Nevill Son to the Earl of Salisbury, Sir David Hall, with several Knights, and others to the Number of two thousand eight hundred Men; among whom were the Heirs of many Southern Gentlemen of great Account, whose Blood was shortly after severely reveng'd. The Duke's Chaplain, and Tutor to the Earl of Rutland, a hopeful Lad of twelve Years of Age, seeing the ill Success, led his Charge out to save him; but the Lord Clifford observing his rich Habit, follow'd, and with a Digger in his Hand demanded who he was. The unfortunate Youth struck dumb with Fear, with Knees Hands and Eyes begg'd for Mercy and Pardon; and the Chaplain, who by naming him thought to have sav'd him, told him who he was, and That if he would save his Life, he would spend it in his Service; but Clifford swore dreaddreadfully, That as his Father had slain his, so would he serve him and all his Progeny, and then struck his Dagger into his Heart, rejoicing at the most barbarous and inhuman Revenge that ever cruel Man took. And not satisfy'd with this, casting himself upon the dead Body of the Duke he cut off the Head, and crowning it in Derision with a Crown of Paper, he presented it to the Queen, who poorly and ungenerously made her self merry with that gasty and bloody Spectacle. This was the fatal End of the famous Richard, who contrary to all Oaths and other Obligations, had caus'd infinite Mischiefs to the English Nation; of whom it was said by the Duke of Somerset his former Antagonist, That if he had not learn'd to play the King by his Regency in France, he had never forgot to obey as a Subject in England. The Earl of Salisbury, here taken Prisoner, was with other Prisoners beheaded at Pontfract, and their Heads together with the Duke's set upon the Gates of York; while the Victors triumph'd and rejoic'd, who not many Days after bewail'd their own Calamity, as did the Queen, or shar'd in the like Fortune, as did the Lord Clifford.

His ignominious Treatment.

The Earl of Marche, Son and Heir to the deceas'd Duke of York, hearing of this tragical Adventure, with a Mind full of Grief and Revenge, and an Army of twenty three thousand Men, resolv'd to march against the Queen. But he found more immediate Imployment; for being inform'd that Jasper Tudor Earl of Pembroke, half Brother to King Henry, and James Butler Earl of Ormond and Wiltshire, had with them a great Force of Welsh and Irish to intercept his March; this youthful and valiant Man, whose amiable Presence and Behaviour render'd him gracious to the People, especially to the Female Sex, resolv'd first to try his Fortune against those Earls. He therefore suddenly turn'd back from Skrewsbury, and at a Place call'd Mortimer's Cross near Ludlow, he engag'd the Enemy on Candlemass-Day. In the same Morning, we are told there appear'd three Suns in the Heav'ns, that suddenly join'd in one; which fortunate Omen exceedingly fir'd the Earl of Marche, and was judg'd to be the Reason why he us'd for his Badge, or Royal Device, the Sun in his full Brightness. The Armies maintain'd the Fight with great Fury; but at length the Earl of Marche obtain'd a compleat Victory, with the Deaths of three thousand eight hundred of his Enemies; the Earls of Pembroke and Wiltshire saving themselves by Flight. But Sir Owen Tudor, Father to the Earl of Pembroke, and Husband to King Henry the Fifth's Queen, with several other Prisoners of Note were beheaded at Hereford, as a Sacrifice to the Manes of his Father the Duke of York.

The fifth Battel at Mortimer's Cross.

The Queen on the other Side being encourag'd by her late Victory, after she had settled her Affairs in the North, march'd towards London with an Army consisting of Scotch, Welsh and Irish as well as English. But when her Soldiers were once South of Trent, as if that River was the utmost Limits of their good Behaviour, they proceeded to ravage the Country after a barbarous manner. Advancing near to St. Albans, they were inform'd that the Duke of Norfolk and the Earl of Warwick, with the King in Person, were prepar'd to give them Battel; whereupon they hasten'd to march through the Town. But being not suffer'd to pass, they furiously attack'd their Enemies in the Field call'd Bernard-Heath; where perceiving the main Battel to stand still and not to advance, as it was manag'd by the Treachery of Lovelace, who with the Kentish Men had the Command of it, they soon caus'd the Southern Men to betake themselves to flight; upon which the rest, doubtful of each others Fidelity, made the best of their Way. The Lords about the King's Person, perceiving the Danger, withdrew themselves; only the Lord Bonville coming in a complimentary manner to the King, and declaring his Affection to his Majesty, was unfortunately importun'd by him, together with Sir Thomas Kyriel a Kentish Knight, to stay with him; he passing his Royal Word that their Stay should be no Injury to them. Upon which Promise they staid, but to their Ruin; for the Queen hearing how the Commons had beheaded Baron Thorp at High-Gate, without considering her Husband's Word, in Revenge caus'd both their Heads to be taken off at St. Albans. So that there were slain in this Battel about twenty three thousand Men, but none of any Note or Name, but only Sir John Gray, who the same Day was Knighted, with twelve others, at the Village of Colney. This Battel was the sixth fought in these unhappy Civil Wars, and the second at St. Albans; it being upon Shrove-Tuesday the seventeenth of February.

And now the King was advis'd to send a Messenger to the Victors to let them know, That he would gladly come to them, if it might be done with Safety and Conveniency; upon which the Earl of Northumberland appointed several Lords to attend him to the Lord Clifford's Tent, where the Queen and the young Prince met him with extraordinary Joy. But it was now observ'd, as if it were in the Destiny of King Henry, that tho' he was the most Pious Prince in his Age, yet no Enterprize of War did ever prosper where he was present; which shews that Human Prosperity is not inseparable to Piety. At the Queen's Request the King honour'd thirty Gentlemen with Knighthood, who the Day before had fought against that Part of the Army where he was: The young Prince, now eight Years of Age, was also Knighted. After which they went to the Monastery, where they were receiv'd with Anthems, and likewise a humble Petition to be protected from the Outrages of the loose Soldiers; which was promis'd, and Proclamation made accordingly, but to small Effect, for the Northern Men alledg'd, That by Agreement they were to have all the Spoil in every Place after they had pass'd the Trent, and so acted like lawless People, to the great Damage, or rather Ruin of the King's Affairs. For about this Time the Queen sent Commands to the Lord Mayor of London to send her in Provisions for her Men, which he obey'd; but the People oppos'd him, and stopp'd the Carts at the City Gates: Which shews the Error that deludes some Princes, when they promise themselves Obedience from a dissatisfy'd People, and who without Fear of Punishment have already begun to disobey. The Magistrate laid open all the Mischiefs that might ensue, but could not prevail; for still they cry'd out the more, That the City had no Occasion to relieve them that came with a Design to pillage it. This Disobedience grew yet more obstinate by reason of an insolent Troop of Horse, who at the same Time came from St. Albans to pillage the Suburbs; and many of them hastening to Cripple-Gate, where the Carts were stopp'd, and endeavouring to enter, they were beaten back, and three of them slain, to the great Concern of the wiser sort; for it was fear'd that the Queen being in Arms, and so many ways offended, would rigorously resent it. The Mayor sent to excuse himself to the Council residing at Barnet, and the Dutchess of Bedford accompany'd by the Lady Scales and some Prelates, went to the Queen to pacifie her. They perswaded her that some Lords might be sent, with four hundred armed Men, who riding about the Streets might appease the Tumult, and that part of the Aldermen should come to meet her at Barnet, to bring her and the King peaceably into the City.

The People against him.

But all these hopeful Designs suddenly vanish'd at the News of the Defeat of the Earls of Pembroke and Wiltshire, and that the Earls of Marche and Warwick were join'd, and marching towards London, with a Force not easily to be resisted. This so terrify'd the Queen, that she suddenly return'd towards the Northern Parts, where she had most Friends; impolitickly leaving some Marks of Severity and Cruelty behind her. The Earl of Marche on the contrary, who for his amiable Qualifications was in every Man's Mouth and Affections, hearing of the Queen's Retreat, march'd directly to London, where, upon the twenty eighth Day of February, he was receiv'd with the universal Applause of the People. On Sunday the second of March, the Earl of Warwick, a zealous Friend to the Earl of Marche, muster'd all his Army in St. John's Field, and having drawn them in a large Ring, and read aloud to them the Agreement of the last Parliament, and then demanded, Whether they would have King Henry, who had violated that Agreement, to reign over them? They all cry'd out, No, no! Then he ask'd them, Whether they would have the Earl of Marche, who according to the same Agreement ought to be King, to reign over them? They with a great Clamour answer'd Yea, yea! Upon which some Commanders, and others of the City repair'd to the Earl of Marche at Baynard's Castle, to acquaint him with what had pass'd; who at first seem'd to excuse himself, as unable to execute so great a Charge: But being animated by the Arch-Bishop of Canterbury, the Bishops of London and Exeter, and the Earl of Warwick, he at last consented to take it upon him. On the next Morning he went in Procession to St. Paul's Cathedral; and after Te Deum sung, he was in great State convey'd to Westminster. There seated in the most conspicuous Place of the great Hall, with the Scepter of St. Edward in his Hand, he made a Declaration of his double Title to the Crown: First, By Descent, as Heir to the third Son of King Edward the Third: Secondly, By Authority of Parliament, which upon the Examination of the Duke of York's Title, had conferr'd the Crown immediately on him and his Heirs, when Henry the Sixth should make Forfeiture of it, by Death, Resignation, or Breach of that Agreement there solemnly sworn by them. And that this Agreement was broken, the Slaughter of the Duke of York at the Battel of Wakefield, did sadly manifest. Nevertheless he protested himself ready to give up the Justice of his Claim, rather than enter upon it without their free Vote. At which, with loud Applauses, all cry'd, King Edward, King Edward! transported when they found their Voices were requir'd to confirm him King, who had declar'd he would not receive that Title without their Suffrage. The Formality of this second Election thus past, he went in Procession to the Abby Church; whence after much Solemnity, and Homage from the Nobility present, he return'd by Water to the Bishop of London's Palace, and was immediately proclaim'd King throughout the City by the Name of Edward the Fourth. This was done upon the fourth Day of March, after King Henry, now near forty Years of Age, had pass'd over an unfortunate and inglorious Reign of thirty eight Years, six Months and four Days.

He is proclaim'd King.

Here in the Course of all Writers ends the Reign of King Henry the Sixth, of whom it is observ'd, That never any came to be King so soon after his Birth, nor ceas'd to be King so long before his Death; the former being but eight Months, and the latter twelve Years. It has also been truly observ'd, That all the Sons of King Edward the Third, as well as himself; all the Sons of John or Gaunt, and all the Sons of Henry the Fourth, were compleat Hero's, Men the most renown'd in their Age for Personal Strength, Courage and Bravery: But when this Heroical Disposition was at the Height in Henry the Fifth, how it came to degenerate in Henry the Sixth, is attributed to his Mother, who tho' a Woman of a noble Spirit, yet being descended from a crazy Father, it was no Wonder if she prov'd the Mother of a crazy Issue. Yet as to his Person he was comely and well proportion'd, and had Virtues sufficient to make a Saint; no King ever showing more Piety and Devotion than himself. He had one Inmunity peculiar to himself, that no Man could ever be reveng'd on him, because he never offer'd any Man an Injury. He was so chaste and modest, that when in a publick Mask some Ladies presented themselves before him with their Breasts uncover'd, he immediately rose up, and exclaim'd against their Behaviour: So merciful, that when he saw the Quarters of a Traitor over Cripple-Gate, he caus'd them to be taken down, declaring, He would have no Christian so cruelly treated for his sake: So free from Swearing, that he never us'd any Alleveration but Forsooth and Verily: So patient, that to one who struck him when he was taken Prisoner, he only said, You wrong your self more than me, to strike the Lord's Anointed: So devout, that on the chief Holy Days, he us'd to wear Sack-Cloath next his Skin: And so innocent in general, that his Councillor declar'd, That for ten Years Space he never found

The End of King Henry's Reign.

His Character.

any

any thing he had said or done, for which he might justly enjoin him Penance. And herein consisted his Happiness, that he was the only Prince perhaps in the World that never distinguish'd between Adversity and Prosperity; being so intent upon his Devotion, as to think nothing Adversity that did not interrupt that. But this brought him under the sole Power of others, and made him fitter for a Priest than a King; and had his Virtues been as useful to the Publick, as those of his pious Father, neither the Duke of York, nor his Son durst have contested with him for his Kingdom. Not to exclude Providence, the Peoples Inclinations was then the only thing which took the Kingdom from one, and gave it to the other; which may teach Princes that long Possession, without the Practice of Princely Actions, is not sufficient for their Conservation. In him was confirm'd that wise Sentence, Wo to that Nation whose King is a Child, and rather shows it means in Government more than in Years: For as long as he continu'd a Child in Years, his Kingdoms flourish'd by the Care of his Uncles; but when he ceas'd to be so in Years, and continu'd to be so in Government, all Things ran to ruin both in France and England; and a great Part of his Time was a Reign of Disgrace, Misery and Blood. And notwithstanding his extraordinary Piety, his manifest Breach of Faith to the Earl of Armagnack ought not to pass uncensur'd by a Christian Historian; and the great Raleigh observes, that as he refus'd the Daughter of that Prince, by which he might have defended his Inheritance in France, and marry'd the Daughter of Anjou, by which he lost all that he had in that Country; so in condescending to the unworthy Death of his Uncle of Glocester, the main Pillar of the House of Lancaster, he drew on himself and his Kingdom the greatest Loss and Dishonour, that ever it sustain'd since the Norman Conquests.

Matters of Note in his Reign.

Notwithstanding this Reign was both troublefom and calamitous, it was remarkable for many pious and charitable Foundations, and for several eminent and worthy Men. The King himself founded two famous Colleges, the one in Cambridge called the College Royal or Kings-College, and the other at Eaton near Windjor; to the Maintenance of which he gave three thousand four hundred Pounds per Annum; and the glorious Chappel of the former shews of what wonderful Magnificence the whole should have been, had the Founder reign'd to finish it. In the twenty eighth Year of this Reign Queen Margaret began the Foundation of Queens-College in Cambridge. Three Colleges in Oxford were also founded in this Reign, All-Souls, Bernard and Magdalen, the two first by Henry Chicheley Arch-Bishop of Canterbury, and the latter by William of Wamfleet Bishop of Winchester; as also the famous Divinity School by Humphry Duke of Glocester. There were many other Foundations and Buildings made in other Places, as the College of Tatshall in Lincolnshire by Ralph Lord Cromwell; Leaden-Hall in London by Simon Eyre Mayor; the Standard in Cheapside, &c. As to Men of Valour, we have already taken notice of the chief, such as the Duke of Bedford, the Earl of Salisbury, the Lord Talbot, the Earl of Warwick, and others; so that it may be said, as there was never a more Heroical King of England than Henry the Fifth, so never any King had more Heroical Subjects than Henry the Sixth, who had been train'd under his Father and Grand-father. As to Men of Learning, they are too numerous to be particulariz'd; we shall only mention John Leland the Elder, who wrote divers Treatises for Instruction of Gramarians; Peter Basset, Esq; one of the Privy-Chamber to Henry the Fifth, whose Life he wrote; Thomas Walsingham, Thomas Radburn, John Capgrave, and John Wethamsted, all Writers of some Parts of the English History; John Lydgate, a Monk of Bury and celebrated Poet; Richard and Robert Flemming, Thomas Dando, and Robert Bale.

The Reign of King EDWARD the Fourth.

Containing 22 Years, 1 Month, and 5 Days.

I. IN the midst of the Miseries of an unfortunate Nation, we are now arriv'd at the History of the Second, yet nearest great Branch of the Plantagenets, that sat upon the English Throne. And from the fourth Day of March, in the Year 1461, according to the common Computation in those Days, commenc'd the Reign of King Edward the Fourth, who was then about twenty Years of Age, in the prime of his Youth and Beauty, and whose charming Looks and Behaviour render'd him the Object of all Peoples Love and Affection. Yet great Numbers were still intire Friends to the depos'd King Henry, who was now with his Queen raising a powerful Army in the North; and not a few in London it self, as King Edward's Jealousie gave him cause to suspect: Of whom one Walker a substantial Citizen and a Grocer was an unhappy Proof, who only for Words spoken concerning his own Son, That he would make him Heir to the Crown, meaning the Sign of the Crown in Cheapside, was on the eighth Day of this King's Reign apprehended, and beheaded in Smithfield. And tho' the Words only contain'd an unseasonable Jest, and no real Treason; yet it being a Time when the Crown lay at Stake, the Law was stretch'd, and somewhat more, to remove the Man that spoke 'em.

King Edward's severe Beginning.

This

This severe Beginning caus'd many to believe, that they had injur'd themselves in wronging King Henry; which Opinion was more confirm'd by Edward's retaining a large Sum of Money borrow'd of the Staplers-Merchants, and disburs'd in his Affairs, the Restitution of which he utterly deny'd with an angry Command to surcease their Demands.

Oppositions in the North.

And now hearing how King Henry was belov'd in the North, and what Numbers were gather'd to recover him the Crown, upon the twelfth Day of March he with a compleat Army set out from London, accompany'd with his two Brothers, and many other Noblemen. Then marching towards Pontfract in Yorkshire, he there appointed the Lord Fitzwater to keep the Passage of Ferri-bridge, omitting no Directions of a worthy Commander. King Henry, tho' no ways warlike, thought it best Policy to employ such Commanders whom the Thirst of Revenge had animated against the House of York; such were the Duke of Somerset, the Earl of Northumberland, and the Lord Clifford, whose Fathers had been slain in the first Battel of St. Albans: Which last, tho' in Degree the least Man, yet sought to raise his Fame with the first; and therefore to leave no Enterprize unattempted, he so suddenly attack'd the Party appointed for Ferribridge, that he not only defeated the Men, but also slew the Lord Fitzwater, with the Bastard of Salisbury, and many others, before they well knew whence the Disturbance arose. The Noise of this Defeat came first to the Ears of the stout Earl of Warwick, who too much transported at the evil Fate of the first Attempt, rode almost breathless to King Edward, and killing his Horse in his Presence, he cry'd out, God have Mercy upon the Souls of those, who for your sake have already lost their Lives! Let him fly that will fly. Then kissing the Hilt of his Sword, he said, By this Cross, I will stand by him that stands by me. The valiant Lord Fauconbridge, fearing that this Beginning should prove dangerous, soon got over the River at Castleford, three Miles from Ferri-bridge, designing to surround the late Victors; which Clifford perceiving, sought to avoid; and whether out of Haste or Heat, he put off his Garget, when suddenly an Arrow without a Head, shot from an unknown Hand, pierc'd through his Throat, stuck in his Neck, and put a Period to his Life. A Death too honourable for him; since the innocent Blood of the Earl of Rutland requir'd one foreseen, painful and cruel. But his Son met with the Punishment he escap'd; who being sav'd by a poor Shepherd, liv'd a Beggar during three Reigns, till he was restor'd by King Henry the Seventh.

The events Battel between the House of Lancaster and
ton.

The next Day, more fatal for England's Blood, being Palm-Sunday, early in the Morning both Armies came in sight of each other; a dreadful Meeting, which like the Soul and Body never parts but by Death. The Field was between Caxton and Towton, from the latter of which this Battel afterwards took its Name. Upon a full Survey of King Henry's Army, so formidable for Numbers, Proclamation was made in King Edward's Camp, That whoever fear'd to fight might immediately depart, but if any remaining Soldier should endeavour to fly, he should be slain by his next Fellow, who should receive a great Reward. And further it was proclaim'd, That no Quarter should be given, nor Prisoner taken. A necessary Cruelty, and not to be avoided without Hazard of King Edward's Ruin; in regard the common Soldiers, in Hopes of Spoil or Ransom, might be wanting in their Duty. About nine in the Morning both Armies drew near; sixty thousand for King Henry, then in York, and for King Edward scarce forty thousand; only the Presence and Courage of the latter made an Equality. The experienc'd Lord Fauconbridge, to whom the Van was committed, immediately before the Battel, commanded his Archers, as soon as they had shot their first Flight, to fall some Steps back, and make a Stand; by which they might avoid their Enemies Arrows. Which Stratagem had its design'd Success; for the Northern Men with a sudden Fury answer'd the Onset, and having empty'd their Quivers, hasten'd to a close Battel: But the Arrows they had discharg'd, not having reach'd their Adversaries, turn'd

now to their Annoiance and Distraction, and so far gaul'd them by the Splinters sticking in the Ground, that they were forc'd to a confus'd Stop. In this Trouble the Southern Men shot another Flight; and the Wind conspiring with their Policy, blew a Storm of Hail and Snow in their Faces; so that the Vanguard, led by the Earl of Northumberland and Andrew Trollop, gave back. Yet the Main Battel did not stir with this Motion; but as if the Enemy had gain'd no Advantage, continu'd with the first Constancy.

For ten Hours together the Victory hung in Suspence; equal Courage on both Sides; equal Hopes in the good, and equal Despair in the bad Success; which occasion'd so much Obstinacy and Cruelty in the Battel. But at length, after a most pitious Slaughter, the Northern Men began to hope for Safety only in Flight; nor did they yield to the prevailing Fortune of the Enemy, 'till their Courages were disinay'd with the Sight of so many eminent Men slain before their Eyes. For the Earls of Northumberland and Westmorland, the Lords Beaumont, D'acres, Gray, Scales and Wells, with many others of greatest Reputation for their Rank and Courage, had already fallen; and in their Deaths taught the Survivors what to expect. The Dukes of Somerset and Exeter, seeing all Things desperate, the greater Part of the Army slain, the rest broken and flying, posted to York to carry the fatal News to the unfortunate King Henry; whose Virtue still had a Patience greater than his Ruin. In no Battel since the Conquest was ever shed so much English Blood; so that the Fields were not only disinally stain'd, but the Rivers also ran red for a great Distance: For in this and the preceding Day were slain no less than thirty six thousand seven hundred Persons; all of one Nation, many near in Alliance; some in Blood, fatally divided by Faction, yet all animated by the same Zeal to maintain their Prince's Right: Which being so difficult to determine nicely, doubtless it made the Contest on both Sides, how ruinous soever to their Families, not unsafe to their Consciences. And it is worthy of Observation, that in this long and cruel Conflict between the two Royal Families, never any Stranger of Note was present at their Battels; as if the English had disdain'd to conquer or perish by any other Weapons than their own.

The Yorkists prevail.

The Greatness of the Bloodshed and Victory.

After this great Victory King Edward rode to York, from whence King Henry was fled, where he was receiv'd with the utmost Solemnity; and first he caus'd the Heads of his Father, the Earl of Salisbury, and other of his Friends, to be taken from the Gates and bury'd with their Bodies: And then he caus'd the Earl of Devonshire, and three others, to be beheaded, and to have their Heads put on the same Places. In the mean time the unfortunate King Henry hasten'd with his Wife and Son to the Town of Berwick; and leaving the Duke of Somerset in that Place, he went into Scotland, begging the Counsel and Assistance of the young King of that Nation. He was receiv'd with all Humanity, and had Provision made for him of a certain Pension by the King of the Scots, who likewise agreed that the Princess Margaret his Sister should marry to Prince Edward, Son to King Henry, tho' this Marriage was never after consummated. And Henry to requite these Civilities, did more than he would in Time of Prosperity, and gave up the Town of Berwick to King James; a Place very advantageous to the Scots, and long desired by them. The Queen his Wife went with her Son into France, to procure Assistance from her Father Reyner, Duke of Anjou; and she obtain'd also of King Lewis of France free Access for as many English as were of her side, and Banishment for those of the contrary Party; Matters of no great Consequence. And thus we find the unfortunate King Henry, after above thirty eight Years Reign, not only to have been driven from his Throne and Crown, but also out of all his Dominions.

King Henry flies into Scotland.

In the Interim King Edward, with as glorious a Triumph and dilated Joy as Victory could beget, march'd towards London, where the Citizens, who were deeply interested in his Fortune, receiv'd him with great Splendor and Magnificence. And on the twenty eighth Day of June he was with great Solemnity crown'd crown'd at Westminster, where in St. Peter's Church it was the next Day again solemnly set on his Head, and the third so crown'd he came to St. Paul's Cathedral, and there was cens'd with the extraordinary Applause of the People. That no Circumstance of Sovereignty might be wanting, a Parliament was summon'd to meet in November; by which his Title to the Crown was confirm'd, King Henry and his Son disinherited, his Friends rewarded, and his Enemies punish'd. And tho' private Respects were his chief Business, desiring to disannul all Acts made in Prejudice of the House of York and its Adherents, yet his outward Pretensions were the Safety and Quiet of the Realm. For he publicly profess'd that his only Care was to have such wholsom Laws enacted, as might redress Disorders crept into the State, by the free Liberty given to Rapines in the former Troubles. By which Appearance of earnest Care for quieting a disturb'd Republick, he gain'd Authority among the Wise, and founded a Belief in all, that his Government in Peace would be as fortunate as his Proceedings in War. Having by his Wisdom and Care thus won the Opinion of the Generality, he proceeded to confer his Favours on particular Persons whom Blood and Service had render'd dear to him. He created his two Brothers, George and Richard, Dukes; the Elder of Clarence, and the Younger of Glocester. He made the Lord Nevill, Brother to the Earl of Warwick, Vicount Montague; Henry Bourchier, Brother to the Arch-Bishop of Canterbury, Earl of Essex; and the Lord Fauconbridge, Earl of Kent; giving others the Title of Barons, and honouring many with that of Knighthood. The Conclusion of this great Assembly was with several Punishments: For John Earl of Oxford, Aubery Vere his Son, Sir John Tiddenham Knight, William Tyrrel and Walter Montgomery Esquires, were without Answer convicted of Treason, and beheaded: A formidable Proceeding, and too much manifesting the Actions of a Conqueror.

Affairs thus happily settled for King Edward's Interest, to check the Insults of transmarine Neighbours, who had thrown Injuries on the Nation when weaken'd with Discords, the new-created Earls of Essex and Kent, with the Lord Andley, were sent with ten thousand Soldiers to scour the narrow Seas; who first landing in Bretaign, took the Town of Conquet, and afterwards in the Isle of Ree, pillag'd that little Country, and return'd with Victory. By which Enterprize, tho' of no signal Consequence to his Affairs, yet King Edward let the French know how unsafe it was to irritate the English when govern'd by an active Prince, who might hereafter appear in Person, for the Recovery of those Provinces, which nothing but the Nation's Dissentions could have lost; and likewise struck some Terror into all foreign States which should adhere to King Henry, who both in Courage and Fortune was so far his Inferior. And now was the Prosperity of Edward in so much Splendor, and so dark a Cloud hung over the House of Lancaster, that Henry Duke of Somerset, and Sir Ralph Piercy forsook the Ruins of that Family they had so long endeavour'd to support. The Submission of two such Persons of Interest and Power, was as pleasing to King Edward as a Victory; and they by his Favour were immediately restor'd to full Possession both of Honour and Estate; and the same Grace was promis'd to any others, whom their Example should persuade.

The Attempts
of King Henry's Queen for his Restoration.

Yet did not the indefatigable Queen lose any Part of her Spirit or Endeavours; but in France us'd all Means and Methods to gain Succours towards the Restitution of her Husband. At length, having obtain'd an inconsiderable Number of Frenchmen, she pass'd over with them to Scotland, and from thence with the Shew of a great Enterprize, she sail'd for England; and touching upon the Bay of Timmouth, out of some peculiar Apprehensions, she and her French put back to Sea, where such a sudden Tempest overtook them, that had not the Queen in a small Vessel got into Berwick, she had lost her Life, or fallen into her Enemies Hands. Her French Forces, by the Bastard Ogle and other other Friends of King Edward, were driven into Holy-Island, where many were slain, and four hundred put to their Ransoms. This feeble French Enterprize, tho' it enervated the Minds of many, yet it no ways daunted the Courage of the Queen, whose chief Hopes were founded upon the Scotch Valour. So leaving her Son Edward in Berwick for Safety, she with the King her Husband and a Scotch Army furiously enter'd into Northumberland, took the Castle of Bamburgh, and so pass'd into the Bishoprick of Durham, their Forces daily increasing by the Confluence of such English as favour'd King Henry. Among these the Duke of Somerset, and Sir Ralph Percy, with other of King Henry's Friends, revolted from King Edward, and came over to this Army. But many others came over in Hopes of Spoil; for his Army pillag'd and burnt Towns, and destroy'd Fields wheresoever they came.

King Edward hearing of these Commotions in the North, made Preparations both by Sea and Land, and with his two Brothers and many Noblemen march'd to the City of York: From whence he sent the new Viscount Montague with a considerable Party to secure the Loyalty of the Northumbrians; who passing forwards, at a Place call'd Hegley-Moor, he was suddenly attack'd by the Lords Hungerford and Roos, and Sir Ralph Percy. But Montague bravely stood the Assault, and in the first Encounter repuls'd the Lords, and at length slew the said Percy, who would not be driven from the Field, but in dying cry'd out, I have sav'd the Bird in my Bosom, meaning his Oath made to King Henry. Montague finding Fortune thus prosperous, advanc'd forwards; and learning by his Spies that Henry's Army lay incamp'd in a fair Plain call'd Livels near Hexham, he hasten'd his March, and so valiantly attack'd their Camp, that after a great Slaughter, he totally defeated their Army, with the Loss of two thousand Men. The unfortunate King Henry fled into Scotland; but the Duke of Somerset, the Lords Roos, Mollins and Hungerford, with other Persons of Note, as unfortunately fell into the Hands of their Enemies, and were afterwards, according to the usual Proceedings of these miserable Times, beheaded in cold Blood. Sir Ralph Gray was first solemnly degraded from his Honour of Knighthood, and then led to Execution. Thus was the white Rose in every Place dy'd red with the Blood of the Nobility; and the red Rose turn'd pale with Horror to view the Calamities occasion'd by this Dis-sension.

The eighth Battle at Hexham. The Yorkists victorious.

King Edward having with a little Water extinguish'd a Flame which was like to have set all England on Fire, fortify'd all the Frontiers, and built Forts upon such Parts of the Sea as were fittest for Landing; he threaten'd heavy Punishments against any who should favour or harbour King Henry, Queen Margaret, or any of their Adherents. He us'd the like Care in other Places of his Kingdom, especially in the Southern Parts, where Landing was easiest for such as should come from Normandy. In the Rooms of the Earls of Northumberland and Pembroke, who were fled with Henry, he created John Nevill Viscount Montague Earl of the former, and William Herbert Earl of the latter. But the former being afterwards restor'd, Nevill gave up the Title, and was rewarded with that of a Marquess. In the mean Time King Henry, hurry'd on by his own Fate, pass'd into England in disguis'd Apparel; where in a short Time he was betray'd, while he sat at Dinner in Waddington Hall, from whence he was carry'd to London after a disgraceful manner, with his Legs bound under the Horse's Belly. Here, with Doctor Manning Dean of Windsor, he was arrested by the Earl of Warwick, his gilt Spurs taken off, and he committed close Prisoner to the Tower of London. A sudden and strange Alteration of Estate, when he that was once the most potent Monarch for Dominions that ever England had, was not now Master of a single Spot of Ground, nor Owner of his Liberty. So various are the Changes and Fortunes of this transitory Life; which appear'd further from his distressed and disconsolate Queen, who with her Son was driven once again to fly for Shelter into France.

Reg. 4.

King Edward's Regulations in the Publick.

His Ordinances.

II. The Imprisonment of King Henry, the Absence of his Queen and Son, with the Deaths, Flight and Banishment of the chief of their Party, for a long Time secur'd King Edward in his Throne. This Calm afforded him Occasion of reforming many Disorders in the Publick, to which the late Troubles had given Birth. For several Days together he sat publicly with his Judges in Westminster-Hall, on the King's-Bench, to acquaint himself with the Orders and Proceedings of the Court, either at Bench or Bar. He likewise order'd the Officers of the Exchequer to take more moderate Fees, and to be more intensive of their Duties, for the Benefit of the Subject, than their own Profit; and not under Colour of preserving the King's Revenues, to enrich themselves and oppress the Nation. And to shew his Liberality and Gratitude to those who had serv'd him, he distributed the confiscated Goods of the late Delinquents to as many as had merited Reward; in which he dealt so wisely, that none were dissatisfy'd. Then to gain the Love of all Men, he shew'd himself more familiar both with the Nobility and Commonalty, than as some thought was convenient either for his State or Dignity. To his Affability he added Clemency, and pardon'd all those who in what manner soever had formerly oppos'd his Greatness, provided they would abandon all who persisted in their Averseness to him: By which means he won such an Opinion of the People, that afterwards, by their Assistance, he surmounted Difficulties which otherwise would have been insuperable. The Laws of the Realm he in part reform'd, and in part augmented; and the Coin both of Gold and Silver he new invented and divided; for the Gold he nam'd Royals and Nobles, and the Silver he call'd Groats and Half-Groats. He ordain'd penal Statutes against excessive Pride in Apparel, particularly against long pick'd Shoes then usually worn, which grew to that Extream, that the Pikes in the Toes were turn'd upwards, and with Silver Chains or Silk Laces ty'd to the Knees. But among many good Provisions one prov'd injurious; for concluding a League with the Kings of Castile and Aragon in Spain, he granted them Liberty to transport certain Numbers of Coteswold Sheep, which so much increas'd, that it afterwards prov'd a great Hindrance to the English Merchants in the Sale of their Woollen Cloths in the Levant Seas.

The Earl of Warwick sent to treat of Marriage in France,

The publick Affairs being thus establish'd, King Edward descended to what more particularly concern'd himself; and that was to provide a Queen, by whom he might have Issue and a sufficient Alliance against the Power of King Henry. Three Marriages were propos'd to him; Margaret Sister to James King of Scotland; Isabel Sister to Henry King of Castile, and Bona Daughter to the Duke of Savoy, and Sister to the present Queen of France. The two former were set aside for particular Reasons, and the last approv'd of in Council; and none was thought more fit to solicit this Affair than the mighty Earl of Warwick, a Man esteem'd as a King in Power and Revenues, and exceeding all in Magnificence and Hospitality; in whose House at London six Oxen were spent every Day, and most Taverns in the City were full of his Meat and Provisions. This Earl in great State arriv'd at Tours, and his Message known, was accordingly entertain'd in the French Court, where he wrought the Queen herself to be the chiefest Agent, who engag'd her Sister Bona with recommending the State and Stile of a Magnificent Queen, and her Husband Lewis with the Assurance of a Wife and Potent Ally; a Subject sufficiently pleasing to this soft-natur'd Prince. In a short Time all Parties were fully satisfy'd, and the Earl of Warwick dismiss'd with no small Compliments; and the Earl of Damp-Martin was to pass into England for the final Conclusion.

But while the Earl of Warwick highly valu'd himself for his Success abroad, King Edward's Affection was working another Way at home. For the young amorous King after Hunting coming to visit the Dutches of Bedford at her Manor of Grafton near Stony-Stratford, was solicited by a fair Petitioner, the Lady Elizabeth Gray, Daughter to the Dutcheſs, and Widow of Sir John Gray, ſlain on King Henry's Behalf at the Battel of St. Albans. The King could deny no Requeſt made by ſuch an eloquent Tongue, and conquering Beauty; and immediately himſelf became as earneſt in ſolliciting her, but in a more unlawful Suit. But ſhe arm'd her ſelf with a Modeſty ſufficient to deſtroy the moſt violent Batteries of Luſt; and tho' ſhe was on all Sides attack'd by the moſt inſinuating Temptations, ſhe repulſ'd her Enemy ſo nobly, that he offer'd to parly upon honourable Terms. For when the King perceiv'd her adorn'd with Chaſtity ſtrong enough to reſiſt him, who ſcarce ever fail'd in ſuch Attempts, he became enamour'd on the Beauty of her Mind, and concluded that her Virtue was Dowry enough to marry her to the higheſt Monarch upon Earth. The Reaſons of State were directly againſt this Marriage, which ſhew'd the Danger of exaſperating ſo potent an Allie as the French King, and ſo dangerous a Subject as the Earl of Warwick, as likewise the Inconveniencies of raiſing a Widow to his Bed, who could bring nothing but Poverty and an unprovided Iſſue; who if not advanc'd would be a Scorn to his Children, and if otherwiſe a Charge to his Exchequer, and an Envy to the Nobility. Yet the charming Object, and his unbounded Paſſion prevail'd ſo far, that notwithstanding the Dutcheſs of York his Mother moſt violently oppos'd him, by throwing the higheſt Calumnies upon the Lady Gray, and alledging a Pre-contract with the Lady Lucy, he broke through all Difficulties, and marry'd her privately. Not long after, upon the twenty fixth of Day of May, he crown'd her Queen with the uſual Solemnities. Her Mother was Jaquellin Daughter to Peter of Luxemburg Earl of St. Paul, and Dutcheſs to John Duke of Bedford Regent of France; after whoſe Death ſhe marry'd to Sir Richard Woodville Knight, and among others bore him this celebrated Lady.

Lady

King Edward falls in Love with the Lady Gray.

A. D. 1465. Reg. 5.

He marries her.

None were pleas'd with this Match, the Nobility leſs than the Commonalty; their Grandeur being obſcur'd by the ſudden Splendor of the Queen's Relations: Her Father was created Earl of Rivers, and ſhortly after made High-Conſtable of England: Her Brother Anthony was enrich'd by the Marriage of the Daughter and Heir of the Lord Scales, which Title was likewise conſerr'd upon him: Her Son Thomas Gray, whom ſhe had by her former Husband, afterwards marry'd the Daughter of the Lord Harrington, and was created Marquels of Dorſet. Hiſtorians obſerve many Calamities that were caus'd by this Marriage; as the Deaths of innumerable English Men, King Edward's Expulſion from his Dominions, his Children declar'd ſpurious, and murder'd, and the Queen's Houſe extirpated. All which begun from the proud Earl of Warwick, who being by this deceiv'd and wounded in his Reputation, parted from France with ſuch furious Reſentments, as he could not wholly conceal from the French King. Being return'd into England, he ſo behav'd himſelf with King Edward, that he ſeem'd not at all diſoblig'd; while the preſent Injury reviv'd the Remembrance of many formerly receiv'd. He ſaw how the King apprehended his Greatneſs, and grew jealous of his Power; that his Deſign was to depreſs him, when himſelf was better eſtabliſh'd; that he thought himſelf no King, while Men judg'd him as neceſſary to the Conſervation of the State, as he was in the obtaining of it; and that he ſought all Occaſions to bereave him of Mens good Opinions. All which caus'd him to believe that he was ſent into France for the ſame purpoſe. To which ſome add, that King Edward had provok'd him by attempting the Chaſtity of his Daughter or Neice; thereby endeavouring to diſhonour the Family of his Kinsman, Servant and Benefactor. Theſe Conſiderations join'd together, begot in him ſuch a Hatred that all England, France and Iſlanders could never extinguiſh; ſo that he reſolv'd to depoſe him, and reinthroned King Henry, as ſoon as a fit Occaſion ſhould preſent it ſelf. In order to which, by the King's leave he retir'd to Warwick, under Pretence of Indispoſition of Health; yet the King made ſome Diſcovery of his Diſcontents, but not ſufficient for his own Security; for he thought him not ſo able to drive him from, as to liſt him into a Throne.

The Earl of Warwick enraged at it.

In

A. D. In the following Year the Queen was deliver'd of a Daughter, named Elizabeth, who afterwards put a happy Period to the Civil Wars, by marrying with 1466. King Henry the Seventh. In which Year King Edward concluded a Treaty Reg. 6. of Alliance with the Kings of Castile and Arragon, who upon Occasion might King Edward's by way of Diversion assist him in Gascony and Languedock; and likewise for Alliances. the same Respect, he concluded a Truce with Scotland for fifteen Years. But the Alliance of the old Duke of Burgundy was that which most avail'd him, and which re-establish'd him in his Kingdom when he had lost it. This Prince had a Son, Charles the Count Caralois, who by two several Wives having but one Daughter, his Father desir'd to marry him a third Time, hoping to secure the Succession by Issue Male. He bethought himself of Margaret, Sister to King Edward, a Princess of admirable Beauty, and endu'd with a Spirit not usual to her Sex; but her being of the House of York made him stagger in his Resolutions, because he was nearly related to the House of Lancaster. Yet since he could make no Alliance more formidable to France, or more advanta-1467. gious to the Low-Countries, he sent over Anthony the Eldest of his Natural Reg. 7. Sons, commonly call'd the Bastard of Burgundy, with some others, as Ambassadors into England for this Purpose. He came with a pompous Retinue of four hundred Horse, with rich Liveries, and richer Furniture; and was graciously receiv'd by King Edward. The Affair being propos'd in Council, none withstood it but the disoblig'd Earl of Warwick; for forming the Rebellion he had formerly design'd, he conceiv'd the Match would be injurious to King Lewis, on whom he intended to rely, and beneficial to King Edward, whom he intended to destroy. But he having but a single Vote, the Ambassador's Request was granted, and King Edward promis'd Amity to the Friends of Burgundy, and threaten'd Enmity to his Adversaries. He presented his Sister to the Lord Anthony, and the other Ambassadors, who kiss'd her Hand, as their Princess, and presented her with many rich Jewels, which she accepted with Terms of Gratitude both to her Father-in-Law and Husband. The Entertainments made upon this Occasion were great and magnificent; and Challenges at Tilt rais'd between Anthony and the Lord Scales, Brother to the Queen, and between his Followers and the English Gentry. In the midst of these Rejoycings, News was brought of the Duke of Burgundy's Death, which much afflicted the Lord Anthony; so taking leave of the King, with rich Presents he pass'd over into Brabant, and made such a Relation of the Princess to the new Duke his half Brother, as abundantly satisfy'd him; who in the following Year desir'd King Edward to send her over to him, according to the Articles of the Contract; which accordingly was perform'd. After a solemn and magnificent Departure, she took Shipping at Dover, attended by five hundred Horse, and accompany'd by her two elder Sisters the Dutchess of Exeter and Suffolk. She landed at Sluce, and went from thence to Bourges, where the Marriage was consummated.

 Reg. 8. because dangerous Resolutions are not to be undertaken without great Supports, he judg'd the Assistance of his two own Brothers most proper, the Arch-bishop of York and the Marquis Montague. Discouraging with them of the Reasons that mov'd him to this Undertaking, he made an odious Parallel between Henry and Edward, magnifying the Gratitude and Goodness of the Former, and aggravating the Ingratitude and Wickedness of the Latter, *Who when their Family had been foremost to spend their Lives and Estates in the Service of his Father and himself, he had not recompenc'd them according to their uncommon Deserts; and durst still upbraid them with his being the Raiser of their Family, when next to Heaven they ought their chiefest Honour to King Henry:
 That not contented to vilifie them, he had endeavour'd to disgrace them in a most tender Point, by attempting to violate the Honour of a Daughter of* their Family. That he had thrown such an Affront upon him relation to the Match with the Lady Bona, as he would not have done to the most despicable of his Subjects; and that he no ways excus'd it, but pass'd it over in Silence, not considering that a Man's Honour was more dear to him than his Life. Since therefore he had acted so contrary to Justice and Gratitude, his Resolution was to use all Means to take that Crown from him, which he had plac'd on his Head, and put it again upon Henry, a good and lawful King. That since they were Sharers in the Injuries, they ought to be so in the Revenge; which might easily be effected, if they would be as vigorous and as hearty, as many of the chief Nobility of the Nation, as also several foreign Princes. This unexpected Proposition surpriz'd the two Brothers, who seem'd averse to a Compliance. But the Arch-Bishop after long Disputes giving way, the Marquess with much Difficulty suffer'd himself to be persuaded, but still with great Unwillingness. Which Ambiguity was the Ruin of them all; for being not able to deny his Brother, nor to betray his Prince, he did amiss on both Sides: He assisted Edward by not cordially assisting his Brother, and betray'd his Brother by not resolutely betraying Edward.

His two Brothers join with him.

The Earl of Warwick having thus laid the Ground-work of his ruinous Building, he pursu'd the Fabrick with the King's second Brother the Duke of Clarence, who being then a Male-content, he resolv'd to found the Bottom of his Inclinations. But he partly anticipated the Earl's Complaints by exclaiming against the King his Brother, That he was in his own Nature disobliging and ungrateful, and chiefly to such as had most oblig'd him: That since he had no Esteem for his own Brothers, much less would he show any to his other Friends; but more valu'd his Wife's Blood, than his own. That he had disposed of three of the richest Heiresses of the Nation to her Son, her Brother, and the Lord Hastings, three upstart Lords; and that without any Regard to his own Brothers. Continuing such like angry and threatening Discourse, he gave the Earl Occasion to lay himself open to him, and to offer his Daughter to him with a Portion equivalent to those he had nam'd, with innumerable other Promises and Prospects. The Duke at this Time blinded with Passion and Resentment, contrary to all Reason and Policy, join'd with the ambitious Earl in a Design which might easily and naturally prove the Ruin of them both. The Order they took was to retire themselves to Calais; and that the Arch-Bishop of York and the Marquess Montague should privately procure some Insurrection in the North of England, and give the Occasion of the War, while they being beyond Sea, might not be thought the Authors of it. Being thus repair'd to Calais, and having sworn by the Holy Sacrament to all Things agreed between them, the Duke upon the foresaid Promises and Expectations marry'd the Earl's Daughter.

He gains the Duke of Clarence to his Party.

The two Brothers being gone to York, of which one was Arch-Bishop, and the other President, fail'd not to put in Execution what was agreed among themselves. The first Occasion of Arms was rais'd from the Abuse of a Charity in an Hospital dedicated to St. Leonard in the City of York, whose Revenue consisted chiefly of Corn, which several factious Persons alledg'd was misapplied, and given from the Poor to the Rich. To redress which Grievance, one Robert Huldern enter'd into Action, and with fifteen thousand strong attempted the City of York, where the Marquess Montague was President for King Edward, who with a select Body of Men issu'd out against the Enemy, repuls'd them, and struck off the Head of their Captain before the Gates of the City: But whether he did this in Policy to gain Credit with the King, or else in Duty or Irresolution, as not thoroughly moulded to this Commotion, is uncertain. But however the Rebels were no ways discourag'd at Huldern's Death, but became more resolute and vigorous in pursuing what they had begun. To which end they chose themselves two Commanders of greater Note, and of eminent Calling, which were Henry, Son and Heir to the Lord Fitz-bugh, and Sir Henry ry Nevill, Son and Heir to the Lord Latimer, the one being Nephew and the other Cousin-German to the Earl of Warwick. These being but young, and not fully experienc'd in Arms, chose for their Conductor Sir John Convers, a Knight of such Conduct and Valour as was scarcely to be found in all the North; who designing to strike at the Head, determin'd to march directly for London, proclaiming in his Passage, That Edward was neither a just Prince to God, nor a profitable King to the Nation.

King Edward's
Preparations.

King Edward hearing of these Northern Proceedings, and that his own Brother and Warwick were preparing against him, sent for the Lord Herbert, whom he had created Earl of Pembroke, to be General in the North; who joyfully undertook the Service, partly to deserve the King's Favour, and partly in Revenge to the Earl of Warwick, who had hinder'd his Son from marrying with a rich Heiress. So taking with him his Brother Sir Richard Herbert, a valiant Gentleman, and six or seven thousand well arm'd Welshmen, he advanc'd forwards, and was join'd by the Lord Stafford with eight hundred Archers. Understanding that the Northern Army was near Northampton, he march'd that Way; and desiring to know their Number and Order, Sir Richard Herbert offer'd to make the Discovery. He with two thousand Welsh Horse took Shelter in a Wood, by which they were to pass; and having view'd them, and desirous to return with the Relation to his Brother, he could not withhold his Men from charging them on the Rere; which marching in good Order, as expecting such an Attack, fac'd about, and fighting valiantly, slew many of them, took many Prisoners, and dispers'd the rest, now too late sorry that they had not obey'd their Leader.

Dissentions in
my.

King Edward understanding this ill Beginning, muster'd his Subjects on every side, designing to ingage with the Northern Forces in Person; and the Earl of Warwick, as vigorous on the other Side, gather'd his Friends to encounter with Pembroke and the Welsh. But before any Supplies came to either of them, Fortune brought the two Armies together upon a fair Plain call'd Dans-More near the Town of Hedgecot, within three Miles of Banbury. The Earl of Pembroke and the Lord Stafford were lodg'd in Banbury; where to avoid Disputes, they agreed each of them to take such Lodgings as Chance should present them. Stafford being lodg'd to his Satisfaction, the Earl, forgetting his Agreement, and using Authority, oblig'd him to give Place and remove; which he unwillingly obey'd, because by this he was to quit the Company of a fair Gentlewoman in the same Place. However to show his Resentment, he basely abandon'd the Town with all his Men, and left the Earl destitute of the Archers, who were the most necessary Part of the Army; which still did not discourage the Earl, who resolv'd to suffer any Mischief rather than retreat. Early in the Morning the Lord Latimer's Son Sir Henry Nevill, one of the Northern Leaders, thinking he had been too idle, went forth to skirmish, being attended by a Company of light Horse; but pressing on too eagerly, he was taken Prisoner, and soon after put to Death in cool Blood; his Youth, Nobility and Valour not being sufficient to save him. This Act of Cruelty highly incens'd the Northern People, who resolving to revenge his Death, let fly their Arrows with their utmost Fury, and soon forc'd their Adversaries to come to a general Battel, which was very sharp and bloody. The Earl of Pembroke, who fought with Disadvantage, thought it not sufficient to execute the Part of a Commander, but also of a common Soldier; while his Brother Sir Richard Herbert, hurry'd on with a prodigious Impetuosity, so behav'd himself, that the true Story of his Valour is not to be exceeded in fabulous Romances: For forcing his Way through the Enemies Troops with his devouring Sword, he twice pass'd the Length of their Army, returning to his own Men, if not untouched, yet without any mortal Wound: Occasion'd, as it was believ'd, by his uncommon Worth, which being admir'd by all who saw it, by joining Delight with Danger, and Wonder with Delight, restrain'd the Hands of all Men from hurting hurting him. The Victory seem'd wholly on his Side, 'till John Clapham, a Servant to the Earl of Warwick, coming in with a few fresh Soldiers, and crying out A Warwick, A Warwick! so much terrify'd the Welsh, that believing Warwick was arriv'd with all his Forces, they betook themselves to Flight, leaving a bloody Field, cover'd with five thousand slain upon the Spot. The Lancastrians prevail.

This Battel, like the rest of those in these miserable Times, was succeeded by something more dreadful and shocking than War it self; which was the sedate Execution of many great and worthy Men. For the Earl of Pembroke, with Sir Richard his Brother, and many other Gentlemen of Note were taken Prisoners, and without any Trial at Law beheaded at Banbury. The Earl who was appointed to suffer first, pathetically addressing himself to Coniers and Clapham, who sat as Judges, petition'd them in Behalf of his Brother; alledging his Youth and graceful Person answerable to his martial Mind; that his Valour, even by themselves admir'd, might one Day be serviceable to his Country. But the Death of Henry Nevill had so far exasperated them, that it occasion'd not only the Execution of these two, but also of many others; a deplorable Tragedy represented by so many worthy Men. Their Cruelties did not cease here; Great Severities. for those of Northampton having chosen one Robert of Riddisdale for their Commander, and joining certain others with them, they surpriz'd the Earl of Rivers, Father to the Queen, and his Son John, in his Mansion-House of Grafton, brought them to Northampton, and without any Process of Law beheaded them: That deformed Body hark'ning to no Arguments but those of Blood and Fury. An envy'd Life and a cruel Death was the Sum of all those Favours which Fortune conferr'd upon this Earl, who esteem'd himself so happy in his Marriage with the Duke of Bedford's Widow, and in that of his Daughter's with the present King. For as his Ascent to these extraordinary Heights was ever view'd with malignant Eyes, so his Descent was ruinous and fatal; not any one of his seven Sons leaving behind him Issue to perpetuate his Name; some of them likewise coming to violent Ends. A Misfortune either seldom hap'ning, or not observ'd in meaner Families. As to the Lord Stafford, the Cause of this Overthrow, he met with a deserved Punishment from King Edward's Party; for by diligent Enquiry being found in Devonshire, he lost his Head at Bridgewater without any Process.

In the mean Time the Victors were retir'd to Warwick, where the Earl of that Name was arriv'd with a great Body of armed Men; and understanding that King Edward was marching towards him, he gave Advice of it to the Duke of Clarence, who immediately join'd him with a considerable Force. They were ready to come to Battel with all Speed, according to the usual Custom of the English, had not some great Persons, desirous of Peace and the publick Good, interpos'd to find some Way of Accommodation. This Negotiation made King Edward so careless, that confidently trusting to a Peace, he neglected all the Duties of military Discipline, and began in his Camp to taste the Pleasures of a Court; while Warwick, more wary than he, being certify'd by his Spies of the Negligence of the Guards and all the rest, who behav'd themselves as if they had no Enemies, set upon the King by Night, and without any Resistance took him Prisoner. Warwick takes King Edward Prisoner. Thus was King Edward betray'd into the Hands of an insulting Enemy, who in the most insolent Terms upbraided his Prisoner with Ingratitude to his great Merits; and boasted It was now both in his Power and Resolution to plain that Mountain he had rais'd, and to elevate the Valley of King Henry's Fortunes to the Throne he once possess'd: And immediately sent away the King Prisoner to Middleham Castle in Yorkshire, there to be kept by the Arch-Bishop of York his Brother. But as through Negligence he fell into this Condition, so by good Fortune he freed himself from it; making use of his wonted Affability, by which he caus'd the Arch-Bishop to treat him like a King, not a Prisoner, allowing him not only the Liberty of the Castle, but the Freedom to hunt, setting but a small Guard upon him, who either could not or would not secure him. For Edward having sent to Sir William Stanley and Sir Thomas Burgh his faithful Friends, to come with a select Body of Men to rescue him; they successfully perform'd the Service, whilst he was a hunting, meeting with no Resistance from the Guards, who were either too weak, or else, which is more probable, were brib'd to this Behaviour. The Earl of Warwick hearing of this Escape, was at first distracted with a thousand Imaginations; but finding no Remedy, made use of Necessity, and gave it out That himself had so caus'd it, having the Power to make and unmake Kings at his Pleasure.

Escape.*

King Edward immediately repair'd to York, where he was receiv'd with great Honour and Satisfaction, which made him reasonably hope for a further Supply of Men and other Necessaries; but failing in that Point, after a short Stay, fearing the Arch-Bishop's Pursuit, he with a small Train posted to Lancaster, where he found the Lord Hastings his Chamberlain well strengthen'd for his Convoy. His Spirits then reviv'd, and his Train daily increasing, with speedy Journeys he got to London; where all his Studies and Consultations were, how to be reveng'd on these disloyal Lords, his Brother Clarence and the Earl of Warwick: And they on the other side, enrag'd at the Arch-Bishop's Folly and Neglect, sought Means to increase their Party and Interest against the King. The miserable Nation thus torn by these unnatural Divisions, and no Estate sure to enjoy what was their own, the Nobility again began to solicit both Parties to an Accommodation. To that end having first obtain'd Liberty to ride freely without Molestation, and so effectually laid open the State of the Land, whose Ruin was become so imminent by these intestine Wars, that the Natives languish'd, Foreigners rejoic'd, and God in his Displeasure had made the English in an unnatural Rage turn their Swords into their own Bowels, they at length so far prevail'd, that the Duke and Earl upon perfect Confidence came to London, accompany'd with small Numbers in respect to their great Danger. Here falling into a formal Conference with Edward at Westminster, he severely tax'd them with Disloyalty, and they him with Ingratitude; so that their Resentments were nothing appeas'd, but much more exasperated; upon which with angry Words they departed, the King to Canterbury, and they again to Warwick.

A. D. The enraged Earl of Warwick now caus'd new Commotions to be rais'd in 1470. Lincolnshire, under the Guidance of Sir Robert Wells, an expert Soldier, and Reg. 10. Son to the Lord Wells, who with thirty thousand Men in Arms disturb'd the Country, and in every Place proclaim'd King Henry; and at length encamping not far from Stamford, he there resolv'd to wait for the Approach of his Opposers. King Edward hearing of this Insurrection, sent for the Lord Wells his Father, and getting him into his Possession, commanded him to write to his Son to desist; and then marching towards Stamford, he took this Lord in his Company, hoping that the Son would not bear Arms against his own Father in the Field. But whatever he wrot, or the King conceiv'd, Sir Robert proceeded in his former Designs; which so enraged King Edward, that he beheded the Lord Wells, with Sir Thomas Dymock who had marry'd his Daughter, tho' he had given them his Promise for their Lives and Safeties. An Action barbarous and unfaithful! the Report of which generally clouded the Reputation of King Edward; but in Sir Robert Wells it begot nothing but Fury and Revenge; who without staying for Warwick, who was preparing for his Assistance, set furiously upon King Edward and his Army near Stamford, where between both Parties was fought a most terrible bloody Battel. At length Sir Robert was taken Prisoner, with Sir Thomas Deland and others, which so discourag'd the Lincolnshire Men, that throwing off their Coats they all fled; upon which Account it was afterwards call'd The Battel of Loose-Coat Field, in which were slain at least ten thousand Men. After which Victory King Edward, proceeding in the usual Practice of these calamitous Times, commanded

Wells and many others of Note to be put to Death, as the chief Cauſers of theſe dangerous Commotions.

This untimely Conflict and Overthrow drove Clarence and Warwick to the laſt Extremity, who being unprovided to encounter King Edward's Forces, gave way to Neceſſity, and from Dartmouth embark'd themſelves and their Ladies, both to apply themſelves to King Lewis, no Friend to Edward, and to ſecure themſelves in Calais, where Warwick was Governor. Theſe caſting Anchor before the Town, and giving Notice that they were ready to land, the Lord Vauctere, a Gascoign whom Warwick had made his Deputy, to their great Surprize diſcharg'd ſome Canon againſt them, and let them know that they ſhould not enter there. In the mean Time the Dutcheſs of Clarence fell in Labour, and on Shipboard was deliver'd of a Son, which Child Vauctere would hardly ſuffer to be baptiz'd in the Town, nor without much Entreaty permit two Flaggons of Wine to be convey'd to the Dutcheſs in the Haven. For which Uſage and Service King Edward by his Letters Patents made him chief Governor of Calais, and diſcharg'd the Earl as a Rebel and Traitor. The Duke of Burgundy, who hated Warwick for hindering his Marriage, was alſo ſo well ſatisfy'd with Vauctere, that he ſent Thanks to him with a Promise of an annual Penſion of a thouſand Crowns, if he would be true and faithful to King Edward, as he had already ſhown himſelf. But tho' Vauctere gave both his Word and his Oath to be faithful to King Edward, he privately ſent Word to Warwick of the Danger he would meet from the Duke of Burgundy, and from Duras the King's Admiral, ſo that to land there would turn to his final Confuſion. His Advice was therefore that he ſhould haſten into France, where the King was his particular Friend, but as for the Town of Calais he wiſh'd him to take no Thought, but promis'd to give him a good Account of it, when Time ſhould ſerve. Upon this Advice he ſail'd towards Dieppe in Normandy, and in his Paſſage took ſeveral Ships belonging to the Duke of Burgundy, and gain'd a conſiderable Treafure towards his preſent Occaſions. Arriving at Dieppe, by the Command of King Lewis he was receiv'd with great Reſpect, and after that by him met at Amboiſe; where cauſing him to be provided with all Neceſſaries, he promis'd him his beſt Aſſiſtance, and cauſ'd many Ships to be fitted out for him, well furniſh'd with Soldiers and Mariners. And this he did the ſooner, becauſe the Duke of Burgundy had threaten'd him, if he aſſiſted Warwick, or any other againſt his Wife's Brother King Edward. King Henry's Queen Margaret came to meet him as ſoon as he heard of his Arrival, and with her the Earls of Pembroke and Oxford, the laſt of whom had lately eſcap'd out of Priſon in England. King Lewis to have the ſtronger Obligation, cauſ'd Queen Margaret's Son Prince Edward to marry with Anne the Earl of Warwick's ſecond Daughter; ſo that Warwick took for his Son-in-Law the Son of him whom he formerly depos'd, that he might now depoſe him who he had plac'd in his Room. Upon this Marriage, Warwick and the Duke of Clarence took an Oath never to put a Period to the War, till King Henry or his Son Edward ſhould recover his Kingdom; and Queen Margaret promis'd to make them two Governors of the Nation, till her Son ſhould be of full Age.

Clarence and Warwick leave the Nation.

They are receiv'd by the French King.

They make new Alliances.

King Edward, in the miſt of his Pleaſures, hearing of this Confederacy againſt him, began to rouse himſelf, and deal more ſeverely with thoſe of the Lancaſtrian Faction; ſo that many of them daily took Sanctuary, or yielded themſelves to his Mercy: Among whom the Marqueſs Montague, Brother to the Earl of Warwick was one, who with fair Promiſes was receiv'd into Favour. But while both Parties were making their Preparations, a ſubtle and ingenious Gentlewoman was ſent over to France, who under Colour of viſiting the Dutcheſs of Clarence, might prevail upon her Husband. Being arriv'd at Calais, ſhe impos'd upon Vauctere by making him believe that Affairs were near to an Accommodation, and that King Edward had ſent her over for that purpoſe; which cauſ'd him freely to give her a ſafe Conduct. Having gain'd Acceſs cess to the Duke of Clarence, the Secret to be deliver'd was to counsel him not to cause the Destruction of his own Family, by again setting up the House of Lancaster, but to remember their ancient Hatred and Division; adding, That he might well assure himself that the Earl of Warwick, having marry'd his Daughter to the Prince of Wales, and already done Homage to him, would by all possible Methods seek to make him King; not only to the Ruin of the King his Brother's Interest, but also to his own. This Gentlewoman so wisely executed the Charge committed to her, that she won over the Duke of Clarence, who promis'd to revolt to King Edward, immediately after his Return into England: Which shows of what little Efficacy Oaths and Alliance are, when a powerful Interest comes in place. She was a Person nicely advis'd, and of few Words, and by reason of her Sex had leave granted to pass to her Mistress, when a Man would have been refus'd; and notwithstanding the profound Cunning of Vauclerc, she went beyond him, and was the sole Manager of an Enterprize, which at length ruin'd Warwick and his whole Faction.

And now all Things being in Readiness, as Ships, Men and Mony, supply'd by the French King, the Admiral of France was sent to secure them from the Duke of Burgundy's Fleet, which with great Numbers and Forces lay in the Mouth of the Seine, to fight with Warwick, when ever he began to set Sail. But here Providence gave a remarkable Turn to King Edward's Affairs, and sent such a Storm against the Duke's Fleet, the Night before the design'd Expedition, as destroy'd several of them, and dispers'd the rest, some into Scotland, and some into Denmark. Shortly after the English set Sail with a fair Wind and a calm Sea, and landed at Dartmouth, from whence they had been driven into France almost six Months before. King Edward relying upon Burgundy abroad, and imagining all to be Friends who flatter'd him at home, by Day gave himself up to Hunting and Hawking, and at Nights to Dancings and amorous Addresses to fair Ladies; little regarding the Approach of them, who design'd to destroy all his Pleasures. For Warwick being landed, proclaim'd King Henry, commanding all from sixteen to sixty, upon the severest Penalties to take Arms against Edward Duke of York, the most unjust Usurper of King Henry's rightful Crown; and it was almost incredible to see the Confluence of them who came daily in to him, and who not long before applauded and approv'd of none but King Edward. Thus marching towards London, his Numbers continually encreas'd; which the youthful and vigorous King seem'd little to regard; but conceiving he had now Warwick in a Snare, wrote to the Duke of Burgundy to secure the Seas against his Retreat, and to the Lords of England to attend him in his Wars. But most of them neglected his Commands, and very few repair'd to him; which soon gave him such a Sight of his Danger, that with his Brother of Glocester, the Lords Hastings and Scales, he suddenly retir'd from London, and hasten'd towards Nottingham, there to determine what Methods to follow.

His Progress
and Success.

King Edward
retires.

In the mean Time the Bastard Fauconbridge in the West, and the Earl of Pembroke in Wales, proclaim'd King Henry; and at the same Time Doctor Godard preaching at Paul's-Cross, declar'd by reading of Bills and other Proofs, that King Henry was the true and undoubted Heir to the English Crown. Nor was the Marquis Montague the same Person he lately show'd himself, who having gather'd six thousand Men in the Name of King Edward, and brought them near Nottingham, suddenly drew back his Forces, alledging, That Edward was ungrateful, and regardless of his Friends, of whom himself was an Example, who having served him in many bloody Battels, was only rewarded with the bare Title of Marquis, without any Maintenance at all: And therefore he had just Cause never more to draw his Sword in his Quarrel, and those who did would receive no better Reward than himself. These and the like Allegations being divulg'd among the rude Multitude, it caus'd a further Change in their Inclinations and Affections; in every Street Bonfires were made, made, in every Church Bells rung, Psalms and Songs were sung at every Meeting, and every Man shouted King Henry, King Henry! whose Eccho likewise redoubled a Warwick, a Warwick! And indeed all so applauded the present Face of Affairs, that King Edward finding no Place of Safety, he went with some Danger to Lynn, where he found two Holland Ships and one English; where he imbarc'd himself with seven hundred Men, without the least manner of Baggage or Mony. In his Passage he was encounter'd by eight Easterling Ships, so that with great Difficulty he escap'd to Alchemar in Holland, belonging to the Duke of Burgundy; where having no Mony to pay for his Waftage, he gave the Captain a rich Vestment lin'd with Sables, promising not to forget his Civility, and to satisfie him better afterwards. A strange Change of Fortune happening in a few Hours to such a Prince merely out of Remissness and Carelessness; who lost a Kingdom without one Blow given, and was constrain'd to fly to a Prince, whose Presence alone upbraided him with his Negligence, Lust and Male-Administration.

He leaves England, and flies to the Duke of Burgundy.

In these Times of Misery, Queen Elizabeth, the Original of these Alterations, seeing her self destitute and abandon'd, took Sanctuary at Westminster, where with a small Attendance she was deliver'd of a Son nam'd Edward; he who a short Space after his Father's Death, was the Fifth King of that Name, who sympathiz'd in Birth, Fate and Death with his Cousin the Son of the Dutcheis of Clarence born on Ship-board before Calais. Many of her best Friends likewise betook themselves to several Sanctuaries, who afterwards prov'd highly serviceable at Edward's Return. The Kentish Men, prone to Insurrections, finding that one King was fled, and the other in Prison, came to London, and pillag'd the Suburbs, and design'd to have enter'd the City, had not the Earl of Warwick diverted them, who coming there, punish'd the Accomplices of the Insurrection; which Piece of Justice added much to his Reputation and the Peoples Love. This great Earl, accompany'd with his Brother the Arch-Bishop of York, the Prior of St. Johns, the Duke of Clarence, the Earl of Shrewsbury, the Bastard Fauconbridge, the Lord Stanley, and other Gentlemen, some for Love, some for Fear, and some to gaze at a changeable World, upon the sixth Day of October enter'd the Tower of London, where King Henry had been detain'd Prisoner about seven Years, and there again nominated him for their lawful King. Immediately they convey'd him roab'd in a long blue Velvet Gown through the City to the Bishop's Palace, where a pompous Court was kept till the thirteenth of the same Month; upon which Day he went in Procession crown'd to the Cathedral Church of St. Paul, the Earl of Warwick bearing his Train, and the Earl of Oxford his Sword, the People crying out God save King Henry! forgetting that not long before they had play'd for Edward against him. Thus was the Crown plac'd sometimes upon Henry, and sometimes upon Edward, according to the Power of the prevailing Party.

Warwick comes to London.

King Henry deliver'd by him out of Prison.

In King Henry's Name a Parliament met at Westminster upon the twenty sixth Day of November; in which Edward was declar'd a Traitor to his Country, and an Usurper of the Crown, his Estate confiscated, all Statutes made in his Name and by his Authority annull'd, the Crowns of England and France continu'd upon Henry, and the Heirs Male of his Body, and for want of such, upon the Duke of Clarence, and his Heirs Male, who hereafter was to be acknowledg'd the next Heir to his Father Richard Duke of York; and Edward, for his Crimes committed, depriv'd of his Birthright, and all other Advantages attending it. The Earls of Pembroke and Oxford were restor'd to their Blood, Dignities and Estates; and the Marquess Montague was receiv'd into Favour, and his Fault pardon'd, since his Revolt from Edward was the chief Cause of his deserting the Kingdom. Those who sided with him were depriv'd of their Honours, Titles and Faculties; and such punish'd as in this Contest had taken up Arms against King Henry. Upon which Account John Tiptoft Earl of King Henry recogniz'd, and Edward declar'd a Traitor in Parliament.

War-

Worcester, and Lord Deputy of Ireland for Edward, being found in a Hollow Tree near Huntington, was brought to London and beheaded on Tower-Hill. Finally the Government of the King and Kingdom was committed to the great Earl of Warwick and his Son-in-Law the Duke of Clarence: So that King Henry, who scarce ever possess'd more than the Name of a King, seem'd not so much to be set at Liberty, as to have his Keepers chang'd, and his Prison enlarg'd.

About this Time Jasper Earl of Pembroke, going into Wales to view his Land in Pembrokeshire, found there the Lord Henry, Son to Margaret, the only Daughter and Heir to John Beaufort the first Duke of Somerset, not then full ten Years of Age, kept in some measure like a Prisoner, yet honourably educated by the Lady Herbert. This remarkable Youth was brought by him to London, and presented to King Henry; who after he had seriously fix'd his Eyes upon him, solemnly spoke thus to the Lords about him, Lo this is the Person to whom, after all our violent Struggles, both we and our Adversaries must at last submit. Which afterwards happening, confirm'd the Opinion that was held of his uncommon Sanctity, since by the Spirit of Prophecy he foresaw the Succession of King Henry the Seventh, when at that Time many of both Houses were alive to precede him.

Reg. 10.
King Edward's Endeavours for his Restoration.

III. While all Things in England happily succeeded for King Henry's Interest, his Rival Edward was using all possible Endeavours to recover his Kingdom by the Assistance of his Brother the Duke of Burgundy. Before his Landing in Holland that Duke was inform'd that he was dead, which was no unpleasant News to him, being bias'd by his ancient Inclination to the House of Lancaster; and tho' Warwick's Power did much disturb him, never expecting to gain him, yet he hop'd strongly to oppose him, by Means of the two Dukes of Somerset and Exeter, who had been maintain'd by him in Time of their Distress. But hearing of Edward's Arrival in Holland, he was at first confounded, for to assist him openly would draw on him the Enmity of King Henry; nor could he in Honour deny him Succours, since his Wife was the other's own Sister. However to prevent all Relief, Warwick's first Designs were to divert the Duke of Burgundy, justly conceiving that while he was busied with the Arms of France in Picardy, and those of England near Calais, Danger would oblige him to look wholly to his own Affairs, without concerning himself with those of other Men. Accordingly he sent a Body of Men to Calais to make Inroads into the Parts about Bouloign, which were with all dutiful Respect receiv'd by Vaoclere; which freed him from all Suspicion of being inclin'd to the contrary Party. For as soon as the News of Henry's Re-establishment arriv'd at Calais, every one there took upon him the Earl of Warwick's Ensigns and Impress, which was a Ragged Staff made of Gold, Silver, Silk or Cloath, according to the Condition of him that wore it. And Vaoclere was the first who did so. Still the Duke of Burgundy knew not that Calais was at Warwick's Command; but building much upon Vaoclere's former Usage towards Warwick, and his accepting a Pension from himself, he sent the famous Historian Philip Comines to see what he had to rely on. Upon his Arrival, he soon found his Labour useless; for all he met wore the Earl's Colours; the Gate of his own Lodgings and Chamber-Door were mark'd with the White-Cross; and Songs were every where sung of the strict Amity between King Lewis and Warwick. This alter'd Comines's Measures, and caus'd him to assure Vaoclere, That the Duke of Burgundy had made no Personal Alliance with Edward; since the Articles of the Contract only mention'd England and the King thereof; that therefore the Amity between England and Burgundy should still continue the same, the Name of Henry being put in instead of Edward. The Duke was not displeas'd at this Agreement, tho' it was not altogether to his Desire; for by this he might secretly act as he pleas'd, while he was free from being suspected by King Henry's Party. In the mean Time Ed- ward us'd all possible Arguments and Persuasions to his Brother Burgundy, which at first were but coldly entertain'd by him; for the Dukes of Somerset and Exeter had shown him what was owing to his Birth, he himself coming from the House of Lancaster, and had promis'd what he could desire against Warwick, to whom they were both irreconcilable Enemies. Edward was not pleas'd to be nourish'd with Hopes, while his Brother made him believe that his Dissembling was necessary for them both; for himself, because he was not to fight with two Kingdoms at the same Time; and for his Brother, because Opportunity might render his Succour more effectual.

At length, Edward resolving not to bear any longer Delays, the Duke caus'd four Ships to be made ready for him at Vere in Holland, which being a free Port, the Ships might seem to be set out by Edward himself; and hir'd fourteen more for him of the Easterlings, bargaining that they should transport him into England, and serve him fifteen Days after his Landing. He also caus'd fifty thousand Florins to be secretly deliver'd to him, and that this Aid might not seem to be given by him, he by Proclamation forbad all Men to assist Edward; by which he freed himself from giving Suspicion to England, and whatever the Success was, he remain'd Friends to both Sides. And now the Season serving, King Edward being two thousand strong, besides his Mariners, took Shipping for his former Kingdom of England, attempting first to land in Norfolk; but these Coasts being strongly guarded, he hover'd more Northwards, and entring Humber, landed at Ravenspur in Yorkshire; the same Place where King Henry the Fourth landed, when he came to deprive Richard the Second of the Crown, and usurp it to himself. Then imitating the same Person, but much more his own Father, who upon the like Occasion thrice forswore himself, he laid aside all Claim to the Crown, and by Oath declar'd he came only to recover his Inheritance, the Dutchy of York. He shew'd the rude Multitude, that flock'd in to his Army, the Letters and Seal of the Earl of Northumberland, which as he affirm'd, and caus'd them to believe, was sent for his safe Conduct to enjoy the same; and in every Place where he came, he proclaim'd King Henry himself, wearing an Estrich Feather, his Son Prince Edward's Livery. In the Practice of these popular and plausible Pretensions he approach'd the City of York, which was prepar'd to oppose him; but by his insinuating Behaviour and Affability towards the Magistrates, he obtain'd leave to enter upon his ancient Patrimony, upon Condition he swore to two Particulars; First that he would treat the Citizens according to his proffer'd Articles, and Secondly that he would be faithful to all King Henry's Commands. To both which he solemnly swore; but immediately after broke the first by seizing the City into his own Hands, and soon after the latter by reassuming his former Title to the Crown. In which may be observ'd both the Forbearance and Justice of Heaven; the one in not immediately punishing him, the other in extending the Punishment to his Family; manifesting, that the deferring of Vengeance is oftentimes the rendring of it more signal.

The Earl of Warwick, now hearing that Edward was landed, before he had march'd many Miles, sent strict Commands to his Brother the Marquis Montague, then residing at Pontfract with an Army sufficient to secure those Parts, that he should not suffer his Entrance into York; whilst himself was preparing what Forces he could procure to join him. But whether the Marquis purposely conniv'd, or rather wholly shut his Eyes, it is certain he made no haste to intercept his Passage to York; nor indeed did he give him any Impediment, when shortly after he in a more hostile Manner march'd from thence towards Nottingham, passing quietly near Pontfract through the Midst of his Enemies: Which encourag'd many to favour his Designs, justly believing that Montague was either a real Friend, or afraid to meet with such a powerful Enemy. At Nottingham Edward was proclaim'd King, contrary to the Tenure of his first Pretensions, and his Oath at York. People flock'd to him every ry Hour; and thus without Fear he pass'd on to Leicester, that he might approach his Enemy who lay then at Warwick, under the Command of the Earl of that Name, accompany'd with the Earl of Oxford, resolving either to give him Battel, or else to find Means to join with his Brother the Duke of Clarence. The Earl was not well satisfy'd with the Marques his Brother, who by not opposing him had encourag'd and strengthen'd the Enemy: He levy'd Soldiers with all Speed that he might come to Battel, and sent to the Duke of Clarence to hasten his March towards him; but apprehending the Danger of his temporizing, he resolv'd to fight alone himself with those Troops he had, and with this Design repair'd to Coventry. Edward, who soon after his Departure from Warwick came thither, follow'd him the same Way; which much perplex'd the Earl, who was sure of nothing but Battel, his Safety depending much upon the Will of Fortune, since he had reason to fear that both his Son-in-Law and Brother were corrupted. Having intrench'd himself, he waited the Arrival of the Duke of Clarence, who he understood was not far distant. In the mean Time Edward broke up his Camp, as if he design'd to give his Brother Clarence Battel by himself, and drew up in Battalia before him. But as soon as they were in Sight of each other, the Duke of Glocester ran into Clarence's Camp, without so much as demanding the usual safe Conduct, and they seem'd to treat of what long before they had concluded between themselves. Peace was immediately publish'd, and Edward proclaim'd King, and the two Brothers joyfully embrac'd each other, as tho' there had never been any Contest between them.

The Duke of Clarence immediately sent Messengers to excuse his Proceedings to the Earl of Warwick, offering him also very honourable and advantageous Conditions with the King his Brother, if he would submit, and prevent the Effusion of so much Blood. But Warwick had a Spirit too stubborn to incline to any Conditions but those of his own proposing, much less from One who had directly betray'd him; therefore with Indignation he rejected all Offers of Courtesie, and spoke thus to the Messengers, Go tell your Master, I had rather be an Earl, and like my self, than a false and perjur'd Duke; and before I falsifie my Oath, like him, I will lay down my Life at my Enemies Feet, which I doubt not but will be dearly purchas'd. This bold Resolution caus'd Edward to be more wary, and to resolve first to secure Henry, and gain the City of London; whose Citizens hearing of his Approach, and the Increase of his Army, and considering that Henry was unable to oppose him, they thought it most safe to sail with the fairest Wind, therefore set open their Gates, and with publick Applause cry'd out King Edward! Upon which the Duke of Somerset and others, left to attend the innocent King Henry, fled from the City; so that Henry was abandon'd, void of Help, Dexterity or Resolution. And Edward entring six Months after the Loss of his Kingdom, put Henry again into the same Prison, from whence he had been taken by the Earl of Warwick, in which, if unmolested, he might have been more happy, according to his Inclinations, than at Liberty and Governing among so many Vicissitudes of Fortune, above which his Piety had already set him. Edward in a publick Oration commended those Citizens who had been loyal to him, but so severely threaten'd such Merchants and others as had assist'd King Henry with Monies, that he made the rest to tremble. But he who had not his Equal in captivating Mens Minds, after he had held them in a long and dreadful Suspence, encourag'd them by expressing his last Words with as much Clemency, as he had done his former with Terror: Which not being procur'd by the Importunity of Officers, or Supplications, but from his own meer Motion, did so win the Hearts of those that were disinterested, that for the future they did that out of Love, which formerly nothing but Fear could have produc'd. And it is probable that it was his insinuating Behaviour that gave him such an easie Entrance into London. Tho' Comines alledges three Reasons, of which the Reader must be be left to judge: First the Gentlemen that were in the Sanctuaries, and the young Prince lately born: Secondly Edward's great Debts in the City, which gain'd him the Merchants good Wishes, since the Payment of his Debts depended upon his Success: Thirdly the Love of many of the chief Citizens Wives, who having been familiar with him, drew their Husbands and Friends to favour him.

So soon as Edward had settled his Affairs in London, he led forth his Army to oppose the Earl of Warwick, who having re-united his scatter'd Forces, by easie Marches was come to St. Albans; in hopes that his Reputation among the Inhabitants of London would draw over many to his Side, or at least so divide them as to render them of little Advantage to his Enemy. But Edward jealous of their Levity, which he had often found, interpos'd his Army between the City and the Earl of Warwick, to cut off all Means of Communication and Intelligence; and that the Presence of King Henry might occasion no Disturbance in London, he took him into his Camp; by which the poor distressed King, whatever Side prevail'd, was morally certain of Destruction. King Edward encamp'd upon Gladmore near Barnet; his Van was commanded by the Duke of Glocester, the Rere by the Lord Hastings, and the main Battel by himself. On the other Side the Earl of Warwick with great Resolution prepar'd his Forces; the right Wing consisting of Horse he committed to the Earl of Oxford, with whom was join'd the Marquess Montague; the Left to the Duke of Exeter, and the main Battel, compos'd of Bills and Bows, to the Duke of Somerset. He himself with invincible Courage gave Directions in every Quarter; and when he had survey'd his whole Army, and lik'd both their Order and Behaviour, he sent away his Horse, resolving to fight on Foot, and try the utmost of his Fortune, prefixing in his Thoughts no Medium between Death and Victory. Then he affectionately embrac'd all his great Commanders, in each of whom appear'd a Resolution equal to the Cause; and having by many Protestations declar'd their sincere Faith and Forwardness to the present Service, every Man betook himself to his respective Charge.

It was Easter Sunday in the Morning, a Day remarkable for that it was stain'd with so much Blood, when both Armies approach'd each other for Battel. That for King Edward took Courage from the Justice of their Cause, and the Fortune of their Prince: That for the Earl, from the mighty Valour of their Commander, and from the Piety of him for whose Redemption they now hazarded their Lives. Both fought for their Kings, both Kings having been crown'd, and acknowledg'd by several Parliaments; and indeed the Question was so nice and subtle, that even among Divines it had continu'd long, and at that Day remain'd not absolutely decided. No wonder then if the common Soldiers on both Sides had the same Assurance of Truth, and with equal Justice began a Battel which was one of the fiercest that had ever been fought by engag'd Men; the Kingdom and Life being the Question on one Side, and Life and the Kingdom on the other. For six Hours the Victory continu'd doubtful, tho' it often tended to the Earl of Warwick's Side; 'till at length Error alone brought Disorder upon his Army, and that a final Overthrow. For the Earl of Oxford giving his Men a Star with Streams for his Device, rais'd a Mistake in the Army that they were Part of the Enemy whose Badge was the Sun, which was occasion'd by the Mistiness of the Weather: Wherefore when they were successfully pressing forwards, they were thought to be King Edward's Men flying, which caus'd their own main Battel to attack them fiercely on the Back. Upon which Error, Oxford suspecting Treason in Warwick, immediately fled with eight hundred Men; and King Edward with certain fresh Troops in Reserve soon took the Advantage of this Disorder, and forc'd them all to shrink back. Warwick us'd all Methods both of Language and Example; but when nothing could prevail he furiously rush'd into the thickest of his Enemies, hoping either that his Men would bravely follow, or that Death would prevent to the Misery of a Defeat. Montague seeing to what Danger his Brother was reduc'd, ran violently in to his Rescue; and both soon oppress'd with Numbers fell, and with them the Spirit of the whole Army. In their Deaths they both clear'd those Calumnies with which they were blemish'd; Warwick with having a swift Horse in Readiness for Flight; and Montague with holding Intelligence with King Edward. Soon after their Fall, King Edward obtain'd a compleat Victory with the Death of ten thousand of his Adversaries, and fifteen hundred of his own Men; among whom were none of Note, besides Sir Humphry Bourchier, Son to the Lord Barnes. The Duke of Somerset and Earl of Oxford fled towards Scotland; but fearing Danger by the Length of the Way, they repair'd to Wales to find out the Earl of Pembroke. The Duke of Exeter, who was left half slain among the dead Bodies, with great Difficulty escap'd, and took Sanctuary in Westminster. The great Slaughter of the common People is attributed to this: That whereas Edward in his other Battels was wont to cry out Kill the Lords and Commanders, and spare the rest; he acted contrary at this Time, being highly offended that they more esteem'd the Earl of Warwick than himself.

Their Glory
extinguish'd.

This was the End of the mighty Warwick's worldly Glory, the greatest and busiest Subject of these Times, whose Ambition was to make and unmake Kings; and it could not be expected, that such a stormy Life should be concluded by a calmer Death. His Ruin took its Rise from his Father, who being Cousin-German to Henry the Fifth, forsook his Respect to Consanguinity, for that of Affinity with Richard Duke of York, who marry'd his Sister Cicily Mother to the present King Edward. Treading in his Father's Steps, by which he ruin'd innocent King Henry, he proceeded like an indiscreet Builder, so delighted to pull down and set up, that at length Part of the Frame he had erected himself, fell upon him and crush'd him to Death. When by the most powerful Engines of Policy and Valour he had rais'd up his Thoughts to the Highest, by making himself King in Authority, and causing the Crown to be entail'd upon the two Princes who had marry'd his Daughters, Providence in one Overthrow ruin'd him, and permitted his Sons-in-Law with their Wives not long after to be extinguish'd by strange Deaths, none answering his Hopes but the younger Daughter, and that preposterously to his Design. For she indeed by marrying the Duke of Glocester, the Murderer of her Husband Prince Edward, became Queen to an Usurper; and soon after by Poison, as it was justly believ'd, put a Period to her Glory. His Grandchildren by the Duke of Clarence, who arriv'd to any Age, dy'd by the Ax upon a Scaffold; and all that Greatness he so violently labour'd to confirm in his Posterity, by unnatural Deaths was reduc'd to nothing. His Brother Montague was unhappily involv'd in the same Ruins; and both were thought so considerable in the Eye of the Nation, that when King Edward return'd triumphantly into London, he caus'd their dead Bodies to be expos'd three Days together to all Comers, that every one might be satisfy'd in the Reality of their Deaths. After which they were permitted to be convey'd to Bilsam Abby, and interr'd in that Priory among their Ancestors.

Queen Margaret lands with her Forces at Weymouth.

While King Edward's Affairs thus far prosper'd at London, the Winds that had stopp'd King Henry's Queen Margaret at France came favourably about to fill her Sails for England, and indeed to accomplish the Decree which Heav'n had prefix'd. She and her Son Prince Edward, with their French Followers, being landed at Weymouth, were soon entertain'd with the melancholy News of the Loss at Barnet Field; which so affected the unfortunate Queen, that at first she fell into a Swound, and after a little Recovery withdrew her self to the Abby of Cerne. Here the chief of her Party resorted to her, as Edmund Duke of Somerset, with the Lord John his Brother, John Courtney Earl of Devonshire, the Earl of Pembroke, John Lord Wenlock, and John Longstrother Prior of St. John's. These with many promising Expressions comforted the sorrowful Queen, and offer'd their Assistance to establish her Son Edward, tho' it were with the Loss of their Lives, desiring her only to undertake the Authority city of the War, and they would sustain the Charge and Burden of it, by whose Power and Valour they did not doubt but to abate the Pride of Edward the Usurper; who holding himself secure, began to relapse into his former Negligence. To these Resolutions the warlike Queen consented, and us'd all Diligence in her Proceedings; when considering what Methods to follow, her Care was most fix'd upon the Life and Safety of her Son: And therefore, as well for their Advantage, as for the restraining of the Yorkists, she thought it best to send him back again into France; from whence he might supply them with new Forces, or at least over-awe Edward from tyrannizing too far. But on the contrary the Lords alledg'd, that Prince Edward, being the sole Hopes of the Lancastrians, ought to be present in the Field, the Sight of whom would add Courage to his own Soldiers, and cause many of the contrary Side to come over to him. Which Opinion prevailing, every Person departed to make what Preparations he could, and the Queen with her French repair'd to Bath, where the Duke of Somerset and the Earl of Devonshire were high in Reputation, and by whose Authority new Forces daily came in to the Prince's Service.

King Edward had hardly Time to breath after the Battel at Barnet when he heard Queen Margaret was landed, and of the Confluence of People out of Cornwall, Devonshire and the Western Parts, which hourly flew to her Assistance: Wherefore committing King Henry and George Arch-Bishop of York to the Tower, with a select Company of Men he march'd out to meet them, designing to destroy those many Springs before they could have time to join in the Body of a River which might prove dangerous to his Safety. Therefore from Windsor, Abington, Chichester and Malmesbury he continu'd his Progress, seeking out and urging his Enemies to Battel. But the Queen and her Forces fearing to continue in Bath, remov'd to Bristol, to Berkley, to Glocester, and at last to Tewkesbury; where the Duke of Somerset encamp'd his Forces, without staying for the Earl of Pembroke's Arrival. Here he hastily drew up in three Battels, of which himself and his Brother John Lord Somerset commanded the first, the Middle was led by Edward the young Prince, under the Conduct of the Lords St. John and Wenlock; and the Rere was commanded by John Earl of Devonshire, a mortal Enemy to the House of York. The Queen finding King Edward to approach, and that her Soldiers ought to have the Advantage in Valour to equal their Enemies who had it in Numbers, took the Prince with her, and rode about the Army. In her Looks appear'd nothing but Life and Resolution, and in her Language almost an Assurance of Victory; so subtilly she conceal'd the Wound her Despair had given her, and suffer'd it only to bleed inwardly.

King Edward marches against them.

King Edward being come within Sight of his Enemies likewise drew up in three Lines of Battel, committing the first to his Brother Richard Duke of Glocester; the second he undertook himself, and the Rere was commanded by the Lord Hastings his Chamberlain. The Armies thus drawn up, and a Signal given, an obstinate Battel began. The King had planted his Ordnance to great Advantage, which Glocester employ'd against the Duke of Somerset's Men; and they being lodg'd between Ditches, Bushes and Hedges, with their Showers of Arrows so gaul'd Glocester's Line, that he commanded them to give back, as tho' they had fled. Which Somerset perceiving, with too much Rashness he left his best Places of Strength to pursue them, and advanc'd as far as King Edward's Quarter; expecting to be follow'd and supported by the Lord Wenlock, who seem'd to have had no such Design. Glocester spying the Advantage, made good his Retreat, and with fresh Supplies of Spears so charg'd Somerset's Battalion, that his Men were soon put to Flight. He himself recovering the middle Line found the Lord Wenlock idle, and without Action, whom he most opprobriously revild with the Name of a Traitor, and with his Battel-Ax clove his Head in Pieces: When immediately the Duke of Glocester, and after him King Edward enter'd the Trenches, and soon put an End to the Battel by defeating all the Queen's Party. For there were slain on her Side John Lord Somerset, preval.

the Earl of Devonshire, the Lord Wenlock, Sir John Delves, Sir Edward Hampden, Sir Robert Whittingham, and Sir John Lewkener, with no less than three thousand Men besides. This was the twelfth Battel fought between the Houses of Lancaster and York, and the sixth and last that was fought in King Edward's Reign; in which, or soon after, both the Queen and her Son Prince Edward were taken Prisoners. But the Duke of Somerset, the Prior of St. John's, with many Knights and Esquires took Sanctuary in the Abby, and other Places in the Town; notwithstanding which, they were violently taken out and arraign'd before the Duke of Glocester, who that Day sat Constable of England, where they were without Mercy or Regard to Blood condemn'd to Death, which they immediately suffer'd upon a Scaffold erected in the Town. With these Lords dy'd twelve worthy Knights, besides others of inferior Note. By this Violation of the Sanctuary King Edward made good the Opinion the World had before conceiv'd of him; that Religion could never so far prevail upon his Conscience as to be any Bar either to his Pleasures or Revenge.

Young Prince Edward fell into the Hands of Sir Richard Crofts, who intended to have conceal'd him; but King Edward having promis'd a Pension of a hundred Pounds per Annum to whosoever should bring him alive or dead, and Life to the Prince if he was not already dead; Crofts believing he would not falsifie his Promise, presented him to him. King Edward fixing his Eyes upon him, and admiring the Sweetness of his Youth and Disposition, demanded of him; How he durst come with flying Colours into his Kingdom, and raise his People against him? To which he courageously answer'd, That he came to recover his Father's Kingdom, his proper and natural Inheritance, descended to him by several Generations. King Edward highly offended at these Words, thrust him disdainfully away with his Gantlet, and some say struck him on the Mouth: Upon which Incouragement the Dukes of Clarence and Glocester, the Marquis Dorset and the Lord Hastings, seiz'd suddenly upon the Prince, and with their Poniards most barbarously murder'd him; contrary to the Laws of God, Nature and Nations, whose Blood was afterwards reveng'd upon every one of them in particular. His Body was bury'd without any Solemnity among other poor and mean Persons in the Church of the Monastery of the Black-Friars in Tewksbury.

Shortly after this last Battel, King Edward had notice that the Northern Men were in Arms, and design'd to hazard themselves for the Queen's Liberty; upon which he march'd towards Coventry with such a Power, that they were soon discourag'd, and came thronging in to offer him Subjection. Yet all the Lancastrians were not so determin'd, but rather design'd once more to try whether Fortune would favour them. They had one fit Instrument to promote the Enterprize, the Bastard Fauconbridge, Son to the Earl of Kent, a great Supporter of King Edward's Interest. However this Son, being a Man of a turbulent Spirit, and bold and active, the Earl of Warwick had made him his Admiral to secure the narrow Seas against King Edward's Power; which Office he executed beyond his Commission, and became a Terror to all Merchants. Having got three hundred Male-contents from Calais, he resolv'd to try his Fortunes at Land; and putting in at Dover, great Numbers of loose Persons, most of them the Dregs of former Rebellions, daily repair'd to him, so that his Forces came to be seventeen thousand strong. With these he march'd to London, and in a hostile Manner demanded Admission into the City, and the Release of King Henry out of Prison; but was resist'd by the Mayor and Citizens on one side, and the Lieutenant of the Tower on the other. Upon which he brought up his Shipping to St. Catharine's, and leaving in them Men sufficient to receive the Booty brought, with the rest he march'd to Kingston Bridge, promising his Soldiers by the way, to give them the Plundering of Westminster for their Dinners, and of the Suburbs of London for their Suppers, but London it self should be their Breakfast the next Morning. But being disappointed at Kingston, and hearing of King Edward's March towards London, he turn'd back to Southwark; when to open his Way into London, he caus'd the Bridge to be fir'd; and three thousand of his Men being by his Vessels sent over the Thames, divided themselves into two Parties, one attempting to enter at Algate, and the other at Bishopsgate. Both these they set on fire, so that the City was in three Places both fir'd and assaulted at the same Time; but by the Care and Valour of some Noblemen and Citizens, the bold Fauconbridge was at last driven to his Ships with the Loss of seven hundred of his Men; and not long after his Forces were dispers'd, and himself beheaded. He is repuls'd.

On the twenty first Day of May, King Edward with the chief Lords of England, and a Body of thirty thousand Men came to London, where he was triumphantly receiv'd, which he as gratefully requited, giving the Order of Knighthood to the Mayor and some others who had bravely repuls'd the late Rebels, commending both the Valour and Loyalty, and promising to reward the meanest of his good Citizens Loves with ample Satisfaction, as soon as the Common-wealth had recover'd its former Quiet. In the mean Time the cruel Duke of Glocester took an Occasion to visit King Henry in the Tower, where observing his unmov'd Behaviour, either out of Pity of his unbounded Injuries, or of Envy at his unparallel'd Patience, or out of Jealousie of the Life of one idoliz'd by many Thousands in the Nation, he stabb'd him to the Heart with his own Hands, or at least commanded it to be done in his own Presence. The Body of this murder'd King was with Guards, and some show of Funeral Rites, brought into St. Paul's Church, where with the Face uncover'd it was expos'd to the Curiosity of every Eye; for the King was resolv'd rather to endure the Scandal of his Murther, than to hazard the Question of his Life. Here it bled again afresh, and became a melancholy Spectacle to most of the Beholders. From thence it was carry'd to the Black-Friars Church, where being laid bare-fac'd, it bled as before, to the great Amazement of the sorrowful Spectators; who look'd upon it as a miraculous way of demanding Justice from Heaven, when it was not to be had on Earth. At length it was put into a Boat, without Priest, Clerk, Torch or Taper, Singing or Saying, and was ferry'd into the Abby of Chertsey in Surry, and there without any Pomp interr'd.

King Edward returns to London.

King Henry murder'd in the Tower.

Thus dy'd the just and innocent King in near the Fiftieth Year of his Age, who had been proclaim'd in the Cradle, crown'd in his Infancy, and again at more Age in the City of Paris, living in all Piety, and loving his Subjects, and reigning thirty eight Years, was in that Time toss'd with infinite Variety and Mutations: For he was twice imprison'd and depriv'd of his Crown, betray'd, smitten, and wounded, and in all things became a memorable Example of Fortunes Inconstancy. His disconsolate Wife Margaret, who twenty six Years before, had with the utmost Pomp and Magnificence been crown'd Queen of England, and had rul'd over all, was now become a poor Prisoner in Want and Distress, and wore out her Time in Tears and Lamentations: Which being known to Duke Reyner her Father, he afterwards offer'd Terms of Ransom to King Edward, which prov'd so burthensom to that Prince, that he was constrain'd to pawn and sell the greatest Part of his Dominions to purchase her Liberty: So that the best of her future Condition was only the Return of a wretched Daughter to an indigent Father. Her Marriage with King Henry was both contrary to Policy and Justice on his Side; and as soon as she found her Husband's Weakness, she us'd all Machinations to reduce him to her sole Command, with the Destruction of his most faithful Friends; so that she was both unfortunate to her self, and ruinous to the Kingdom. Her prosperous Fortune presents her in her worst Colours, a factious, busie and imperious Queen; her Adverse in the Best, an industrious Woman to recover what her self had lost, an excellent Wife, and indulgent Mother; so that had she not acted but when Misfortunes had compell'd her, she had been rank'd among the best Examples of her Sex. Her Life was the Discourse of the present and future.

The Miseries of his Queen.

Her Character

succeeding Times, because it occasion'd the Destruction of the House of Lancaster, then the most considerable in the Christian World; but her Death was so obscure, that we do not find it in History when she left this World.

A. D. IV. The victorious Edward being thus successful, and having destroy'd ^{the} the very Root of the Lancastrian Party, he proceeded to settle the Nation, and ^{to} to lop off all such Branches as might disturb the Peace of that, or his own Security. And first, under a Pretence of Treason, he secur'd the Arch-Bishop of York Brother to the late Earl of Warwick, and seiz'd all his Goods, Lands and Lordships, and got Possession of his rich Plate and Jewels, of which one in his Miter was of such a Value, that the King caus'd it to be set in his own Crown. After this he sent him over to the Castle of Guisnes, where he continu'd a Prisoner, with less courteous Usage than himself had shown to King Edward when he was his Prisoner. In which Times of Fear and Danger, Jasper Earl of Pembroke, with his Nephew young Henry Earl of Richmond, fled into Bretaign, where they were honourably receiv'd and entertain'd by the Duke of that Province. Their Escape created such a Jealousie in King Edward, that he offer'd large Sums of Money to that Duke, if he would deliver them up to his Power: To which the Duke reply'd, That he could not in Honour deliver up those distressed Princes that had implor'd his Protection; but for his sake, he would take such Care of them, that he should have no Cause of Apprehensions from them: And to that End he remov'd their own Servants from them, and appointed Bretaigns to attend upon them. John Earl of Oxford, after Barnet Field, for a while secur'd himself in St. Michael's Mount in Cornwall, but afterwards yielding himself to King Edward, had his Life pardon'd. But yet he was sent over Sea to the Castle of Hammes, where for the Space of twelve Years, till the Death of King Richard the Third, he was kept a close Prisoner. His Countess, who was Sister to the late Earl of Warwick, was never permitted to come to him, nor had any Thing allow'd for her Subsistence, but was compell'd to live upon the Charities of others, and what she could get by her Needle or other Work. But still more deplorable was the Condition of Henry Holland, Duke of Exeter and Earl of Huntington, who after he had made so mighty a Figure for many Years, was reduc'd to such Wants, as may be an Example to all Men of the Uncertainty of Secular Grandeur. For Comines tells us, That he himself saw the Duke of Exeter running bare-leg'd after the Duke of Burgundy's Train, begging his Bread for God's sake; but he declar'd not his Name, being nearest of the House of Lancaster, and Brother-in-Law to King Edward himself; but afterwards his Quality being known, Burgundy gave him a small Pension to maintain him. Not long after he was found dead upon the Shore of Dover, quite stripp'd and naked; but how he came by that Death, no Discovery could be made.

A. D. All Things being brought to a reasonable Quietness, and Edward reigning without any Competitor or dangerous Disturber, caus'd a Parliament to be assembled at Westminster, in which he re-establish'd those Acts which King Henry had abrogated, and annull'd those that were made against his Friends and Favourites, at the same Time pardoning all former Offences. During this Session the Duke of Burgundy sent his Ambassadors to King Edward, desiring his Assistance against the French King, which was the more readily heard and granted, as well for the Favours receiv'd of the Duke, in the Time of his Necessities, as for his Resentment against Lewis, who had furnish'd Warwick to dispossess him of his Crown. And indeed this was a Spark that would probably set the English Hearts on Fire to recover France, which was lost by Henry the last King. But Money being wanting for so great an Enterprize, the King having expended what had been given him the last Year, he proceeded to a new Invention, which was to cause a List to be made of the richest and ablest Men of the Kingdom; who being summon'd before him, he by his insinuating Arts of Persuasion so far prevail'd vail'd upon them, as they all willingly suffer'd themselves to be assess'd, some to gratifie him, some for Example, and some for Fear. By this Means he rais'd vast Sums of Mony, which he call'd by the new Name of Benevolence; in the raising of which, we are told of a rich old Widow, who being by the King courteously demanded what she would contribute upon such an urgent Occasion, she answer'd, For your Majesty's Royal and Amiable Countenance I will contribute twenty Pounds Sterling. This Answer and Gift so pleas'd the King, that he testify'd his Gratitude by giving her a hearty Kiss; which so transported the Gentlewoman, that she immediately doubled her Sum, and added twenty Pounds more. By which slight Passage, a Judgment is easie to be made of the King's Temper; either of it self full of Humanity, or without Difficulty bending to the lowest Courtesie, when it any ways concern'd the Advancement of his Profit.

All Things being in a Readiness, King Edward repair'd to Dover, and there embark'd himself for Calais with an Army more formidable than any that hitherto had invaded France: For he had almost all the Nobility and Gentry of the Nation, fifteen hundred Men at Arms compleatly accouter'd, fifteen thousand Archers on Horseback, besides a great Number of Footmen, Pioneers and others; which was the more surprizing and remarkable, because so much Blood and Mony had been spent in the late Civil Wars. This Army was about twenty Days in passing between Dover and Calais; but before their Landing, King Edward sent a Letter of Defiance to the French King, in which he demanded no less than the whole Realm of France, threatening if he refus'd to invade his Dominions with Fire and Sword. King Lewis receiving the Letter, which Comines says was excellently well penn'd, he privately conferr'd with the Herald that brought it, and in Substance return'd this Answer: It is far better and wiser for the new King your Master to trust us an old Adversary, than to rely upon two such new Deceivers as the Duke of Burgundy and the Earl of St. Paul will prove, if he complies with them: And so commend me to your Master. Which the Herald promising to do, he was graciously dismiss'd with an honourable Reward of three hundred Crowns, and thirty Ells of Crimson Velvet, with a Promise of greater Acknowledgments, if a Peace was concluded; as also with a Present of a stately Horse, a wild Boar and a Wolf for King Edward.

The King embarks for France with a mighty Army.

He defies the French King.

His Answer.

And now to make good the French King's Allegation to the Herald, the Duke of Burgundy, who had promis'd upon the Word of a Prince to bring to Calais two thousand Lances, and four thousand Light-Horse, fail'd to come. Upon which the Lord Scales was sent by King Edward to the Duke, to remind him of his Agreement, and to hasten his Arrival with his promis'd Forces. But his Journey was to no great Effect, only occasioning the Duke with a small Troop of Horse to come to the King, formally to excuse himself for his Backwardness; alledging this Reason, that having been employ'd in the Siege of Naz, he could not leave the Place without infinite Disgrace, if either Composition or Submission were enforc'd; for that Reason he was compell'd too much to trespass upon his Patience by the Obstinacy of the Besieg'd; but promis'd to supply all Defects, both with his Presence and Power, and that with all Speed. The Earl of St. Paul likewise by his Letter perswaded King Edward to proceed in the Enterprize, and not to doubt of any Accommodations both from the Duke and himself. Upon this Assurance and Incouragement King Edward advanc'd forwards, but in his Passage found no Performance of Promises, either from one or the other; for the Duke did not accommodate his Soldiers at Peronne with Victuals or Lodging, as was requisite and expected; and the Earl instead of surrendring up St. Quintin's according to Agreement, sally'd out upon such as were sent from King Edward to take Possession, and play'd upon them with the Canon of the Town. This caus'd King Edward to suspect the Truth of the French King's Character of the Duke and Earl; and from thence-thenceforward flood upon his own Guard, giving no further Credit to their Protestations: Which being resented by the Duke of Burgundy, he pretended extraordinary Occasions, and promising a speedy Return with his Forces, he took his leave and departed, which did not a little encrease the King of England's Suspicious.

The French King sends a Messenger to Edward, who yields to an Accommodation.

The French King having Intelligence of the Duke of Burgundy's Departure, and foreseeing the Danger if they should unite their Powers, he resolv'd with himself to make a Trial to mediate a Peace in the Duke's Absence; and yet to treat in such a Manner, that if it took not Effect, he might disclaim the Knowledge of the Overture. Whereupon he privately dispatch'd a Messenger, in Appearance a Herald, but in Reality a Person of no Office or Estimation, and not known to any of the King's Household, but to Villiers the Master of the Horse, who only was acquainted with the Project and Party. This counterfeit Pursivant at Arms, cloath'd with a Trumpet's Banner-roll, address'd himself to the King of England, and upon Admission into his Presence, he first shew'd the great Desire the King his Master had for Peace, whose Amity for England he had ever esteem'd; excusing his Reception of the Earl of Warwick with the Necessity of the Times, whom he assist'd not against King Edward but the Duke of Burgundy, who had drawn the English to these excessive Charges only to repair his own broken Fortunes, and to make a good Composition for himself. Lastly, he desir'd that the King of England would grant a safe Conduct to the Ambassadors of the French King his Master, who should fully inform his Majesty, and give his safe Conduct for a further Conference in these Affairs. This Message being deliver'd in a submissive Tone, expressing much Humility, and ever yielding to the King's Greatness of Spirit and the Nation's Glory, together with a Promise of such Conditions as should be honourable and profitable, begot a favourable Audience. And many of the great Lords, who had plentiful Revenues at home, were as ready as the King to harken to Peace, and forsake unnecessary Dangers abroad. Nor did the greatest Statesmen dislike a Treaty, considering that almost all the English Wars in France had rather purchas'd Fame than Treasure to the Kingdom; and when the Soldiers return'd home, their Scars were usually greater than their Spoils. Upon these Considerations King Edward granted a safe Conduct, and sent with this Messenger an English Herald, to receive the like and other Assignments from the French King.

The Duke of Burgundy's Rejoinders.

But to no Effect.

But when the Duke of Burgundy understood that a Peace was negotiating between the two Kings, he in haste posted to the English Camp, attended only by sixteen Horsemen. The Distraction of his Look and Gestures express'd the Wildness of his Thoughts; so that the whole Army discover'd his Discontent before he declar'd it. At his first Appearance before King Edward, he broke into a most passionate fierce Language, upbraiding him with inglorious Sloth, and the indefatigable Courage of the former Kings of England, upon whose Attempts ever attended the noblest Victories. He made a scornful Repetition of the Mirth his Enemies would make at his Return, as if he had come over with such a numerous Army, Merchant-like to traffick for a little Mony; and the despicable Appearance of his People, when they saw the mighty Conquests their Contributions had procur'd. King Edward charg'd him with Neglect and other Miscarriages, and the Earl of St. Paul's with something worse; and when he intimated that he and the Duke would still be included in the Peace, Burgundy disdainfully rejected it; protesting the Love he bore to the English Name, not Care of his own Safety, had inclin'd him to this Enterprize. And to show how little Dependancy his Fortune had on any other, and how without any Mediation he was able to make his own Peace, he vow'd to conclude none with France, 'till the English Forces had been three Months retir'd. After he had thrown out these disorder'd Speeches, in much Discontent he left King Edward; who not a little admir'd to hear himself so disdainfully treated, having rarely been accustomed to any Language, but what was soften'd and polish'd by Compliment and Flattery.

The Peace being resolv'd between the two Kings of England and France, the Place appointed for Conference was near Amiens; and the Parties assign'd from the French, were the Bastard of Bourbon, Admiral of France, the Lord St. Pierre, and the Bishop of Eureux. For the English, were the Lord Howard, Sir Thomas St. Leger, and Doctor Morton Lord Chancellor of England. All these meeting, they soon concluded a Peace, the Substance of which Articles were as following: 'That the French King should immediately pay to the King of England seventy five thousand Crowns of the Sun; and annually fifty thousand Crowns at London during King Edward's Life. That Charles the Dauphine should marry the Lady Elizabeth, eldest Daughter to King Edward, and they two to have for their Maintenance the whole Dukedom of Gascony, or else fifty thousand Crowns yearly to be paid in the Tower of London for the Space of nine Years; and at the End of that Term the Dauphine and his Lady was to have Gascony, of the Charge of which the French King was to be acquitted. That the Lord Howard and Sir John Cheyney Master of the Horse, should remain in Hostage till the English Army had quitted France, and a general Peace for nine Years concluded; in which the Dukes of Burgundy and Bretaign were also to be included, if they thought fit. This was so acceptable to the French King, that he gave great Presents of Plate, Money and Jewels to the English; and besides he made most magnificent Entertainments for all of that Nation at the City of Amiens, of which Comines gives us a very particular Account. The Duke of Glocester solely oppos'd this Agreement, as not honourable, or rather not suiting with his Designs; however it met with no great Delay: And to compleat all, it was agreed that the two Kings should have a personal Interview at Picquigny, a Town three Miles from Amiens, seated in a Bottom upon the River Somme. Over this River a strong Bridge was purposely built, and in the midst of it a Grate made with Cross Barrs, no wider than was sufficient for Men to thrust in their Arms; cover'd with Boards above to avoid the Rain, and the Bridge so broad, that twelve might stand in a Rank on both Sides.

A Peace concluded.

The Day approach'd, and the two Kings repair'd to the Place in great Splendor; he of France came first to the Grate, accompany'd with twelve Persons, according to Appointment; of whom John Duke of Bourbon, the Cardinal his Brother, and Comines Lord of Argenton, were the Principal. King Edward enter'd the Bridge on the other End, with his Brother the Duke of Clarence, the Earl of Northumberland, the Lord Hastings his Chamberlain, and the Lord Chancellor with eight more; being himself gloriously adorn'd with Cloth of Gold, and wearing a black Velvet Cap richly beset with Diamonds. Comines says that his very Presence spoke him a King; and that both gracefully approaching the Grate, with a reverend Bow and Bending of the Knee, the two Monarchs embrac'd through the Partition with mutual Courtship. Lewis first broke Silence, and declar'd, That he never coveted any Sight so much as This; and that he bless'd God who had brought them together to so glorious an End. After this the Bishop of Ely, who was Chancellor of England, made an eloquent and learned Oration; and then read the Articles of Peace, and demanded of the two Kings whether they were done with their full Contents. Which being acknowledg'd, each of them laying one Hand upon the Missal, and the other upon the Holy-Cross, took their solemn Oaths to observe the same. And then falling into a more familiar Conversation, Lewis with a pleaster Air told King Edward, That he would one Day invite him to Paris to visit and court the fair Ladies of that City; and if he should chance to make any false Steps with them, he would assign the Cardinal of Bourbon for his Confessor; by which he at once handsomly touch'd upon the Intimacies of both Persons. After some Compliments, and more private Discourses, both Kings parted with great great Satisfaction; only Lewis began to be under some Fears that Edward's Curiosity might carry him to Paris, the Delicacies of which City had invited too many English Princes before.

An Interview between the Kings of England and France

Many of King Edward's Servants were displeas'd with this Agreement, believing he had not consulted his own Honour; particularly one of them nam'd Lewis de Bretailles, who being with Comines, and demanded by him in how many Battels Edward had been present, he answer'd In nine, and was victorious in all, but in this you have made him lose, for his Return into England without Fighting or Danger, will redound more to his Dishonour, than all his Victories have done to his Honour. Lewis being inform'd of this Answer, swore according to his Custom That this Man's Mouth must of necessity be bridled; and immediately caus'd him to be sent for to dine with him, making great Offers to draw him to his Service; which being refus'd, he gave him a thousand Crowns, with particular Promises to him and his Relations, if he would cultivate the Amity between England and France. Such Artifices was Lewis oblig'd to use; and there were few English Lords, great in the Opinion of the State, but shar'd proportionably of his Bounty; even the scrupulous Duke of Glocester return'd not home without a large Present both of Plate and Horses. The Affection of the Lords was generally bought up, according to the ordinary Course in Markets; as they were worth more in King Edward's Estimation, so was their Price rais'd. The principal Men of Name who were in Pension, were the Lord Hastings, the Lord Howard, Sir John Cheyney, Sir Anthony St. Leger, and Sir Thomas Montgomery. Among these, besides the present Gifts, he annually distributed sixteen thousand Crowns, and exacted from every Man an Acquittance; which none refus'd to give but the Lord Hastings, who declar'd His Hand should not be seen among the King's Accounts at Paris; but still receiv'd the Pension, which without that Formality was continu'd. At what rate King Lewis valu'd his Amity with England is easily to be judg'd by his profuse Liberality; but how lawful it was in the Receivers, we will not strictly determine. For tho' in this King's Reign, as likewise in that of Henry the Seventh, many of the great Counsellors were in Pension to Lewis and his Son Charles, yet it is hard to judge how it could agree with their Dignity; it being beneath a noble Mind to owe any Revenues to a Prince, whose Safety must never be in the first Place of their Care.

King Edward
returns into England.

King Edward having receiv'd the Mony agreed by Articles, and given his Hostages, march'd to Calais in order to pass over into England. It seem'd very strange to many, that after he had enter'd France with the noblest Army that any King of England had before, so small a Sum should cause him to return. Writers have had different Apprehensions as to this Matter; but after all, considering King Edward's former Condition and Circumstances, it was thought Wisdom in him, after he had been fail'd by the Duke of Burgundy, deluded by the Earl of St. Paul, allur'd by Lewis with Monies, Pensions, and chiefly with the Promise of so honourable and advantageous a Match, to withdraw himself; avoiding thereby such Snares into which the Contingencies of War might throw him, as well at home as abroad. And such the Generality of his Friends accounted it; and when he return'd to London, he was receiv'd with the Acclamations and Triumphs of a Conqueror.

A. D. V. The Remainder of this Reign, which continu'd about seven Years longer, was without any extraordinary Actions, and for the most part calm and undisturb'd. The King enjoy'd his Dominions without any Molestation from Foreign Enemies by means of the late Treaty with France: Burgundy's Enmity did no ways trouble him, which was soon diverted another Way, to the Loss of that Prince's Life: Scotland was in a safe Condition, by reason of the Truce, the Quality of her present Government, and the Want of Encouragement from France: And at home he found himself freed from all dangerous Opposers.

Reg. 15.

Opposers, who were come to their Ends either from the Sword in the Field, or the Ax on the Scaffold; of neither of which he was sparing. The Life of young Henry Earl of Richmond now in Bretaign, was what alone could give him real Trouble: He could not possibly live at Ease, and attend such Pleasures to which he was naturally addicted, so long as this Worm did gnaw upon his Heart; that Earl being the only Relict of the House of Lancaster, who might probably deprive him of his Quiet and Kingdom, if he was not remov'd out of the World. In order to this he sent Doctor Stillington and others, Ambassadors to the Duke of Bretaign, with large Sums and fair Promises, That he design'd to marry his eldest Daughter Elizabeth to the Earl of Richmond, by which all unhappy Causes of Dissentions might be intirely extinguish'd. The Ambassadors so far prevail'd upon the Duke, that he deliver'd the Earl to them, who conducted him to St. Malo's; where while they stay'd for a fair Wind, the young Earl, by the subtle Contrivances of Peter Landoes the Duke's Treasurer, who had not been well gratify'd by the English Ambassadors, made his Escape, and fled to a Sanctuary; from whence neither Intreaties nor Promises could allure him. Nevertheless upon Landoes's Promise that he should be safely kept and confin'd to that Place, the Ambassadors return'd home, and acquainted King Edward with the Duke of Bretaign's Courtesie in delivering him, and their own Negligence in suffering him to escape; affording no other Satisfaction than Landoes's Promises. King Edward dissembled his Concern, and the better to secure his Family, he created his eldest Son Edward Prince of Wales, &c. and his Second Son Duke of York; giving the Order of Knighthood to the Son and Heir of the Earl of Lincoln, and many others. He also created twenty four Knights of the Bath, of whom Brian Chief-Justice, and Littleton a Judge of the Common-Pleas were two.

The King fears the Earl of Richmond,

but to no purpose.

King Edward being now in a great measure free from all Apprehensions of Danger, the better to give Lustre to that Peace he had settled, began to addict himself to a profuse Hospitality; a way of Greatness in which the Monarchs of England have in all Ages exceeded the other Princes of Europe. And upon all solemn Times, when Cessation from Labour licens'd the Vulgar to admire the glorious Outside of a State, he shew'd a particular Grandeur to the Eye, by presenting as well martial Exercises in Justs, Tiltings, Tournaments, and the like, as the softer Entertainments of Wit and Ingenuity. Never any Prince was more familiar with his Subjects than King Edward; for now all Things succeeding without Interruption, he set his Heart upon Pleasures, which had hitherto been afflicted with continual Troubles; and frequently laying aside the State of a Prince, he often would freely converse with the inferior Part of his People. At Windsor he sent for the Mayor and Aldermen of London, with others, upon no other Occasion than to hunt in his Company; and himself to eat, drink and be merry with them. As also another Time he did the like at Waltham, where he gave them a most friendly and familiar Entertainment, and sent to their Wives two Harts, six Bucks, and a Tun of Wine; which gain'd a nearer Affection than many greater Favours. He was wont often to court and converse with beautiful Women, which Fault by King Lewis was noted and prevented as to the French Ladies; but in England he seem'd to take his full Scope of Liberty: For besides the Lady Lucy, formerly mention'd, and some others, by whom he had Issue, he kept three Concubines, who, according to his own Words, all excell'd in very different Qualifications; One the merriest, another the wisest, and the third the holiest Harlot in the Kingdom, as one whom no Man could get out of the Church, unless it were to his Bed. The merriest was Jane Shore, Wife to a Citizen of London, in whom he took extraordinary Pleasure; the other two were greater Persons, but in their Humility were content to be nameless, and to forbear the Praise of those Properties.

ther the Duke of Clarence, a Prince of greater Spirit than did become a Brother and a Subject. As his Ruin was long design'd, so there were three Things that concur'd to the bringing it about; the King's Suspicion, the Queen's Hatred, and his own Mismanagement; which latter would not have effected it without the other two. His former Rebellion and Alliance with the Earl of Warwick were Faults long forgiven; yet still there remain'd a Fear that these old Inclinations, laid aside for a present Advantage, might be reassum'd; especially when he had the Presence of an Agreement in Parliament, that he should succeed to the Crown, upon the Failure of King Henry's Heirs. This Consideration wounded the Queen to the Soul; she thought that if her Husband dy'd first, her Children would never succeed their Father; and she was confirm'd in this Opinion by the Rumor of a Prophecy, That G should be the first Letter of his Name that succeeded King Edward; and this Duke's Name being George, it was thought he should be the Murderer of Edward's Sons, which Glocester afterwards really was. To these, other Reasons were added which render'd the former more suspicious; his attempting to marry Mary only Daughter to the late Duke of Burgundy; in which the Queen oppos'd him, endeavouring to have marry'd her to her Brother the Earl of Rivers; so that their Disgusts and the King's Jealousies were continually augmented. But the Imputations which gave some Colour to the Justification of his Condemnation, were, That he caus'd a Report to be rais'd among the People that Thomas Burdet was unjustly put to Death, who had lately been executed only for wishing in a Passion that the Horns of a Deer had been in the King's Belly: That the King us'd Negromancy and Poison, to bring such as he hated to their Ends; That Edward was illegitimate, and not begotten by the Duke of York; That he had procur'd many to swear to him and his Heirs, without reserving due Obedience to his Brother; and That he had pretended to the Crown by Virtue of the Contract made with Henry the Sixth.

*He is drowned in a Butt of

These several Accusations were brought publicly upon the Stage, and into open Parliament, where he was found guilty, and sent close Prisoner to the Tower of London. Here upon the eleventh of March he was secretly put to Death; the manner, as it is generally receiv'd, was by thrusting his Head into a Butt of Malmesey Wine, by which he was suffocated. His Body was first expos'd, and then bury'd at Tewkesbury in Glostershire, by that of his Dutche's Isabel Countess of Warwick, who being with Child, dy'd of Poison not long before. The Death of this Prince, which may modestly be accounted the Vengeance of Heav'n, every where begot an extraordinary Censure; the unnatural Severity taking away all Excuse from those who most favour'd the King. It was generally condemn'd, both in regard of the Manner, it being prodigious to be drown'd without Water upon dry Land; and of the Quality of the Person, he being the first Brother to any King of England that ever was attainted. King Edward, who had consented to it, was afterwards so afflicted with the Remembrance of it, that when any su'd for the Life of a condemn'd Man, he usually cry'd out, Oh unfortunate Brother, who had no Man to intercede for him! This Prince left issue behind him, Edward Earl of Warwick, and Margaret afterwards Countess of Salisbury, both Infants, and Followers of their Father's Misfortunes; He a continual Prisoner, at twenty four Years of Age, beheaded under Henry the Seventh; and She, at sixty two, lost hers in the Reign of Henry the Eighth, which put a full Period to the famous Name of the Plantagenets. The same Year in which the Duke of Clarence was murder'd, the Nation was punish'd with such a raging Pestilence, that the Sword in fifteen Years before devour'd not so many as this did in four Months.

Reg. 19.
King Edward's Severities.

After the Death of the Duke of Clarence, King Edward soon began to give another Face to his Temper and Disposition; and from being affable and liberal, he became austere and covetous, to the great Wonder and Dissatisfaction of his People. For whereas the Laws of England granted many Things in Favour of their Kings, which the Kings themselves seldom put in Execution, as being too full of Rigour; he by virtue of those Laws took such Penalties as they who were rich incurr'd for want of punctual Observance of them; and making no Difference in respect of Blood, Quality or Title, he made all sorts of Men apprehend that he would become formidable to the whole Nation: For having abated the Courage of other Men by his Brother's Death, there were none that dar'd contradict him. But the greedy heaping up of Mony was so much the more monstrous to him, because it was contrary to his natural Temper; so that such a Change seem'd to foreshew approaching Death. In these Times Ambassadors were frequently sent from England to France, and from France to England; the Former, that according to their Obligation, the French might send for the contracted Lady Elizabeth Daughter to King Edward; and the Latter to excuse their Delays, charging it upon the Wars of Burgundy and the Low-Countries, in which all the chief Men in the Kingdom being employ'd, she could not be sent for in a manner becoming the Dignity and Greatness of both the Crowns. So as he who earnestly desires a Thing, is by nothing more easily deceiv'd than by the Confirmation of new Promises; Edward was easie to believe, and Lewis made Advantage of his Falshood, and brought about his Purposes of marrying his Son another Way; which if he had carry'd more openly, he could not have effected them. And King Edward being grown gross in Body, and more unactive in Mind, seem'd to rest satisfy'd with the Fame of his former Victories, and the present Enjoyment of his annual Tribute from France, which was duely paid into his Exchequer. So that they are not much mistaken who say that the English have generally won more Honour by Fighting than by Treaties.

His Mistakes.

In these Times, James the Third of that Name, King of Scotland, sent his Ambassadors into England, to move and treat of a Marriage between the Lady Cicely, King Edward's second Daughter, and his eldest Son James Prince of Scotland. King Edward and his Council thinking this Affinity might be both honourable and profitable for England, did not only readily grant his Suit, but also furnish'd him with certain Sums of Mony, that the Marriage should not hereafter be interrupted; upon this Condition, that if the intended Marriage should by any Accident be broken off, either on the Scotch or English Side, that then the Provost and Merchants of Edinburgh should be bound for the Repayment of the Mony. All Histories represent King James as a Man much addicted to his own Will, and to despise the good Advice of his ancient Nobility, and his grave and faithful Counsellors; and that none might reprehend his Actions, he entertain'd and preferr'd Men of mean Birth and worse Conditions; by whose evil Counsel he so afflicted his Nobility with Exactions and Imprisonments, and some with Death, that divers of them chose a voluntary Exile and liv'd in foreign Countries. Others he himself banish'd, particularly his second Brother Alexander Duke of Albany, who was entertain'd by King Edward; and moreover caus'd the Veins of John his third Brother to be open'd, so that he bled to Death. Besides this his Carriage towards his Brothers, Friends and Nobility, by the Instigation of the French King, who repin'd at this last League and Alliance, he neglected his Promise and Affinity made with King Edward, and caus'd an Army to be rais'd in order to invade the Kingdom of England. And relying upon his own Valour and the Assistance of France, he sent a peremptory Message to King Edward, That he should not dare to aid his Sister the Dutcheß of Burgundy against King Lewis, who was the Scots Ally; and also with Threats of War he commanded him to deliver to his Ambassadors the Duke of Albany, then residing in the English Court; and lastly to make full Satisfaction for all Damages done upon the Scotch Borders.

A War commences.

King Edward not a little irrag'd at these false and dishonourable Dealings, even in the Winter Season muster'd his Men, prepar'd his Artillery, and fitted out his Navy, that nothing might be wanting in the following Spring: Which was no sooner advanc'd, but he appointed for his Lieutenant his Brother Richard Duke of Gloucester, who with the Earl of Northumberland, the Lords Stanley, Lovell, Greystock and others, with the Duke of Albany himself, march'd into the North with an Army of above twenty thousand strong. And first Gloicester belieg'd the important Town of Berwick, and then marching forwards with great Terror and Devastations, he enter'd the chief City Edinburgh, urging King James to perform his Covenants concerning the Marriage between Prince James his Son and the Lady Cicely, before agreed upon, and threatening Ruin and Destruction, if the Match was not consummated. The Scotch Nobility reflecting upon their own imminent Danger, put to Death the King's wicked Counsellors, ordain'd the Duke of Albany Vicegerent of Scotland, and promis'd to repay the Mony receiv'd according to Covenants. After which, with the Surrender of the strong Town of Berwick, which had been out of the English Possession for twenty one Years, a general Peace was concluded between the two Nations. Whereupon not long after, Garter King at Arms was sent into Scotland, with a formal Instrument in Writing to the Provost and Burgeses of Edinburgh, who had undertaken to disburse the Mony, to signifie King Edward's Mind touching the Marriage intended, and to demand the said Sum by a fix'd Day, which was accordingly repaid.

A Peace concluded.

A. D. 1483. Reg. 23. As King Edward was greatly disappointed in the Marriage of his second Daughter to Scotland, so he met with a greater as to that of his eldest Daughter to France. For the French King finding the Daughter of Austria more proper for his Son's present Interest, deluded Edward with Shows of firm Faith, till he had effected his Purpose. The naming of this sounded so harshly in King Edward's Ears, that he would never suffer that String to be touch'd in his Presence, but ever believ'd that the French design'd honourably, tho' the Truth of their Designs was confirm'd by the Duke of Austria's Ambassadors residing in England. Yet still Edward would not so much as entertain a Suspicion against the French King, and therefore suffer'd him to incroach upon those Parts of Picardy that join'd to Calais, and to gain Time till it was past recalling. For then the Lord Howard returning from France, confidently told him, That he was present, and saw the Lady Margaret of Austria, Daughter to Duke Maximilian, Son to the Emperor Frederick, receiv'd into France with great Pomp and Splendor, and at Ambois contracted and espous'd to the Dauphine. The King became so nicely sensible of this Abuse, that he immediately resolv'd upon a Revenge; and every one with Chearfulness provided for War, the Clergy supplying in Monies what they could not do in Person. But while he was passionately endeavouring to call Lewis to an Account for his Crimes, he was summon'd by Death to give a full Account of all his own. Being seiz'd by a melancholy Fit, or as others say a Surfeit, and finding little Hopes of Recovery, he began to consider the Vanity of all his Victories, which he had purchas'd with the Expence of so much English Blood; and to reflect upon the deceitful Beauty of his sensual Pleasures, which now appear'd with all the Marks of Horror and Deformity. Then causing his Lords, which were then numerous in Court, to be sent for, he upon his Bed pathetically recommended to them the Care of the young Princes his Sons; shewing them, That they being so young they stood in need of extraordinary Counsellors, which in the Distraction of private Contentions could hardly be found: That they having all a Relation to him, some by Blood, some by Affinity, all by Love and Duty, they were to join in a reciprocal Affection to each other, that the Conformity of their Minds might beget the like in their Actions, and in their Ends necessarily conducing to the Service of an Infant King, and the general Good of the Kingdom. Then reminding them of the innumerable Evils arising from Civil Wars and Dissentions, he heartily begg'd of God that out of his particular Goodness no such might hereafter happen; but as this Favour was never to be expected without the forgetting of past Injuries, it caus'd him in the Name of the same God, and as the last Comfort he should receive, to desire of them all a sincere Forgiveness of any Injuries done by him. All that were present fell into Tears; and those who had born greatest Hatred freely shook Hands in Token of their last Obedience to the dying King; who being pleas'd with these outward Expressions of Love, soon after expired in the forty second Year of his Age, upon the ninth Day of April, after a tumultuous, great and various Reign of twenty two Years one Month, and five Days.

His Death.

The Manner of his Interment was thus: First, the Corps was cover'd from the Navel to the Knees, and so laid naked upon a Board for ten or twelve Hours, to be view'd by all the Lords in London, as well as the Lord Mayor and his Brethren; and then he was seared. The next Day he was brought into St. Stephen's Chappel, where three Masses were sung over him in the Morning, and Dirige and Commendamus in the Afternoon; at Night he was well watch'd by the Nobles and his Servants. In this manner he rested eight Days, and on the ninth was convey'd to Westminster Abby, born by several Knights and Esquires, cover'd over by a large black Cloath of Gold, with a Cross of Cloth of Silver, and above that a rich Canopy of Cloth Imperial fring'd with Gold and black Silk, born by four Knights, having at the Corners four Banners born by four other Knights, the first of the Trinity, the second of our Lady, the third of St. George, and the fourth of St. Edward. The Lord Howard bore the King's Banner before the Body, and the Officers of Arms about him on every Side. In the Herse in Westminster Abby, above the Body and Cloath of Gold, was a Personage in the Similitude of a King, in Royal Robes, and a Crown on his Head, a Scepter in one Hand, and a gilt Ball of Silver on the other, with a Cross patee. After many Solemnities perform'd, the Body was plac'd in a Chariot drawn by six Horses, and so with great Pomp went to Charing-cross, where the Chariot was cens'd, and from thence to Syon, and so to Eaton, where it was met by the Procession of Windsor. At the Castle Gate the Arch-Bishop of York and the Bishop of Winchester cens'd the Corps; and from thence they pass'd to the new Church, where in the Quire was appointed an admirable wrought Herse, being that Night watch'd by many Nobles and Esquires of the Body, and was there bury'd with all Solemnities befitting so great and victorious a King.

His Interment.

To say something of his Person and Character, Comines tells us That he was the goodliest Gentleman that ever his Eyes beheld, tall of Stature, fair of Complexion, and of a most noble Presence; yet too much inclining to Fat and Grossness in his latter Days. Yet the Gifts of his Mind seem'd to strive for Priority with those of his Body, having a most courageous Heart, and a magnanimous Disposition, being politick in Counsel, witty in Conversation, and in Adversity undaunted. In Battel he was bold and adventurous, being present in nine several Engagements, in which to his great Renown he always fought on Foot, and was ever victorious. He was far from being proud, yet very ambitious; and to gain his Ends, no Man was Master of more insinuating Methods than himself. In the midst of all his shining Qualifications he could set no Bounds to his Lust or his Ambition, in both of which he was remarkably punish'd. As to the former, it was observ'd that never Man was fram'd by Nature more apt to the Exercise of it, and whom amorous Courtship did less misbecome: Yet this Sin, tho' black in the Eye of Heav'n, by Politicians is too often excus'd in a Prince, as not generally injurious to his Subjects. But notwithstanding that Opinion, besides the fatal Example, if we observe the Revolution of Kingdoms, we find no Iniquity in Princes so commonly punish'd: The Dishonour of one Lady abus'd often causes the Disgrace of several Families, and mighty Factions joining for Revenge; for no Injuries like these are so cruel to human Nature, and with so little Patience dissimbled. For this King Edward was peculiarly punish'd in his Sons, who were both depriv'd of all Things by their unnatural Uncle;

The Misfortunes of his Family.

Uncle; and there was so much Appearance of Right in that Usurper, by their Father's Incontinency, that even an Act of Parliament was made to bastardize them both. As to his Ambition, tho' according to the exact Rules of lineal Succession he had the nearest Right to the Crown, yet considering the innumerable Perjuries, Treasons, Bloodsheds, and other Calamities that brought him and secur'd him in the Throne, his and his Father's Actions were less justifiable than those of many real Usurpers: And all those Victories he obtain'd, were against his own Nation, and his greatest Adversaries were in Consanguinity with him; so that he may more properly be said to have let himself Blood, than his Enemies; or rather for the Preservation of his own Body, to have cut off his principal and most necessary Limbs. The Hand of Heav'n lay heavy upon his Generation, and notwithstanding all his Success he was descended from a most unfortunate Family, he being the only Male of all his House, except a Child of Richard the Third, that dy'd a natural Death, after it claim'd the Crown. His Grand-Father the Earl of Cambridge was beheaded at Southampton; the Duke of York his Father slain before Sandall; of his three Brothers, the Earl of Rutland was slain in cold Blood, the Duke of Clarence drown'd in a Butt of Malmesey, and the Duke of Glocester, after he had strangled his Nephews, lost his Kingdom and Life in Battel. So that we meet with no Tragedy, whether true or fabulous, where we find so many various and cruel Deaths as in this Family. Besides two Sons, King Edward left seven Daughters, of whom Elizabeth the Eldest met with good Fortune, and was marry'd to King Henry the Seventh: Cicely was marry'd to Vicount Wells, and after that to another, but had Issue by neither: Anne marry'd to Thomas Howard Duke of Norfolk, whose Children dy'd all young: Bridget was a Nun in Dartford: Mary promis'd to the King of Denmark, but dy'd before Marriage: Margaret dy'd young: Catharine was marry'd to William Courtney Earl of Devonshire, and he had Edward Earl of Devonshire, who dy'd without Issue in Padua in the Year 1556.

Learned Men.

In this Reign flourish'd several Men eminent for Arts and Learning, as well as Valour, as Thomas Littleton a famous Judge of the Common Pleas, who brought a great Part of the Law into Method which before was confus'dly dispers'd: John Fortescue a Judge, and Chancellor of England, who was famous for understanding the Laws and Constitution of England: John Priding and William Caxton, both Writers of the English History: Scogan a learned Gentleman, and a Student of Oxford, who for his pleasant Wit and jocular Conceits was call'd to Court. And that which now began to give new Encouragement to Learning was the famous Art of Printing, which was first found out in Germany by John Gutterberghen about the Year 1440, or somewhat later, and was brought into England by William Caxton, a Mercer of London, and probably the same with the Historian, who first practis'd the same in the Abbey of Westminster, Anno Dom. 1571, and the eleventh of this Reign.

The History of King EDWARD the Fifth.

Containing two Months, and twelve Days.

I. KING Edward the Fourth left two Sons behind him, Edward Prince of Wales, twelve Years and five Months old, and Richard Duke of York, about nine Years of Age. The first of these by all Writers is call'd by the Name of King Edward the Fifth, as being lawful and rightful Heir to the Crown of England, and was accordingly proclaim'd King. But if we consider the Nature of his Reign, it may rather be call'd an Inter-regnum, or perhaps more properly the Tyranny of Richard the Third, who from the Death of King Edward the Fourth, both rul'd as a King, and rag'd as a Tyrant. Of this Man, who was now Duke of Glocester, we are told strange Stories, as to his monstrous Birth, his deformed Person, and his barbarous Disposition; of all which we have not so much Certainty, as that his Ambition had long prompted him to usurp the Crown of England. This was in part discover'd by means of one Mistlebroke, who in the same Night that King Edward dy'd, hastily went to one of the Duke's Friends in the City call'd Potter, and rousing him out of his Bed, declar'd that King Edward was departed. To whom the other with great Satisfaction reply'd, Then will my Master the Duke of Glocester be King. This soon appear'd in the Event; tho' at that Time the Duke was in the North of England; for which Reason the Lord Hastings, then Lord Chamberlain, sent an immediate Express to him of the King his Brother's Death; acquainting him withal, that he had committed the young King, the Queen, and his other Children, to his Care and Government; and likewise putting him in mind, how necessary it was for him speedily to repair to London. But the Duke of Glocester needed no Spur to set him forwards, who was already in a full Career; and as he had long projected how he might attain to the Crown, he now found the Way more open than ever.

Young Edward
proclaim'd King

Young Prince Edward, now call'd King, was at Ludlow in Shropshire when his Father dy'd, where he had liv'd for a considerable Space, in Order to awe the Welsh. Here he had many of his Mother's Relations about him; but Sir Anthony Woodvile the Lord Rivers was appointed his chief Counsellor and Director. This placing so many of the Queen's Friends about the young Prince was thought to be good Policy in her; but the Duke of Glocester turn'd it to their Destruction, and upon that Ground laid the Foundation of all his unhappy Fabrick. For whomsoever he found either displeas'd at them, or Friends to himself, he discover'd his Thoughts to them, some by Words, and some by Writings and secret Messengers, That it was not to be suffer'd either in Reason or Policy, that the young King their Master should be in the Hands and Custody of his Mother's Relations, sequester'd in a manner from their Company and Attendance, who were far superior to them both in Birth and Merits. With these and the like Insinuations, he soon set several on Fire who were but too apt to kindle into a Flame; especially the Duke of Buckingham, and the Lord Chamberlain Hastings, both of great Power and Authority. These two, not having so much Affection for each other, as Hatred to the Queen's Party, agreed in this Point with the Duke of Glocester, That they would intirely remove from the King's Society all his Mother's Friends, under the Name of Enemies to the Publick. This first Step gain'd, the Duke of Glocester, understanding that the Lords then about the King design'd to bring him to be crown'd at London, accompany'd with such a Power of their Friends, that it would be difficult for him to effect his Purpose, without such Numbers as would raise the Appearance of a Rebellion; lion; he therefore secretly and by various Methods caus'd the Queen to be persuaded That if her Son came to London with such a numerous Retinue, it would cause many Mischiefs, and administer Matter of Suspicion and Jealousies to several who were but lately reconcil'd. Upon this the Queen ignorantly in all Haste sent to her Son, and her Brother; earnestly requiring them, for some Causes known to her self, to dismiss their Guard; which was the sooner obey'd, because the Duke of Glocester himself, and other Lords of his Party, wrot to the King so reverently, and the rest so lovingly, that without any great Suspicion the King mov'd forwards with an inconsiderable Train.

This second Work effected, Glocester, Buckingham, and several Lords, resolv'd to meet the King in his Passage; and coming to Northampton, where the King was arriv'd, pretending it was incommodious for so many to lodge in the same Place, they caus'd the King to go to Stony-Stratford, twelve Miles further. But the two Dukes stay'd behind; and under Pretence of Honour kept the Earl Rivers with them, and feasted him with such Demonstrations of Joy, and so unusual, that if Opinion had not blinded him, he might have easily discover'd the Deceit. Upon his going to his Lodgings, the two Dukes caus'd the Keys of the Gates to be brought to them, to secure any from going out; and spending the greatest part of the Night in Counsel and Advice, early in the Morning they sent to all the neighbouring Villages where their Servants were billeted, ordering them to be ready on Horseback, and secure the Way to Stony-Stratford from all Passengers going thither. A strange Diligence, which yet wrought no Impression in such as observ'd it; believing it to be done that none might come to the King before themselves. But Rivers was of another Opinion, and after several Conjectures, he resolv'd to go himself, and discover the Bottom of the Design; but upon his first Appearance, they roughly charg'd him with endeavouring to keep them from the King and ruin them, which he should not be able to effect; and tumultuously interrupting him when he was making a Reply, they committed him to the Custody of some of their own Servants. Then hastning to Stony-Stratford, they found the King just mounting his Horse, to whom they address'd themselves with the utmost Reverence, and he as lovingly receiv'd them, without conceiving their Designs. Then coming up to the Lord Richard Gray, Brother to the Marquess Dorset, and half-Brother to the King, they immediately accus'd him of joining with his Brother the Marquess and his Uncle Rivers to get the Government of the King and Kingdom into their own Hands, and sowing Divisions among the Nobility: In order to which the Marquess had taken out of the Tower of London all the Royal Treasure, and had sent Men to Sea for dangerous Designs. To which the young King calmly made Answer, That for what concern'd the Marquess, he was ignorant, because of his Absence; but for his Uncle Rivers and his Brother Richard, he was sure they could not be guilty, because they had always been in his Company. To this Buckingham reply'd, His Majesty was deceiv'd; that their Designs were conceal'd from him; and that they did not deserve to be excus'd by so good a Prince. And immediately they arrested the Lord Richard, with Sir Thomas Vaughan and Sir Richard Hawte in the King's Presence; and the King instead of going forwards was brought back with his Company to Northampton. Such of his Attendants as Glocester durst not trust were remov'd, and others put in their Place; at which the poor King could not refrain from Tears; having only the Name of a King, and wanting Age and Power to defend himself, as well as his Kindred and Servants. And that Dissimulation might not be wanting, even where there was no Occasion, the Duke of Glocester the next Day sent a Dish of Meat from his own Table to the Earl Rivers, desiring him to be at Ease, for all should be well with him. The Earl handsomly baulking the former Injury, return'd Thanks for the Honour done to him, and desir'd the Messenger that he would carry it to his Nephew Richard, For he being young, and unaccustom'd to Adversity, stood more in need of this Favour. This feign'd Courtesie was like the Lightning that foreruns Thunders; for after many Change of Prisons, they were all brought to Pontfract, and afterwards lost their Heads.

The News of these Transactions was brought to the Queen in the Night, who immediately guess'd at the Duke's Design: She too late repented the Counsel given to her Brother to disband his Forces; and apparently saw her own Danger, but much more that of her second Son the Duke of York, and her Daughters. At the same Hour she fled with her Children from her Palace, and took Sanctuary in Westminster, to the great Compassion of all that saw so much Hurry and Precipitation at that unseasonable Time. The Lord Hastings had receiv'd the like Advice, but with contrary Sentiments: He could but rejoice at the Queen's Sufferings; but loving King Edward and his Children, he after Midnight dispatch'd a Gentleman to the Arch-Bishop of York, Lord-Chancellor of England, who with Difficulty being brought in, acquainted him with what had been done to the young King and his Friends; not concealing the Queen's flying to Sanctuary, but at the same Time assuring him, All would be well. The Arch-Bishop hastily answer'd, Be it as well as it will, it will never be so well as we have seen it; and as soon as the Gentleman departed he arose from his Bed, and causing all his Family to do the same, and to arm themselves, he took the Great Seal, and went with them to the Queen. There he found nothing but Haste and Confusion, People jostling each other, some carrying in Goods, others going out to fetch more; and Sighs and Lamentations every where. The Queen her self was seated by her Children in the most disconsolate Manner upon the Ground; whom the Chancellor comforted with such Reasons as Hope then could suggest, acquainting her with what the Chamberlain Hastings had let him know; conceiving that he who had been oblig'd to the late King would join with his Children and Family. But the Queen loathing to hear that Name, reply'd That he was the Man that endeavour'd the utter Extirpation of her Blood. The Arch-Bishop not able to dissuade her from that Opinion, discoursing from the least Dangers to the greatest, assur'd her That if any other King should be crown'd but her eldest Son, they would crown the Duke of York, who was now in her Possession: Upon which he deliver'd to her the Great Seal of England, for the Use and Benefit of that Son, and so departed about Day-light, not then weighing the Importance of this Delivery, nor how prejudicial it might be to him. But being return'd home, and seeing from his Window the Thames cover'd with Boats fill'd with Glocester's Servants, watching if any went by Water to Sanctuary; and hearing that there were Tumults and Cabals in the City, Lords and others appearing in Arms, he consider'd that he had been too rash in parting with the Great Seal to the Queen, who could reap no Advantage by it; and thereupon privately sent for it again, and after that carry'd it, according to Custom, openly in the Sight of all Men.

The Queen-Mother takes Sanctuary.

The Arch-Bishop of York comforts her.

In the mean Time the Commotions in the City encreas'd; most believing that the Proceedings at Northampton were caus'd to hinder the Coronation, and more Troubles might have follow'd, had not the Lord Hastings at a publick Assembly assur'd them, That Rivers, Gray and the rest were imprison'd for certain Conspiracies against the Dukes of Gloucester and Buckingham, as would appear by due Process of Law. That no Doubt was to be made of the Duke of Gloucester, since he had always continu'd faithful to the King; but to suspect it might prove of dangerous Consequence, and if they did not lay down their Arms with the same Facility they had taken them up. This Assurance quieted the greatest Part of the People, especially when they understood the King was coming, attended by the Duke his Uncle with all manner of Respect; as also that among Rivers's Carriages certain Barrels full of Arms were found; which tho' not much regarded by the wiser Sort, yet Glocester's Adherents insisting much upon it, it rais'd Doubts in some who otherwise would not have been persuaded to it. The King, met by the Lord Mayor of London, the Sheriffs and Aldermen, all in Scarlet, accompany'd with five hundred Citizens on Horseback, cloath'd all in Purple, enter'd the City the fourth Day of May, in the first and last Year of his Reign. The subtle Duke of Glocester shew'd such Appearance of Reverence and Affection to the King his Nephew, that he chang'd their former Suspicions into a high Esteem for him. Inſomuch that when a Protector was to be chosen in Council, as was usual in the Minority of Kings, he without any Contradiction was nominated for the Person; not only as a Relation and a Friend, but as most loyal, affectionate, and fittest for that great Charge. At this Council many were remov'd from their Offices; particularly the Arch-Bishop of York, and not without sharp Reproof for having left the Great Seal with the Queen. He was succeeded by Doctor Ruffel Bishop of Lincoln, a Man wise and experienc'd, and one of the most learned in the Nation. Divers Lords and Knights were appointed to fill up Vacancies; but the Lord Chamberlain and some others still retain'd their Places.

The Duke of Glocester made Protector of the Land.

II. The Duke of Glocester, now Protector, having gain'd so much Advantage, resolv'd to proceed to the utmost; but his main Difficulty was that he could not free himself from one Brother without the other; and if the Elder was destroy'd, the Duke of York the Younger would still succeed. In this he was to use his best Policy; for the Queen being suspicious of him, and the young Duke in a Place not to be violated, he could reach him only by Deceit or Sacrilege. Therefore at the next Meeting of the Lords in Council he represented the Queen as highly culpable in detaining the Duke of York in Sanctuary, when the Honour, the Health and Conveniency of the King his Brother requir'd his Presence and Company with him in his Palace. After some further Allegations and Aggravations, he declar'd, That the Coronation could not be compleated without Scandal, while the Duke of York, who was to be next the King in that Solemnity, continu'd in a Sanctuary, a Shelter only for Criminals and Delinquents; affording Matter to the common People to judge according to their Ignorance, and to Foreign Princes according to the Appearance of false Suppositions; which must redound to the Dishonour and Prejudice of them all. Therefore in his Opinion, some Person should be sent to the Queen, whom she did not mistrust, yet such as would be zealous of the Honour of the King and Council, who might rectifie her, and let her know what Injury she did to all. And if this did not prevail, the Duke of York ought by regal Power to be taken from his Prison, and brought to the King his Brother. He propos'd the Cardinal Arch-Bishop of York for this Design, remitting himself to their Pleasure, if they should not approve of him, from which he profess'd he would not dissent. They all commended his Opinion, and agreed with him, that if the Duke was not remov'd, Inconveniences might ensue. But the Cardinal, with some Ecclesiasticks there present, was of another Opinion, so far as related to taking him by Force, alledging, That the Sanctity of the Place was inviolable upon many Accounts; but he hop'd that Force would be needless, since the Queen in Reason would deliver him up; which she should not do, the Fault was not to be attributed to her, nor him: Not to him, because he would not be failing in his Duty; nor to her, she being excusable in respect of her Maternal Affection, and the Weakness of her Sex. But the Duke of Buckingham not approving these Circumſpections, with an Oath cry'd out, That the Queen will know she had no Cause of Fear; that her Fears were merely fictitious, and of Malice; and if she would be believ'd because her Kindred were hated according to their Deserts, she should distinguish between those who were of Kin to her, and those so to the Royal Blood. That her Kindred had given Cause for Hatred, as she her self had done through her own Malignity; but in her extending it to the Duke of York, the Distribution was too large and odious. That he likewise had the Honour to of Kin to him, nor would he in his Zeal for his Service give way to any Person, no not to his own Mother; who since she desir'd to keep him, not without Danger and Scandal, his Opinion was that he ought to be taken from thence. Then he discours'd largely of the Use and Abuse of Sanctuaries, concluding That the Duke of York was incapable of the Use of them; and it was no Abuse to take any Person from thence when it was with a Design to do him good. All the Council joining with him in this Opinion, it was resolv'd That if the Cardinal could not prevail with his Persuasions, he should be taken by Force, and brought to them. This being concluded, they all remov'd to the Star-Chamber, as the nearest Place, there to expect what would be the Issue.

Ed. The Cardinal went with several Lords, either because the Protector would not trust a Matter of that Weight to a single Man, or because the Appearance of so many might make the Queen perceive it was not he alone that desir'd the Delivery of her Son, and that she might see her Danger if she refus'd. The Cardinal first told her, That he was sent by the Protector and the Privy-Council to let her know how much her detaining of the Duke of York in that Place had given Offence to them and others; as if one Brother liv'd in Danger, and could not be preserv'd but by the other's Life. Therefore they desir'd and expected to have the Duke set at Liberty, and to have him brought to his Brother, where he might live answerable to his Condition and Quality. After further Discourse, finding her altogether averse to any Compliance, he proceeded to Persuasions and Arguments drawn from Nature and Affection, as well as Prudence and Policy, and to inform her, That she neither ought nor could keep him in Sanctuary, and that taking of him by Force would be no Violation of it. To all these she gave distinct and rational Answers, and began freely to declare the Apprehensions she had from the Protector; which became uneasy to the Cardinal who had a better Opinion of him. So that growing warm, in some Passion he told her, He was not come to argue with her, but to demand the Duke; and if she would deliver him up, he would pawn both his Body and Soul for his Safety. If she refus'd, he would leave her to her self, finding her fix'd in a Belief that they all wanted Understanding or Fidelity; the former, in being so dull as not to perceive the Protector's Designs, and the latter, in procuring her Son to be deliver'd into the Hands of one who would destroy him.

The Arch-Bishop of York goes to the Queen.

He persuades her to deliver up her Son.

The poor Queen was now reduc'd to great Perplexities, hastily weighing within her self the divers Hazards she ran whether she deliver'd him or not. By delivering him, she consider'd the Mischiefs that might happen both to him and his Brother: In detaining him, she fear'd that the Protector would immediately come in Person and take him; and she wanted Time to provide against this; many Things were requir'd in sending him elsewhere, none of which were like to succeed. And not having thought of it before, she knew not whether to send him; she had not appointed People to conduct him; she had not Time enough to keep the Secret undiscover'd, and him from being intercepted. Finding the Mischief greater in letting him go by Force, than by Choice, she began to hope her Suspicions might be false: She did not doubt the Cardinal's good Intentions, nor yet theirs who were with him; she was satisfy'd they were not corrupted, but not sure they might not be deceiv'd; therefore her appearing to believe them would oblige them. Wherefore taking the young Duke by the Hand in the Presence of all she spoke thus, My Lord, and all my Lords; I am neither so unthinking as to doubt your Understanding, nor so suspicious as to mistrust your Fidelity; of which I design to make you such a Proof, that if either were wanting in you, would bring me to infinite Sorrow, the Realm to incurable Damage, and you all to indelable Reproach. For I here present to you the Person, whom I doubt not but I could have kept beyond Opposition; tho' at the same Time I am sure there are some such mortal Enemies to my Blood, that if they thought there was any of it in their own Bodies, they would open their Veins to let it out. We have also Experience that the Thirst of Government knows no Kindred; and if Brothers have not been spar'd, much less shall Nephews escape. Each of my dear Children is the other's Defence, while they are asunder, and each of their Lives lye in the other's Body: Notwithstanding this most tender Point, I here resign one into your Hands, and the other in him, that I may at all Times redemand them of you both before God and all the World. Then assuring them of her Confidence in their Abilities and Loyalty, she concluded thus, One Thing I conjure you, by the Trust his Father ever had of you, and by the Trust I now put into your Hands, that as far as you think my Fears too great, you would be as cautious that your own be not too small. After which, turning to the young Duke, with the most ardent Affection she cry'd, Farewel my dear sweet Son, the Lord be thy Protector! let me kiss thee now, lest I never kiss thee more. Then with Kisses, Blessings, and a mingling of Tears, she deliver'd him to the Lords; who immediately brought him to the Star-Chamber, where with longing Expectations, and the kindest Caresses he was receiv'd by his Uncle. He brought him to the King his Brother, who was lodg'd in the Bishop's Palace near St. Paul's; from whence, with great Pomp and Shew of Honour, they were both convey'd to the fatal Tower, from whence they never departed.

The King and Duke convey'd to

III. The Protector having gain'd such a signal Advantage, still wanted the Assistance of some particular Men, especially the Duke of Buckingham, who till now probably did not know the Bottom of his Designs. There were great Inducements for him to join with the Protector; particularly he had so offended the young King in imprisoning his Relations, that in due Time he could expect nothing less than a severe Revenge, whether he liv'd, or they escap'd. The Protector had provided himself of a Guard, and arm'd himself while no Man thought of it; trusting the Management of his Affairs to none but those whose Fortunes totally depended upon him. He set Spies about Buckingham, thinking it impossible he should be equally wicked with himself, not having the like Designs; and was resolv'd, if he found him defective, to be his immediate Ruin. He made use of his most profess'd Friends; and no Wonder if they were Traitors, since the Conformity of evil Inclinations had caus'd the Friendships between them and their Master. Yet had not Buckingham join'd heartily, but upon very advantageous Conditions; for when he oblig'd himself to make the Protector King, the other oblig'd himself to take the Duke's Daughter in Marriage to his only Son, promising with this the Earldom of Hartford, claim'd by him as his Inheritance; which being deny'd him by the late King was the first Cause of his Defection, by that revenging himself upon his Children. Moreover of his free Motion he promis'd him a great Part of the Treasure left by King Edward, together with a large Proportion of the Wardrobe. These Things being fix'd, they erected a new Council, consisting of the greatest Men, to treat of Matters belonging to the Coronation, that they and the People at present might be amus'd with a Belief of the Reality of it; and to that End they commanded the absent Lords to repair to London, and assist at the Solemnity. Besides this they had a private Council consisting of certain select Persons, who treated of the Means how to bring the Protector to the Throne: so that while both the Arch-Bishops, the Bishop of Ely, the Lords Stanley and Hastings, with others, were busying themselves about an unnecessary Ceremony to establish a lawful King, they treated how to establish in his Place an unlawful Tyrant and Usurper. The first Council was compos'd of many of the best Rank. The second of few, and those of the worst Condition; but the Protector's Dealings not being easily penetrated, the People began to murmur, tho' they could not guess at the real Mischief intended. It was impossible from so many Circumstances and vain Delays as were by this Council propos'd to the other, but Jealousies would arise. All which were encreas'd by the Protector's taking from from the Tower all the King's Servants, and placing his own in their Room; so that the King was soon left destitute of all Manner of Company, Magnificence and Regal Splendor; all which were in reality convey'd over to the House and Person of the Protector.

Among those who were admitted into the secret Council there was one Catesby, a Man well skill'd in the Laws of the Land; who being imploy'd by the Lord Chamberlain Hastings in all his Affairs, and by his Favour advanc'd in the Court, had won such Credit with all Men, especially in Leicestershire, where the said Lord was very powerful, as nothing was transacted without him: So that being a Creature of his, and by his Means highly in favour, the Chamberlain thought he would never fail to inform him of any thing of moment done in that Council, especially if it might be prejudicial to him. But Gratitude having forsaken him who had lost all Loyalty, he was the Original of many ensuing Evils. For the Lord Stanley justly doubting this Cabinet Council, had endeavour'd to cross it, by the Favour and Assistance of many who likewise fear'd it, had not the Lord Chamberlain prevented him, relying wholly upon Catesby's Fidelity. The Protector naturally lov'd the Chamberlain, he having always been his Friend, and one from whom he had receiv'd Kindnesses, in the King his Brother's Time; nor had he resolv'd upon his Ruin, had he not fear'd to have met with Opposition, if he should discover his Secrets to him. He therefore imploy'd Catesby to use his utmost Endeavours to bring him intirely to his Side. But Catesby either perform'd it not at all, or if he did, he gave the Protector such a sinister Account, that changing his Love into Hatred, he resolv'd to have his Life; yet treating him with his usual Confidence, he by that gain'd two Advantages. He caus'd him to be slower in executing such Resolutions as he might have done against him; and he the more dextrously brought about his own Designs to the other's Ruin, while he least thought of it. Infomuch that when the Chamberlain acquainted Catesby with the Jealousies this secret Council had rais'd in many, thinking to gain from him some Assurance, he not only gave him no Satisfaction, but perswaded the Protector to dispatch him as soon as he could, as if his Life was fatal to his Designs. An Advice politickly taken by the Protector, tho' not given out of Zeal to his Service, as it seem'd to be; but that by his Death Catesby might enter into the plenary Authority, which the Chamberlain solely had in his Country.

A Design against the Lord Hastings.

The Protector having fix'd his Resolution, upon the thirteenth Day of June, three Hours before Noon, he came into the Tower to the Lords in Council, who were settling the approaching Coronation. At his first Entrance he civilly saluted all the Lords present, excusing himself for coming so late; and diverting his Discourse he desir'd the Bishop of Ely to send for a Dish of Strawberries from his Garden at Holborn, saying he had never eaten better. The Bishop taking it for a Favour, immediately sent for them; while he soon after rising up, desir'd the Lords to dispence with his Absence for a short Space. Within less than an Hour he return'd with such a severe and fierce Countenance as made them all amaz'd; and being sat down, with angry Eyes, and frowning Looks, and biting his Lips, he for a while kept Silence. At last he demanded of them, What Punishment they deserv'd who had plotted his Destruction, who was next in Blood to the King, and by Office his and the Kingdom's Protector? This Question startled the Council, not knowing for whom it was intended, tho' each was satisfy'd with his own Innocence. The Chamberlain finding all silent, very readily made Answer, That they ought without Exception to be punish'd as Traitors. To which the rest assenting, the Protector said, It was his Brother's Wife, and others with her; at which those who favour'd the Queen were much concern'd. But the Chamberlain, who fear'd it was some of his own Friends, was overjoy'd when he heard the Queen nam'd; tho' he was ill pleas'd, that he was not before made privy to this Matter, as he had been to the taking off her Relations, who were by his own Consent before appointed pointed to be beheaded at Pontfract this very Day; little imagining that his own Execution should be the same Day at London. The Protector continuing his Complaints, stripp'd his Arm bare, and shew'd it to be dry'd and wither'd, very unlike the other, declaring That the Queen and Shore's Wife, her Counsellor and Coadjutor in this Wickedness, had by their Sorceries and Withcraft thus wasted his Flesh. The Lords, who knew this Arm had never been otherwise, immediately conceiv'd he had now some impious Design; especially since it was so improbable that the Queen should associate with Shore's Wife, whom she most hated, as the Concubine most doated on by her Husband. The Chamberlain had unfortunately and foolishly given the Protector this Advantage by taking this Woman, whom he had long lov'd, and keeping her for his own Mistress; therefore with some Extenuation he answer'd, If they have been thus guilty, they deserve heinous Punishment. At which the Protector cry'd What, dost thou answer me with Ifs and Ands? I tell thee they are thus guilty, and that I'll make good on thy Body, Traitor. Then giving a great Blow upon the Table, as an appointed Signal, a Cry of Treason was heard from without, the Door was forc'd open, and the Chamber immediately fill'd with armed Men; and one of them striking at the Lord Stanley, had undoubtedly cleft his Head, had he not hastily shrunk beneath the Table, yet not so suddenly but he receiv'd a terrible Wound. Immediately the Protector arrested the Chamberlain by the Name of Traitor; and being by him in all Humbleness demanded whether he spoke to him or no; he reply'd, Yes, to thee, Traitor. And securing all the rest in other Rooms, the Protector swore by St. Paul, That he would not dine before he saw his Head taken off. It avail'd nothing to ask Questions and beg for Mercy, but heavily taking the next Priest that was ready, he made a short Confession, since a longer would not be permitted; and being led to the Green before the Tower Chappel, he had his Head struck off upon a Log of Timber; being afterwards bury'd at Windsor, near King Edward's Tomb.

and then cuts
off his Head.

Besides a remarkable Dream of the Lord Stanley, which occasion'd his Advising him to fly from Danger, and other ominous Presages of this sudden Execution, we may well take notice of a particular Passage that happen'd the Morning before he went to Council. Being come to the Tower, he met a Pursivant near the Place where he was beheaded; and recollecting that he had met him in that very Place, when by Procurement of the Earl of Rivers he formerly was made Prisoner for a short Space, and much doubted his Life; he ask'd him Whether he remember'd that he had met him in that Place, at a Time when he was in great Danger? The Pursivant reply'd, Yes, my Lord, I well remember it; but, Thanks to Heav'n, the Authors got no Advantage, nor you no Damage. The Chamberlain knowing that Rivers and the rest were that Day to lose their Heads, with a chearful Air answer'd, You would say more, if you knew as much as I do: I never was so afraid as then; but Times are happily chang'd, and my Enemies are now as much in Danger as I was before, as you will soon know; so that I never was more joyful and secure than at present. Now this Lord having formerly imbru'd his Hands in the innocent Blood of King Henry's Son Prince Edward, and lately by his Advice join'd to the taking off the Heads of Rivers and others without any Process upon this very Day, the Vengeance of Heav'n became more conspicuous and signal in his own extraordinary Execution. So that the great Raleigh upon this Occasion declares, 'That a greater Judgment of God, than this upon Hastings, he had never observ'd in any Story. And we may truly observe, that scarcely any State Homicide ever escapes a natural and proper temporal Punishment, either in his Person or Family.

A remarkable Instance of God's Vengeance.

To colour over this open Violence, the Protector immediately after Dinner sent for many of the principal Citizens to the Tower; at whose coming himself and Buckingham stood harness'd in old rusty Armour, which was to show the greatness of their Surprise and Danger, as having no Time to procure better. And after having insisted upon the Mercy of Heav'n in their Escape from the Treason of Hastings and others, a Herald of Arms was dispatch'd into the City with a formal Proclamation in the King's Name, implying, ' That the Lord Hastings and some others had conspir'd the same Day to have slain the Lord Protector and the Duke of Buckingham as they sat in Council; and after that to have assum'd the Government of the King and Kingdom at their own Pleasures; insisting likewise upon many Crimes of the Lord Hastings, as well as those of Shore's Wife. This Proclamation, which was publish'd within two Hours after the Lord Chamberlain's Execution, was so curiously indited, so long, and so fairly ingross'd on Parchment, that the weakest Person alive might perceive it was prepar'd before: Which occasion'd various Discourses, some venturing to say It was writ by the Spirit of Prophecy. The Protector having accus'd Shore's Wife, as an Accessary and Adviser, sent the Sheriffs of London to her House, and caus'd her to be plunder'd of all her Estate, which was above three thousand Marks, not out of Avarice, but Malice and Design; and then being imprison'd, she was charg'd with many treasonable, as well as improbable Practices, tho' she was convicted of none but Incontinency, which she did not deny. For this last Crime, the Protector deliver'd her over to the Bishop of London, to do Penance after the most publick Manner; which she did the following Sunday, being led in solemn Procession, with a Wax Taper in her Hand, and the Cross born before her: In which Action, tho' she was destitute of all manner of Ornament, yet she appear'd so lovely and decent, that, her Blushes adding to her Beauty, all the Spectators did not only blame the Severity, but were charm'd with her comely Aspect, which was the Cause of their Compassion, as well as her own Ignominy. This remarkable Woman was well born, and civilly educated; but her Ruin was her being unequally marry'd as to Years, which made it easie for King Edward to win her, and to break through all the Obligations of Duty. Besides her extraordinary Beauty, Wit, Eloquence and good Humour, she had some Qualifications not usual to Persons of her Life and Conversation; as particularly she seem'd to be born to do Good, and no Harm to any one: She restor'd many who had unjustly fallen from the King's Favour, and caus'd many confiscated Estates to be return'd without any Degree of Avarice. She was more desirous to oblige others, than to enrich her self; desiring rather to do good Turns than to receive them; always affable, never insolent; and all her Ambition was to be esteem'd. Yet now being reduc'd to Poverty, and afterwards to old Age, her Beauty quite lost, and her numerous good Turns as much forgotten, she was forc'd to beg of those, who if they had not formerly begg'd of her, might have been greater Beggars than her self.

Her Character.

The Protector had given Orders, that on the same Day in which the Lord Chamberlain was beheaded at London, the Earl Rivers and Lord Gray, the one Brother the other Son to the Queen, should lose their Heads at Pontfract; and the two Knights, seiz'd with them at Northampton, bore them Company in the Punishment. The Execution was committed to the Care of Sir Richard Ratcliff, a Favourite of the Protector's, and privy to all his Designs; who being of a fierce and merciless Temper, was judg'd most proper to manage such an odious Affair. He caus'd them to be brought out of Prison, and being expos'd to publick View as Traitors, they were beheaded without any manner of Process or Justice. He would not suffer them to speak, lest their Innocence being made known, and commiserated, might make the Author of this Tyranny more detestable. Thus these unfortunate Men suffer'd without being guilty of any Crime in this Reign; but so far as they might contribute to the Injustice and Bloodshed committed against the last King Henry, and his Family, it was more the Hand of Heav'n than the Punishment of Men.

IV. The Protector had now remov'd all Obstacles, and hop'd shortly to compleat his Design; but as the Success of Things cannot be represented upon a Theatre without the Concourse of several Personages requisite to the Composure of the Plot, so it was necessary for him to make use of many others to the forming of this Treason. Among the rest Sir Edmund Shaw Lord Mayor of London, his Brother John Shaw, and Pinker, Provincial of the Augustine Friars, were some. The first was to draw the City to the Protector's Will, and to suppress Tumults; the other two were Doctors of Divinity, and by the People esteem'd famous Preachers, and were chosen to give Authority and Fervor, as is usual in such like Actions. The Knot of this Business lay in finding out specious Pretexts to exclude the Heirs of Edward the Fourth; for which purpose they were to insist upon two in a special Manner. The first was, That King Edward and the Duke of Clarence were both the Issue of Adultery; that they were not Sons to the Duke of York, whose only legitimate Heir the Protector was. The second was, That Edward's Children were not only spurious upon that Account, but as born in an illegitimate Marriage, he being first engag'd to the Lady Lucy before he marry'd their Mother: For both which Reasons the Protector must be the only true Heir to the Crown. Those Preachers were to make these two Points the Subject of their Sermons; but because the first was horribly scandalous, and highly reflecting upon the whole House of York, and the Protector's Mother in particular; they resolv'd not to treat of it in downright Terms, but by oblique Insinuation: But in the second Point they were to be open and barefac'd without Reserve. Pinker was appointed to preach at the Spittal, and Shaw at Paul's-Cross; but the former lost his Voice, so that he was forc'd to leave off in the Midst of his Discourse. Shaw took for his Subject this Sentence out of the Wisdom of Solomon, Bastard Plants shall take no deep Root; and after many Proofs of his Position, and an odious Discourse against the Legitimacy of King Edward's Family, he proceeded to make a long Panegyrick upon the Protector, declaring him to be the only Image of his Father, for Valour and all other good Qualifications. It was also further design'd, that when he enter'd into this Encomium, the Protector should appear, that the People might think the Preacher inspired by the Holy Ghost, and be ready to cry King Richard! But the Protector coming somewhat too late, Shaw in a disorderly manner resum'd his Subject, and carry'd it on after such a fulsome way before his Face, that the People were amaz'd at his nauseous Flattery, and stood like Statues. So that both the Protector and Preacher being utterly out of Countenance, the one return'd confus'd to his Palace, and the other to his House, where understanding by his Friends how much he was condemn'd, he a few Days after dy'd out of Grief and Shame.

The Protector, resolving not to be discourag'd at this Failure, upon Tuesday following he sent the Duke of Buckingham, accompany'd with many Lords and Gentlemen, to the Mayor and Aldermen of London, with whom were likewise the Common Council of the City, commanded purposely to attend at Guild-Hall. Here the Duke, who wanted neither Parts nor Assurance, made a long, plausible and artificial Speech to the whole Assembly, highly aggravating all the Mismanagements, Cruelties and Calamities of the last Reign, in order to bring an Odium upon King Edward's Posterity; insisting upon Shaw's Sermon, as a clear Proof of the Illegitimacy of his Children; and that the Protector was the only undoubted Heir to the Crown; in which the Lords of the Kingdom were so well satisfy'd, that they agreed to accept of him for their King; and now himself was come to acquaint them with it, and to require their Consents. Having ended his study'd Oration, and expecting the Applauses of the People that they should cry King Richard! he was amaz'd to find the contrary; and drawing near to the Lord Mayor, who was to have prepar'd them for it, it, he as'd the Reason of their Reserv'dness and Silence. Who not knowing what to say, answer'd, That he thought he was not well understood. Upon which the Duke in a louder Tone, and plainer Words, repeated all that he had said before; but still to no better Effect. Then the Duke whispering with the Mayor, it was judg'd that the Citizens being us'd to have such Motions made to them by their Recorder, they would better hear it from him; and thereupon the Recorder was commanded to move the same Matter to them. But the Recorder, being lately come into the Place, and misliking the Task, unwillingly repeated the Substance of the Duke's Speech, but carefully avoided any Addition of his own, that they might not believe his Vote went with it. The People stood still more unmov'd than ever; at which the Duke told the Mayor, That he never met with such an obstinate Silence. Then standing up a third Time he said, He was come thither to persuade them to concur in an Affair, where their Assistance perhaps would not be necessary; for the Nobility and Commons of the other Provinces would do it without them: But bearing a particular Affection to that noble City, he desir'd that they might have the first Share of the Honour: Therefore he desir'd them to declare, whether in Conformity with the rest of the Kingdom, they would nominate the present Protector for their King. At which Words the People began to whisper among themselves secretly; but their Voice was neither distinct nor loud, till at last in the lower End of the Hall, some Servants belonging to the Protector and the Duke, with some Prentices gotten into the Croud, began to cry aloud King Richard, King Richard! and threw up their Hats for Joy; tho' the Citizens turning about kept their former Silence. The Duke wisely making use of this Disorder, declar'd He was transported to find such Unanimity in their Voices for making that noble Prince their King; with which he would acquaint him, so as to make it turn to their Advantage, desiring them to be ready the next Morning to go with him to the Protector, in order to persuade him to comply with a Matter, so much desir'd by them and the whole Kingdom. Upon this the Assembly was dissolv'd, and most departed with a melancholy Countenance, and a more melancholy Heart.

His Success.

The next Morning the Lord Mayor assembled the Aldermen and Common-Council-Men of the City, and repair'd with them to Baynard's Castle in Thames-street, where the Protector then lodg'd; and there according to Appointment the Duke of Buckingham came accompany'd with a great Number of Lords, Knights and Gentlemen; who sent a Message to the Protector, That an Assembly of honourable Persons were come to wait upon his Grace in a Matter of great Importance. The Protector seem'd amaz'd, and unwilling to appear before such Numbers, unless he first knew the Design of their coming; which feign'd Ignorance Buckingham soon turn'd to the Advantage of the Protector's Honour and Integrity. He sent a second Message, That the Business was not to be imparted to any but himself, and in such a humble and submissive way, as might have wrought Belief in any one who had really doubted. At length the Protector appear'd, in a Gallery above, with a Bishop on each Side of him, as if he was still apprehensive of the worst. The Duke of Buckingham, making a low Reverence, begg'd two Things of his Grace, The one, that he would permit him to make a humble Supplication to him; the other, that he would pardon him, in case it should prove unacceptable to him: For tho' he aim'd at nothing but his Honour, and the Good of the Kingdom, yet he fear'd his Motives might take it contrary to their Intentions. The Protector answer'd, He was so assur'd of their Integrity, that he hop'd they would propose nothing that would displease him, and so granted the Leave and Pardon they demanded. Buckingham, after a long Digression of the Kingdom's Grievances, said, That He was not he were expressly came to Petition him, that considering the illegitimate Birth of the of King Edward's Children, he would in Commiseration of the Necessities of the Kingdom, purchase, together with the Government of the Kingdom, to the Kingdom, accept of the Crown, to the Honour of God and Safety of the Realm; resting assur'd that never any People would think themselves more happy than under his plenary Protection. The Protector, as if offended at his Request, with an angry Look answer'd, That tho' there was much Truth in what he said, yet his Love to his Brother Edward, his Affection to his Children, and the Regard to his own Honour, would not permit him to accept of such a Burthen: For it was to be fear'd, that should he depose his Nephews and make himself King, the Ignorant and Malignant would accuse him to all the Princes of the World, as if it did not proceed from his own just Right, the Importunity of the People, and the Necessities of the Nation, but purely from his own Ambition. Yet notwithstanding, he did not only pardon them, but return them Thanks, since he conceiv'd it proceeded from their Love and Affection; which he desir'd might be turn'd to their King, whom he with his Person and best Advice would serve; hoping so to settle the Affairs of the Kingdom, that they should have nothing to desire; as he had already given some Proof, notwithstanding the Malice of some, which had been rather suppress'd by Divine Providence than by Human Wisdom.

He complies.

This Answer being given, the Duke of Buckingham stepp'd aside, as if he consulted with the Noblemen, the Lord Mayor and the rest; which being done, he again desir'd Pardon; and having obtain'd it, he with a more exalted Voice declar'd, That the Kingdom was absolutely resolv'd not to permit Edward's Children to reign; not so much because they had proceeded beyond all Hopes of Pardon, as because the publick Good requir'd it: That therefore he beseech'd him to accept of the Crown, which if he deny'd, they should be compell'd to offer it to one who would not refuse it. The Protector, affrighted, as it were, at these Threats, express'd much Concern, That they should have so hard an Opinion of his Brother's Issue: He own'd he could not govern or reign without their Affections: Therefore since it was their Resolution, and there was none to whom the Crown did of Right belong besides himself; and that to his natural and legal Titles, they had added that of Election, the most valuable of all others; he yielded to their Intreaties and Requests, by taking upon him from that Time forwards the State and Regal Preheminence of the two Kingdoms of England and France; the former to be govern'd and defended by him and his Heirs, and the latter by God's Assistance and their Valour to be subdu'd, and for ever establish'd in due Obedience to the Realm of England, of whose Grandeur and Honour he was so ambitious, that he desir'd God to continue him no longer upon Earth than his Life might be serviceable to that End. At this they all cry'd out King Richard, King Richard! and the Lords went up to him to kiss his Hand, while the People departing, talk'd diversely of the Matter, every one as his Fancy guided him. They were displeas'd at nothing more than the counterfeit Management of the Business, which tho' it had been plotted and resolv'd before, there had been us'd so many Stage-like Actions, as if it had never been conceiv'd 'till then; and as if choice had been made of the Spectators as of the most senseless and stupid People of the Land. Here all Historians conclude the imaginary Reign of King Edward the Fifth, which ended upon the eighteenth Day of June 1483, after it had continu'd only two Months and twelve Days, he being at that Time twelve Years and about seven Months old.

*The End of

S E C T III.

The Reign of King RICHARD the Third.

Containing 2 Years, 2 Months, and 4 Days.

I. Richard Duke of Glocester was the eighth and youngest Son of Richard Duke of York and Cecily Nevil his Wife, and was now less than thirty Years of Age when the Crown was thus tumultuously conferr'd upon him, which in a short Time was more legally offer'd him in Parliament, with all the Marks of the vilest Flattery. Being proclaim'd King upon the twenty second Day of June, believing to establish his Tyranny by resting it upon unaccustom'd Circumstances, he went into Westminster-Hall, sat down in the King's Bench, where in doubtful Cases the Kings of England anciently us'd to sit, and where he avow'd his Acceptance of the Crown; which he express'd in a formal Oration, and so well compos'd, that those who had not known him, would have believ'd England had never been blest'd with so good a King. And to begin himself with a pretended Clemency, he pronounc'd Pardon of all Offences committed against him; for Confirmation of which he sent for one Fogge who had taken Sanctuary, and whom he mortally hated, and in the Sight of all the People took him by the Hand, and assur'd him of his future Love and Affection. By which Act he made a great Impression upon the common Sort, but those who were better advis'd took it for Artifice and Dissimulation. In his Return to the Palace, he courteously saluted such as he knew had no Affection for him, thinking by this servile Flattery to insinuate into their Minds, and to establish his Government. Yet still he durst not rely upon his present Fortune, but secur'd his Coronation with an unusual Appearance of Forces, causing five thousand Men to come from the North, where he was most favour'd, to assist at the Solemnity. These Northern Men appear'd so ill cloath'd and accouter'd, that they became the Subject of Mens Derision; and it was believ'd that if he should have Occasion to use them, they would not have serv'd his Purpose; and that it was neither those nor greater Forces, but a meer Fatality had precipitated the Nation into such a miserable Subjection.

Reg. 1.

Richard proclaim'd King.

He strengthens himself.

He makes new Titles.

Nothing now was wanting to his full Possession of the Crown, but the Ceremony of his Coronation, for which all Things were ready, as having been before prepar'd for that of his Nephew. Two Days before he went with his Wife and young Son to the Tower; where he created the Lord Thomas Howard Duke of Norfolk, and Thomas Howard his Son Earl of Surry; he made William Barkley Earl of Nottingham, and the Lord Francis Lovell Vicount and Lord Chamberlain, and likewise made seventeen Knights of the Bath. The Arch-Bishop of York, the Lord Stanley, and the Bishop of Ely had been Prisoners in the Tower ever since the Lord Hastings lost his Head: He set the first at Liberty, finding himself peaceably possid'd of the Kingdom, which otherwise he would not have done; for being an honest Man he would never have consented to the deposing of the true King: He freed the second out of Fear; for his Son the Lord Strange was raising great Forces in Lancashire, so that it was necessary to appease him. But he did not set the Bishop of Ely at Liberty, who was a faithful Servant to King Edward the Fourth; for he was sure he would never comply with his Childrens Deprivation, nor his unjust Usurpations; of which he had made trial in the Councils held in the Tower, while by oblique means he was carrying on that Design. This celebrated Bishop, Morton by Name, was of no great Birth; but having liv'd long in high Repute in Oxford, he was taken from thence, only a Doctor, and made a Privy-Counsellor by Henry the Sixth: Edward knowing his Integrity, kept him still in that Condition, and chose him at his Death to be one of his Executors.

tors. Richard therefore fearing him, would have kept him still in Prison, had not the University of Oxford interceded for his Enlargement; so being desirous to oblige that Body, he was content to remove him from the Tower, as being too publick a Prison: But that he might not give him his full Liberty, he committed him to the Custody of the Duke of Buckingham, who sent him to a Castle of his in Brecknockshire in Wales, where they jointly laid the first Ground-Work of Richard's Fall.

His Coronation.

The following Day, with mighty Pomp and splendid Attendance of Noblemen, Richard rode through the City of London, having three Dukes, nine Earls, two Vicounts, twenty Barons, and seventy eight Knights, all most richly adorn'd. Among whom the proud Duke of Buckingham far exceeded the rest in Appearance, having the Caparisons of his Horse so charg'd with embroider'd Works of Gold, that it was born up by Footmen after an extraordinary manner. In the following Day, which was the Sixth of July, Richard with Anne his Wife was crowned at Westminster with more than usual Solemnity, as may be seen in Hall, Grafton, and others. His Wife was Daughter to the great Earl of Warwick, who had made and unmade two preceding Kings, and Widow to Prince Edward, Son to Henry the Sixth; to whom she was marry'd, when Edward the Fourth's Ruin was determin'd in France. So being destin'd to be a Queen, it was her ill Fortune to be marry'd to one who had been the Author both of her Husband's and Father's Death. The Solemnity being ended, King Richard dismiss'd all the Lords that they might return to their own Houses; recommending to such as were in Office, the due Administration of Justice without Extortion or Injury, the Execution of the Laws, and Liberty of the Subject; as being desirous to have nothing ill done but by himself. He dismiss'd not the Lord Stanley, 'till such Time as the Lord Strange his Son had disbanded the Forces he had rais'd. He also dismiss'd the five thousand he had caus'd to come from the North both with Promises and Rewards; upon which they departed so well pleas'd, that becoming thereupon insolent and tumultuous, they forc'd him to go in Person into those Parts, to appease the Disturbances they had rais'd, which could not be effected without the Death of many of them. About this Time he sent to Lewis the Eleventh, King of France, concerning the Continuance of the League made with his Brother Edward, demanding the Tribute then setled; but his Ambassador arriving after the Death of his two Nephews, Lewis would not afford him Audience, judging his Friendship unworthy of any Human Correspondence.

He sends Ambassadors to France.

He contrives the Murder of his two Nephews.

In what concern'd their Deaths, he demean'd himself with great Caution. He first withdrew himself to Glocester, the Place of his former Patrimony and Title; his Conscience not permitting him to stay in the Place where his Cruelty was to surpass that of all other Tyrants. He might have kept them Prisoners without any Danger, since they had no material Supporters; but he not accounting himself a King, while they were alive, sent his trusty Servant John Green with Letters to Sir Robert Brakenbury, Constable of the Tower, commanding him to put them to Death; who, abhorring the Act, return'd Answer, He would rather die than obey that Command. Richard at this being highly dissatisfy'd, and still restless, his Page who usually lay in his Chamber, desir'd his Majesty That he would be pleas'd to acquaint him with the Reason of his Disquiet. To whom he reply'd, He was miserable, in not having a Man he could trust; that his Service was ungratefully deny'd by those, who for what they had receiv'd ought to think themselves happy when blis'd with an Opportunity of serving him. The Page immediately judg'd the Cause to be of a desperate Nature, since any one durst decline it; and calling a Gentleman to mind who lay in the Ante-Chamber, he nam'd him to the King, assuring him There was nothing so dangerous or difficult, which he would not undertake. His Name was James Tirrel, a Man who might have deserv'd a good Character, had he not been corrupted by dishonest Ambition: He had lost no Vethods untry'd to gain Preferment in Court; but was discontented by being held back by Richard Ratcliffe and William Catesby, who govern'd the King, and fear'd a third Person, who if he surpass'd them in Audacity, might surpass them in Fortune, and throw them from the Favour they possess'd. This Page was a Friend of his, and knowing his Discontents, thinking to do him a good Office, he propos'd him to King Richard; who being then warm with the Imagination, rose out of his Bed to make Trial of him, awoke him, and acquainted him with what he desir'd, urging him to a Compliance. This ambitious Man immediately undertook the execrable Design; and was next Day dispatcht with Letters to Brakenbury, in which he was commanded to deliver up the Keys of the Tower for one Night to this Tirrel, that he might exactly perform his Orders: All which was punctually obey'd by the Constable.

James Tirrel employ'd in it.

The two innocent Youths had been more strictly kept after their Uncle had quitted the Title of Protector, and assum'd that of King: They were not only debarr'd Visits, but had their Servants taken from them, and others unknown to them appointed to attend them, rather in the Place of Guardians than Servants. Edward the Eldest was fully sensible he was no longer King, and that his Uncle was crown'd; and when the News was brought to him, he shew'd no Regard to the Loss of his Crown, but with a tender Sigh said, I wish my Uncle would let me enjoy my Life, tho' I lose all besides. After this Time he never put off his Cloaths, or ever went out of his Chamber; but being with his Brother full of melancholy Apprehensions, he kept his Room 'till the Arrival of this miserable Night. Of the four that attended him, Tirrel chose Miles Forest, a Man from his Youth brought up in Blood, to whom he join'd for his Companion John Dighton, the Groom of his Stable, a strong Man and fit for his Design. He caus'd them to go at Midnight into the Chamber where they slept; and there wrapping them up in their Bed-Cloaths, they stopp'd their Mouths with the Bolster and Pillows, and so stifled them. The Business was soon dispatch'd; and Tirrel immediately bury'd them under a Heap of Stones near the Stairs Bottom: Which being done he took Horse, and acquainted King Richard with what had pass'd, which so pleas'd him, that 'tis said he gave him the Honour of Knighthood. But being inform'd in what obscure Place the Bodies lay, he gave Command for their better Interment; whereupon a Priest belonging to Sir Robert Brakenbury removing them, and dying shortly after, it could never be known whither they were carry'd. 'Till in King Charles the Second's Reign, Ann. 1674, some Persons, who were employ'd in Rebuilding several Offices in the Tower, and to clear the white Tower from all contiguous Edifices, as they dug down the Stairs leading from the King's Lodgings to the Chappel in the same Tower, discover'd a wooden Chest ten Foot in the Ground, in which they found the Bones of two Striplings, and from the Proportion judg'd to have been in their Ages they were concluded to be the Relicks of those Royal Brothers, whereof one was about thirteen and the other eleven Years of Age. The Circumstances from Story being fully consider'd, upon good Presumption that these were the Bones of the said Princes, King Charles commanded them to be put into a Marble Urn, and deposited among the Relicks of the Royal Family in Westminster Abby.

Their Bones discover'd in the Reign of King Charles the Second.

Both the Contrivers and Actors in this horrible Villany met with Rewards suitable to their Deserts in no long Time after. King Richard himself, besides his last Misfortunes, was both outwardly and inwardly tormented with Fears and Agonies; and according to the Relation of some most intimate with him, he after this execrable Fact enjoy'd not one Hour of Quiet: His Countenance was changed, his Eyes distracted and ghastly; he wore Coats of Mail underneath his Cloaths, and had almost always his Hand upon his Dagger ready to strike, as if others were striking at him. He spent whole Nights without Sleep; and if by chance he got a little Rest, he waken'd with fearful Dreams, which forc'd him to quit his Bed, and so walk'd up and down his Room full of prodigious fears. Sir James Tirrel suffer'd on Tower-Hill for Treason, in the Reign of Henry.

The Duke of Buckingham discontented.

His Designs against King Richard.

II. King Richard had now a more unquestionable Title to the Crown than ever, but still further to secure it, he first caus'd himself to be crown'd a second Time in the City of York with extraordinary Magnificence, and invested his Son Edward in the Principality of Wales. Then, having made many good Ordinances worthy of a better Man, he procur'd a Parliament who declar'd and adjudg'd the Marriage between his Brother and the Lady Gray to be unlawful, by reason of a prior Contract, and their Children to be illegitimate and incapable of the Crown. But before these Projects were compleated, besides his continual Anxiety, he soon found himself disappointed, first by the untimely Death of his Son, and then by the Revolt of his principal Supporter the Duke of Buckingham. The Cause of this last is not fully known; but it is suppos'd to arise from the Claim Buckingham had to the Duke of Hertford's Lands; and he having done such Services to King Richard, he concluded that he could deny him nothing. But these Lands having fallen from the House of Lancaster, and being now annexed to the Crown, the King fear'd that if the Duke were possess'd of them, his Thoughts might soon exceed the Condition of a Subject. Inasmuch that when Buckingham demanded them, he receiv'd such a threatening and scornful Reply, that he could not bear it, but feign'd himself sick that he might not attend at the Coronation; so that Richard sent him Word That if he would not come he would force him to be brought thither. At which he appear'd in that magnificent Manner before recited; but with such Dissatisfaction, that he was not able to behold the Crown upon Richard's Head. However it was, Pride and Discontent soon widen'd the Breach; and having retir'd himself to his Castle at Brecknock in Wales, he there compleated his Resolutions by the Council and Encouragement of his Prisoner Doctor Morton Bishop of Ely.

Here Sir Thomas Moore gives us the Particulars of a long and secret Debate between the Duke and this politick Prelate, which probably he learnt from the Bishop's own Mouth. In which Conference, the Bishop, after many Helutations and Soundings of the Duke's Intentions, freely inveigh'd against the numerous Crimes and Enormities of the present King Richard, and lastly urg'd the Duke, as being of the House of Lancaster, to take upon him the Title of King, and assume the Crown of England, to the Security of the Nation. On the other Side the Duke made a plausible Apology for all the Assistance he had given to the present Usurper, declaring that he had once an Intention to assume the Crown; but upon Reconsideration, he found the Earl of Richmond to be the nearest Heir of the House of Lancaster, and the properest Person; who if he marry'd the Lady Elizabeth, eldest Daughter to King Edward the Fourth, and the nearest Heir of the House of York, he might both destroy King Richard, and put a full Period to all the Troubles and Calamities of the Nation. This Conclusion was highly pleasing to the Bishop of Ely, who consulting with the Duke where first to begin, it was resolv'd immediately to treat with the Countess of Richmond, it being necessary first to know from her the Intentions of the Earl her Son, who was then in Bretaign. In order to this, the Bishop offer'd to bring one Reynold Gray, a domestick Servant to the Countess, a wise and discreet Man, and well vers'd in the Negotiation of great Affairs; and accordingly he wrot to him to come to Brecknock about a Business nearly concerning his Mistress. Being arriv'd, the Instructions he receiv'd were these, 'That considering the Kingdom could not be reduc'd to Quiet, but by advancing the Earl of Richmond to the Crown, and uniting the two Houses of Lancaster and York by Marriage; that the Countess of Richmond should treat of that Matter with Queen Elizabeth, and having obtain'd her eldest Daughter, she should send into Bretaign to her Son; who if he promis'd to marry her whenever he was crown'd, they engag'd by joining the Forces of the Factions to make him King. Bray being dispatch'd away with this Embassie, the Bishop likewise took Leave of the Duke, who was extreemly unwilling to part with such a wise Counsellor. However he resolv'd to depart; and while the Duke fed him with Hopes, under Pretence of raising Men for his Journey, he stole away disguis'd, and getting fortunately to Ely, he provided himself with Mony, and pass'd over into Flanders, where he became more serviceable in this Matter than he could have been in England. Yet his Departure prov'd fatal to the Duke, for wanting his Advice, and meeting with unexpected Accidents, it caus'd his final Ruin.

The Duke of Buckingham and Bishop of Ely mutually engage to advance the Earl of Richmond.

In the mean Time Bray acquainted his Lady with the whole Affair, who immediately approv'd of it; but the Queen being still in Sanctuary, the Countess thought it not proper to go in Person, therefore she sent her Physician Lewis, a learned Welshman, who had a specious Pretence of visiting a Person not well in Health. Having gain'd Access, and being well known to her, he handsomely open'd the Cause, as a Matter not digested and concluded, but as an Opinion of his own, not hard to be effected if she would approve of it. The Queen well understood him, and was rightly sensible that if the Earl of Richmond was marry'd to her eldest Daughter, it might naturally produce the greatest of all human Felicities to her Family; therefore she promis'd if that could be effected, to assist by any Methods towards the Destruction of the Usurper. The Physician having inform'd his Mistress of the Queen's Intentions, she immediately proceeded with all Vigour; and Bray secretly treated with such as he knew faithful and fit for a Matter of such Importance; while the Queen negotiated with all those who hated King Richard, and wish'd for nothing more than an Opportunity of serving her. Those employ'd for the Countess, besides Bray and the Physician, were Sir Giles Aubery, Sir John Cherny, Sir Richard Guilford, Thomas Ramney, and Hugh Conway. This last being sent by the Countess to her Son with a considerable Sum of Mony, he took his Way by Plymouth through Cornwall; while Thomas Ramney was sent through Kent, that if one should unfortunately miscarry, the other might effect the Work; but both were so successful, that they did not differ many Hours in their Meeting at Bretaign. Their Embassie to the Earl was, 'That he was sent for as King, nominated by the great Men, and desir'd by all; That the Marriage was agreed by the Queen and the Duke of Buckingham; That he should come with all Expedition and land in Wales, where he should find Friends and Assistance sufficient for his Purpose. The Earl, form'd by Nature for a Throne, communicated the Affair to the Duke of Bretaign, who notwithstanding King Richard's Threats and Promises, had given him his Liberty, and now generously consented to befriend him in this nice Conjuncture. So that confident of good Success, the Earl sent Conway and Ramney back to his Mother, with Answer That he accepted of the Invitation, and that as soon as he could provide Necessaries he would come for England; in the mean Time Order might be taken for the Affairs there, that he might find the less Impediments at his Arrival. Upon this Message, his Adherents took Courage, and began their Preparations; they sent into convenient Places Persons fit to make them good, and dispos'd several Commanders in other Parts, that they might be ready upon all Occasions. Others privately sollicit'd the People to prepare them for an insurrection; and the Bishop of Ely wrot from Flanders to such as he knew hated King Richard, promoting the Business by the sole Authority of his Letters.

Richard's Preparations against him.

Tho' this Design was carry'd on with the utmost Caution and Secrecy, yet it could not be long conceal'd from the Jealousies of the politick King; who placing his Spies in all Parts, betook himself to Arms; and soon concluding the Duke of Buckingham to be the prime Mover, he was of opinion that the main

Provisions were to be made against him. But first he resolv'd to try him with Offers, which if rejected, then to proceed to the severest Methods: Accordingly he sent an express Messenger to him with Letters full of Courtesie and the greatest Promises; but the larger they were, they became so much the more suspicious. He well knew the King's Temper, and that he had proceeded in the same manner with all those he desir'd to abuse; therefore he desir'd to be excused coming to him, alledging a great Indisposition and Unfitness to travel. Richard not at all satisfy'd, wrot to him in contrary Terms, commanding him to appear immediately before him; to which the Duke, laying aside all Artifices, gave Answer to the Messenger, That he would not come to One whom he accounted his mortal Enemy. Thus without further Disimulation they prepar'd for War; and the Rumour of it caus'd the Marquess Dorset, Son to the Queen-Dowager to quit his Sanctuary, and to go and raise Forces in Yorkshire; in Devonshire and Cornwall Sir Edward Courtney, and his Brother the Bishop of Exeter did the same; and Sir Richard Guilford, assisted by many other Gentlemen, began the War in Kent. King Richard was not taken altogether unprovided; but using all Diligence he march'd towards Salisbury, while the Duke of Buckingham with an Army of Welshmen advanced towards Glocester, there to pass the Severn, and join with the two Courtneys and the rest of their Adherents; which if effected, the King probably had been ruin'd. But here Providence, that design'd to punish the Duke for all his Crimes, interpos'd, and sent such a Deluge of Rain, that the Severn was not only impassable, but Men, Women and Children were carry'd away in their Beds by the Violence of it, and the Tops of Mountains were cover'd with Waters. This Flood continuing for ten Days, the Duke was forc'd to stay, while his Soldiers almost drown'd with Rain, famish'd for want of Victuals, and having no Pay, took a Resolution to disband of themselves; which they did, notwithstanding all the Authority and Persuasions of the Duke to the contrary. Being all dispers'd, and the Duke abandon'd, he retir'd near Shrewsbury to the House of one Humphry Banister, a Servant of his, who being highly oblig'd to him upon all Accounts, he concluded he might remain in Safety, 'till such Time as he could either gather new Forces, or pass over into Bretaign to the Earl of Richmond.

The Duke taken

The Disbanding of the Duke's Army being publish'd abroad, and it not being known whether he was alive or dead, such Fear possess'd those of Kent, Devonshire and Cornwall, that laying down their Arms, they fled some into Sanctuaries, and others beyond the Seas, and most of the chief of them particularly into Bretaign. King Richard hearing of the Welshmen's Retreat, the Duke's Flight, and the rest of the Conspirators Design to save themselves, he immediately sent to all the Ports, and order'd all Passengers of any sort to be stopp'd: making Proclamation, That whoever should discover or deliver up the Duke of Buckingham into his Hands, if he were under the Villenage, he should be enfranchis'd; and if otherwise, together with a general Pardon he should have a thousand Pounds ready Mony given him. Together with this he made strong Preparations at Sea, being assur'd by Sir Thomas Hutton, who had been Ambassador in Bretaign, that the Earl of Richmond was certainly to be assisted by that Duke both with Men and Mony; he therefore sent many Ships to the Coast of Bretaign, with Intention either to fight him, or hinder him from landing on the English Shore. In other Parts he left no Place unguarded, and none were permitted to land or take Shipping without the most diligent Search, that some News might be had of the Duke of Buckingham. Banister, into whose Hands the Duke had trusted his Life, hearing of the Proclamations and promis'd Rewards, out of Fear or Avarice, discover'd where he was to the Sheriff of Shropshire; who coming to Banister's House, found the Duke in the Habit of a Day-Labourer digging in a Garden; in which Apparel he was sent well guarded to Shrewsbury, where King Richard then resided. He deny'd not the Conspiracy, hoping by his free Confession to have gain'd Admittance into the King's King's Presence; some think with an Intention to have begg'd for Mercy, others to have kill'd the King with a Dagger which he wore underneath his Cloaths. But stern Richard not suffering him to be brought to him, he was on the first Day of November beheaded in the Market-Place, without any manner of Process, and after the same Manner he had caus'd many others to suffer. Here Sir Thomas Moore takes notice of the Punishments which God sent upon Banister and all his Family afterwards; but the Vengeance of Heav'n was more conspicuous against the Duke, who now justly fell into the Hands of a Tyrant, whom contrary to all Justice he had rais'd into the Throne. The Duke was in his Death accompany'd by several others, particularly Sir George Brown, Sir Roger Clifford, and Sir Thomas Saintlieger, who was the last Husband to the Dutches of Exeter the King's Sister.

III. During these Transactions at home, the Earl of Richmond, assisted by the Duke of Bretaign, had got together five thousand Men, and forty furnish'd Ships, in which he embark'd for England. But in the next Night he met with a dreadful Storm, which dispers'd all his Ships, and threw him singly upon the Coast of Dorsetshire near the Town of Poole; where he found the Shore all cover'd with Men to prevent his Landing. Here he cast Anchor, expecting the Arrival of his other Ships; and then sent a Boat near the Shore to discover whether they were Friends or not. Being come within Hearing, those on the Shore said, They were sent to conduct them to the Duke of Buckingham, who lay with a great Army not far distant, expecting the Landing of the Earl of Richmond, who might easily ruin King Richard, now abandon'd by most Men. But the Earl soon discover'd this Deceit, and despairing to meet with the rest of the Fleet, he put to Sea and landed in Normandy, from whence he dispatch'd a Gentleman to Charles the present King of France to desire a safe Conduct into Bretaign; and he commiserating the Earl's Misfortunes, did not only grant that, but also a considerable Sum of Money. Being arriv'd in Bretaign, and his Ships return'd, he then learnt the ill Success of his Affairs in England, how the Duke of Buckingham was executed, and the Queen's Son the Marquess Dorset, with the rest of his Companions, were come into Bretaign, which extreamly dejected him; yet he was comforted at the Arrival of his Friends, promising himself some Advantage from their Safeties. Here they again all resolv'd to proceed in their first Design, and to make the Earl King, upon Condition he marry'd the Princess Elizabeth Daughter to Edward the Fourth. All this was sworn to in the Cathedral Church of Rennes; where likewise the Marquess with all the rest did Homage to the Earl, as their actual King. The Earl fail'd not to acquaint the Duke of Bretaign with all these Proceedings, and the Greatness of the Cause he undertook; and that he greatly stood in need of another Fleet and Supplies of Money: To all which the Duke generously harkned and condescended.

The Earl of Richmond's Fleet dispers'd at Sea.

In the mean Time the Tyrant Richard proceeded with great Severity, and put many suspected Persons to Death; and being return'd to London, he call'd a Parliament, in which the Earl of Richmond and those that had fled to him were declar'd Enemies to the Kingdom, and their Estates confiscated. Tho' these Confiscations amounted to large Sums, yet they were insufficient for his Purposes, and did not hinder him from laying insufferable Taxes upon his Subjects. Fearing to provoke the People too much, he was content to keep the Earl of Richmond's Mother only as a Prisoner, while the Lord Stanley her Husband pass'd without any great Suspicion. But for William Collingburn, who had been High Sheriff of Wiltshire and Dorsetshire, he caus'd him to be executed for writing this Rhime, The Cat, the Rat, and Lovell the Dog, do govern England under a Hog; alluding to Catesby, Ratcliff, and the Lord Lovell, who gave the Dog for his Arms, as Richard did the Boar for his; being all three prime Favourites. Then to keep himself secure from foreign Disturbances,

The Earl and his Adherents declar'd publick Enemies in Parliament.

Truce with Scotland.

Richard sent Commissioners to treat with the King of Scotland, with whom he made a Truce for three Years, each of them to keep what they possess'd, only the Castle of Dunbarre was to be restor'd to the Scots. And that he might have a double Tie upon them, he concluded a Marriage between the Duke of Rothsay Heir of Scotland, and his Niece Anne of Poole, Daughter to his Sister Anne and John Duke of Suffolk. All these Precautions could not free his distracted Mind from those Furies which had brought Hell into his Conscience; and tho' Buckingham and many others were dead and banish'd, yet he could have no Peace or Security; his heinous Crimes, the Peoples Hatred, and the Earl of Richmond would not suffer him to enjoy an Hour's Rest. He again endeavour'd to get the Earl into his Possession, and loaded his Ambassadors with large Sums of Mony and other Gifts to present to the Duke of Bretaign; also offering him Richmondshire, all the Earl's Revenues, and all the Estates of those that had fled to him. But the Ambassadors could not have Access to the Duke, being come when he was under a delirious Fit; whereupon they made their Addreses to Peter Landois, who had Power to dispose of the Prince and State as he pleas'd. These large Offers had such Effects upon his base Mind, that he was ready to comply with them, but not in the manner they were propos'd; for he demanded Richmondshire for himself; upon which Messengers were several Times dispatch'd into England, which Delay of Time prov'd the Earl's Security. For these Designs being discover'd in England, and to the Bishop of Ely in Flanders, that Prelate immediately gave notice to the Earl, advising him to fly with all Speed, or he would fall into the Enemy's Hands.

The Earl of Richmond in great Danger.

The Earl receiv'd this Advice at Vennes, from whence he immediately sent for a safe Conduct from the French King, which being obtain'd, he left many Englishmen behind him, and with only five Followers in a Disguise, fled out of Bretaign into Anjou so fortunately, that one Hour's Delay might have been his Ruin. The Duke of Bretaign having recover'd his perfect Senses, was highly displeas'd at the vile Proceedings of Landois; and commanded that all the English might have Permission to go to their Master, and their Charges honourably born by the Publick. He also sent the Mony he had promis'd to the Earl by Edward Woodvile and Edward Poinings, two English Gentlemen; for which the Earl to shew his Gratitude declar'd, That he could never be at Rest, till Fortune had afforded him Means in some sort to requite his infinite Obligations to the Duke, by whose Favour only he now liv'd. The King of France was then at Langres, where the Earl repair'd to him, inform'd him of the Reason of his Flight from Bretaign, and begg'd his Assistance in this extraordinary Cause; which was not hard to obtain from so generous a Prince, against one whose Name began to be odious in all Nations. King Charles promis'd to assist him, and brought him on his Way to Montargis, treating the Lords that attended him with Hospitality becoming a King. While thus he was ordering his Affairs, Fortune, the better to encourage him, sent him a Man forgotten, and in effect thought dead; John Vere Earl of Oxford, who had been imprison'd in Hamme's Castle by King Edward the Fourth not long after the Battel of Barnet. This Nobleman had so far prevail'd with Sir James Blunt Captain of that Castle, and Sir John Portescue Porter of Calais, that he did not only obtain his Liberty, but procur'd them to forsake their Commands, and go along with him under the Conduct of the Earl of Richmond. But Blunt having left his Lady and all his Goods in Hamme's, he compleatly fortify'd it, and increas'd his Garrison, that if it should be belieg'd, they might defend themselves 'till Fortune turn'd against King Richard. King Charles being return'd to Paris, the Earl's Retinue increas'd; all that were fled from England, as well as the English in those Parts, either as Scholars in the Universities, or returning from their Travels, flock'd to him: Among whom was one Richard Fox a secular Priest, a Man of excellent Parts, who was shortly after advanc'd to great Places and Dignities.

King Richard all this Time was not wanting to himself; his Thoughts were bent upon his own Preservation, and the Security of the Crown which he unworthily wore: And tho' he saw Heav'n and Earth conspiring against him, yet he thought by his own Subtlety to make his Party good against both. But understanding the Earl's Flight out of Bretaign he stood amaz'd, and concluded that his main Remedy was to break the design'd Match between the Earl and his Niece Elizabeth. But barely to break it was not thought sufficient; therefore he resolv'd to break into the Laws of Nature, and marry his own Niece, whom formerly he had declar'd Illegitimate, and Incest would serve but as a Laurel to crown his other Abominations. His Conscience was now so hardned, that he resolv'd upon three Things, Deceit, Murder and Incest; the former, with Allurements and fair Promises was to mollifie the Queen Mother, and to make way for the other two, the Murder of his Wife, and the Marriage with his Niece. To effect all this, he chose Persons fit for his Purpose, who in the most obliging manner made plausible Excuses to the Queen Mother for all that was past, pretending That his Majesty was sensibly afflicted for his dear Nieces, that they should make themselves voluntary Prisoners, and mistrust the natural Affection of an Uncle, who like a Father thought of nothing but their Happiness: That his great Desire was to treat them according to their Birth, to have them to Court, and to provide them with worthy Husbands; and whenever the Death of his Wife should happen (which must necessarily be in a short Time, by reason of some extraordinary Indispositions) his Resolution was to make the Princess Elizabeth his Queen; and would likewise prefer the Marquess Dorset to the most honourable and profitable Places in the Nation, if he would leave the Earl of Richmond and return to England. These and many other Things, being dress'd up in all the Advantages of Honour and Profit, the Queen, through an unconstancy of Resolution, too often charg'd upon her Sex, at the first Onset began to melt, and at the second to yield to the King's Proposals; at once forgetting the Murder of her two Sons, the Infamy thrown upon her Husband and self by the present Possessor; and what was most material, the Oath that she had given to the Countess of Richmond concerning the Marriage of her Daughter. Ambition so far prevail'd as to make her faulty to her own Honour, the Safety of her Daughters, the Generosity of her past Actions, and her own Conscience; so that nothing was thought equivalent to the Persuasions of her mortal Enemy. And thus abus'd, she dispatch'd a Messenger to her Son Dorset, then in France, commanding him to leave the Earl and come for England; declaring, That all past Injuries were forgotten, and were to be repair'd with Honours and Preferments; and that King Richard desir'd nothing more than to give him full Satisfaction. And being thus reconcil'd to the King, they all remov'd out of their Sanctuary, and the young Princesses were convey'd to Court with extraordinary Solemnity.

Richard's Proceedings.

He prevails upon the Queen Dowager.

who quits her Sanctuary.

Richard having obtain'd the first of his three Designs, proceeded towards the second, which would be imperfect without the third, and the third impossible without the second. He could not marry his Niece unless his Wife was dead; upon this therefore he wholly bent his Thoughts. He consider'd that to put her to a violent Death would too much alienate his Peoples Affections, which he sometimes could and had gain'd by his hypocritical Proceedings. For this he hit upon a Method unknown to common Sinners; That Grief, Melancholy and Fear might jointly produce that Effect with the Appearances of Nature, which neither Sword nor Poison could do without Scandal. He forbore her Bed, and refus'd to speak to her, denying her both his Society and his Presence: He began to bewail his ill Fortune in having a Wife that was now barren; and made known his great Affliction to the Arch-Bishop of York, whom he had set at Liberty, not doubting but he would declare it to his Wife, and hoping it might work the desir'd Effect. The Arch-Bishop, who was a wise Man, and well acquainted with the King's Disposition, spoke of it to some of his intimate Friends,

King Richard's
Queen dies.

Friends, judging the unfortunate Lady's Life to be of no long Continuance. Shortly after the King caus'd it to be reported that she was dead, that whenever her Death should happen, it might appear less surprising, and likewise caus'd this Rumour to be brought to her own Ears; that every thing might add to her Grief, or at least take off the Horror of the Fact. The Queen, who was of a soft and tender Disposition, and not able to stand against the Power of so many Machinations, was extreamly confounded and dispirited; well knowing that a dreadful Tempest must needs follow such portentous Thunderings. She ran with great Eagerness to him to know wherein she had so highly offended him, as that he thought her not only worthy of Hatred, which was apparently seen, but of the Punishment that was to befall her, the World judging her to be dead already. His Answer was pleasant in Words, but severe in Sense, mingled with Smiles, which gave her more Cause of Suspicion than Comfort. She retir'd to her own Lodgings, where a few Days after she departed this Life, uncertain whether out of Grief or Poison. And this was the End of a Lady, who out of Ambition and Interest marry'd to one who had been the Author both of her Husband's and Father's Death.

Reg. $\frac{2}{3}$.

IV. King Richard having obtain'd two of his Designs, he began to proceed towards the third, the Marriage of his Niece; but he was soon so interrupted and almost confounded with the Publick Affairs, that he could never bring it to Effect. He found many of the Prime Nobility fled into France to the Earl of Richmond, and saw himself so nauseous to the People, that they were ready to vomit him out. He began now also to have greater Jealousies against the Lord Stanley than any other Nobleman; so that when that Lord desir'd leave to return to his Country House, under Pretence of some Domestic Affairs, he would not permit him 'till he had left his eldest Son George Stanley in Court, as an Hostage for his Father's Loyalty. Understanding of Blunt's Revolt, and the Earl of Oxford's Escape from Hamme's Castle, he order'd the Garrison of Calais to besiege and reduce that Place; which was done with a Success greater than was expected. This inconsiderable Advantage, and some false Representations of the Weakness of the Earl of Richmond, and the Backwardness of the French King to assist him, prov'd a vast Disadvantage to King Richard, who being both puff'd up and deluded, recall'd his Ships and disbanded his Army; judging that the Nobility inhabiting the Maritime Parts, especially those of Wales, were sufficient to oppose any Descent his Enemy could make.

The Earl of Richmond had really met with some Delays and Impediments in the Court of France, that caus'd the Marquess Dorset secretly to fly from him; which might have been of great Damage to him, had he not been happily stop't in his Journey. These Things made the Earl more diligent; and finding that Delays might be the Loss or Ruin of his Friends, he judg'd it necessary to attempt that with a Few which he could not with Many. He borrow'd Money of the King and many others, leaving the Marquess Dorset and Sir John Bourchier as Hostages; and having gather'd some Men, he repair'd to Roan, there waiting for the Ships from Harflleur that were to transport his Forces. Here he was inform'd of the Death of King Richard's Queen, and of his Resolution to marry his Niece, who by her Mother was promis'd to him. This extreamly discourag'd him and his Followers; who after a new Consultation judg'd it a rash Resolution to undertake so dangerous an Enterprize with a Handful of Men; therefore they resolv'd not to stir 'till they had receiv'd new Advices from England, and could gain over Sir Walter Herbert, a Gentleman of great Family and Power in Wales. But the Earl about the same Time receiving an Account that Sir Rice ap Thomas and Captain Savage, two Men of great Note in Wales, would declare for him, and that Reynold Bray had large Sums in Possession to pay the Soldiers; he at length took Shipping on the fifteenth Day of

of August, with a few Vessels, and two thousand Soldiers. After seven Days he landed at Milford-Haven in Wales; from whence passing on to Dale, he march'd to West-Hereford, where he was receiv'd with all Satisfaction by the Inhabitants. Here he was discourag'd with the false News that Thomas and Savage had declar'd for King Richard, and soon after as much encourag'd by Arnold Butler, that the Inhabitants of Pembrokeshire had join'd with his Uncle Jasper Earl of Pembroke, their natural Lord; which caus'd him to march on to Cardigan, his Camp encreasing every Hour. Here he heard News that Sir Walter Herbert was at Caermarthen with a Design to oppose him; but he soon understood by his Scouts that there was no Enemy to be seen, the Country being open and free for his March. This Satisfaction was augmented by the coming in of Richard Griffith and John Morgan, with a good Body of Men. Yet the Earl seeing himself reduc'd to the Necessity of meeting with Victory or Ruin, and that without further Assistance he could not subsist long, he wrote to his Mother, and the Lord Stanley with others, That being by their Advice arriv'd in England, it was their Assistance that must support him; for having but few Men, one Defeat would be his Ruin: That temporizing would now be fatal; and if Dissimulation was once advantageous, it would be now pernicious, and discourage all his real Friends. This Dispatch being sent away by a faithful Servant, he took his March towards Shrewsbury, and met with Rice ap Thomas, who with a considerable Number of Welshmen swore Fealty to him, the Earl having promis'd to make him President of Wales, as soon as he should be King. At Shrewsbury he receiv'd an Answer from his Mother and others, according to his Desire. From thence he pass'd on to Newport, where Sir Gilbert Talbot with two thousand Men came to meet him; as likewise did Sir William Stanley at Stafford, where he made some Stay to refresh his People. After this he came to Litchfield, and was receiv'd by the Inhabitants as their lawful Prince. The Lord Stanley had been there two Days before with his Soldiers, and was remov'd from thence to make Way for the Earl, that he might not be seen in his Company; being extreamly cautious by reason of his Son's being an Hostage with King Richard, and so hourly in Danger of his Life.

The Earl lands in Wales.

His Progress.

King Richard, being now at Nottingham, heard of the Earl's Arrival; but with such a Relation of his inconsiderable Forces, that he had no Regard to him. But afterwards well considering the Consequences, he began to change his Mind, and his Affairs appear'd to be in a Condition not to be trusted to other Mens Directions, by reason of the general Hatred of the Nation. Therefore making a Scrutiny of such as were most interested in the Preservation of his Person and Dignity, he chose John Duke of Norfolk, the Earl of Northumberland, and the Earl of Surry, giving them Commission to gather together what Friends and Forces they could; and he gave order to Brakenbury the Lieutenant of the Tower to do the same, and bring as Companions Sir Thomas Bourcher and Sir Walter Hungerford; not that he expected any Service from them, but to prevent their Conspiring against him. All these Precautions did not satisfy him, when he understood the Earl had pass'd the Severn: He then began to mistrust his Affairs, and to complain of those who had promis'd to defend that Passage; and now he found that his Business was not to be trusted to any third Party, and growing jealous of all Men, he went in Person at the Head of his Army to give his Enemy Battel, executing himself the Duty of a Serjeant-Major. He came by Night to Leicester upon a white Steed, surrounded by Guards and a great Number of Foot, with a wild Countenance, answerable to the Speeches he utter'd against such as had abandon'd him, and disown'd him for their King. The Earl hearing of his Approach, encamp'd near Tamworth, where he was met by Sir Thomas Bourcher and Sir Walter Hungerford, who fearing King Richard, had privately slipp'd from Brakenbury's Forces. From other Parts divers Men of Quality repair'd to him, who probably would have have been his Enemies, had not their Hatred to King Richard mov'd them to join with him: Only the Lord Stanley durst not appear openly for him, by reason of his Son's being in Richard's Possession. Both Sides were equally inclinable to fight, being mov'd by several Fears; Richard of being abandon'd, and the Earl of wanting Mony and other Necessaries. But Richard's Condition was apparently the worse of the two, for Persons daily deserted from him; so that seeking out a fit Place for Battel, he encamp'd himself near a Village call'd Bosworth, not far from Leicester, where having refresh'd his Men, he prepar'd to fight. Here we are told that the Night preceding the Battel, he in his Sleep had certain strange and dreadful Apparitions that he believ'd to be Devils, which tormenting him, broke his Rest, and left him in such a Consternation, that all that saw him were amaz'd.

The fatal Day being come which was to decide the Fortunes of a Kingdom, Richard drew out his Troops in such a manner as might make the greatest Appearance; committing the Van to the Duke of Norfolk, and commanding the second Line himself, where were the choicest and best armed Men, being guarded on the Flanks by Horse, and on the Front by Archers. But notwithstanding all this Show his Numbers were but small in respect of the Cause and Consequence, yet still much greater than the Earl had on the other Side. The Lord Stanley stood at a Distance almost between the two Armies with three thousand Soldiers, affording Hopes and Fears to both Parties: For being desir'd by the Earl that he would come and take care of the Ordering and Commanding his Men, his Answer was, That he might do that Office himself, he would come as he saw it convenient; and to Richard, who swore that if he did not come to him he would cut off his Son's Head before Dinner, he answer'd, Let him use his Pleasure, for I have more Sons than he. This Ambiguity prov'd his Son's Security; for Richard having commanded he should be beheaded, he suspended the Order, not so much out of Pity as Fear that Stanley's Cloud which threaten'd a Tempest should discharge all its Fury upon him when he most needed his Assistance. The Earl of Richmond, taking Courage from his Father-in-Law's Answer, drew up his Men, placing the Archers in the Front under the Conduct of the Earl of Oxford; he gave Sir Gilbert Talbot charge over the Right Wing, Sir John Savage commanded the Left, and he lent for himself and his Uncle the Earl of Pembroke a considerable Proportion of Horse and a few Foot, as a Reserve, with Intention to join with the Troops as Occasion should require. All his Forces exceeded not five thousand Men, and when join'd with the Lord Stanley, they scarcely amounted to half the Number that King Richard had.

The thirteenth and last Battel, at Bosworth.

Both Armies being drawn up, King Richard on one Side, and the Earl on the other, made long Speeches to their Soldiers, which Sir Thomas Moore has recited at large. At the joining together of the two Armies, their several Inclinations were soon discern'd; those of the King's Side fought faintly, and others withdrew themselves out of the Camp. The King had commanded those in whom he most confided, to take care that all might be carry'd on without Disorder, and that they would advertise him of any Danger that should appear. These seeing that some were negligent, and others retiring, advis'd him to save himself, concluding he was betray'd. But the Divine Justice would not suffer him to harken to such Advice, not even when the Victory appear'd evidently on his Adversaries Side; for a fleet Horse being presented to him to further his Escape, he declar'd That Day should either determine the War or his Life. Understanding soon after that the Earl was not far from him, guarded but with a few Men, he spurr'd on towards him, and knowing him by some Marks, he ran furiously at him with his Lance. The Earl was not pleas'd at the Encounter, judging it the true Way to decide their Contest; but he could not meet him directly, being hinder'd by some of his own Men. Richard being disappointed, push'd against the great Standard, and flew Sir William Brandon the Standard-

Standard-Bearer; then advancing forwards, Sir John Cheney endeavouring to meet him, Richard bore him to the Ground, tho' he was a Man of great Strength and Valour. The Earl with his Sword in Hand stopp'd his Fury, at the very Instant when the Lord Stanley investing the King's Squadrons afforded Occasion for as many to run away as thought fit. Richard perceiving this, left the Earl, and thrust himself into the thickest of the Battel, either to reunite his Men, or to meet Death the sooner, which last soon happen'd to him; for fighting valiantly, he fell with the Sword in his Hand all over cover'd with Blood: So that he is said to have gain'd more Honour in these two Hours by his Death, than he had done all the Time of his Life. This happen'd on the twenty second Day of August, in the Prime of his Years, after a detestable Reign of two Years, two Months, and four Days, His Body was carry'd to Leicester after a most ignominious Manner, like a slain Deer laid cross a Horse's Back, his Head and Arms hanging on one Side, his Legs on the other, scorn'd and stark naked, and besmear'd with Blood, Dirt and Mire; and having lain two Days in this Manner, on the bare Earth, it was bury'd without any Solemnity or Funeral Rites.

In this Battel were slain not much above a thousand Men, among whom was the Duke of Norfolk and the Lord Ferrers. Sir William Catesby, who had betray'd the Lord Hastings, was with some others beheaded at Leicester according to his Deserts. This was the thirteenth and last Battel fought in the Civil Wars between the House of Lancaster and York, which had broken out about thirty Years before, fill'd the Nation with Blood and Desolation, and taken away the Lives of near a hundred thousand Men, and eighty Princes of the Blood, as Comines assures us. This prov'd the Ruin and Extirpation of the Males of both Families, and soon after put an End to the very Name of Plantagenet, which had continu'd near three hundred and fifty Years in Possession of the Throne of England. As to the House of York in particular, which in Strictness had the nearest Right to the Crown, it was founded and rais'd upon such Violations of the Laws of God and Man, that it could not last above twenty four Years; tho' it was supported by all the Powers of Human Strength and Policy. Richard may truly be said to have descended from an unfortunate House: The Earl of Cambridge his Grand-father was beheaded at Southampton; the Duke of York his Father slain before Sandal; of his three Brothers the Earl of Rutland was slain in cold Blood, the Duke of Clarence drown'd in a Butt of Malmesey, and his two Nephews strangled in their Beds: So that we can meet with no Tragedy, true or fabulous, where we find so many various and cruel Deaths as in this Family. Richard himself, whose Character we need not give, was reserv'd for the last Stroke of the Divine Vengeance: Yet in these Proceedings of Providence we find that God, who is the Rewarder of Good in thousands, is the Punisher of Evil even in the third and fourth Generations, when some of the more immediate Actors escape in this World. It has been observ'd That in Richard the Second he punish'd the Death of Edward the Second; in Henry the Sixth and his Son, the Death of Richard the Second; in Edward the Fifth and his Brother, the Death of Henry the Sixth and his Son; and in Richard the Third the Death of Edward the Fifth and his Brother: And yet he was pleas'd to suffer those to die in Peace which were the real Authors. Edward the Third, whose Mother's Crime gives some Aspersions of Parricide; Henry the Fourth, who murder'd Richard the Second; and Edward the Fourth, who murder'd Henry the Sixth, remain'd all unpunish'd. But to Richard the Third, whose Crimes were beyond Example, he deny'd Life, and perhaps Repentance, his Inhumanity neither deserving Successor nor Pardon.

Henry Earl of Richmond enters upon the Throne.

out King Henry, King Henry! upon whose Forwardness the Lord Stanley took King Richard's Crown, and set it upon the Earl's Head, by that Ceremony confirming the Election of the People; from which Time commenc'd the Reign of the new King with full Success. But because so great a Revolution happen'd in the Kingdom, as to transfer the Crown from one Family to another, it will be very proper to take notice of the Gencology of this King, with his politick Claims and Pretensions.

His Pedigree.

His Father Edmund of Hadham Earl of Richmond, was Son to Owen Tudor and Queen Catharine, Widow to King Henry the Fifth, whose Houses had no Affinity nor Relation to the House of Lancaster, or to the Crown of England. So that his Claims by Descent must proceed all from his Mother, the Lady Margaret, only Daughter to the first Duke of Somerset, and Grand-Child to John of Gaunt, Father to King Henry the Fourth; which Lady pretended that in Case the then present Succession should fail, she and her Son were to succeed, as rightly descended from the said John, the Father of the House of Somerset, as well as Lancaster. But upon a strict Examination, it might easily be discover'd, that besides the Deficiencies in the House of Lancaster it self, the House of Somerset was distinct, and without those Pretensions the other had, as it thus appears. John Duke of Lancaster had three Wives, Blanche, Constance and Catharine, the last of whom was Mother to the House of Somerset; and the due Claims of his Children he had by them were not the same, in respect of the several Dowries, and different Qualities of the three Mothers. Blanche brought with her the Dutchy of Lancaster; Constance, the Pretences to the Kingdoms of Castile and Leon; and Catharine, nothing at all being but a meer waiting Woman to the above nam'd Blanche: So that if Henry the Fourth, and his Sisters born of Blanche, could not pretend to the Kingdoms of Castile and Leon, in prejudice to the Children of Constance; nor those Children to the Dukedom of Lancaster, in prejudice to Henry the Fourth and his Sisters; much less could the Children of Catharine have any Pretence at all, in prejudice to the Children by the two former Wives. And they were excludable with the greater Justice, because they were really Bastards, and with this aggravating Circumstance, on the Father's Side born in Adultery: And tho' after the Death of Constance, the Duke marry'd Chatharine, and had her Children made legitimate by Parliament; yet they not being of the whole Blood, the House of Somerset had nothing to do with the House of Lancaster, in what pertain'd to the Inheritance of the Crown. So that when Henry the Fourth was establish'd in the Throne by Authority of Parliament, and by the same Authority his Sons and their Descendants declar'd his lawful Successors; no Mention was then made of his half Brothers, in case his Succession should fail, or such as should descend from them. So that strictly speaking, King Henry the Seventh had no rightful Pretensions to the Crown of England, not so much as the House of Lancaster had; but being Head of that Party, and endow'd with many excellent Qualifications, his great Success was owing to the Wickedness of King Richard, and his Promise to marry the Lady Elizabeth, the nearest Heir to the Kingdom. The Troubles that afterwards afflicted him, arose from hence; for he always shew'd himself but lukewarm in his Affections towards his Wife, being an irreconcilable Enemy to her Family; insomuch that having gain'd the Victory and destroy'd his Opposer, he positively resolv'd not to be King but by his own Title and Interest: He therefore deferr'd his Marriage and her Coronation, till such Time as being crown'd himself and establish'd by Parliament, he had only accepted of the Title of Lancaster, as the first and chiefest Fundamental; and of the other two, those of Conquest and Marriage, but as Accidental, and as Supporters. All which was the less blameable, because it did not proceed so much from any Hatred to the House of York, as from the Love he bore to himself, and from a cautious Foresight: For a Report being rais'd that the young Duke of York had escap'd from his design'd Murderers, his Claim by his Wife would have forbid him, if her Brother had been alive, who could not have been excluded but by the litigious Title of Lancaster. And if this News were false, there still remain'd other Scruples: As supposing she should die without Children, the bare Title of Marriage would not secure the Crown to him, which was to fall upon her Sisters; and if she should die with Children, the Crown would devolve upon them, to the Exclusion of himself. But if still his Children and a Parliament should be content to continue him in his Government, he knew there was a great Difference between reigning by Virtue of Birth and Law, by which he was oblig'd to no Man, and reigning by the Consent of others, by which he was oblig'd to every Man. Then to make use of the Title of Conquest, was both odious and dangerous, which might alienate even those that sided with him. And tho' the Title of Lancaster had been condemn'd in Parliament, and he himself arriv'd at the Crown not by the real Virtue of that, but that by marrying with the Princess Elizabeth, all Disputes between the two Houses might be ended; yet mov'd by the foresaid Considerations, and not valuing probable Inconveniencies, he declar'd himself King by Virtue of his own Birth, without naming the Princess Elizabeth in any Degree: Being willing to run the greatest Hazard, rather than be King by the Courtesie of his Wife, while she should live; by the Good-will of his Children, if she should first die; or by the Permission of a Parliament, if he should have no Issue by her.

With these nice Precautions this politick Prince began his Reign upon the twenty second Day of August: And understanding that the Princess Elizabeth, and Edward Plantagenet, Earl of Warwick and Son to the Duke of Clarence were in Sheriff-Hutton Castle in Yorkshire, there kept by King Richard's Command; he order'd that the Princess should be brought up to London to the Queen her Mother, whether she was attended by several Lords and Ladies. But for the Earl of Warwick, he gave order that the Keeper of the Castle should deliver him into the Custody of Sir Robert Willoughby, to be by him brought Prisoner to the Tower of London; for tho' he was not fifteen Years of Age, yet he was a Person not thought fit to enjoy his Liberty in such uncertain and litigious Times. The new King march'd from Leicester towards London, without any Ostentation of Victory or Conquest: His Journey was peaceful; all Military Insolencies were forbidden, and forborn: He pass'd on more like an old than a new Sovereign, being receiv'd in all Places with the highest Acclamations of Joy. His taking up the Olive Branch, and laying aside the Laurel, did highly encourage the People, who now promis'd themselves that Quiet, which since Henry the Fourth's Time had only been enjoy'd by Intervals; being subject to so many Mutations, that the very Expectation and Apprehension of the ensuing Evils was as an intermitting Fever for the Space of fourscore and six Years. In the like manner he made his Entrance into London: For tho' he was met by the Mayor, Magistrates and Citizens, and himself attended with many Noblemen and Gentlemen, yet dispensing with the Pomp usually observ'd at the first Entrance of Kings into that City, he came in a close Chariot; that it might not be imagin'd, that having recover'd his Country by the Favour of Arms, and gain'd his Crown by the Death of a King, he had any Design to triumph over the People. His Entry was upon Saturday, the Day of his Victory; which Day he always solemniz'd, as ever being the happiest Day of the Week to him: He alighted out of his Chariot at St. Paul's Church; where he caus'd Te Deum to be sung, and the Colours taken from the Enemy to be hung up. He pretended to no other Trophies; nor did he own this as the Effects of his own Valour, or from Fortune, but as from God, the only Fortune to which Sacrifice ought to be made. He made all Preparations for his Coronation; and because it was said he had given his Promise to marry the Lady Anne, Daughter and Heir to the Duke of Brevaigh, which was by many believ'd to be true, he in an Assembly of the Chief Lords of the Kingdom, call'd for that purpose, ratify'd his Promise to marry the Princess Elizabeth; by which he put a Stop to the Whispers and Jealousies of many. Yet still he referr'd the Consummation, without regard to Obloquy, till being crown'd, and in Possession of all by his own Title, he might avoid being call'd King in the Right of his Wife.

Not long after his Arrival at London, towards the End of September, both the City and the Kingdom was afflicted with a Disease hitherto unknown, call'd the Sweating Sickness; which was prodigious in its Nature, both as to the swiftness of its Course, and the mortal Effects it produc'd. But it lasted not much above a Month; so that it was no Hindrance to the King's Coronation, which was the last of October; nor to the holding of the Parliament, which began seven Days after. In Order to the former, the King made his Entrance into the Tower on Simon and Jude's Eve, and on the Feast Day made twelve Knights Bannerets. After which Jasper Earl of Pembroke, the King's Uncle, was created Duke of Bedford; Thomas Lord Stanley, the King's Father-in-law, Earl of Darby; and Edward Courtney, Earl of Devonshire. Two Days after he was crown'd in the Abby Church of Westminster by Cardinal Bourchier, Archbishop of Canterbury, with the accustomed Solemnities, and joyful Acclamations both of the Nobility and People. Upon the same Day, as if the Crown upon his Head had infus'd Jealousies into his Thoughts, for the Security of his Person he instituted a Guard of fifty Archers under a Captain to attend him, by the Name of Yeomen of the Guard. This being a new Thing in England, where the Kings were usually guarded by the Laws and their Subjects Affections, to remove all cause of Suspicion, he declar'd the Institution to be perpetual; and that since the Kings of all other Nations had their Guards, Decency if not Necessity made the same requisite here in England.

Seven Days after a Parliament met, in which he annul'd all the Decrees for the Confiscations of the Lives and Estates of such as took part with him, and made the like Decree against the Principal of the other Side; and to remove all Jealousies from the rest, he granted out a general Pardon, which freed such from Fear who had real Cause to be afraid. For having condemn'd those whom he design'd not to pardon, it was a certain Sign he would pardon the rest; so that quitting their Sanctuaries and Places of Retreat, they swore Fealty to him, and did their Homage answerable to the Tenure of the Declaration, and re-enter'd into their Possessions. Afterwards as concerning his Title, which was the cheifest Concernment, he govern'd himself by such peculiar Caution and Management, that without so much as naming the Princess Elizabeth, he caus'd the Act that was made to contain a double Sense: That the Inheritance of the Crown should remain in him and his Children lawfully to be begotten, not declaring whether it was his by Nature, or by Conquest; he knowing that whatsoever Interpretation was made of it would turn to his Advantage. He avoided to prescribe any Succession in case he and those that should lawfully descend from him, should fail, because it should not be thought to be alone purposely to exclude the House of York; he therefore left the Decision of that to the Laws. He procur'd this Statute to be confirm'd by the Pope's Bull, with particular Mention, by way of Recital, of his other Titles, both of Descent and Conquest. He in the same Parliament conferr'd new Honours upon several: He created Monsieur de Chaudos, a Gentleman of Bre taign, Earl of Bath; Sir Giles Dawbeny was made Lord Dawbeny, and Sir Robert Willoughby Lord Brooke. He restor'd Edward Stafford, Eldest Son to the Duke of Buckingham, to his Blood, Dignity and Estate, and tho' his Confiscation was great, yet his Father having been the first Promoter of his Rise with his own Ruin, he restor'd all to his Son; which won him the Reputation of being generous and grateful. And tho' Kings seldom call'd Parliaments without desiring some Aids, and closing some Acts of Grace, he would not make any such Demand at this Time, as not having any Grace to confer proper to the Season. For tho' the general Pardon was an Act of Grace, yet he would not pretend it to be such, but rather a Correspondency to the Satisfaction they had given him, in receiving him to be King by his own Title: Besides, not having War with any at this Time, and having many Confiscations fallen to him, he was willing to spare his Subjects Purfes.

The Parliament being dissolv'd, he did not forget that he had left the Marquess Dorset and Sir John Bourchier as Pledges in France for those Sums he borrow'd to pay the Force he brought into England. Being desirous therefore upon this Occasion to try the Inclinations of the Citizens, he commanded the Lord Treasurer to require from the Lord Mayor of London that the City might lend him six thousand Marks; and after several Consultations, the Matter was decided by a Loan of two thousand Pounds Sterling; which tho' it came short of the Sum desir'd, he receiv'd with Courtesie, and supply'd the Remainder out of his own Coffers, that the Hostages might be wholly at Liberty. He forgot not the Service done to him by John Morton Bishop of Ely, and Richard Fox Bishop of Exeter, for which he made them both of his Privy-Council, and gave to Morton the Archbishoprick of Canterbury, which fell vacant by the Death of Cardinal Bourchier: He made Fox Lord Privy-Seal, promoting him through several Bishopricks to that of Winchester, the richest of all the rest. And now having no Impediment to hinder the Performance of his Promise, upon the eighteenth Day of January the long expected and desir'd Marriage, between him and the Princess Elizabeth was solemniz'd: Which Day of Marriage was celebrated with greater Triumph, and Demonstrations of the Peoples over-flowing Joy, than the Day of his Entry or Coronation; which was rather noted than approv'd of by the King. For during the eighteen Years the Lady Elizabeth liv'd, he shew'd himself no very indulgent Husband towards her, tho' she had all the Advantages of Beauty, Goodness and Fruitfulness. His Averfion towards the House of York was too predominant in him, infomuch that it found place, not only in his Wars and Councils, but also in his Chamber and Bed.

The King's

II. All Things having succeeded thus happily, King Henry reasonably imagin'd that now he should meet with no more Oppositions: He was King by his own Title, in his own Right; he had marry'd the Heir to the Crown; and by his general Pardon and Restitution of Goods, he had reconcil'd such as were his profess'd Enemies. Yet after all, the Northern People, still bearing a Love to the House of York, and to the late King Richard, he thought it proper for himself to go into those Parts; hoping by his Prefence to cure their insatuated Imaginations. He kept his Easter at the City of Lincoln; where shortly after he understood that the Lord Lovel, and the two Brothers, Humphrey and Thomas Stafford had forsaken Sanctuary, but it was unknown to what Place they was retir'd: But arriving at York, he there understood that the Lord Lovel was not far from thence with a considerable Force; and that the Staffords having rais'd Men in Worcestershire, were marching towards York to attack him. This second Information, tho' it did a little discompose him, yet he took it only for the Remainers of King Richard's expiring Party at Bosworth: But he was more at a loss to find that he was amongst a People that did not affect him, that join'd with the House of York, and upon whom he could not safely rely. Amidst these Difficulties, he muster'd out of his Followers, Tenants and Dependants in whom he might confide, three thousand fighting Men; which being ill arm'd, but well assur'd, were deliver'd to the Duke of Bedford; giving him for his Van-Guard a general Pardon, which like Cannon Shot was to ruin the Enemy at a Distance. This prov'd effectual: For the Duke coming in Sight of the Lord Lovel, and the Heralds having publish'd the Pardon, he was so confounded, that fearing both to be abandon'd, and to be deliver'd up Prisoner, he fled the same Night towards Launcester, and from thence to Flanders.

A Disturbance
in the North

It is quell'd ders to the Dutches Dowager of Burgundy; while the rest laying down their Arms yielded themselves to the Duke. Upon which those who had join'd with the Staffords, having lost their chief Hopes, despers'd themselves into several Places; and the two Brothers got into the Sanctuary at Colnham near Abington, where they found not the Safety they imagin'd; for the Privilege of the Place not extending to the Security of Traitors, they were taken from thence, and the eldest executed, the younger finding Mercy. This Rebellion quieted, the Northern People settled, and the King return'd to London, in September following, the Queen was deliver'd of her first Son, whom the King nam'd Arthur, in Honour of the British Race from whom he was descended, and according to the Name of that ancient worthy King of the Britains; in whose Acts, besides what is fabulous, there is Truth sufficient to render him famous. This to the most fortunate King was a new Happiness, to the Queen a great Matter of Joy, to the Church a Sovereign Delight, to the Court an exceeding Pleasure, and in Sum to the whole Kingdom an incredible Satisfaction.

Notwithstanding all this, shortly after there follow'd a strange Accident of Henry State, of which the Relations that remain to us are so naked, that they leave it scarce credible, not so much for the Nature of it, but for the Manner and Circumstances of it, especially in the Beginning. There liv'd in Oxford a Subtle aspiring Priest nam'd Richard Simon, of mean Birth and tolerable Education; who ventur'd to undertake what a far greater Man durst not have attempted. This Man took upon him to educate a young Lad, nam'd Lambert Symnel, who, tho' only the Son of a Baker, had so sweet and ingenious a Countenance, as he might readily be thought one of the highest Quality. The presaging Aspect of this Youth first gave Simon an Occasion to take Advantage of two Rumours then spread abroad by the Enemies of King Henry: The one, that the Duke of York, second Son to King Edward the Fourth, was still alive; the other, that King Henry was resolv'd secretly to put the young Earl of Warwick to Death, who was Prisoner in the Tower. The first was divulg'd to raise and nourish the Hopes of the Male-contents; the second to blow up Hatred against the King, as if equally cruel with his Predecessor, he was ready to treat the Earl of Warwick as Richard had treated his Nephews. Upon these Reports, Simon first design'd to make Lambert personate the Duke of York; but soon changing his Opinion, he judg'd it more advantagious to have him personate the Prisoner the Earl of Warwick; so that if his Endeavours should succeed, and Lambert gain the Crown, he himself should be rewarded with the chief Miter of England, and with the Government of King and Kingdom. Nor did he fear to meet with any fatal Obstacles; since the Love to the House of York, still remaining in the Hearts of most Men, had occasion'd a great Dissatisfaction that the Princess Elizabeth, who had now born the King a Son, should yet want the Ceremony of a Coronation. Resolving upon the Affair, he proceeded to give proper Instructions to Lambert, in whom he met with an Aptness answerable to his Designs: But considering afterwards that his Pupil was to represent a Person not known to many, and unknown to himself, he judg'd it impracticable without the Assistance of some conversant in the Court, who might be inform'd by those that had serv'd the Earl, of his particular Conversation, and of all things that had befallen him since King Edward's Death. None being fitter for such an Office than the Queen Dowager, she was conceiv'd to be the main Instructor; as having too great a Cause of Resentment against King Henry, for so coolly treating her Daughter either as a Wife or a Queen. Not that she was willing to make Lambert King, but to use him as an Instrument to depose her Son-in-law, and to substitute the Infant Prince Arthur in his Place; and if that fail'd, Warwick or Lincoln might succeed, who were both of the House of York. That which confirm'd this Opinion was the King's confining of her afterwards, upon no weighty Pretence; thinking it expedient to punish her under the Colour of a small known Crime, for one more hainous not fitting to be known. How-

However it was, Lambert assum'd the Gestures and Behaviour of a great Personage, with such a fortunate Exactness, as being join'd to his natural Sweetness, a true Prince could not be enrich'd with more real Perfections, than those that appear'd to be true in him. The Reasons that caus'd Simon to chuse to have his Pupil personate the Son to the Duke of Clarence, rather than the young Duke of York, was, That when the Report was rais'd of his being escap'd out of the Tower, he observ'd so great a Joy in the People, that he judg'd it more proper for his Design, and that it would be easier to insinuate a Delusion in the Person of this Man, falsely suppos'd to have made an Escape, than in that other whose Escape would with more Difficulty be believ'd. Now to act the Comedy with Applause, he did not think England a fit Scene, a proportionable Distance being requir'd in Things of this Nature. He resolv'd therefore to go over into Ireland, a Kingdom affectionate to the House of York, and where King Henry had yet made no Alterations either in Dignity, Counsellor nor Officer; but the same commanded there as were plac'd by King Richard. All which made for Simon's Designs; who coming before Fitz-Gerald the Deputy, one well affected to the House of York presented his pretended Prince to him, and Lambert acted his Part with so much Artifice, that the deluded Deputy believ'd him to be what his Masters Speeches, and his study'd Nobility made him appear: Insomuch that acquainting some of his truest friends with this Secret, he found them and the People sufficiently inclinable to a Revolution. They receiv'd this fancy'd Prince with great Honour; they gave him the Castle of Dublin for his Lodging; and shortly after proclaim'd him King, by the Name of Edward the Sixth. There was not any one Province that deny'd him Obedience, but all join'd in declaring War against King Henry; while on the other Side not one would draw a Sword in his Cause. But that Kingdom being bare of Mony and Arms, and meanly furnish'd with Soldiers, they rely'd upon the House of York's Friends in England, and Margaret Dutcheß of Burgundy, to assist them with their Supplies; to whom they gave Intelligence that Edward Plantagenet was escap'd out of the Tower and come into Ireland, where he was proclaim'd King; that they design'd to bring him into England his hereditary Kingdom, if they would be ready to secure his Entrance, and that his Aunt of Burgundy would assist him with Mony, Soldiers and Commanders. This Dutcheß Margaret was Sister to King Edward the Fourth, and third Wife to Charles Duke of Burgundy, who after her Husband's Death took such honourable Care of Mary, his only Heir and her Posterity, that she was in great Esteem among the Flemings, who honour'd her as their natural reigning Princess. Her Husband had left her a plentiful Dowry; so that having no great Occasion for Expences, she might, by the Mony she had been gathering so many Years, easily undertake this remarkable Affair. She therefore willingly hearkned to the Embassie; not that she was wholly ignorant of the Imposture; but that she might have an Occasion to molest King Henry and the House of Lancaster, against which she had insuperable Prejudices. The Marriage with her Neece, which should have reconcil'd her to King Henry, did more incense her against him, since it establish'd him in the Kingdom, and took it from her House without Hopes of Recovery: For which Reason she readily promis'd Assistance, and in due Time perform'd it.

The King hearing of this Insurrection in Ireland, was extremely concern'd, being too late sensible that he had acted amiss, in leaving that Nation under the Command of such as depended upon his Predecessor. Hereupon he first call'd his Council together with great Secrecy; in which was propounded and concluded three Expedients: First, That a general Pardon should be proclaim'd to all who would discover their Crimes, and submit by a Day prefix'd; which Pardon should be deliver'd in such a full and ample Manner, that no High-Treason, even against the King's own Person, should be excepted Which tho' it might seem strange strange, yet it was not so to a wise King who knew the most imminent Dangers arose not from the least Treasons, but from the greatest: And this was design'd chiefly to bring in Sir Thomas Broughton, a powerful Opposer, of dangerous Interest. Secondly, That Edward Earl of Warwick should be taken out of the Tower, and shown publickly to the People, that they might be assur'd of his being alive; and that the suppos'd Earl in Ireland was a meer Chimæra, fram'd only to disturb the State. Thirdly, That the Queen's Mother should be confin'd to a Nunnery, and have all her Goods confiscated; because she had promis'd the Princess Elizabeth to the present King, when he was in Bretaign, and contrary to Articles of Agreement had deliver'd her, and the rest of her Sisters, up to King Richard. The Issue of these three Revolutions were, That as to the first, Sir Thomas Broughton did not answer Expectation: As to the second, the Earl of Warwick was led in Procession from the Tower to St. Paul's; being all the way discours'd withal by divers of the Nobility who knew him, especially by such of whom the King had any Suspicion; this all might have full Conviction of his being alive. This prov'd successful in England, but had no Effect in Ireland, where the Inhabitants turn'd the Impostor upon the King, and reported, That to defeat the true Inheriter, and to delude the World, he had dress'd up a Boy in the likeness of the Earl of Warwick, and shew'd him to the People, without sparing to prophane the Solemn Ceremony of Procession. The Resolution concerning the Queen-Mother was what alone took effect, who was thrust into the Monastery of Bermondsey, and had all her Estate seiz'd into the King's Hands; but not without great Scandal and Obloquy against the Severity of his Proceedings. This Lady may be plac'd amongst the greatest Examples of Fortune's Inconstancy; who being indu'd with rare Qualities, was ruin'd by her Abuse in the Choice; and as Wisdom and Wylinefs have too near a Resemblance, she mistook the latter for the former. From being Widow to a bare Knight, by an unreasonable Rise, and through a peculiar Breach of Faith, she became Wife to a great King; who being fled away, depos'd and banish'd, she was forc'd for the Secutity of her Person to take Sanctuary, where she bore her unfortunate Son. Her Husband afterwards returning home victorious and triumphant, she likewise shar'd in his good Fortune; but when he dy'd, she was driven to the like Necessity of taking Sanctuary. Her Brother-in-law having usurp'd the Kingdom from her Sons, declar'd them to be Bastards, and barbarously murder'd them; and for her greater Affliction, her Brother and one of her former Sons, dy'd by the Hands of the Hangman; so that in less than three Months space she was dismally wound'd with the Deaths of three Sons and her Brother. Her eldest Daughter being marry'd to the present King, she being mov'd by her Female Indignation to practice extravagant Chimæras, she lost her Honour, Estate and Liberty; and being abandon'd by her Friends, and not visited by any, she shortly after dy'd miserably. She was buried by her Husband at Windfor; and it was she that compleated the Foundation of Queen's-Colledge in Cambridge, which had been begun by Margaret Wife to King Henry the Seventh.

Her Death.

About this Time the Earl of Lincoln fled into Flanders, who was Son to John de la Pole Duke of Sussex, and Elizabeth, eldest Sister to the two Kings Edward and Richard. The latter had declar'd him Successor, in Case he should die without Children; which justly rais'd his Hopes, having a Wit and Courage capable of attempting the greatest Enterprizes. His Designs which were born to the Ground by his Uncle's Death, and Henry's Accession to the Crown, began to be reviv'd at this Irish News: For knowing the Fallhood of the pretended Plantagenet, he thought the Troubles likely to arise from thence would bring him to what he desir'd; for if Henry were once overcome, it would be easie for him to bear down the Impostor. The King had him oftentimes in his Thoughts: but the Earl of Warwick's Imprisonment, at which the People was offended, was the Reason why he did not confine him. Which if he had it would have encreas'd the Odium; and he hop'd that tho' he were at Liberty, he could not hurt him so long as the other was in Prison. In which if he was deceiv'd, it turn'd not to his Prejudice; for Lincoln being fled by the Advice of Sir Thomas Broughton, he repair'd to the Dutcheſs, his Aunt, who after divers Consultations ſent him into Ireland, accompany'd by the Lord Lovel and other Fugitives, with a Regiment of two thouſand ſelect Almains, commanded by Martin Swart a valiant Captain. She thought this ready Succour would produce many good Effects; as the confirming the Rebels in their Proceedings, the ſecuring of the counterfeit King in Poſſeſſion, and the encouraging of his Party in England towards the Ruin of King Henry: For the Pretended Edward the Sixth was to be ſupported, as long as Occaſion requir'd, but not yet to be caſhier'd; and the true Edward, in the Tower, to be put in his Place, contrary to the Earl of Lincoln's Expectations. King Henry underſtanding this Flight, was extreamly perplex'd; and found that the Dutcheſs having declar'd her ſelf in behalf of the Rebels, he muſt defend his Crown with the Sword. His firſt Care was to cauſe the Sea-Coaſts to be well guarded, that others might not follow Lincoln's Example: He rais'd a powerful Army, and devided it under two Generals, the Duke of Bedford and the Earl of Oxford; expecting to be attack'd at the ſame time both from Ireland and Flanders: And tho' he believ'd it would not be before the next Spring; yet he took a Journey almoſt in the midſt of Winter into Suffolk and Norfolk, to take Order for neceſſary Proviſions. And underſtanding by the way, that the Marqueſs Dorſet was coming to him, to clear himſelf of ſome Imputations charg'd upon him, he diſpatch'd the Earl of Oxford to meet him upon the Road, with Order to carry him to the Tower, and to let him know, That it was not done for his Deſerts, or for any ill Opinion of the King's, but to free him from the Danger of being perſuaded to undertake any Thing to his Prejudice, deſiring him to take this Uſage patiently, and promiſing to make him honourable and ſatisfactory Reparation. The King kept his Chriſtmaſs at Norwich; and went from thence by way of Devotion to our Lady of Wolſingham, and from thence return'd by Cambridge to London.

King Henry prepares againſt him.

The Earl of Lincoln's Arrival in Ireland, with ſo good a Force added to the Rebels Hopes: They were proud to ſee themſelves favour'd by the Dutcheſs, who had ſo readily aſſiſted 'em with Forces, and placed two ſuch Lords as Lincoln, and Lovel at the Head of them. At their Appearance, Lambert who was formerly proclaim'd King, had now the Ceremony of Coronation; and after ſome time ſpent in Conſultations, they all embark'd with great Numbers of the poorer ſort of Iriſhmen, better furniſh'd with Hopes than with Weapons. They landed at Fowdrey in Lancaſhire, with Lambert clad in Royal Apparel; and were conducted by the Earl of Lincoln and Kildare, and Viſcount Lovel, follow'd by the Dutchmen under Colonel Swart. Sir Thomas Broughton met them at their Landing, but with a few Men: They march'd towards York, and paſſed in a peaceable manner, to ſhew that lawful Kings came to relieve, not oppreſs their Subjects. But ſhortly after their Hopes began to grow cool, when they ſaw not any come to them in their Solitary March; eſpecially ſince they had moſt reaſon to expect many to join with them in that Country which was ſo much inclin'd to the Houſe of York and King Richard. But Viſcount Lovel having found no ſafety there, the Year before, they might believe they were not now likely to ſucceed better. Some were of Opinion, that the Alienation of theſe People proceeded from a Diſtaſte they took that two foreign Nations, the Dutch and Iriſh, ſhould pretend to preſent them with a King made by them: And tho' Henry the Fourth, Edward the Fourth, and the preſent King Henry had in like manner been preſented by Strangers, yet the caſe was different. The firſt and the Laſt were call'd in by a Part of the Kingdom, to free them from the two Richards, the Second and the Third; the one by divers Reaſons more ſolid than the other; and Edward the Fourth came of himſelf, building upon the Love of the People. Neither had Henry the Seventh given any Occasion of hatred, so as to cause him to be expell'd; rather the Opinion of his Worth, and his marrying with the House of York, had establish'd him. Moreover the Procession was made to St. Paul's, wherein the true Plantagenet was expos'd to view, and had caus'd the People not to regard the Impestor.

The Earl of Lincoln being reduc'd to this Necessity, resolv'd to hazard all upon the Issue of a Battel; and march'd towards Newark, with a Design first to make himself Master of that Place. In the mean time King Henry being arriv'd at Nottingham, a Council of War was held, in which it was debated whether it was better to protract time, or give Battel. The King was for the latter, being encourag'd by the Arrival of Six Thousand fighting Men, most of them Volunteers, under the Command of the Earl of Shrewsbury and the Lord Strange. And that the Enemy might not take the Advantage of Newark, the King encamp'd himself between them and the Town. Lincoln seeing himself closely persud, retir'd to a Village call'd Stoke, planting himself upon the Side of a Hill, from whence he descended as soon as the King presented him Battel; which was valiantly fought on both Sides, but for the Manner and Particulars, we have but an imperfect Account transmitted to us. It is related that of the King's three Battalions only the Vant-guard fought, and the other two mov'd not at all; which seems the more strange, because one half of the Vant-guard was cut in Pieces, and that the King should purchase the Victory at so dear a Rate. All the chief of the Enemy were Slain, as Lincoln, Kildare, Lovel, Broughton, and Colonel Swart; great Slaughter was made of unarm'd Infantry who mov'd not from the Posture they had plac'd themselves in the beginning of the Battel. The Conflict lasted three Hours; in which dy'd four Thousand of the Enemy, and one half of the King's Vant-guard, but not one of Quality on the Kings Side. The King was troubled at the Death of the Earl of Lincoln, because he was depriv'd of the Means of learning from him what Correspondence the Dutchess Margaret had in England. Many Prisoners were taken, among whom was Lambert himself, otherwise call'd Edward the Sixth, and Simon his Tutor and Seducer. The King out of Generosity would not take Lambert's Life, looking upon him as an Image moulded by the Hands of others; and likewise out of Wisdom, thinking that if he suffer'd Death, he would be too soon forgotten; but being kept alive, he would be a continual Spectacle, and a kind of Remedy against the like Inchantments of the People for the future. His Punishment was the Kitchen, where he was put to the vilest Employments; his Scepter and Crown were turn'd to Spits and Fire-locks. He continu'd in the Office of a Scullion, till by unknown Means he was preferred to be one of the Kings Falconers, in which Condition he dy'd, not leaving any further Occasion of Story. As to Simon, being a Priest, he was committed to a close Prison, and hear'd of no more.

After the Battel of Stoke, the King remov'd not from the Camp till he had given humble Thanks to God for the Victory; which he likewise did three Days successively at Lincoln, with Processions and other religious Ceremonies; and he sent his Standard to our Lady's Church at Walsingham, whither it had been devoted. He caus'd some of the Prisoners to be put to Death; but since it would have been thought too great a Cruelty to punish so many for one Crime, he was willing to commute the Blood of their Veins for that of their Purples, imposing pecuniary Punishments upon many in Yorkshire and other Parts, with which both he and they were satisfy'd. After that he went to Newcastle; from whence he sent Ambassadors to James the Third King of Scotland, to treat and conclude a Peace with him; but that King, labouring under many Inconveniences from discontented Subjects, he only obtain'd a Truce for seven Years; but with a Secret Promise of renewing it during both the Kings Lives. This Point being gain'd, King Henry return'd to London, where he enter'd in State and in a triumphant Manner: And now being taught by the last Events, that his Hatred to the House of York had been the Cause of his former Troubles, he prepared for the Coronation of his Queen; which was perform'd with great Solemnity on the twenty fifth Day of November, in the Third Year of his Reign, and two Years after his Marriage with her. Which strange and unusual Distance of Time, made it subject to every Person's Observation, that it was an Act against his Inclination, and forc'd upon him by Necessity and Reason of State. Soon after, to shew that all Suspicions were over, and that the Imprisonment of the Marquefs Dorset, was more from the Danger of the Times than the Man, he set him at Liberty without Examination, or any other degrading Circumstance. About the same time he dispatch'd an Ambassador to Pope Innocent the Eighth, to inform him of his Marriage and Success, to thank him for former Kindnesses, and to offer himself and his Kingdom to be at his Service upon all necessary Occasions. For which his Holiness, by way of Correspondency, gratify'd him, by moderating the Abuses of Sanctuaries, and other privileg'd Places; and by sending him a Bull, which prov'd a Check to Rebels and Traitors. In the same Year dy'd Thomas Bouchier Arch-bishop of Canterbury; and the famous John Morton, Bishop of Ely, succeeded in his Place, who was afterwards created Cardinal, and Lord-Chancellor of England.

Queen Elizabeth crown'd.

III. Hitherto King Henry had been employ'd in settling his Affairs at home; but about this Time there broke out an Occasion that caus'd him to look abroad, and harken to Foreign Affairs. Charles the Eighth, King of France, having by the Management and good Fortune of his two immediate Predecessors, receiv'd that Kingdom in a more flourishing and encreasing Condition than it had been for many Years before, and recover'd the Provinces of Anjou, Normandy, Provence, and Burgundy; he now cast his ambitious Eyes upon the Dukedom of Bretaign, resolving to annex and unite that to the Monarchy of France, and so to bring it to its ancient Bounds and Limits. Many Circumstances gave him Encouragement in this Attempt; as the Duke of Bretaign old, and fallen into a Lethargy, serv'd by mercenary Counsellors, Father only of two Daughters, the one sickly and not like to live long; on the other Side, himself in the Flower of his Age, his Subjects well train'd for War, and now in Peace with all the neighbouring Princes. He was apprehensive of no Disturbance but from the King of England, who had been under great Obligations to the Duke of Bretaign, and whose Interest it was not to suffer Bretaign to be join'd to the Monarchy of France. Therefore he dispatch'd Ambassadors to King Henry, who after several artificial Compliments represented to him, That their Master was enforc'd to enter into a just and necessary War with the Duke of Bretaign, who had receiv'd those who were Traitors and declar'd Enemies to his Person and State; and such as were of that Quality, as it was apparent they went not thither to protect their own Estates, but to invade his; among whom was the Duke of Orleans, the first Prince of the Blood, and the second Person of France. Therefore the War was defensive on his Side; that he perswad Rebels in a Prince's Country, who owing Homage to him ought not to receive them, and much less to join with them in the Conspiracy. Then they proceeded to insinuate, That if the Duke of Bretaign had formerly shown him Favour, he had destroy'd the Merit of it, since he sail'd on his part, so that he might have been utterly ruin'd and deliver'd up to King Richard: That their Master did not pretend to remind him of the Assistance and Favours receiv'd from him, which proceeded from meer Affection, and contrary to what Policy should have perswaded; since it had been more advantageous for him, that a Tyrant like Richard, should have reign'd in England, than so virtuous a King as himself: That if he would rightly weigh both their Services, he would find that his proceeded from true Friendship, and the Duke's from Self-Interest: That he did not desire a Requit of Assistance, knowing he was but newly possess'd of a Kingdom he had purchas'd with great Expence and Trouble;

The French King's Designs.

An Embassy to King Henry.

ble; but only that he would stand Neuter: That he would not by aiding the Duke, hinder the just Progress of his Arms, in punishing of Rebels, and correcting him who contrary to all Law had receiv'd them. But touching the Mystery of reuniting Bretaign to the Crown of France, either by War or Marriage with the Duke's Daughter, the Ambassadors carefully declin'd all Mention of it as what made most against them; but on the contrary declar'd the assur'd Purpose of their Master to marry, with the Daughter of Maximilian King of the Romans; and entertain'd the King with some wandering Discourses of their King's Design to recover the Kingdom of Naples, by an Expedition in Person: All to remove the King from all Jealousie of any Design upon Bretaign, otherwise than for suppressing some rebellious Subjects.

Which displeases King Henry.

King Henry was very uneasie at this Embassie, and after Advice taken with his Council, he answer'd to this Effect, That the King of France and the Duke of Bretaign, were the two Persons to whom he own'd the highest Obligations; therefore he should think himself very unhappy, if the Contest should arise to that Height as to hinder him from acquitting himself in Gratitude towards both; and that there was no Means for him, as a Christian King and a common Friend, to satisfy all Obligations both to God and Man, but to offer himself for a Mediator of Peace between them: By which Course he doubted not but their King's Honour and Estate would be preserv'd with more Safety and less Envy than by a War; and that he would spare no Cost or Labour to effect it, tho' it were that of a Pilgrimage. Then letting them know that he would express himself more fully by an Embassie, which he would speedily dispatch to the French King for that Purpose, he dismiss'd them with that Answer; carefully avoiding to understand any Thing touching the re-annexing of Bretaign, as the Ambassadors had avoided to mention it. He was sensible of the French King's Designs, and was resolv'd to prevent it, even by Force of Arms, if Necessity so requir'd. But he fully believ'd that Fortune would not prove so favourable to Charles, but that he might have Time to negotiate this Affair, grounding his Confidence upon the great Oppositions he had; on the one Side Maximilian's Arrival, on the other the Forces of Bretaign, and the Orleans in the Bowels of his Kingdom ready to raise a Civil War; together with the Inconstancy of his Youth, sufficient to make him change his Mind, and the whole Course of his Affairs.

He sends an Embassie into France.

Upon these probable Suppositions he sent over Christopher Ursenick his Chaplain into France, giving him in Commission, That if the French consented to treat he should immediately repair to the Duke of Bretaign, and conclude the Treaty on both Sides. Ursenick made Declaration to the French King, much to the Purpose of Henry's Answer to the French Ambassadors; tenderly instilling some Overture of receiving the Duke of Orleans into Favour, and some Conditions of Accommodation. But King Charles on the other Side proceeded with the utmost Art and Disimulation in the Treaty; designing only to gain time, and put off the English Succours under the Hopes of Peace, till he had got good Footing in Bretaign by Force of Arms. His Answer therefore to the Ambassador was, That he would put himself into King Henry's Hands, and make him Arbitrator of the Peace; and readily agreeing that he should go directly into Bretaign, to signify his Consent, and to know the Duke's Intentions; well foreseeing that the Duke of Orleans, who rul'd all in Bretaign, taking himself to be upon irreconcilable Terms with him, would admit of no Treaty of Peace. By which he should not only veil over his Ambition, and win the Reputation of a just and moderate Prince; but also endear himself in the Affections of the King of England, as one who had committed all to his Will. These Grounds being subtilly laid by the French King, all succeeded as was expected: For when Ursenick arriv'd at the Court of Bretaign, he found the Duke in no Capacity to treat with him, but all things were directed by the Duke of Orleans; who giving Audience to this Ambassador, return'd an Answer swer full of Resentments: That the Duke of Bretaign having been an Host, a Parent and a Protector, in time of greatest Necessities, he might justly have expected from the renown'd King Henry a number of brave Troops for his Succours, rather than a vain Treaty for Peace. And if the King should forget the Services done by the Duke, yet he well knew he would of his Wisdom consider of Futurity, how much it imported his own Safety and Reputation, not to suffer Bretaign to be swallow'd up by France, and so many good Ports and strong Towns upon the Coasts, to be in the Command of so potent a Neighbour, and so ancient an Enemy. And therefore he desir'd the King to think on this Affair as his own; and with that broke off, and deny'd any further Conference for a Treaty.

Ursenick first return'd to the French King, and related what had pass'd to him; who finding Matters according to his Desire, speciously made Answer, That considering in whose Possession the Duke of Bretaign was, there was no Hopes of Peace, but a mix'd Treaty of Force and Persuasion; and therefore he would proceed on the one, desiring King Henry would not desist from the other: But for his own Part, he faithfully promis'd to be still in the King's Power to govern him in the Matter of Peace. This was accordingly represented by Ursenick at his Return, in such a Manner, as if the Treaty was in no Degree desperate, but rather waited for a more nice and proper Conjuncture. Whereupon there continually pass'd Packets and Dispatches between the two Kings concerning this Negotiation; from one out of Desire, and the other of Dissimulation. During this Intercourse, the French King invaded Breitaign with a great Force, and laid close Siege to the City of Nantes; and as one well vers'd in the worst kind of Policy, the more he urg'd the Prosecution of the War, he at the same time did more urge the Solicitation of the Peace. In so much that during the Siege of Nantes, after many Letters and particular Messages, the better to maintain his Dissimulation, and to refresh the Treaty, he sent D'Aubigny, a Person of Quality to King Henry, earnestly desiring him to make an end of the Business depending. Which caus'd the King to send over three Commissioners, the Abbot of Abington, Sir Richard Tunstall, and his Chaplain Ursenick formerly employ'd, to do their utmost Endeavours to perfect the Treaty and render it effectual.

During the Negotiation, the Lord Woodville, Uncle to the Queen, a gallant Gentleman and ambitious of Honour, desir'd leave to go and assist the Duke of Breitaign with a Troop of Volunteers, with whom he would steal over privately, so that the French King should have no Occasion to complain of any but himself. It is not known whether the King secretly consented to it, but in publick he deny'd his Request, commanding him not to depart from the Court. Notwithstanding which, he went to the Isle of Wight, where he was Governour, and there rais'd four hundred fighting Men, with whom he sail'd into Breitaign; which caus'd such an Alteration among some of the Courtiers of France; that the English Commissioners would have been roughly treated, had not King Charles, conscious of his own Dissimulation, and not fearing four hundred Men, prevented all ill Usage to them and their Followers. The Commissioners now discovering that King's Design, returned into England, and acquainted King Henry, that all his Desire of Peace was but counterfeit, the better to gain Time, and to make him lose the Opportunity of hindering his Attempts upon Breitaign. Upon this King Henry call'd a Parliament; in which Supplies being granted, he rais'd Monies and muster'd Soldiers; and to keep a Decency towards the French King, to whom he acknowledg'd himself oblig'd, he sent a new Embassie to him to intimate the Decrees and Resolutions of his Parliaments, and to reiterate his Motion, That the French would desist from Hostilities; or if War must ensue, to take it as the Acts of his People, who being sensible of the Cause of the Breitaigns as their ancient Friends and Confederates, had sent them Succours; further protesting, that to preserve all Treaties Treaties and Laws of Friendship, he had limited his Force to proceed only in Aid of the Bretaigns, and not to War upon the French, otherwise than to maintain the Possession of Bretaign. But before this formal Embassie could arrive, the Duke's Party had receiv'd a terrible Blow near the Town of St. Albine, where the Duke of Orleans and the Prince of Orange were taken Prisoners, six thousand of the same Side slain, with the Lord Woodvile and almost all his Soldiers: The French lost twelve hundred Men with their Leader James Galeot, a great Commander. King Henry understanding this Defeat, sent over eight thousand fighting Men into Bretaign, under the Conduct of the Lord Brook, who joining themselves with the Duke's Forces, march'd towards the Enemy the French, who knowing they lov'd not to encamp themselves, but to come to Battel, thought to cool their Ardor by entrenching their Army, and sallying out with their Light-Horse; which they did, but with more Loss than Advantage, especially from the English Archers. But during these Transactions, the Duke of Bretaign left the World; upon whose Death, the Principal Persons of that Country, partly being bought, and partly through Faction, threw all Things into Confusion; so that the English not finding Head nor Body with whom to join their Forces, and being justly jealous of their Friends, as well as in Danger from their Enemies, and the Season advancing, they return'd home five Months after their Landing. So that the Battel of St. Albine, the Death of the Duke, and the Retreat of the English Succours, were follow'd a short time after by the Loss of that Dukedom; which some accounted as a Blemish of King Henry's Judgment, but most as no more than a Misfortune of his Time. In sum, the treacherous Proceedings of a King of no profound Reach or Judgment, prevail'd more than the Policy of one of the wisest Princes in Christendom.

Tho' the temporary Fruit of the Parliament, in their Assistance given to Bretaign, did not prosper; yet the lasting Fruit of it, which was wise and good Laws, prosper'd for many Years, and most of them to this Day; particularly one that made it Capital for any Person to marry an Heiress by Force. But in the raising the Subsidies granted for the Expedition into Bretaign, great Disturbances arose in Yorkshire and the Bishoprick of Durham; which two Counties positively deny'd the Payment of any Tax. They alledg'd that they had suffer'd great Grievancies the last Years past, and were not able to bear any more; which Refusal proceeded from the old Affection they bore to the House of York, which with every Motion arose and floated with all other Considerations. The Commissioners for the assessing and collecting this Tax, wanting Means to enforce them, knew not how to proceed; for each of these two Counties had given in a direct Negative to the Act of Parliament. They went therefore to the King's Friend the Earl of Northumberland to consult with him, who wrote to the King upon that Subject; and receiv'd Answer, That the Subsidies being given by Parliament, and pay'd by all the rest of the Kingdom, he was resolv'd not to recede from one Penny of his Right. The Earl calling together the principal Gentlemen and Free-holders of the County, in an impetuous Manner acquainted them with the King's Answer; which many believing to have been invented by his own Head, the meaner Sort of the People broke into his House, and murder'd him, together with many of his Servants. And not resting here, they chose Sir John Tyremond for their Head, a factious Person, who hated King Henry; and being also animated by a base Person, nam'd John a Chamber, an Incendiary much esteem'd by the Vulgar, they broke out into open Rebellion, and in the planned Terms declar'd, They would go against King Henry, and fight with him for the Maintenance of their Liberties. Upon which the King commanded Thomas Earl of Surrey, whom he had lately releas'd out of the Tower, to march and reduce them; which he soon did by defeating them, and taking Chamber Prisoner. Tyremond fled into Flanders to the Dutchess of Burgundy; Chamber was hang'd upon a high Gallows at York and some others of the principal of them were hang'd a little lower round about him.

him. Nor did the King omit his Custom to be first or second in all his war-like Exploits; making good his usual Saying when he heard of Rebels, That he desir'd but to see them: For he march'd after in Person; and tho' in his Journey he heard the News of the Victory, yet he went as far as York, where he settled all the Taxes without the least Abatement.

About the same Time that the King lost so good a Servant, as the Earl of Northumberland, he likewise lost a faithful Friend and Allie in James the Third King of Scotland; who was brought to a miserable Period rather by evil Counsel, than evil Nature. He had naturally good Inclinations; but they were all poison'd by the Practice of a sort of People, that has been ever ominous and contagious to all Princes: His Thirst after absolute Sovereignty was insatiable; and he esteem'd not his legal Authority, but sought for what was not permitted by the Constitutions of his Kingdom; so that his Ruin arose from his hating the Liberty of such as give him good Counsel; and loving Flattery in those who advis'd him ill. The Discontent and Hatred of many of his Nobility and People, breaking forth by Degrees into seditious Alterations at Court, this unfortunate Prince was at last detested by them; so that taking up Arms, and surprizing the Person of Prince James his Son, partly by Force and partly by Threats, they compell'd him to head their Party. Whereupon King James made Application to the two Kings of England and France, and likewise to Pope Innocent the Eighth; who highly resented this Treatment, and might have succour'd him in good Time, if he had had Patience to expect them in the Castle of Edinburgh, a Place sufficiently safe. But he judging Strivelin to be a more convenient Place to receive those whom he expected from the Northern Parts of his Kingdom, was in marching thither at Bannock's Bourn engag'd and defeated: Whereupon retiring to a Water-Mill, in hopes of saving himself in certain Vessels not far off, he was there miserably slain; and James the Fourth his Son, by way of Penance girt himself with a Chain of Iron, to which he added one Link every Year after as long as he liv'd. The Pope had dispatch'd away Adrian de Corneto, upon this Occasion for Scotland, a Man of noble Qualifications, who came to London two Days before the News of this unfortunate Accident. Designing to return, he was honourably entertain'd, and became in great Favour with King Henry, and no less Familiarity and Friendship with Morton the Chancellor. Insomuch that the King, finding him agreeable to his Inclinations, preferr'd him to the Bishoprick of Hereford, and afterwards to Bath and Wells, and employ'd him in many of his Affairs of State, that had Relation to the Court of Rome. He was a Man of great Learning, Wisdom and Dexterity in Business of State; and having not long after ascended to the Degree of Cardinal, he greatly paid the King, in his diligent and judicious Advertisements of the Occurrences of Italy.

Troubles in Scotland.

James the Third slain.

In the latter End of the Fourth Year of this Reign the King again call'd a Parliament, more for the making of good Laws, than for the raising of any Subsidies. This Prince was always a celebrated Law-giver; and among many good Laws in this Parliament, one was made to prevent Depopulations by Inclosures, with so much Care and Policy, that the military Power was thereby advanc'd, the middle Sort encourag'd, and the exorbitant Power of the Nobility in course diminish'd. Nor did the King in this Parliament throw off his Cares and Hopes concerning Bretaign, but thought to recover all by Policy, tho' his Arms had been unfortunate, and to deprive the French King of the Fruit of his Victory. The Sum of his Design was to encourage Maximilian King of the Romans to proceed in his Suit for the Marriage of Anne the Heiress of Bretaign, and to assist him in the Consummation of it. But Maximilian was then reduc'd to great Straits by a Rebellion of his Subjects in Flanders, who made him Prisoner in the Town of Bruges, and oblig'd him to swear to several unreasonable Things. And tho' this Indignity was resented by his Father the Emperor; yet it was never effectually reveng'd; but the Inhabitants were so exasperated that the Lord Ravenstien took Occasion to join with the Lord Cordes Governour of Picardy, and to seize upon Ipres and Sluce, while the other besieged the Town of Dixmude. King Henry not willing to break with France, nor yet to let Flanders be lost, sent over the Lord Morley with a thousand Men to the Lord D'Aubigny, Governour of Calais, with secret Instructions to assist Maximilian, and to raise the Siege of Dixmude. This was so well obey'd, that to those thousand another thousand being added, which he drew from the Garrisons of Guisnes and Hammes, he pass'd over the Water of Graveling by Night, and got into Newport; where augmenting his Forces by six hundred Germans, and led on by a trusty Guide into Dixmude, while the Enemy had no Suspicion of it, he set upon them unawares, and was victorious, with the Slaughter of eight thousand Men, and the gaining of all their Artillery and Baggage. The English only lost about a hundred Men, and the Lord Morley himself; and the Lord D'Aubigny return'd to Calais, leaving his wounded Men with some Volunteers at Newport. The Lord Cordes being at Ipres with twenty thousand Men, thinking to recover the Disgrace at Dixmude, immediately invested Newport; and making a furious Attack upon it, he succeeded so far as to take the principal Fort or Tower, and to set up the French Standard upon it. Yet they were soon after beaten from it by the English and the Help of some fresh Succours of Archers, by good Fortune arriving at that Instant in the Haven of Newport: Which so discourag'd the Lord Cordes, that he immediately broke up the Siege and retir'd. By this Means Affairs became more exasperated between the two Kings of England and France; and the more by the vain Words of the Lord Cordes, who declar'd himself an open Enemy to the English, beyond what belong'd to the present Service, making it a common Saying of his, That he could be content to lye seven Tears in Hell, so he might win Calais from the English.

Reg. 5.

The King of the Romans contracted to the Heiress of Bretaign.

King Henry not satisfy'd in assisting Maximilian with his Arms, endeavour'd to do the like by his Counsel; persuading him to resume the Marriage with the Heiress of Bretaign. Which Maximilian accordingly perform'd, and so far prevail'd with the young Lady, and the principal Persons about her, as the Marriage was consummated by Proxy, with a Ceremony unknown in these Parts. For she was not only publickly contracted, but stated as a Bride, and solemnly bedded; and whilst she lay in Bed, Maximilian's Ambassador came in, and in the Presence of several of the Nobility, put his naked Leg between the Espousal Sheets; that the Ceremony might be thought to amount to a Consummation, and actual Knowledge. After which the publick Proclamations were made in the Names of 'Maximilian and Anne by the Grace of God, King and Queen of the Romans, Duke and Dutches of Bretaign, &c. But Maximilian thinking himself secure, very imprudently neglected the Prosecution of this Affair, and proceeded to other Matters less material. In the mean Time, the French King, after a Consultation with his Divines, proceeded more effectually, and by secret Instruments and subtle Agents of both Sexes about the young Lady, first sought to remove the Point of Religion and Honour out of the Mind of the Lady her self, in which there was a double Labour. For Maximilian was not only contracted to the Lady, but Maximilian's Daughter was likewise contracted to the French King. For the Contract with the French King, it was readily alledg'd that Maximilian's Daughter being under Years of Consent, it was not obligatory, but dissolvable at Pleasure. But for the other Contract, the French King's Friends could only alledge, That it being done without the Consent of her Sovereign Lord King Charles, whose Ward and Client she was, it was sufficient to vacate any Contract whatsoever, tho' it could not vacate a Marriage after Cohabitation and actual Consummation. As for the Ceremonial Consummation, they made Sport with it, and declar'd, That it was an Argument that Maximilian was a Widower and a cold Lover, who could content himself to be a Bridegroom by Deputy.

puty, and would not take a small Journey to put all out of Question. So that the young Lady, wrought upon by these Reasons, finely instill'd by the French King's Agents; and allur'd likewise by the Youth and Grandeur of the Monarch, and fearing to make her Country the Seat of a ruinous War, at length she secretly yielded to accept of the French King for her Husband.

The French King breaks the Contract.

But during this secret Treaty with the Lady, the better to secure it from Opposition and Interruption, King Charles had recourse to his usual Arts, and sent a solemn Embassie to King Henry, to treat of a Peace and a League with him; joining it with an Article in the Nature of a Request, That the French King, according to his Right of Sovereignty and Tutelage, might with the King of England's Leave dispose of the Marriage of the young Dutchess of Bre-Bretaign, as he should think good; offering by a Judicial Process to make void the Marriage of Maximilian by Proxy. This was the Design and Substance of the Embassie, which was deliver'd in a long formal Oration, fill'd with Compliments and Artifice, and with amusing Declarations of the French King's Designs of recovering the Kingdom of Naples, and conquering the Ottoman Empire. And the better to effect this Matter, the French King continu'd in his Court and Custody the Daughter of Maximilian, who had formerly been sent to him, to be bred and educated in France; and still caus'd it to be reported, that he design'd to proceed in that Match. As for the Dutchess of Bre-Bretaign, he desir'd only to preserve the Right of Sovereignty, and give her in Marriage to some Allie, as might depend upon him. King Henry was much displeas'd at the Embassie, well perceiving the ambitious Designs of the French King, and that Bre-Bretaign would now be lost. Therefore he resolv'd to make use of that as a just Pretence for War, but at the same time not to discourage the other's Designs upon the Kingdom of Naples. His Answer deliver'd to the Ambassadors was full of Caution and Regard to the present Circumstances; yet he directly renew'd his Claim to the Dominions of France, or at least to such a Tribute as might be proportionable to what he ought to hold in Possession. The Ambassadors were surpriz'd at this Demand, and in some Heat declar'd, That their Master's Sword would be sufficient to maintain his Scepter, and after some other Discourses, they were all dismis'd but one, and a new Embassie dispatch'd from King Henry into France. All this prov'd of no Effect; for not long after, the King of France, breaking through all Difficulties, publicly marry'd Anne Dutchess of Bre-Bretaign, and took the Dukedom into his own Hands; having lately sent home the Daughter of Maximilian. About the same Time was born the King's second Son Henry, who afterwards reign'd by the Name of Henry the Eighth.

His subtle Managements with King Henry.

King Henry VIII born.

Maximilian now perceiving that he was doubly defeated at one Blow, both as to the Marriage of his Daughter and his own, he lost all Patience, and casting off the Respect due to Princes, he fell to violent Invectives against the Person and Actions of the French King: Declaring him To be the most perfidious Person in the World, who had made a Marriage compounded between an Adultery and a Rape; permitted by the just Judgment of Heaven, that the Nullity being apparent to the World, the Progeny of a Manso unworthy might not reign in France. And immediately he sent Ambassadors both to King Henry and to Ferdinand King of Spain, to excite them to War, and to enter into a League offensive against France, promising to concur with great Forces of his own. Upon which King Henry call'd a Parliament, and propos'd the War to the Nobility and Gentry, rousing them by the Fame of the glorious Victories at Cressy, Poictiers and Agencourt, and encouraging them to grant suitable Supplies for so great an Occasion. This had its Effects, and the War with France was with much Chearfulness approv'd of in Parliament; which judg'd that the Honour of the King and Kingdom had suffer'd by the Loss of Bre-Bretaign. But the King's Intentions were very different from what they appear'd: He knew that he could not rely upon the Forces of Maximilian, who was so weak of him-

himself; nor upon those of Ferdinand, who had exhausted his Powers by the Wars of Granada. He also knew that France was now entire, and at Unity within it self, and never so powerful for many Years before; and that it was now come to a Custom of Encamping cautiously, and not to fight but with apparent Advantage, which would weary his People, weaken his Forces, and impoverish his Kingdom. Finding therefore these Inconveniencies and Difficulties, he projected for the gaining of two Points: The one how to make the War turn to his Profit, and the other how to recede from it with the Security of his Honour. For Profit it was to be made two Ways, upon his Subjects for the War, and upon his Enemies for a Peace: For the Point of Honour, he knew that as he could not trust to the Assistance of Ferdinand and Maximilian; so the Impotence of one, and the double Proceedings of the other, would give him a fair Occasion to accept of a Peace. These Things he wisely foresaw, and did as artificially manage; by which every thing succeeded according to Expectation. The Parliament readily consented that Commissioners should go forth, for the gathering and levying a Benevolence from the more able Sort; which Tax, call'd Benevolence, was invented by Edward the Fourth, for which he sustain'd much Envy, and was abolish'd in Parliament by Richard the Third to engratiate himself with the People. It was now reviv'd by this King, with the Consent of Parliament, which was otherwise in King Edward's Time, and rais'd exceeding great Sums; insomuch that the City of London contributed more than nine thousand Pounds. In this Parliament Liberty was given for all Men to sell or mortgage their Lands without Fines for Alienation, to furnish themselves with Mony for the War; which prov'd a great Step to the Diminution of the Estates and the exorbitant Power of the Nobility.

Succours sent

Henry.

King Henry having got great Sums by the Means of Benevolences, in a short Time rais'd a powerful Army; and knowing that King Charles had renew'd his ancient Confederacy with James the Fourth King of Scotland, he proclaim'd War against them both; but not without Suspicion that Maximilian would fail him at his greatest Need. For tho' his Wants and Weaknesses were capable of Remedy, if he were succour'd against his Subjects that molested him, yet his Nature was incapable of it. It was impossible for him to maintain ten thousand Men for two Years, according to his Promise; tho' being inrag'd at his double Affront, he hop'd to raise something out of nothing. But what still weaken'd this Prince was the Rebellion of the Lord Ravestein, who being supported by the French King, had possess'd himself of Gaunt and Bruges, the chief Cities of that Country; and then made himself Master of Sluce, and the two Castles that were its Security, seiz'd upon the Ships, and hinder'd the Commerce of the whole Country. The Duke of Saxony, Lieutenant to Maximilian soon found Means to invest Bruges and Sluce, but could not take the latter without Forces by Sea; wherefore he sent News of his Wants to England. King Henry being desirous to support Maximilian, sent twelve Ships well furnish'd with Men and Ammunition under the Command of Sir Edward Poynings; who having block'd up the Haven of Sluce, besieg'd the Town by Sea, while the Duke did the like by Land, and play'd with his Cannon upon the two Castles in which the Preservation of the Town consisted. They were valiantly defended for twenty Days, in which Space the Earl of Oxford's Brother was slain; and might have held out longer, had not the Besiegers in the Night burnt the Bridge built between the two Castles, which forc'd them to surrender, together with the Town of Sluce. Bruges soon follow'd, which gave Occasion for many others to do the like.

In the mean time King Henry past the Summer in ordering his Soldiers for his Expedition into France; and finding himself in a Readiness, he sent Sir John Risley and Ursenick to Maximilian, to agree upon the Place for Meeting: But finding him utterly unprovided, they sent secret Advice to the King, and waited for his further Commands. The King, who suspected the same, praised their their Discretion, and commanded them to tarry 'till new Directions were sent them, and to conceal that Prince's Weakness, that his Men might not be discourag'd. His Army was compos'd of twenty five thousand Foot, and sixteen hundred Horse; the chief Nobility flocking to it, some to purchase Merit, and others to avoid Disgrace in not following their King. He landed at Calais on the sixth Day of October, which caus'd many to admire that he should undertake so great a War at so late a Season. But these Difficulties serv'd him to make his People believe what he never design'd; declaring That since he intended a resolute War, 'till he had conquer'd France, the Season was of no Importance, having Calais at his Command, from whence he might easily draw out his Army, in the Spring. As soon as he was landed, the English Ambassadors from Flanders certify'd him that there were no hopes of Assistance from Maximilian, who was altogether unprovided of Men and Mony. This was made known, and spread through the Army; and tho' the English were no ways discourag'd, yet it was a kind of Preparative to a Peace. To work the same Effect, there came Letters from the Lord Cordes, with an Overture for Peace in behalf of the French King; which contain'd such Conditions, as it would have been unreasonable not to have harken'd to it. From other Parts it was confirm'd that King Ferdinand had agreed with him, having receiv'd from him the County of Roussillon, without repaying the Mony for which it was mortgag'd to him: This made all Men see a Necessity of Peace. King Henry notwithstanding, playing the Game with Art, deputed the Bishop of Exeter and the Lord D'Aubigny to meet the Lord Cordes; while he, without Delay, on the nineteenth Day of October, went and invested the Town of Boloign, a Place well fortify'd and garrison'd, and not to be taken without much Time and Blood. Boloign was besieg'd near a Month without any memorable Action, and when all Things were ready for a general Assault, News was brought that a Peace was concluded, to the great Surprize of most of the Army, who had great Hopes of extraordinary Advantages. In effect it was rather a Bargain than a Treaty, in which King Henry was to receive from the French King seven hundred forty five thousand Crowns at present, for the Charge of this Expedition; and twenty five thousand Crowns yearly, for his Charges sustain'd in the assisting Bretaign. This Annuity was left somewhat indefinitely, when it should determine or expire; which caus'd the English to esteem it as a real Tribute, carry'd under fair Terms: For in Reality it was paid both to the King, and to his Son Henry the Eighth, longer than it could continue upon any Computation of Charges. The French King also assign'd great Pensions and rich Gifts for the present to all King Henry's principal Counsellors and Ministers: Which whether the King permitted, to save his own Purse from Rewards, or to communicate to them the Envy of this Treaty, was diversly interpreted. For unquestionably the King had no Inclination to own this Peace; and therefore not long before the Conclusion, he secretly prevail'd with some of his chief Officers to advise him to a Peace under their Hands, in the Nature of a Petition. This Peace was pleasing to both the Kings; but gave great Discontent to some of the Nobility, and principal Persons of the Army, who had either sold or engag'd their Estates, upon the Hopes of the War. They took the liberty to say, That the King valu'd not the plundering his Nobility and People, to feather himself: And some made Sport with what the King had said in his Parliament, That when the War was once begun, he would make it pay it self; declaring, The King hath literally kept his Promise. Having risen from Boloign, at Calais he wrote to the Mayor and Aldermen of London, applauding the great Sums he had obtain'd; well knowing that the full Coffers of the King was always good News to the City. Upon the seventeenth Day of December, he arriv'd at Westminster, where he kept his Christmases.

Now as if every Thing had contributed to fill the House of Spain with Honour and Riches, that they might transfer it to the House of Austria, it happen'd almost at the same Time that Christopher Columbus a Genoese discover'd the new World of America; which prov'd vastly advantagious to the Spanish Monarchy, and from its Riches obtain'd the Name of the West-Indies.

A. D. 1492. Reg. 2. IV. King Henry, having concluded all his Affairs with France, at the same time begun to be haunted with new Spectres rais'd by the Fascinations of the Dutchess Margaret, who could never be at rest 'till she had produc'd a new Duke of York to embroil the Affairs of this King. This prov'd a more exquisite Counterfeit than Lambert Symnel, more finely done, and own'd by greater Hands, the King of France and Scotland, as well as the Dutchess her self. As for Lambert, his greatest Excellency was his beautiful Presence, and that he did not mis-become his Robes; but this Youth exceeded all former Actors, and became one of the strangest Examples of Personation, that ever was known in elder or later Times. The Dutchess Margaret had entertain'd an irreconcilable Hatred against Henry and the House of Lancaster, insomuch that she valu'd no Fraud nor Injustice, so she might oppress it, tho' her own Niece was so nearly concern'd in the Happiness of it. For which Reason she had formerly favour'd Lambert, whom Simon had set up; but failing in that Design plotted by a Priest, she resolv'd to contrive one her self, and to make so hard and intricate a Knot, as neither Henry's Wisdom, nor Sword, should be able to untie, or cut in funder. The Person she design'd for this new Duke of York was a Youth of mean Extract, whose Father was a Jew, turn'd Christian, nam'd John Osbeck, dwelling at Tourney, 'till being necessitated by some Occasions, he went with his Wife to London, where she bore him this Son. There King Edward did the Child the Honour to be his God-Father, which caus'd many to believe he had some secret Interest in him; and some were of Opinion that he had really begotten him. He was nam'd Peter, which according to the Custom of the Dutch Tongue, was converted to Perkin; and those who did not first know him gave him the Sirname of Warbeck, so that that Name which arose first from Ignorance, was afterwards by Custom continu'd to him. His Father returning to Flanders, afterwards sent him to Antwerp, and from thence to other Parts of the World; so that at length his Travels and Conversation with divers Nations, did not only make him skilful in many Languages, but also adapted him to all Mens Humours and Customs.

His Birth and Education.

This Youth was accidentally presented to the Dutchess, as most proper for her Designs, which gave her great Satisfaction; having all requisite Qualifications, as Years, Beauty, Wit, Comeliness, and Majesty. She took an Affection to him for being God-Son to her Brother; and the more because of his beauty she might judge him to be his natural Son: An Opinion which made her form and transform him with the greater Care and Diligence. She consider'd of all that was to be instill'd into his Mind, or affix'd in his Actions: She omitted nothing that might make him exactly personate the deceas'd Duke of York; and decipher'd to him, as in so many Pictures, the Lineaments, Resemblances and Behaviour of those of the Blood Royal, as of the King, Queen, Prince and Princess; of the first he was to speak as of his Father and Mother, of the rest as his Brothers and Sisters. She bethought her self what Questions might be ask'd him, and prepar'd him with such Answers as might become his Years: She did the like concerning such past Occurrences as might have fallen within his Knowledge, and forgot not the Particulars of the Sanctuary; how the Queen with the Duke of York fled thither; how he was taken from thence; how he was sent with his Brother to the Tower; the manner of their living there; the Ser-Servants that attended them; their terrible Apprehensions, and the Providential Manner of his Escape. She chiefly taught him how to counterfeit innate Nobility, in which he was so docible, that he thought himself the very Duke of York whom he personated; and she so adapted the Places of his Peregrination to the Times, that when he should discourse of what had there hapned to him, he might readily be credited. And finding him of a miraculous Capacity, and a Penetration beyond his Years, she took a particular Delight to instruct him, and was transported with the Image of her own forming. She continually kept him in her most private Recesses, not trusting him to the Air, for the chief Part of this Mystery was, to make the World believe she had never seen him. When afterwards she perceiv'd that King Henry so proceeded in the Affairs of Bretaign, as he must of Necessity break with France, she thought it best to keep him no longer, but first to send him into Portugal, under the Conduct of an English Lady, where he continu'd almost a Year; all which was done, that when he was to appear in publick, it might be from a third Place. In Portugal he had Directions sent him to pass into Ireland; for Henry having declar'd War against France, it was judg'd a proper Time to molest him, and to begin this grand Metamorphosis.

According to Order, he went into Ireland, and made his Abode in Cork; where at his first Appearance, he was esteem'd a Person of great Consequence: For his graceful Deemeanor, and his Plenty of Mony and other Things, were sufficient to make the People mistake one Thing for another. Having for a while kept them in Suspence, by a sort of Force, he acknowleg'd himself to be the Duke of York, who having escap'd out of the Tower, and pass'd through various Fortunes, was come to that Kingdom, in Hopes that the Affection it had ever born to his House, would now continue firm to him. King Henry at that Time was not pass'd into France, but was making Preparations for that Expedition; so that the French King hearing of this Apparition in Ireland, thought it might make for his Advantage to have him with him, either to molest King Henry, if he continu'd in Hostility, or to make his Peace upon easier Terms. Accordingly he sent one Stephen Trion, a Secretary which had revolted from King Henry together with another, as Ambassadors to Perkin, inviting him to come into France, and offering to assist him in the Regaining of England. An Invitation that blew up the extravagant Vanity of this Impostor for being chosen by the Dutcheß of Burgundy, receiv'd by the Kingdom of Ireland, and encourag'd by so great a Monarch, he concluded that Fortune never undertook so vast a Business without finishing it. When he had acquainted his chief Friends in Ireland with this Invitation, and by that gain'd new Credit and Reputation, he went to France, where he was receiv'd by the King with all Honour due to the Duke of York: He call'd him by that Title, and accordingly furnish'd him with Mony, Horse and Servants, and with a Guard of Soldiers under the Command of the Lord Congreschal: Sir George Nevil and Sir John Taylor, with above a hundred other English Men, waited continually upon him; and the Court to follow the Prince's Example, shew'd him the like Respect. All this was done out of Policy; for the French King must needs have more than a bare Guess that this Business was an Imposture. His Glory was not long liv'd here, for the Difference being ended between the two Kings, it was necessary for him to remove. King Henry demanded to have him deliver'd into his Hands; but the other esteeming it an unworthy Action, refus'd to do it; only he oblig'd him to depart his Kingdom. Perkin retir'd into Flanders, where the Dutcheß and he acted their Parts with the utmost Exactness: He seem'd as if he had never been in that Country; and she, as if she had never seen him before: He pretended to fly thither as to a Sanctuary under the Protection of an Aunt, who ought to profess her self his Mother: She feign'd great Fears of being deceiv'd, as being taught Caution by Lambert's Example; and that this might be a Counterfeit as well as he. She oftentimes sent for him, pretending to make an exact Scrutiny; at first seeming very doubtful, afterwards not clearly satisfy'd, and then more inclining to believe well. At last she broke out into an Admiration, and Thanksgiving to the Divine Providence, that had Commiseration for innocent Blood, and had vouchsaf'd so miraculously to preserve him. Then with extraordinary Passion she call'd him Nephew, the Bud of the white Rose, the Hope of the House of York, and the Restorer of the Honour of England; and assign'd him a Guard of thirty Halberdiers. Now every one began to think him really him whom he personated; insomuch that if he were respected in France as a foreign Prince, he was little less than worship'd in Flanders, by all that affected the Dutcheſs.

Various Censures in England.

This News being brought into England, it was there greedily swallow'd by many: Passions and Fancies augmented this Belief in such as were of that Faction, in those who desir'd Novelties, in such as were discontented, and in many that were Lovers of Equity: For the Crown had neither belong'd to Henry nor his Wife, if her Brother had been alive. Hereupon arose Whisperings, Liberty of Discourse and Complaints: The present ill Government was in every Man's Mouth; the endless Impositions, the King's insatiable Avarice, which was the Cause of a dishonourable Peace, and the no less dishonourable Loss of Bretaign. The Nobility were disoblig'd and disgusted at the small Account the King made of them; so that most Mens Imaginations met in the same Point, That God being a just Judge, had preserv'd the true Heir so seat him again in his Throne, which had been twice usurp'd from him. For Henry had no Right to it himself, and wav'd the Right of his Wife, that he might reign alone; therefore it was not to be admir'd, if after so much Injustice, God had rais'd up his Brother-in-Law to punish him. Nor did the Matter end only in Discourse; for there were some Persons of great Quality, who were resolv'd to sound the Bottom of it; among whom were the Lord Chamberlain Sir William Stanley, Brother to King Henry's Father-in-law, the Lord Fitzwater, Sir Simon Montfort, and Sir Thomas Thwaite. These made choice of some Persons of Note to send into Flanders, that upon their Relation, they might ground their Resolutions; but of many, only two wou'd undertake a Business, which if fictitious, might turn to their Ruin. Sir Robert Clifford and William Barley were the Two, both of good Families; who upon their Arrival at Flanders, were receiv'd with great Honour by the Dutcheſs: And having long discours'd with Clifford, that she might understand the Intentions of those that sent them, she brought him to a Sight of Perkin. After many Days Conversation with him, Clifford wrote back into England, That he was the real Duke of York, and that he knew his Person as well as he knew his own.

*King Henry's
politick Management.*

The politick King on his Part was not asleep; yet he thought if he began to arm and levy Forces he should immediately give too much Honour to the Idol. Nevertheless he shut up the Ports, that no suspected Persons might pass; and for the rest he chose to work by Countermine. He had two distinct Designs; the one to lay open the Abuse, and the other to break the Knot of the Conspirators. To detect the Abuse, he had only two Ways; the first to satisfy the World that the Duke of York was really murder'd; and the other to prove, that whether he was dead or alive, Perkin was an Impostor. For the first he secur'd Sir James Tyrel, and his Servant John Dighton, the only two that remain'd alive of the four who were concern'd in the Murder; for Miles Forest, the second who slew the Princes, and the Priest who bury'd them, were dead. They depos'd, That Tyrel saw them dead after they were smother'd; that he caus'd them to be bury'd underneath the Stairs, and cover'd them with a Stone; from whence, by King Richard's Order they were afterwards remov'd, and rebury'd by the Ministers of the Tower, but in what Place they knew not. But the King not satisfy'd with these Testimonies, to divert the Danger, and satisfy the World, he proceeded to search into Perkin's Condition and Descent. He employ'd certain select Friends, and dispers'd them throughout all Flanders: Those

Those who were not to stay in any settled Place, were order'd diligently to enquire after his Birth, and to give him daily Advice of what they should learn: The other, who were to reside where he was, were to counterfeit themselves Fugitives and Well-Wishers to his Party, and to profess that they were come to run the like Fortune with him. These were more particularly to search out the Designs and Correspondencies; they were to grow familiar with Perkin's best Friends, and to insinuate to them the Vanity of the Undertaking, in going to cope with a wise King, not to be beaten without extraordinary Forces; that the Dutchess's Favours were not answerable to their Occasions; that they wanted Aid, and were not certain of what they presum'd to be secure, which was the Assistance of the Party, and the Peoples Inclinations, both which were ineffectual. For such accurate diligent Provision was made, that all Men would forbear to declare themselves, unless they might be encourag'd by the Sight of a powerful Army, which the Duke of York could not shew them, tho' all Flanders were to declare for him. But their chief Care was to sound Clifford by tasting him with fair Promises; for to win him over, was almost to gain the Cause, he being the Cabinet of secret Correspondencies between Flanders and England. Nor did they find much Difficulty in effecting it; for being brought to the Knowledge of the Impostor, he was at length prevail'd upon with the Promises both of Pardon and Reward.

In the mean Time, Henry, by a particular Cast of Policy, caus'd all his Agents in Flanders to be excommunicated in St. Paul's, and declar'd his Enemies, that they might not be suspected his Friends; nor did he forbear, contrary to the Rules of the Church, to solicit the Confessors of the greatest Men, that he might learn how they were inclin'd. At length his Agents came to the perfect Knowledge of Perkin's Birth, Name, Surname, Country, Employments, and Voyages, 'till he was chang'd into the Duke of York: They likewise won over Clifford, who gave them such Proofs of his Repentance, as satisf'd the King. Perkin's Genealogy was publish'd in the Court, and throughout the Kingdom; and Henry not thinking it fit that a Mechanick and Impostor should with such Ostentation be protected in Flanders, he sent Ambassadors to the Arch-Duke Philip, then a Child; desiring, that after the Example of the King of France, the Impostor might be chac'd out of Flanders. The Answer given by the Minister of State was, That the Dutchess was absolute in her own Territories, and they could not hinder her from acting as she thought fit. King Henry was not satisfy'd with this Answer, as knowing her Power to be less than was represented: And having learn'd that she had a mighty Interest in the Arch-Duke's Council, and finding that Perkin would still be protected in Opposition to him, he immediately recall'd the English Merchants from Flanders, and banish'd the Flemish Merchants out of England, and remov'd the Staple of Cloath and Wooll from Antwerp to Calais, to the great Detriment of the Inhabitants of Flanders. Moreover upon Advertisements from Clifford, the King imprison'd the Lord Fitz-Water, Sir Simon Montfort, Sir Thomas Thwaites, William D'Aubigny, Robert Ratcliff, Thomas Cressenor, Thomas A.wood, William Worsley, Dean of Pauls, and certain Priars. These were all arraign'd and convicted of High-Treason; for which Montfort, Ratcliff and D'Aubigny were beheaded; the Lord Fitz-Water being sent Prisoner to Calais, by his endeavouring to escape, lost both his Hopes and Life: The rest were pardon'd; and the Lord-Chamberlain that Time was out of Policy left unmolested.

Several executed.

The King had created his second Son Henry Duke of York in Westminster, where, as it is usual in such Solemnities, divers Knights of the Bath were made. But hearing that Clifford was arriv'd in England, he withdrew himself to the Tower, there to examine him; that if he should accuse any of extraordinary Quality they might be imprison'd without Noise or Obstruction. Clifford being admitted into his Presence, and having receiv'd Pardon upon his Knees, was commanded to declare what he knew of the Conspiracy. He immediately accus'd the Lord-Chamberlain, Sir William Stanley; at whose Name all present were startled, it being highly improbable that a Man of his Quality and Riches, a Favourite so near the King, and the chief Instrument in his gaining the Crown, should be a Traitor. Whereupon being advis'd to reconsider what he said, he without Hesitation or Change of Countenance, accus'd him as before; for which Reason Stanley was confin'd to his Chamber, and the next Day examin'd by the Council. He deny'd some few Circumstances, but confess'd the main Crime; relying upon his former Actions and Merits, for which he erroneously presum'd the King would pardon him. Tho' he had put the Crown upon his Head, yet his Endeavours to take it away, had wholly cancell'd that Obligation. However King Henry was very doubtful whether he should take his Life or not: The Love and Reverence which he bore to his Father-in-law, pleaded for Clemency; but Example and the Condition of the Times urg'd for Severity. But if it be true what some Authors write, his Riches bore down the Balance; he being esteem'd one of the most mony'd Men in England; for in his Castle of Holt were found forty thousand Marks in ready Mony, besides Jewels and Goods; and in Revenues in Land and Fee he had three thousand Pounds a Year of old Rents, a considerable Estate in those Days. However after six Weeks Distance of Time, which the King did honourably interpose, both to give Space to his Brother's Intercession, and to shew to the World that what he did was with Conflict and Reluctancy, he was arraign'd of High-Treason, condemn'd, and soon after beheaded. This was a remarkable Instance of the Fall of a mighty Favourite, which afforded Occasion for Diversity of Discourses, and for some to treat King Henry's Memory with great Severity. We at this time are ignorant of the main Circumstances of his Case, and the true Motives for the King's Proceedings; but what seems most probable is, that he thought his Merits beyond Reward, and therefore aspir'd to a Greatness more than a Sovereign could bear. He was succeeded in his Place by Giles Lord Dawbeny, a Man of great Sufficiency and Valour, and the more because he was gentle and moderate.

Libels dispers'd.

The Death of the Lord-Chamberlain threw the whole Court under Apprehensions; one Man durst not trust another, and every one fear'd lest his Friends might prove like Clifford. Yet such was the Spirit of Detraction, that they made use of Pen and Paper to express what they durst not do with their Mouths: Swarms of Libels, those Instruments of Sedition, were dispers'd against the Council and the King himself; for which five mean Persons were apprehended, and put to Death. Perkin's Party daily decreas'd; no Man durst think any more of him, and but a very few tarry'd with him in Flanders; among whom Barley, Clifford's Companion, was principal, who notwithstanding afterwards chang'd his Opinion, and together with his Pardon obtain'd Leave to return home. And now the King finding Ireland to be the Place of greatest Danger, it was necessary for him to establish an undoubted Authority in that Kingdom. He made Choice of two to serve him in two several Offices; the Prior of Langton with Title of Commissioner, to inspect the civil Government of the Kingdom; and Sir Edward Poynings, who was to have Charge of the Militia, giving him many Soldiers, and a large Commission, to which the Deputy the Earl of Kildare was subordinate. The Prior met with no Difficulty; the Laws being his Arms, and the peaceful People the Matter of his Jurisdiction; but Poynings, who was to deal with stubborn Men and Rebels, had not the like Fortune. For Ireland being full of Woods, Bogs and desert Places, he spent much Time there to small Purpose; killing and taking some few Prisoners, which made not much for the main Enterprize. So that being displeas'd with those, who having no Intention to withstand him, had no cause to fear him, he proceeded to accuse the Earl of Kildare, as if he had secretly assisted them. He therefore sent him Prisoner into England, without any Proof against him besides his own Suspicion; and the Earl so fully justify'd himself, that he was declar'd declar'd Innocent, and re-establish'd in his former Government. But if Poyning's had no Success with those who withstood him, yet he had such good Fortune with the rest, as to prevail with them in Parliament to allow of all Ordinances made in England till that Day, which formerly had no Force in that Kingdom. This memorable Act is call'd Poyning's Law, being made in the tenth Year of this Reign, and observ'd to this Day.

Ireland establish'd.

The ill Success of the Conspiracy did not so quell the Resolutions of Perkin, but that he thought the Affections of his Party rather oppress'd than expir'd; and that a new Spirit would so revive them, that Henry should find it difficult to suppress them. Thus flattering himself, he assembled certain Troops of Men of desperate Fortunes, who for Debts or Misdemeanors durst not appear otherwise; and embarking them, he came to Anchor before Sandwich, landing some of his Men to learn News, and to discover how the People were in those Parts affected, reporting that he had great Forces coming in a Fleet after him. The King at this time was gone his Progress, and was now with his Mother in her House at Latham, whom he went to visit; that by his repairing thither, the World might know that the Death of Sir William Stanley had not really Disgusted his Father-in-law. Here he heard of Perkin's Arrival; by which he receiv'd the Advantage of the great Opinion of his People, who esteem'd him a wise Prince, judging nothing had happen'd to him which he did not foresee; and that his retiring into the Northern Parts was one of his Politick Fetches; for knowing he had left the South free from Danger, he design'd to allure Perkin to land, that he might be sure not to escape. But however it was, at the first News he resolv'd to return, and was not well pleas'd at the second, which inform'd him that he was gone again; well perceiving that this Trouble might be of long Continuance. The Cause of Perkins's Departure arose from the Care of the Kentishmen, who had well observ'd the Condition of those who had landed, and that there were but few English among them, and those of no Worth or Consideration; wherefore they advis'd with the chief of the County concerning their taking Arms; which being determin'd, they shew'd part of their Men upon the Sea-Shore, to invite him on land; and dispers'd the rest, as if they were ready to run away. But Perkin soon perceiving their Design, would not stir out of his Ship; but suffer'd several of his Men to be cut in Pieces on the Shore, and a hundred and fifty to be taken Prisoners. All which were hang'd upon the Sea-Coasts of Kent, Norfolk and Sussex, for Sea-Marks or Light-Houses, to teach Perkin's People to avoid the Coast. Shortly after the King returning to London, honour'd the Serjeant's Feast with the Presence of himself and Queen; being a Prince ever ready to countenance the Professors of the Law, after that declaring, That as he govern'd his Subjects by his Laws, so he govern'd his Laws by his Lawyers. In the same Year dy'd Cecily Nevil, Dutches of York, Mother to King Edward the Fourth, in extream old Age; a Woman who had liv'd to see a numerous but a wretched Progeny, involv'd in Misery and Blood; and to see three Princes of her Body crown'd, and four murder'd, besides the many Executions of those of her own Family, and the Infamy of being declar'd an Adultress by her own Son Richard: Afflictions that could scarcely happen to a Person less than her self.

Perkin lands some Men in Kent, but to no Effect.

The Death of the old Dutches of York.

In the same Year, and eleventh of this Reign the King call'd a Parliament, where many Laws were made; the principal of which was the famous Statute of Submission, which has been so much canvass'd of late Years. The Lord Bacon's Account of it is in these Words: It was a Law of a strange Nature; rather Just than Legal, and more magnanimous than provident. This Law did Ordain, that no Person that did assist in Arms, or otherwise the King for the Time Being, should after be impeach'd therefore, or attain'd, either by the Courte of Law, or by Act of Parliament. But, if any such Attainder did happen to be made, it should be void and of none Effect; for that it was agreeable to Reason of State, that the Subject should not enquire of the Justness of the King's Title or Quarrel; and it was agreeable to a good Conscience, that, whatsoever the Fortune of the War were, the Subject should not suffer for his Obedience. The Spirit of this Law was wonderful Pious and Noble; being like in Matter of War, unto the Spirit of David in Matter of Plague, who said If I have sinned, strike me; but what have these Sheep done? Neither wanted this Law Parts of prudent and deep Foresight: For, it did the better take away Occasion, for the People to busie themselves, and pry into the King's Title; for that howsoever it fell, their Safety was already provided for. Besides, it could not but greatly draw to him the Love and Hearts of the People, because he seem'd more careful for them, than for himself. But yet it took off from his Party that great Tie and Spur of Necessity, to fight and go Victors out of the Field; considering their Fortunes were protected, whether they stood or run away.

The famous Statute of Submission made

Perkin goes into Scotland'

In the mean Time Perkin being retir'd to Flanders to the Dutcheſs Margaret, it was judg'd necessary both by her and him, that he should remove from thence, and proceed in the Work they had so unfortunately begun. This Resolution was befriended by the Dislike which Maximilian took at Henry, for taking the Commerce of England from their States; and by the like Dislike taken by the French King, for his having lately enter'd into a League against him, as to his Affairs in Italy. Perkin therefore went first into Ireland; but Poyning's Care having prevented his Chief Expectations, he retir'd into Scotland, grounding his Hopes upon the natural Enmity between the two Kingdoms, and upon the Recommendation of King Charles and Maximilian. He had solemn Audience given him by James King of Scotland, in the Presence of his chief Nobility; where his Majestick Looks, augmented by a most happy Demeanor, captivated the Minds and Opinions of all that heard him. With a graceful Assurance he told the King, That he was the unfortunate Richard Plantagenet, Son to King Edward the Fourth, who drawn by fraudulent Promises from the Bosom of his Mother, was brought to the Tower of London, there to be murder'd with his Brother Edward; but pity arising in the Breast of those who executed that cruel Office, they were contented with the Death of the eldest Brother, and sav'd him, giving him Life, Liberty, and Means to escape. Then he proceeded to recount the various Changes of Fortune that had attended his Fate; and to insist upon the generous Encouragements he had receiv'd from foreign Princes, who were inspir'd with a Spirit of Greatness and Piety; and likewise to enlarge upon the innumerable Acts of Injustice and Treachery contriv'd against him by Henry Tudor, the present Usurper of the English Throne; whose various Methods to asperse him, and his incessant Labours to destroy him, were alone sufficient to prove he was no Impostor. Therefore he had recourse to the Arms of Scotland, whose King was of that Generosity and Bravery, as not to refuse the Supplications of a distressed Prince flying to him; especially when he was sure to meet with a Recompence answerable to the Greatness of the Favour. In summ, Perkin's Expressions, the Compassion of his Case, the Recommendation of so many Princes, and their secret Promises, or perhaps the Occasion to begin a War with King Henry, mov'd King James to promise him his Assistance; which he readily effected, tho' many, who knew the Imposture, dissuaded him from it. And moreover he did not only appoint him an Attendance and Entertainment, answerable to his pretended Quality; but that it might be believ'd he took him for the real Duke of York, he gave him in Marriage his nearest Kinswoman the Lady Catharine Gordon, a young Virgin of admirable Beauty and Virtue.

His Declaration.

Such Provisions being made as the Enterprize requir'd, King James with a considerable Army enter'd Northumberland; where Perkin, under the Name of Richard Duke of York, the true and lawful Heir to the Crown of England, publish'd and dispers'd a formal Declaration, the Substance of which was this: That being by the Grace of God, and Favour of James King of Scotland, enter'd

'ter'd into the Kingdom of England, he declar'd his coming was not to make 'War upon his Subjects, but to free them from the Tyranny with which 'they were oppress'd. That tho' it was known the Crown belong'd to the Royal
 'House of York, of which there remain'd no other Pretender than himself, the 'only surviving Son of Edward the Fourth; yet Henry Tudor had usurp'd the 'Crown from him, and by inhuman Methods design'd to deprive him of his 'Life, boasting that he had eas'd the Nation of a Tyrant, when he had made 'himself a greater than the other. That Richard's Tyranny was the more ex-
 'cusable, since his Nephews being suppos'd to be dead, he had some Pretence
 'to give a Colour to it: The Difference between the two was, That Richard a 'true Plantagenet, had for his Arm the Honour of the Nation, and the Sub'jects Tranquility; but Henry meanly born, without regard to either, had sold
 'the Kingdom's best Friends for ready Mony, made a dishonourable Peace, and 'not only oppress'd the Subject, but unjustly put to Death the Lord Chamberlain,
 'Stanley, and several others, who were ready to withstand his Oppressions. Rich- 'ard had been mov'd to Tyranny by Ambition, Henry by Avarice; Ambition
 'had made use of cruel Means, but Avarice, not only of cruel, but bare extor-
 'ting Methods: His Cruelty appear'd not only from the Deaths of many, but
 'by his Imprisonment of the Earl of Warwick, Son to the Duke of Clarence; his
 'Baseness and Extortion, by his intolerable Subsidies, Taxes, and Impositi-
 'ons, under the Name of Benevolences, and by the Wars and Peace made only 'to heap up Treasure. And because his Usurpation of the Crown had made 'him live in perpetual Fear, not only of Men, but of Women, he had marry'd
 'Ladies of the Royal Blood to Persons of mean Condition; particularly a 'Sister of himself the Duke of York, and a Sister of his Cousin the Earl of War- 'wick, that he might have less Reason to fear future Oppositions. Now as he 'came to free them from Violence by such Forces as God should give him, so
 'by his plenary Regal Authority, he did at that present Time free them from 'all Grievances, by perpetually abolishing all that had hitherto been impos'd
 'upon them, contrary to Law and Custom: And that the good Will of his Sub'jects might not be prejudic'd by the Law, for having illegally obey'd the Usur-
 'per, he granted a general Pardon for all their Transgressions, upon Condition
 'they submit themselves to him, and acknowledge him for their King; the most 'forward of whom should enjoy the greatest Marks of his Regal Favours. Next,
 'he would maintain all that his Ancestors, especially what his Father Edward
 'of glorious Memory, had sworn to; which was the Preservation of their Privi'leges and Liberties, the Franchises of the Clergy, Nobility and People. Then
 'he promis'd a Thousand Pound in ready Mony, and a hundred Marks a Year of 'Inheritance, to whomsoever should take or kill Henry Tudor. Lastly he de-'clar'd that the King of the Scots assisting of him was not done out of any Pact or 'Promise prejudicial to England, but meerly out of Generosity and Justice;
 'and whenever he had put him in Condition to defend himself by his English
 'Subjects, he would return to Scotland, only with the Honour of having re-
 'stor'd an injur'd Prince. This Declaration prov'd like Seed sown on the Sands: It has no effect.
 Wherefore King James after he had long in vain expected some Commotion, he betook himself to plunder and destroy with as little Mercy as the Scots had wont to do in former Times. Having enrich'd his Soldiers he return'd back, hearing that great Forces were marching against him, knowing it would be dangerous for him to stay while he was incumber'd with the great Booty he took along with him.

At this time the Merchants were much discontented at the Breach of Commerce between England and Flanders; so that meeting with a fit Occasion, they began to treat of it with their several Princes, since the reducing it to the former Condition would make for the Advantage of both Sides, therefore it was desirable by both. The Arch-Duke was now sensible that Perkin was an Im-poster, and that to favour him any longer would injure his Reputation, as it had already lessen'd his Revenues. Therefore being ready to comply, Commissioners were appointed on both Sides, who concluded a perfect Treaty both of Amity and Intercourse, between King Henry and the Arch-Duke; containing Articles both of State, Commerce and Freedom of Fishing. To these Articles, was added an Inhibition of either Side to entertain the Rebels of either Country; in which Article the Territories of the Dutchess Margaret were expressly nam'd, that Perkin's Adherents might not be shelter'd there. After the Intercourse was thus restor'd, the English Merchants again repaired to their Mansion at Antwerp, where they were receiv'd with Procession and great Joy. Having settled this Affair, the King call'd a Parliament, where he much aggravated the Malice and the dishonourable Treatment of the King of the Scots, who under the Pretence of supporting one whom all had discarded, had turn'd his Arms upon unarmed and unprovided People, only to pillage and depopulate, contrary to the Laws both of War and Peace: Concluding that he could neither with the Honour, nor the Safety of his People, suffer these Injuries to pass unreveng'd. The Parliament well understood him, and gave him a Subsidy, limited to the Sum of a hundred and twenty thousand Pounds, besides two fifteens. For his Wars were always to him, a Mine of peculiar Ore; Iron at the Top, and Gold and Silver at the Bottom.

Cornwall.*

The King, tho' he avoided to fight with Enemies abroad, yet he was still enforc'd to fight for his Mony with Rebels at home: For as soon as the Subsidy began to be levy'd in Cornwall, the Inhabitants exclaim'd against it as an unjust Exaction: And since the Scotch Commotion was so far from them, they thought only the neighbouring Counties were oblig'd to Contributions; as if when the Head akes, the Legs and Feet were unconcern'd, and might transfer their Duties to the Arms and Neck, as the nearest Members. To make good this Insurrection two numerous Heads appear'd; the one a Black-Smith or Farrier, call'd Michael Joseph, and the other an Attorney nam'd Thomas Flammock, each of whom had their particular Ends: The Black-Smith was mov'd by Ambition, believing such an Action would add Lustre to his Memory, and that his clownish Loquacity would procure him the first Place among the People: The Attorney having gain'd Credit by his Profession, had so far won upon their Opinions, as they believ'd the Refusal of this Subsidy, and their Mutiny to be legal and meritorious. His Opinion was of sufficient Authority to interpret the Power of the King and Parliament; he had instructed them that they were not oblig'd to the Payment of any Subsidies for War with Scotland; that the Law had provided for it by Esuage and other Means, so that this Subsidy was invented to fleece the People. He therefore advis'd them to present a Petition to the King, who for the Example of others would certainly punish the Inventers of it; and they both offer'd themselves to lead them on, 'till they should find some Person of Quality, under whom they might serve. But as for Matter of Life, there was no Hazard at all, their Demand being so just, as it would be approv'd by all the other Counties; and since the publick good was consulted, from which the King's particular Interest could not be seperated. Being thus encourag'd, they took up Arms; and because they were not all provided with Bows and Arrows, they arm'd themselves with such Tools as belong'd to their several Trades. They enter'd by Somersetshire, and pass'd through Devonshire, without offering any Manner of Outrage; but coming to Taunton, they slew one of the Commissioners for the Subsidy, who had shew'd himself more active than the rest. At Wells they met the Lord Audley, who hurry'd on by a fatal Discontent, submitted to their General. They resolv'd to march into Kent, out of an Opinion which Flammock had instill'd into 'em, That Kent had never been Conquer'd, but were the freest Part of England and most likely to join with them. But upon their Arrival finding all Thing to the contrary, some were amaz'd, and others enrag'd. The former wiser drawing their Neck out of the Yoke, return'd home; the rest passing forward though thought that since they had met with no Opposition in so long a March, the King and the City would suffer them to make their own Conditions: And with this foolish Imagination they encamp'd themselves within sight of London, between Greenwich and Eltham.

The King was much concern'd at the first News of this Insurrection, fearing lest he should have three Mischiefs to encounter at once; the People of Cornwall, Perkin's secret Intelligence, and the War with Scotland. He took to his Arms as soon as the Parliament was ended, designing to march towards Scotland; but being diverted by the other Occasion, he suspended that Resolution. And because he had sent the Lord Dawbeny with some Forces to the Borders of Scotland, he order'd him to return, to take such Counsel as Necessity requir'd, and sent the Earl of Surry in his Room, with Orders to defend the Country, in case the Scots should fall in upon it. He mov'd not against the Rebels at the first News, according to his usual Custom; for the Country, not being endamag'd by them, did not require it; and he was confident that wanting Money and Ammunition, they would disband of themselves, as they had already begun to do, when they fail'd in their Hopes of the Kentish Men. But when he saw them encamp'd near London, he resolv'd to attack them; and to free himself from all Hazards of Fortune, he divided his Forces, which far exceeded theirs, into three distinct Bodies: He assign'd the first to the Earls of Oxford, Essex and Suffolk; the second to the Lord Chamberlain. and commanded the third himself. He appointed the first to place themselves behind the Hill where the Rebels were encamp'd, and to secure all the Passages besides that towards London, that being inclos'd like wild Beasts in a Toil, they might not be able to escape. He order'd the Lord-Chamberlain to give them Battel in the Front, having assign'd him the best and most experienc'd Soldiers in the Army, as having the greatest Dependance upon their Valour; and he himself stay'd with the third Body between London and them, to supply them, if it should be needful, and to fight with such as durst march towards the City. In the mean time the Citizens were in a great Consternation, which caus'd much Confusion in the Streets, some running to the Walls, others to the River, without Order, or Knowledge what to do: For they could not believe but their coming from Cornwall, the utmost Bounds of England, must be with Intention to enrich themselves by the Plunder of that opulent City; and they did not think that their quiet Passage through other Counties was to be taken as an Argument that they would do the like upon this Occasion. But afterwards, understanding the good Order the King had taken, how that he had interest'd his own Person in the Danger; that the Enemy were to win three Battels, before they could come to the City; and that the Commanders were both faithful and valiant, they soon laid by their Fears.

That the Rebels might be more unprovided, the King politickly caus'd it to be reported in the Army, that he would not fight 'till the Monday following: But towards the Saturday Evening, the Lord Dawbeny according to Order set upon some Troops, which were lodg'd upon the Side of the Hill; and tho' they valiantly resisted, yet being but few in Number, they could not make good their Station. They quitting their Posts, it was easie for the King's Forces to mount the Hill, make themselves Masters of the Plain, and fall in with their main Body. Tho' they were taken unawares, and their Troops out of Order, they to well receiv'd the first Attack, as the Lord Dawbeny, fighting at the Head of his Men, and playing the part of a common Soldier, was taken Prisoner; but was soon after rescued: For the Rebels being ill arm'd without Commanders, Artillery or Horse, they could not so far resist, but that in a short Time two thousand of them were slain, and great Numbers taken Prisoners. The Lord Studeley the General, and the two Seducers, the Attorney and the Black-Smith, lately suffer'd themselves to be taken alive. Three hundred of the King's Side were slain, and most of them by Arrows; for the Cornish Men us'd very strong Bows,

O. L. three executed. Bows, and Arrows of a Yard in Length. The King came to the Place, and made many Knights Bannerets, as he had done before, when he was encamp'd in St. George's Fields; and he gave the Goods of all the Prisoners to such as had taken them. The Lord Audely was ignominiously led from Newgate to Tower-Hill, in a Paper Coat torn, and painted with his own Arms revers'd, and there beheaded. The Attorney and Black-Smith were brought to Tiburn, where they were hang'd, drawn and quarter'd; the Black-Smith not ceasing to shew his Vanity and Vain-glory to the very last, not doubting But in future Times his Name would be memorable in History. The King would not have their Quarters sent into Cornwall, as it had been appointed; for, hearing they were not totally suppress'd, he thought it not Wisdom to exasperate them any further. All the rest were pardon'd by Proclamation; so that, besides the Blood shed in the Field, the King satisfy'd himself with the Lives of only three Offenders, for the Expiation of this dangerous Rebellion.

Some Action with Scotland. The King of Scotland hearing of this Rebellion, took Advantage from it, and went to besiege Norham Castle, waiting all the Country in his Passage. This Castle belong'd to Fox Bishop of Durham, who foreseeing it would be invested, had doubly furnish'd it with all sorts of Ammunition; causing the Herds of Cattle, and what else might be useful to the Enemy, to be withdrawn into the strongest Retreats. The Earl of Surry, who was ready upon all Occasions in Yorkshire, hasten'd thither, at the Head of a considerable Force. Which when King James understood, he withdrew himself, and was pursu'd by the Earl; who not able to overtake him, sat down before Aton Castle, one of the strongest Places between Edinburgh and Berwick, which he soon took. Not meeting with any Oppositions he return'd to Yorkshire; these two Actions having produc'd no Matter of Note, but the Preservation of one Castle, and the winning of another; not answerable to the Power of the Forces, the Heat of the Contest, nor the Greatness of the Expectation.

A Treaty with Scotland. About the same Time arriv'd Pedro D' Aiala, a celebrated Man, sent Ambassador from Ferdinand and Isabel, King and Queen of Spain. The outward Pretence of his Embassie, was to accommodate the Differences between the two Kings of England and Scotland; but the true Cause was to negotiate a Marriage between Catharine, their second Daughter, and the young Prince Arthur. King Henry, who had a great Dexterity in getting suddenly into the Bosom of Ambassadors, readily embrac'd the outward Offer, being no ways inclinable to the unpolitable War with Scotland; by the Cessation of which, two great Advantages would redound to him: The one was the driving Perkin from that Kingdom, where he had his chief Support, and getting him into his own Hands; and the other, a peaceful Reign, freed from the continu'd Molestations of Importors. So that agreeing with whatsoever D' Aiala should propose, with the Preservation of his Honour, he allow'd him to go into Scotland; where having projected the Affair, and by the Agreement of the Council persuaded that King to harken to a Peace, he wrot to King Henry to send some discreet Man, who together with him might end the Business with the Commissioners of Scotland; which Commission was given to Fox Bishop of Durham, then residing at Norham. When they were met together in Jedworth they could not agree, by reason of many Difficulties that arose: Henry demanded to have Perkin deliver'd up to him; and James could not do it without great Aspersions to his Honour: For tho' he knew him to be no better than a State-Juggler, yet having call'd him the Duke of York, made War in his Name, and marry'd him to a near Kinswoman of his own, to deliver him up would injure his own Faith and Reputation. On Henry's Behalf, was likewise demanded Satisfaction for the Loss he had sustain'd, and the Restitution of such Booty as had been taken from England; which was impossible to be had, it being dispers'd among the Soldiers: King James had not sufficient to give Satisfaction to the other; and it was much easier for one to suffer the Loss, than for the other to repay it. But all all of them being met together with a Desire of Peace, it was easie to find a Way to Accommodation; wherefore deferring the Treaty to another Season, they agreed upon a Truce, upon Condition that Perkin should be dismiss'd from Scotland. This being determin'd, King James call'd Perkin to him, and told him, That according to his Promise he had done what lay in his Power to serve him; then after as civil a Manner as the Subject would bear, he let him know, That the present State of Affairs requir'd him to retire from his Kingdom. Perkin casting all his bad Success upon the Averseness of Fortune, assur'd the King he would never be unmindful of his Favours, and so embark'd himself, together with his Wife, and such whose desperate Condition had compell'd them to follow him, in three Ships which the King gave him, and sail'd into Ireland; for he had no Hopes in Flanders, by reason of the new Alliance, between King Henry and the Arch-Duke.

*Perkin sent

The Cornish Men understanding that he was come into Ireland, petition'd him to come over to them, professing their Obedience, their Lives and Fortunes, for the advancing his Pretensions to the Crown. They who were taken Prisoners in the last Battel, having ransom'd themselves from their Captors at very small Rates, were return'd home; interpreting the King's Clemency only as the Effects of Fear and Impotence. So running into new Imaginations, and believing that the other Counties would follow their Example, they receiv'd Perkin with great Applause; who landed there with four little Barks, in the Month of September, with only a hundred and forty Men. Three thousand of the Cornish presented themselves before him all arm'd in the Town of Bodmin; from whence he issu'd out a Declaration under the Name of Richard the Fourth, King of England, making large Promises for the Ease of the present Tyrannical Government. He had three chief Counsellors to attend him, a broken Mercer, a Taylor, and a Scrivener; which three, joining with the rest, were of Opinion, That the first thing to be done, was to gain some good Town, which might make for his Safety and Reputation, and might encourage the rest. They fate down before Exeter, which being a great and rich City, the Hopes of Booty invited many others to come over to Perkin. They made specious Promises to the Citizens; among which, one was That King Richard would make their City a new London, in Recompence of their Fidelity, and for being formost in acknowledging him for their King; but wanting Artillery to force them, bare Words were not sufficient to persuade them. The Citizens let down Messengers over the Walls, and sent News of the Siege to the Court, desiring immediate Succours; which being apprehended by Perkin, he us'd all Methods to make himself Master of the Place before Relief could arrive. He attack'd it by Scaling Ladders, and set fire to one of the Gates, endeavouring to enter both Ways; but the Walls being well defended, the Fire extinguish'd, and many of the Assaultants slain, the Danger was soon over.

*He attempts

The King hearing of Perkin's Siege of Exeter, made Sport with it, and said to those about him, That the King of Rake-Hells was landed in the West, and he now hop'd to have the Honour to see him, which he never yet could do. He was extreamly pleas'd, for now he seem'd to see the Bottom of his Peril, and as it were to hold his Enemy empounded within the English Ocean, it being a perpetual and noble Wish of his, That he might look his Dangers in the Face, and meet them in open Field. He suddenly dispatch'd away Forces to relieve Exeter under the Conduct of the Lord Chamberlain, attended by the Lord Brook and Sir Rice ap Thomas; with Directions to declare that he was following in Person. But the Lords living in those Parts, knowing that they should do an acceptable Piece of Service, if they came unrequested into the Field, assembled many Troops: The Earl of Devonshire, with his Son, and the chief Gentlemen of the County on the one Side; and the Earl of Buckingham on the other; so as being join'd together before the Chamberlain arriv'd, they advertis'd the King of what they had done, desiring to receive his Commands.

Perkin understanding these Preparations, rais'd his Siege and march'd to Taunton, beginning to have one Eye upon the Crown, and the other upon the Sanctuary; tho' the Cornish Men much encourag'd him, promising not to abandon him, while they had one Drop of Blood in their Bodies. But whether Fear or Wariness had taught him not to trust such Promises, he resolv'd to retire; having about seven thousand Men with him, and seeming however to be courageous: But forsaking all these the next Night, he fled with threescore and ten Horse to Bewley, where he took Sanctuary, showing his wonted Compassion, Not to be present when his Subjects Blood should be spilt. The King hearing of his Flight, sent five hundred Horse after him, fearing he should escape by Sea; but finding he had taken Sanctuary, they us'd no other Violence, but to keep a sufficient Guard till they should receive new Commands. The Troops remaining in Taunton yielded themselves to the King's Mercy; who pardon'd them all, except a few of their Heads, who were put to Death. The King first sent to St. Michael's Mount, where the Lady Gordon was left by her Husband Perkin, whom in all Fortunes she entirely lov'd, adding the Virtues of a Wife to those of her Sex; and he sent with the greater Diligence, as fearing the might be with Child, by which the Business would not have ended in Perkin's Person. Being brought before the King, he receiv'd her not only with Compassion, but with Affection; a noble Pity giving more Impression to her excellent Beauty and Demeanour. Wherefore comforting her, he sent her to his Queen, and assign'd her an honourable Pension, which she enjoy'd during his Life, and many Years after. The Name of the White-rose, which had been given to her Husband's false Title, was continu'd in common Speech to her real Beauty.

The King made a solemn Entry into Exeter, where having thanked the Citizens for their Loyalty, he took off his Sword he wore, and gave it to the Mayor, with Power to have it always carry'd before him. He sent express Messengers to the Sanctuary to Perkin, with Promise of Pardon; who seeing himself destitute of all Hopes of Safety, yielded himself into their Hands, and was brought to the Court, but not to the King's Presence, tho' oftentimes out of Curiosity, he would see him out of the Gallery Window. Divers Commissioners were nominated to proceed against such as had join'd with Perkin, who were punish'd with Pecuniary Mulcts, which gave a general Satisfaction to the Nation. The Scorn and Mockery which Perkin receiv'd from the Courtiers, and from such as ran to see him, as if he had been a Monster, would have been a greater Punishment to a Man of Honour than a thousand Deaths. When he came to London, he was led on Horseback through all the City to the Tower, and from thence brought back to Westminster; suffering by the Way all Kinds of opprobrious and injurious Language: For his greater Ignominy, they led another bound near to him, who was Farrier to the King's Stables, and then chief Counsellor to Perkin, who being taken in the Habit of a Hermit, he was brought to London, and hang'd after he had accompany'd his new Master in this Procession. Perkin upon Examination fully declar'd his whole Genealogy: his Father, Mother, Grand-fathers, Uncles, Cousins, their Employments, and Countries; his Travels and Voyages, together with many other superfluous Things: But concealing, or not committing to Writing, what was most essential, the several Practices of the Dutchess of Burgundy. He acknowledg'd his going into Portugal, but not that he was sent by her; and in like manner he laid open his Voyage to Ireland. Whereupon the Confession, being first written with his own Hand, and afterwards printed, did not fully satiate the Peoples Curiosity; since they found the Name of the chief Actres in the Comedy purposely conceal'd. But the King would not any further exasperate her; thinking it sufficient Punishment for her to be so variously censur'd as she was, together with her own Vexation, that her Inventions not succeeding should be made evident to the World. Thus this famous Impostor fell into King Henry's Hands after he had tormented him by Intervals for about the Space of six Years.

V. King Henry having now surmounted the greatest Obstacles in his Reign, there soon after occur'd a trifling and untoward Accident, that in length of Time produc'd great and happy Effects. The Castle of Norham is parted from the Borders of Scotland by the River Tweed; so that Neighbourhood having caus'd Conversation and Friendship between some young Men of England and Scotland, the latter us'd often to pass the River, and come to drink and sport with those of Norham. The Soldiers of the Garrison growing jealous of this Custom, did not think their coming proceeded from Friendship, but out of a Desire to know the Strength of the Fortifications; whereupon falling first to Words, and then to Blows, the Scotch-men by the Disadvantage of the Place, and Inequality in Number, were hardly treated, and some of them slain. King James taking this as a Design to injure him, dispatch'd away an express Herald to complain; and in case King Henry would not give Satisfaction, to denounce War. The latter, regarding nothing so much as Peace, answer'd, That he was sorry for the Accident, which was wholly unknown to him; that he would enquire after the Aggressors, and give them such Punishment, as there should be no Occasion to break the Truce. But as time pass'd on, and nothing was perform'd, James took it for Dissimulation, and was more offended than formerly; and certainly great Mischief might have ensu'd, had not the Bishop of Durham, who was Lord of Norham, wisely prevented it. For knowing that the Injury was done by his Men, he wrote in so submissive a Manner to King James about it, as he rested satisfy'd, and desir'd the Bishop to come to him, that they might treat upon the present Occasion, and upon certain other Affairs that concern'd both the Kingdoms. The Bishop acquainted King Henry with this, and obtain'd leave to go into Scotland; where meeting with King James at M.ross, he return'd such soft and modest Answers to him as soon brought him to a Reconciliation. After this the King more privately convers'd with him, and told him, That his Desire was to have a firm and strict Amity, and the only way to effect it was by King Henry's giving him for Wife his eldest Daughter Margaret; by which the Friendship between the two Nations would be perpetual: That this was the Reason why he desir'd him to come into Scotland, hoping that by his Wisdom he might bring the Affair to a happy Period. The Bishop modestly answer'd, That he thought himself rather happy than worthy to be an Instrument in such a Matter; but would do his best Endeavour. Therefore returning to England, he acquainted King Henry with the whole Design, which prov'd very acceptable to him. The Matter being long debated in Council, the Match was determin'd, provided a Peace might precede it; all which was effected, and a Peace concluded during the Lives of the two Kings, and for one Year after. But the Celebration of the Marriage was to be deferr'd, because the Lady was not yet ten Years of Age. About the same time dy'd Charles the Eighth, King of France, whose Obssequies were with great Pomp celebrated in London by King Henry, who could not forget the Favours he had receiv'd from him.

In the mean time Perkin, who was made of Mercury, hard to hold or imprison, deceiv'd his Keepers, and fled to the Sea-Coast. But such diligent Care was taken, that in a short Time he was forc'd to return back, and throw himself into the Priory of Bethleem, which had the Privilege of Sanctuary. The Prior being a Man of Note and Esteem, went to King Henry and begg'd of him the Life of Perkin, leaving him otherwise to the King's Discretion. Many advis'd his Majesty to take him immediately and put him to Death; but the King, who had so great a Spirit as he could not hate any that he despis'd, only said, Take out the Knave, and set him in the Stocks. And so promising the Prisoner his Life, he caus'd him to be brought out; and two Days after, upon a Scaffold erected in the Palace Court at Westminster, he was fetter'd and set in the Stocks, for the whole Day. And the following Day, the like was done at the Cross in Cheap-side; and in both Places he publickly read his Confession, which he had formerly committed to Writing, that the World might be fully convinc'd of his being an open Impostor. He was again put into the Tower, but he could not hold from relapsing into his former Error: For growing intimate with four of his Keepers, who were Servants to Sir John Digby, Lieutenant of the Tower, and making them believe he was the true Duke of York, he so far prevail'd with them, as they perswaded the Earl of Warwick to escape away with Perkin; which by their Help was to be effected by murdering the Lieutenant, and taking the Keys of the Tower. But this Conspiracy was reveal'd in Time, and prevented; and in this again the Belief of the King's nice Wisdom did raise a sinister Opinion, that Perkin was but his Bait to ensnare the unfortunate Earl of Warwick. For the Instant while this Conspiracy was operating, there broke forth another Counterfeit Earl of Warwick, a Cordwainer's Son nam'd Ralph Wilford; a young Man set up and instructed by an Austin Friar, call'd Patrick. But this being mismanag'd by the over Zeal of the Friar, they were both apprehended; the young Man was executed, and the Friar condemn'd to perpetual Imprisonment. This Accident gave the King occasion to send the true Earl of Warwick out of the World: Whereupon it was thought that Perkin's Flight, and his second Endeavour to do the like, were wrought by his Artifice; he giving Way to the First, that he might put Perkin to Death; and stirring the Second, to free himself from the Earl and Perkin together. But however it was, Perkin being convicted of this last Conspiracy, and condemn'd to die, was hang'd at Tiburn; where he again openly read his Confession, and affirm'd it upon his Death to be true. Here was the End of one of the longest Plays of that Kind that had been remember'd; and might perhaps have had a different Period, if he had not met with a King extraordinary wise, valiant and fortunate.

The End of the Plantagenets.

Immediately after, the poor Earl of Warwick was arraign'd before the Earl of Oxford, as High-Steward of England, for conspiring together with Perkin, against the State and Person of the King; and being prov'd guilty by his own Confession, was shortly after beheaded upon Tower-Hill. This caus'd the King to be severely censur'd, as having no Reason to condemn him: For having been Prisoner from the ninth Year of his Age 'till the twenty fourth, and always in fear of Death, he was kept in so great Ignorance, that he did not know a Duck from a Hen; and therefore so little capable of the Fault, that he was not capable of the Contrivance; and his Confession of it was only in Hopes of a Pardon. King Henry endeavour'd to lay the Cause of his Death upon the King of Spain, thewing his Letters, in which he declar'd, He could not resolve to marry his Daughter to Prince Arthur, since as long as the Earl of Warwick liv'd, he was not certain of the Kingdom's Succession: Which might be a Reason of State, but not of Justice; insomuch that God would not give a Blessing to that Match, of which the religious Princess Catharine was afterwards sensible. For Prince Arthur dying in a short Time, and she being divorc'd from King Henry after twenty Years Marriage, she said, It was no wonder if God had made her unfortunate in her Marriages, since they were seal'd with the Blood of the Earl of Warwick. This Earl was the last Heir Male of the Blood and Surname of Plantagenet; whose Race, as it was a long Time glorious for giving renowned Kings to England, so in the latter End it became odious to God and Man, for the horrible Fews, Murthers and Perjuries committed within it; which finally threw open all those Fences, which the Possession of Majesty and Numerosity of Issue had for some Ages cast about it; letting in thereby the Surname of Tudor, being but two Descents English, and which after three Descents, and five Princes, did likewise wholly disappear.

The Nation being now freed from all civil Disturbances, was afflicted by a great Plague, which rag'd so terribly in London, and other Parts of the Land, that it caus'd the King to go over to Calais, together with his Queen and Family.

mily. This being known to Arch-Duke Philip, he sent Ambassadors to him to congratulate his Arrival, and to know if he would be pleas'd that he himself should come and visit him; upon Condition he might be receiv'd in some open Place; for which several specious Reasons were given. The Ambassadors were graciously receiv'd, the Condition was fairly interpreted, and St. Peter's Church not far from Calais appointed for the Place. As he was coming towards Calais, the King went out to meet him, when he suddenly alighted from his Horse to hold the King's Stirrop, which the King would not permit; but affectionately embracing him, he led him to the Church appointed for the Parly. The Causes of the Arch-Duke's coming were two; his own good Nature, because he or his Council had offended him by protecting an Impostor, so that he would omit nothing that might give the King Satisfaction: The other, was the Advice of his Father, and Father-in-law, who counsell'd him to establish a strict Amity with King Henry, for the Benefit of the Netherlands, and his own Safety against the Violences of France; but chiefly, because both hating the new King Lewis, they hop'd for many Advantages by his Friendship. The Arch-Duke fail'd not to use all the Art he could, tho' by Nature he was not addicted to Dissimulations; terming him His Father, Patron and Protector. The Matters concluded between them were the Confirmation of the former Treaties, and two reciprocal Marriages; the one of the Duke of York, the King's second Son, with the Arch-Duke's Daughter; the other of Charles, the Arch-Duke's eldest Son, with Mary the King's second Daughter: But all of them being either Children or Infants, these Marriages succeeded not, but evaporated through Time and Interest. The Arch-Duke was but just retir'd, when the King of France sent the Governor of Picardy, and the Bailiff of Amiens to visit King Henry, acquainting him with his Victories, together with his gaining of the Dukedom of Milan, and his Imprisonment of the Duke Lodwick Sforza. The Plague being by this Time ceased, King Henry return'd to London, well satisfy'd with the Testimony he had receiv'd, of the good Esteem in which he was held by the neighbouring Princes.

Duke Philip.

The King returns.

At the same Time Jasper Pons, a learned and well-bred Man, came into England from Pope Alexander the Sixth, upon the Occasion of the Year of Jubilee; for since they only receiv'd the Benefit of it who went to Rome, he thought it fit to have it commuted for by remote Countries, where the Inhabitants could not make such long Journeys: Inasmuch as they staying at home, might receive the same Indulgences, if they would give a certain Sum of Mony to be employ'd against the Turks, whose Approaches Hungary, Germany and Italy did much apprehend. This Man so wisely manag'd this Affair, that he obtain'd large Sums of Mony, without any Murmurings, but against the King's Person; who being too much given to extort from his People, it was thought he would not have permitted such Sums to be rais'd, unless he himself had been a Sharer. However the Matter was propounded from the Pope in the publick Consistory, in the Presence of all the Ambassadors then resident at Court, with a Design to invade the Turkish Dominions in three several Places; in Thrace, by the Hungarians, Bohemians and Polanders; in Greece, by the French and Spaniards; and at Constantinople by the Pope himself, accompany'd by the King of England and the State of Venice: And he sent Nuntio's to all Princes, that they would join their Forces and Monies according to their Abilities, in so pious a Work. The Answer which the King gave to Pons was, That he was ready to accompany his Holyness, but the remote Distance of his Country would put him to double the Inconveniences with any others: That the Kings of France and Spain were first to be made Friends, who were fittest to accompany him; which if it could not be effected, all other Designs would prove vain. But if both should refuse, rather than his Holyness should go alone, he would wait upon him; upon Condition he might have some good Towns upon the Sea-Coast of Italy put into his Hands, for the Retreat and Security of his Men:

claration, as superficial as it was, gave the King that Reputation abroad, that not long after he was elected by the Knights of Rhodes, Protector of their Order; all Things contributing to honour a Prince, who had gain'd such high Esteem for his mighty Wisdom and Abilities.

The Conclusion of the fifteenth Century.

This Century concluded with the Deaths of three great Prelates in England; Cardinal John Morton, Arch-Bishop of Canterbury; Thomas Rotheram, Arch-Bishop of York; and Thomas Langton, Bishop of Winchester. The first was succeeded by Henry Dean, Bishop of Salisbury; the second by Thomas Savage, Bishop of London; and the third by Richard Fox, Bishop of Durham; all Men Eminent in their several Stations.

The Marriage of Prince Arthur with Catharine of Spain.

VI. This sixteenth Century began with the famous Marriage between Prince Arthur and the Infanta Catharine of Spain, who was sent over with the greatest Pomp and Attendance; a Marriage that was seven Years in compleating, then solemniz'd with the utmost Splendor and Magnificence, and memorable for the wonderful Consequence it produc'd many Years after. The Tedioufness of the Negotiation proceeded not only from the tender Years of the Persons to be marry'd, but from the two Kings themselves, who being both of great Policy and profound Judgment, stood long at a Distance viewing each others Fortunes and Success; well knowing that the very Name of the Treaty gave a Reputation of a strict Amity between them; which on both Sides serv'd to many Purposes, that their several Affairs requir'd, and yet they still continu'd free. The Infanta had for her Portion two hundred thousand Crowns, a noble Dowry in those Days, without any Covenant of Restitution either to her self or Family; and in lieu of that she had set out for Jointure the third Part of the Principality of Wales, the Dukedom of Cornwall, and the Earldom of Chester; and if she should come to be Queen, she was then to have as much as any other Queen of England ever had. This Lady was now eighteen Years of Age, and Prince Arthur above fifteen; yet notwithstanding it prov'd a great Question, and a Matter of Controversie several Years after, whether ever he had Carnal Knowledge of her. In the Examination of which, a peculiar and material Passage was alleg'd, which tho' light, and disagreeable to the Majesty of History, cannot fairly be omitted: That in the Morning after the Consummation, Prince Arthur call'd for Drink, and finding the Gentleman who brought it to smile at the Passage as an unusual Thing, he told him He had been in the middle of Spain, which was a hot Country, and his Journey had made him thirsty, and if he had been in so warm a Clime, he would have been drier than himself. However it was, this marry'd Couple liv'd not many Months together:

for on the second Day of April Prince Arthur dy'd at Ludlow Castle, where he kept his Court as Prince of Wales. There is little remaining of the Character of this Prince, but only that he was very studious and learned, beyond his Years, and beyond the Custom of great Princes. His Death was a great Trouble to the King; the Infanta was left as a Burden to him, and if his Son Prince Henry was to marry another Wife, he was to find out a second Jointure, a Matter repugnant to the publick State, and his frugal Disposition: Whereupon resolving to marry him to the same Catharine, he wrote concerning that Affair both to Spain and Rome. King Ferdinand was satisfy'd; but he met with Difficulties in procuring a Dispensation from the Pope, and gaining his Son's Consent, who tho' he was but twelve Years of Age, much oppos'd the Matter, but at length was contracted, and afterwards marry'd to her: And the secret Providence of God ordain'd that Marriage to be the Occasion of mighty Events and Revolutions.

*Catharine contracted to

About the same Time the King met with some new Disturbances from the House of York. John Earl of Lincoln, who was slain at the Battel of Stoke, left his Brother Edmund Earl of Suffolk, Heir to his Honour, and his Misfortunes; insomuch that reflecting that he was Son to Elizabeth, Sister both to King Edward the Fourth, and Richard the Third, he thought he might take an uncontroll'd Liberty under any King's Reign. He had kill'd a Man; and in such a Manner, as the Circumstances much aggravated the Crime. However King Henry granted him his Pardon; but so as he was oblig'd to pass all the Course of Law, to appear before the Judges, and receive Sentence of Condemnation. This Manner of Proceeding was so sensible a Mortification to his high Spirit, that reputing the Favour as a Mark of Ignominy, he suddenly left the Nation, and went into Flanders to his Aunt, the Dutchess Margaret. At which, tho' the King was offended, yet he was resolv'd to apply nothing but Lenitives, giving Order to his Agents in those Parts to offer him Pardon and Incouragement, if he would return; knowing that Despair in banish'd Men begets Thoughts little serviceable to themselves, and very troublesom to others. It succeeded according to his Expectation: For the Dutchess, either because she found his Genius inferior to the King's, or being oblig'd by the Concealment of her Name in Perkin's publick Confession, declin'd assisting him; so that he return'd home, and was reconcil'd to the King. But arrogant and proud Dispositions, such as this unhappy Earl's, leading Men into Dangers and Difficulties, brought this Person at last to his Ruin, under King Henry the Eighth.

The Earl of Lincoln disaffected.

He is reconcil'd to the King.

The fortunate Marriage of James King of Scotland with the Princess Margaret, which was treated of some Years past by the means of Bishop Fox, was celebrated in the beginning of this Year; which together with the preceding Year, was remarkable for two Marriages, and two Deaths: For the Marriage of Prince Arthur and his Death, the preceding Year; and for the Marriage of the King of Scotland, and the Death of Queen Elizabeth this present Year; that noted Queen dy'd in Child-bed in the Tower, and the Child not long after. This Marriage was perform'd by Proxy, and publish'd in January at St. Paul's Cross, when Te Deum was solemnly sung. And certainly the wonderful Joy shewn by the Citizens was more than could be expected, in a Case of so great and fresh Enmity between the Nations, especially in London, which was sufficiently distant from feeling any of the former Calamities of the War; therefore some have attributed it to a secret Instinct and Inspiration, touching the Happiness to ensue in future Ages. The Marriage in August following was consummated at Edinburgh; the King bringing his Daughter as far as Colli-Weston on the Way, and then consigning her to the Attendance of the Earl of Northumberland, who with a noble Train of Lords and Ladies, brought her into Scotland to the King her Husband. The Portion given by King Henry was ten thousand Pounds; and the Jointures and Advancement assur'd by the King of Scotland, was two thousand Pounds a Year, after his Death, and one thousand Pounds a Year in present, for the Lady's Allowance or Maintenance, to be set forth in Lands of the best and most certain Revenue. During this Treaty, the King remitting the Matter to the Council, some of the Table warily put the Question, That supposing the King's two Sons should die without Issue, that then the Kingdom of England would devolve to the King of Scotland, which might prejudice the Monarchy of England. To this Scruple the King made a sort of a Prophetical Answer, That if such a Case should happen, Scotland would be but an Accession to England, and not England to Scotland, because the greater would certainly draw the less; which was a safer Union for England, than that of France. The Effect of this Marriage is thus describ'd by the Bishop of Ross: 'There was a perfect Peace and sincere Amity between the two Realms of England and Scotland for a long time after. And truly during the Life of King Henry, no Cause of Breach was given by either of the Princes, but they continu'd in great Love and Friendship, and mutual Society, contracting of Marriages, continual Interchange of Merchandize between the Subjects of both Kingdoms, as if they had been all under the Obedience of one Prince; where through Justice, Policy and Riches did flourish and abound through-

VII. King Henry, finding himself secur'd by the Amity of Scotland, strengthen'd by that of Spain, cherish'd by that of Burgundy, and all Domestick Disturbances extinguish'd, now more than ever indulg'd his avaricious Temper, by endeavouring to gather and heap up Treasure. And as Princes more easily find Instruments for their Will and Humour, than their Service and Honour, he had gotten two Persons proper for his Purpose, Richard Empson and Edmund Dudley, who became so excessive and burdensome, that the People esteem'd them as his Horse-Leeches and Shearers. Dudley was of a good Family, Eloquent, and one that could put odious Business into good Language; but Empson, who was the Son of a Mechanick, throwing off all Respect, always triumph'd upon the Fact perform'd. These two being Lawyers by Profession, and Privy-Counsellors by Authority, turn'd Law and Justice into Rapines and Extortions. Many Laws at that Time, either by Reason of the Civil Wars, or the Neglect of the Judges, were forgotten, or grown out of Use; and the Patrimony of the Crown, enjoy'd by many by Vertue of long Leases, being become almost as good as Fee-Simple, mov'd the King to examine them strictly; and these two, who were thought the best Practicers in the Law, were by him chosen for that Purpose, and full Authority given them. They rais'd up many Informers and Accusers; and the Accused being put in Prison, and there kept beyond the usual Time, they were compell'd to purchase their Liberties with large Sums of Money. Others being cited by them, or their Delegates, were condemn'd, contrary to the Ordinary Course of Law; sometimes by false Witnesses, and other times by false Pretences, by which many rich Persons were impoverish'd. Such Judges, as, govern'd by Integrity, resisted their Wills, were either better taught by Imprisonments, or ruin'd by Amercements. Wards were not suffer'd to enter upon their Lands without vast Disbursements; and Laws which at several Times had been enacted more for Terror than Punishment, and some that had also been repealed, were without any Remission, rigorously put in Execution. These and many other Courses, fitter to be bury'd in silence than repeated, they had of preying upon the People, both for their Master's Advantage and their own; insomuch that they arriv'd at great Riches and Substance. In these Matters the King himself was too nearly concern'd to escape Censures and Reflections; and we have this peculiar Story remaining of his blameable Conduct. The King as he came to Henningham, a Castle belonging to the Earl of Oxford, who was a Principal Minister both in Peace and War, was there receiv'd and entertain'd with much Splendor and Magnificence: All that held Land by any Title of the Earl, came at that Time to give their Attendance: of which many were Gentlemen, and others Yeomen: They all wore the Earl's blue Liveries and his Feathers in their Hats; but the rest of their Apparel was according to every Man's Condition. When the King came forth, and found them orderly plac'd in two Rows in the great Hall, he having nicely observ'd them, ask'd the Earl, If they were all his Servants: The Earl with a Smile answer'd, They were his Tenants and Retainers, who upon this Occasion came to wait upon his Grace. The King having thank'd him for his good Entertainment, said, That the Report of his Hospitality came short of the Truth; but he could not suffer his Laws to be broken in his Presence; therefore his Attorney must talk with him about it. The Nobility were then restrain'd from giving above a certain Number of Liveries; so that the Earl was forc'd to compound for no less than fifteen thousand Marks. It is very probable that this unusual Action of the King's, whose Business was ever to depress the Nobility, might proceed as much from Policy as Avarice.

In the mean Time the Earl of Suffolk, either through Hatred or Discontent, or for the Debts he contracted at Prince Arthur's Marriage, fled a second Time into Flanders with his Brother Richard; to the great Dissatisfaction of the People, who reasonably judg'd that some Disorder would ensue. The King resorting to his former Arts, immediately caus'd Sir Robert Curson, Governor of the Castle of Hammes near Calais, to fly from his Post, and offer his Service and Assistance to the Earl. This Knight having insinuated himself into the Earl's Secrets, and learning from him who his cheif Supporters were in England, he advertis'd the King of all with the utmost Secrecy; but still maintian'd his own Credit and inward Trust with the Earl. Upon his Advice the King attach'd William Courtney Earl of Devonshire, who had marry'd the Lady Catharine Daughter to King Edward the Fourth, William De-la-Pole, Brother to the Earl of Suffolk, the Lord George Abergavenny, Sir James Tyrrell, Sir John Windham, and Sir Thomas Green. The Issue was, William Courtney was detain'd Prisoner during the King's Life; not so much out of Guilt, as his near Relation to the House of York: De-la-Pole was likewise kept Prisoner, tho' more at large; Abergavenny and Green were set at Liberty, Tyrrell and Windham were beheaded, and the rest of inferior Quality hang'd. This was that Tyrrell, who was concern'd in the Murder of Edward the Fifth and his Brother in the Tower; for whom so easie a Death was too small a Punishment. Then to keep up Curson's Credit in Flanders, and conceal his Intelligence in England, about the same time there was publish'd at St. Paul's Cross the Pope's Bull of Excommunication and Execration against the Earl of Suffolk, and the said Curson, with some other Abettors of the Earl; in which it appears Heav'n was made too much to bow to Earth, and Religion to yield to Policy. But shortly Curson, having perform'd his Business, return'd into England, where he gain'd as much the Favour of the King, as he did the Reproach of the People. His Departure extreamly abated the Courage of the Earl, who found he was betray'd: Therefore endeavouring to procure Help from foreign Princes, he went into Germany, and from thence into France: But his Labours proving vain, he return'd into Flanders under the Protection of Arch-Duke Philip, where he continu'd for about two Years.

The Earl of Suffolk causes new Disturbances.

Several executed.

In a Parliament call'd this Year, where Dudley was chosen Speaker, several wise Laws were enacted; and there was also granted to the King a Subsidy both for the Temporality and the Clergy. And yet notwithstanding, before the Year was expir'd there went out Commissions for a general Benevolence, tho' there were no Wars, nor Fears of any. The same Year the City of London gave five thousand Marks for Confirmation of their Liberties; a Thing more proper for the Beginnings of Kings Reigns, than the latter Ends. Neither was it a small Advantage that the Mint gain'd upon the late Statute, by the Recoinage of Groats, and Half-Groats, since call'd Twelve-Pences and Six-Pences. As for the Mills of Empson and Dudley, they still did grind more than ever; so that it was surprizing to see what golden Showers did pour down at once upon the King's Treasury: The last Payments of the Marriage Portion from Spain, the Subsidy, the Benevolence, the Recoinage, the Redemption of the City's Liberties, and the several Contingencies. He had now but one Son, and one Daughter unprovided for; he was wise, of an exalted Spirit, who needed not to make Riches his Glory; and he excell'd in many other Things; only Avarice ever taints in it self Matter of Ambition. It seems he thought to leave his Son such a Kingdom, and such a Mass of Treasure, as he might chuse his Greatness where he pleas'd. Then to add to his Honour and Fame, this Year Pope Julus sent to him a Cap of Maintenance, and a Sword, as to a Defender of the Church; which Cap and Sword were receiv'd with many pompous Ceremonies.

The King increases in Riches.

But not long after the King was concern'd and perplex'd about the Death of the famous Isabel Queen of Spain, and Mother to his Son's Wife; by reason of the exact Resemblance that was in the Government of their Kingdoms, between Ferdinand and himself, both of them reigning in the Right of their Wives.

A. D. 1506. Reg. 21.

Wives. And tho' Henry had obtain'd his Kingdom under the Title of the House of Lancaster, won it by the Sword, and had it confirm'd both by Parliament and Pope, and tho' he had never admitted of his Wife's Right; yet he could not but be apprehensive, That Ferdinand's quitting the Crown to his Daughter, might by Way of Example effect and prejudice his Cause, and make immediate Way for his Son Prince Henry. The Case was the same, and the foremention'd Securities were with many Men of no Weight, in Comparison of Natural Extract. To determine this Matter with least Opposition, Queen Isabel left the Administration of the Kingdom to her Husband Ferdinand during his Life, tho' her Daughter Joan was immediate Heir. But this highly disgusted the Arch-Duke Philip who had marry'd this Heir; for being become King of Spain in Right of his Wife, he thought he was injur'd, as being reputed unfit to govern without his Father-in-law's Assistance and Superintendency. To remedy this Grievance, before Ferdinand should be settled in his pretended Administration, he took shipping with his Wife in January, when it was believ'd that he would never have taken a Voyage of that Nature. He had hardly left the Coast of Flanders, when taken by a sudden Tempest, his Fleet was dispers'd upon the Coast of England; so that he was forc'd to get on shore at Weymouth, contrary to the Advice of some with him. The great Number of his Ships had given Alarm to the Country, so that many Troops of armed Men hasten'd to Weymouth, not knowing but it might be some Enemy to invade the Nation. Sir Thomas Trenchard, and Sir John Carew, who were their Commanders, understanding the Cause of his Landing, desir'd him to rest himself in Sir Thomas's House, 'till they could inform the King of his Arrival; to which he consented, as knowing that otherwise they would not suffer him to depart. The King hearing of this, sent the Lord Arundell by way of Compliment, to let him know that he himself would shortly come and give him a Visit; but Philip fearing to lose too much Time, resolv'd to go himself to Henry, causing his Queen to come slowly after him. He 'was met six Miles from Windsor by Prince Henry, and one Mile from thence by the King, who receiv'd him with all the Terms of Honour and Friendship. He treated with them of the Marriage of their Children, and of his own Marriage with Margaret, the Dutchess Dowager of Savoy, Sister to Philip: He renew'd all Confederacies made between them in the preceding Year, by the Name of Arch-Duke Philip, Duke of Burgundy, now by the Name of King of Spain. These had better Success for the English than the former, especially in the Fishing Trade; at which the Flemmings were much offended. He with much Difficulty obtain'd the Person of the Earl of Suffolk, who liv'd under the Protection of Philip: Henry knew so well how to persuade him, by passing his Royal Word he would not put him to Death, that Philip sent for him into Flanders; the one desiring to have him before the other departed, and the other not to depart 'till he was arriv'd, that it might be believ'd that he had been in a Manner compell'd to deliver him up. As soon as the Earl was arriv'd, and put in safe Custody in the Tower, Philip departed well pleas'd from England, and was receiv'd in Spain without any manner of Resistance, Ferdinand totally quitting the Government to him; which he enjoy'd but for a while, for he dy'd shortly after.

King Henry declares himself.

The Earl of Suffolk being in the Tower, and King Henry freed from all manner of Trouble and Molestation, he betook himself to Domestick Affairs, and sent his Chaplain, the famous Thomas Wolsey, afterwards Cardinal, to the Emperor Maximilian, to treat of the Marriage with the forenam'd Dowager of Savoy. This Treaty in a great Measure prov'd the first Rise of Wolsey, who perform'd the Journey and the whole Matter with such Celerity of Dispatch as was almost incredible; for which he receiv'd the King's particular Thanks, and Favour. This Marriage was never consummated, by Reason of King Henry's Indisposition of Health that shortly ensu'd; for he now began daily to decline and and draw towards his End: The Gout, a Disease more troublesom than mortal, was the Forerunner of a Distillation, which falling upon his Lungs brought him into a kind of Consumption, which he perceiving, he began to give himself totally to pious Works. For this Year he gave greater Alms than ever he did before, and discharg'd all Prisoners about the City, that lay for Fees or Debts under forty Shillings. He hasten'd his religious and charitable Foundations; and hearing also of the Outcries of his People against the Oppressions of Empson and Dudley, with their Accomplices, partly by devout People about him, and partly by publick Sermons, he began to be touch'd with great Remorse and Compunction. Yet still these two Devourers of the People, tho' they could not but hear of these Scruples in the King's Conscience, as if the King's Soul and his Mony were lodg'd in several Offices, and the one never to interfere with the other, proceeded with as great a Rage as ever. Many for slight Causes were molested in their Estates, and in their Lives: One dy'd in Prison before his Cause could be heard; another being in Prison for denying to pay a Sum contrary to Law, was not let out 'till the next Reign, when Empson was put in his Place.

He proceeds to Acts of Charity.

To make good the usual Custom of promising Obedience to new Popes, the King sent Sir Gilbert Talbot, with two other Ambassadors, to Pope Julius the Second, which he had not formerly done, tho' he was elected some Years before. They urg'd much for the Canonization of King Henry the Sixth, but did not succeed; either because the Pope held that Honour at an excessive Rate, or that he was willing to make a Distinction between Innocents and Saints. Being dismiss'd by the Pope, they carry'd the Garter, and all the Robes and Badges of that Order to Guido Ubaldo, Duke of Urbino, who thankfully accepted of the Honour. This Year the King furnish'd his Hospital in the Savoy, which had been a noted Palace of the Lancastrians; and likewise he founded three Monasteries for the Conventual Friars of the Order of St. Francis, and three for the Observants of the same Order, in distinct Places. Besides which, his pious Mother the Lady Margaret, Countess of Richmond, not long before this Time, founded two noble Colleges in the University of Cambridge, call'd Christ and St. John's. These were spiritual Improvements and Advantages: But the last Act of State that concluded this King's Temporal Felicity, was the Agreement of a Glorious Match between his Daughter Mary, and Charles Prince of Spain, afterwards the great Emperor, both being of tender Years; which Treaty was perfected by Bishop Fox, and other Commissioners at Calais, the Year before the King's Death. In which Alliance he took so much Satisfaction, that considering he was to have two Kings for his Sons-in-law, he declar'd That he thought he had built a Wall of Brass about his Kingdom. So that now there was nothing to be added to this great King's Felicity, who had arriv'd at the Top of Human Glory, but a quiet and seasonable Exit to secure him against any future Blows of Fortune.

The King's last Acts.

And this prov'd his Fate; being foretold by a regular consuming Sickness, which gave him full Time to provide against all the Terrors of his last Hour. He liv'd almost all his Time in Troubles, but always with Success and Victory: He found a Kingdom involv'd in Civil Wars, he left it in a settled Peace. His Subjects, who were impoverish'd by the past Disorders, were notwithstanding by reason of his wise Government become rich; and he did not only free the Crown from all Debts, but left behind him in Richmond a vast Treasure of a Million and eight hundred thousand Pounds Sterling; so that he was justly accounted the richest Prince in Europe. To crown all, in his last Year, as well as his first, he did an Act of Piety, worthy of Imitation; he granted a general Pardon, as expecting a second Coronation in a better Kingdom; and did also declare by his Will, that Restitution should be made of those Sums, which had been unjustly taken by his Officers. And thus this Solomon of England, as he is call'd by some, dy'd at his Palace at Richmond, upon the twenty second Day of April, in the fifty third Year of his Age, after a most politick and fortunate Reign of twenty three Years and eight Months.

His Interment.

The Manner of his Interment was thus: His Body was brought into the great Chamber, where resting three Days, it had solemn Mass and Dirige sung by a Miter'd Bishop; whence remov'd into the Hall, had there the same Service the like Space, as also in the Chappel for three Days longer; and in every Place a Herse adorn'd with Banners, Escutcheons and Pendants, and with the Attendance of Mourners. From whence it was convey'd into a Chariot, cover'd with black Cloath of Gold, drawn by five noble Coursers cover'd with black Velvet, adorn'd with Escutcheons of fine Gold, with his Effigies over it, apparell'd in rich Robes, with the Crown on the Head, and Scepter and Globe in the Hands, environ'd with Banners of Arms of all his Dominions, Titles and Genealogies; a great Number of Prelates praying, with other Attendants before the Body, and nine Mourners and about six hundred Torches following it. In this Order it was met at St. George's Field by the Religious of all Sorts in and about the City, with the Lord Mayor, Aldermen and Officers in Black; and was brought through London to St. Paul's, and plac'd in the Quire under a stately Herse. Whence after a solemn Mass, and Sermon preach'd by the Bishop of Rocheſter, it was next Day with the same State convey'd to Westminster, having the Royal Banner born on a Courser trapped with the Arms of the Defunct, and there by six Lords taken out of the Chariot, and set under a most glorious Herse full of Lights; the Representation lying upon the Coffin upon a Pall of Gold, about which the Mourners being plac'd within the first Rail, Knights with Banners within the second, and Officers of Arms without the same, Garter King of Arms cry'd aloud, For the Soul of the Noble King Henry the Seventh; when the Quire beginning Placebo, and ending at Dirige, clos'd the Solemnities of that Day. The next Day were three Masses solemnly sung by Bishops, at the last of which were offer'd the Banner and Courser, Coat of Arms, Sword, Target and Helmet, the Nobility offering their rich Palls of Cloath of Gold, &c. And thus, the great Officers breaking their Staves, his Body was interr'd in his own magnificent Royal Chappel; in which a glorious Monument of Copper was erected for him, and finish'd by a Florentine at the Expence of a thousand Pound; which is thus describ'd by the Lord Bacon: He lyeth bury'd at Westminster in one of the stateliest and daintiest Monuments of Europe, both for the Chappel and the Sepulchre; so that he dwelleth more richly dead in the Monument of his Tomb, than he did alive in Richmond, or any of his Palaces.

His Character, and Reign.

To say something of the Person and Character of this mighty Prince; he was of great Vigour and Strength of Body, lean, and of Stature taller than the common Sort; of a wonderful Beauty and fair Complexion; with a Countenance pleasing and smiling, especially in Conversation. Yet he had a high Spirit and haughty Courage, and govern'd without a Rival; not admitting any near or full Approach either to his Power, or to his Secrets, and all without any affected Ostentation. He was a Man of wonderful Abilities, and had many excellent Qualifications; he was sober, moderate, chaste and pious, had a quick Wit, and a profound Penetration, which in all great Perils and Emergencies was supernatural, and in a manner divine. And indeed as to Wisdom and Policy he seem'd to excel all Princes, always shewing in them something admirable and surprizing; by which he surmounted infinite Difficulties, both before and after he came to the Crown, and brought Peace, Union and Tranquility to a Nation divided, distracted, and besmear'd with Blood; gaining the full Possession of a Throne by a Complication of all the Titles that ever made a Man King, as Inheritance, Marriage, Conquest, Usurpation and Election, besides the Pontifical Confirmation. Having obtain'd the Crown, he politickly took care to put gradual Stops to the Power of the Nobility, who had lately rais'd such Storms in the Nation, which he perform'd by procuring three several Laws:

Laws: By one of which the Barons Lands were made alienable, which would cause them insensibly to divide and break in Pieces: By another he encourag'd Husbandry, ascertaining Proportions of Land for Tillage; by which the Country Farmers, living more plentifully, would not so readily be seduc'd by their Lords to disturb the publick Peace: By a third, Retainers were lopp'd off; so that the Nobility were stripp'd of their mighty Retinues, and could not easily compose a Cavalry, which was usually made up of these Followers: By all which, the Balance of the Nation was gradually alter'd, and the Commons obtain'd a greater Power and Figure than ever they had before. As his Wisdom was great, so he took care to be serv'd by the ablest Men that could be found in the Nation, both as to War and Counsel; nor did he regard how subtle they were, for as to that he knew himself to have the master Reach. His Government and Power was extensive and great, yet no King ever yielded more to his Parliaments, which still made it greater, so that many foreign Princes either courted or dreaded it. Some reckon it among his principal Glories, that three Popes, Alexander the Sixth, Pius the Third, and Julius the Second, did in their several Times, with the Consent of their Cardinals, elect him for Chief Defender of Christ's Church, before all other Christian Princes. He always profess'd to love and seek Peace; and it was his usual Preface to his Treaties, That when Christ came into the World, Peace was sung, and when he went out of the World Peace was bequeath'd. Yet he is blam'd with making himself somewhat little by being ambitious, and a little poor in admiring Riches: But as to his Ambition, it was better regulated than in any of his Predecessors; and his Avarice might be said to be more the Effect of his Policy than his Temper. The most real Stains upon his Memory was his taking off the Lord Stanley's Head, who had set the Crown upon his, and his unfair Execution of the young Earl of Warwick, without any certain Guilt, or perhaps none greater than his being the last of the Plantagenet Race; which seem'd to have been reveng'd upon his own Race and Progeny: For his Possession in the first Line ended in his Grand-Children, as that of Edward the Third, and Henry the Fourth had done before him. He seems to have been more than ordinary solicitous about his Posterity, and by a fam'd Tradition we are told that he sent to enquire after his Successors from a celebrated Prophet or Negromancer, who in his Answer return'd him this remarkable Latine Verse, Mars, Puer, Aleto, Virgo, Vulpes, Leo, Nullus: But how far this was accomplish'd in the Characters of his Successors, will better appear from the following History.

The Reign of King HENRY the Eighth.

Containing 37 Years, 9 Months, and 5 Days.

I. IN the last Reign of King Henry the Seventh, the two Houses of Lancaster and York were join'd and cemented; but now they were intirely united in the Person of King Henry the Eighth, in whose Character and Life there was such uncommon Variety, that he may be said to have inherited the good and bad Qualifications of both those famous Families. He succeeded his Father with the universal Applause and Satisfaction of the Nation; being now near nineteen Years of Age, and happily endow'd with all the Perfections of Body and Mind. As to his Person, it was extraordinary tall, beautiful and majestick, and he had great Strength and Agility of Body, which signally appear'd in several Jufts and Tournaments before and after he came to the Crown: For at Tilt he bore down a brave Man at Arms, both Horfe and Rider; at Barriers threw Sir William Kingston a Knight of great Strength to the Ground; and with a Battel-Axe combated with Giot, a Gigantick German, and lent him more powerful Blows than he could repay. Then besides his having a magnanimous Spirit and extensive Soul, he had the Happiness of a nice and learned Education, being design'd by his Father, during the Life of his Brother Arthur, for the Archbishoprick of Canterbury; and not only the more necessary Parts of Learning were infus'd into him, but even those of Ornament; so that besides his being an able Linguist, Philosopher and Divine, he was also a curious Musician and Composer. All which Qualifications, being join'd to so excellent a Personage, caus'd him to be lov'd and admir'd by his Subjects, and also to be courted and rever'd by his Neighbours.

*The Beginning
Reign.*

Thus happily began this remarkable Reign, when the young King, following the Advice of able Counsellors, committed fewer Errors than when he govern'd by a more unlimited Will; for as they were selected by the wise Lady Margaret his Grandmother, so he took their Impressions readily, both out of Diffidence of his own Abilities in managing a Kingdom, and a Desire to be free as to those Exercises most agreeable to his Youth and Dispositions. His chief Counsellors were William Warham Arch-Bishop of Canterbury, and Lord Chancellor; Richard Fox, Bishop of Winchester, Secretary and Lord Privy-Seal; Thomas Howard, Earl of Surry, Lord Treasurer; George Talbot, Earl of Shrewsbury, Steward of the King's Household; Sir Charles Somerset, Lord Chamberlain; Doctor Thomas Ruthal, Sir Thomas Lovel, Sir Henry Wyat, and Sir Edward Poynings. By the Advice of these Counsellors, one of his first Acts, after the finishing his Father's magnificent Funeral, was his Care to perform his Father's former Appointment in marrying the Lady Catharine of Spain, the Relict of his Brother Prince Arthur; to which probably, but out of Respect to Filial Piety, he had not the greatest Devotion; and for relinquishing of which, no doubt he might have more easily obtain'd a Dispensation from the Pope, than his Father had done for getting it allow'd. But Obsequiousness to his Father's first Appointment, (tho' contrary to his last Thoughts) and Respect to the Advice of his Council, so far prevail'd with him, that he would not be crown'd till the Marriage was solemniz'd, that one Coronation might serve for both Parties. Accordingly, about six Weeks after his Father's Decease, on the third Day of June, he marry'd the Princess Catharine at the Bishop of Salisbury's House in Fleetstreet; where among the numerous Ceremonies, this is remarkable, that tho' the Bride was a Widow, she was attir'd all in White, to express her untouch'd Virginity, upon which she and her Friends ever insisted. Shortly after, the King, having made twenty four Knights of the Bath in the Tower, upon Midsummer Day was crown'd at Westminster, together with his Queen, by the Hands of Warham Arch-Bishop of Canterbury, with wonderful Magnificence, and all the Circumstances of State. All the Nobility, Spiritual and Temporal, did their Homage; and the People, according to ancient Custom, being ask'd Whether they would receive him for their King? they unanimously cry'd, Yea, Yea! Then to perform the most noble Part of his Father's Will, he proclaim'd a Pardon for all Crimes, except Treason, Murder, and Felony, and promis'd Restitution of all Goods unjustly taken from any of his Subjects. And because the Instruments of such Injustice are always most odious, and nothing gives a People more Satisfaction, than seeing their Persecutors punish'd; he caus'd Empson and Dudley, the two chief Actors in the late rapacious Proceedings, to be committed to the Tower, and divers of the inferior Agents, call'd Promoters, to be set in the Pillory in Cornhill, with Papers on their Heads, and then to ride through the City to Newgate, with their Faces to the Horse-Tails.

*Empson and
mitted.*

And now the King, having taken several Prospects of his neighbouring Princes, thought fit to call a Parliament in January following; in which the principal Proceedings seem to have reference to Empson and Dudley's Extortions; which were so represented, that the King was willing in some measure to restrain his own Authority, that he might enlarge the Peoples Confidence and Affection towards him. And as divers of those Statutes, by which the late King Henry took Advantage of the People, were repeal'd, explain'd or limited; so Empson and Dudley, who had formerly been condemn'd, were now attainted of High-Treason. After they had continu'd above half a Year longer in Prison, the King, to satisfy the importunate Clamours of the People, caus'd them both to be beheaded; in which, according to some, he acted more like a good King, than a good Master. However by this, and his remitting of several Fines, he gain'd the Love and Affection of the Nation at this Time, and was in perfect Peace and Safety with his People. This gave him Opportunity to follow those Liberties and Pleasures which were most suitable to his youthful and vigorous Disposition; yet his Exercises were not sportful alone, but had in them a mixture of Letters and Arms. For tho' he us'd Feasting, Masks, Dancings, Singing, Playing upon many Instruments, making Verses, and the like; yet his more serious Entertainments were Study of History, and School Divinity, in which he much delighted, as likewise in Jufts, Tourneys, and Barriers, and that not in an ordinary Manner, but with the two-handed Sword and Battel-Axe. These again were adorn'd and set out with most costly Pageants and magnificent Devices, and those so frequently, that they did not only consume much Time, but also great part of his vast Treasure. And indeed never any King delighted more in Pomp and Show; his Court was marshall'd like a Camp, and his Camp set out like a Court; so that Mars and Venus seem'd to be in Conjunction all this Reign, and Love and Honour as fashionable as in the Romances of those Times. Nor needed he any thing besides his own Example to draw the young Nobility after him, who were now no less considerable for their Number than their Quality; so that all the neighbouring Nations were both sensible and apprehensive of his growing Greatness.

For this Reason several Ambassadors repair'd to him from France, Scotland, Denmark, Italy, and other Places, who were entertain'd after a most magnificent and extraordinary Manner. The Business of Lewis the French King was chiefly to keep a good Correspondence between the two Nations, while he proceeded with his Wars in Italy; which was the Cause of a new Treaty between England and France. And whereas at the Treaty in 1498, King Lewis had given Caution to Henry the Seventh to pay that which remain'd of the seven hundred and forty five thousand Crowns, due from a former Treaty between Charles the Eighth and the said Henry, in 1492; He did now stipulate to pay the Remainder of the said Sum. The Business of Scotland was Congratulation, in the Name of King James the Fourth, his Brother-in-law and Sister, with a Confirmation of a late Treaty of Peace; and that of Denmark was chiefly to establish a better Course for Trade and Commerce. But because Pope Julius the Second became jealous of the Greatness of the French in Italy, he earnestly sollicitated King Henry, by reminding him of the Glory of his Ancestors, and offer'd him the Honour to be Caput Fœderis Italici. Upon this the King sent Bambridge, Arch-Bishop of York, to reside at Rome, and to treat of these Affairs. In the mean time the French march'd forwards and invested Bononia, while the Pope lay sick in the Place, and forc'd his Holiness to very hard Conditions, which sounded so ill, that King Henry immediately made a League with Ferdinand King of Spain for his Defence; which occasion'd greater Actions afterwards. Ferdinand sent an Embassie both to congratulate King Henry for the Birth of a Son, which liv'd near eight Weeks, and to desire his Assistance against the Moors in Africa. His Request was immediatly granted, and the Lord Thomas Darcy was sent with fifteen hundred Archers, who afterwards wards returned home richly rewarded. In the like Manner Margaret, Regent of the Low-Countries, obtain'd of the King fifteen hundred Archers to assist her against the Duke of Guelders, tho' Confederate both to the French and Scotch. These under the Command of Sir Edward Poynings, Knight of the Garter, were upon their Landing met by the Lady Regent, and treated with great Testimonies of their Worth, and afterwards dismiss'd with unusual Marks of Honour. So that at present every Thing contributed towards the Fame of the English King and Nation.

The Seas infested,

and clear'd.

Yet the King's Authority over the narrow Seas, which had been carefully preserv'd by his Ancestors, was about this Time somewhat lessen'd by the Piracies of Andrew Barton a Scotch Man. This Person, in Revenge of his Father's Death and other Injuries, having in vain sought Redress for a Ship taken from him by some Portuguese obtain'd Letters of Mark from James the Fourth his King, but upon Condition that he should not exercise Piracy. Notwithstanding which, he seiz'd upon several English Vessels, upon Pretence of their carrying Portuguese Goods, and pillag'd them. To remedy which Inconvenience, the two Sons of Thomas Earl of Surry were employ'd; the Elder, call'd Thomas, commanding in one Ship, and Edward, the younger Brother, in another. In the open Sea they engag'd with Barton's two Ships, which, tho' less than the other, maintain'd a cruel Fight; the obstinate Pirate, tho' wounded even to Death, encouraging his Men with his Whistle to his last Breath. But the English so well pursu'd their Point, that at last they forc'd their Ships, took all the Men Prisoners, and at London presented them to the King; who, upon their Submission, graciously pardon'd them, upon Condition they departed the Kingdom within twenty Days. King James hearing of this, sent to require Satisfaction, as being against the Treaty between them; but it was answer'd, That it did not become a King to impute Breach of Treaty to his Confederate and Allie, only for shewing Mercy to Pirates. The Messenger, rather silenc'd than satisfy'd with this Answer, return'd to his King, who when Occasion was offer'd, fail'd not to shew how much he resented the Death of Barton. Having settled all things in Quiet, King Henry pass'd away his Christmass at Greenwich, with the extraordinary Pomp of many unusual Masks, Interludes, and other glorious and expensive Entertainments.

The King declares War against France.

II. While King Henry liv'd in Peace and Felicity at home, the French King proceeded in the Wars of Italy, with so much Success, that the Pope was compell'd to sollicite the Assistance of him and Ferdinand of Spain. This being variously debated in Council, it was at last determin'd that this was a fair Opportunity to recover the English Dominions in France. Whereupon the King resolv'd, together with calling a Parliament, to send to Lewis the Twelfth a monitory Embassie, requiring him to desist from the War against the Pope; but Lewis, whether out of his own Courage, or that he thought the Emperor assur'd to him, regarded not his Advice. King Henry therefore, that he might have more than one Pretence to invade France, sent bravely to require all his Patrimonial Inheritance of Normandy, Gascony, Anjou, Maine, &c. and in case of a Refusal, to denounce War. This then being proclaim'd, Levies were commanded, and Supplies granted by a Parliament that met in the Beginning of this Year, in which several new Laws were enacted.

The War with France being determin'd, it was consulted in what Part the English should begin: And tho' that of Calais seem'd the most ready Way, yet because King Ferdinand promis'd to join with the King of England in this War, it was by his Consent resolv'd to land in some Part of the Spanish Dominions; and that from thence, both their Armies being united, should jointly invade Guienne, and Gascony. The General nam'd by King Henry was Thomas Gray Marquess of Dorset, with whom went, besides his three Brothers, the Lord Thomas Howard, Son and Heir to the Earl of Surry, the Lord Brook, Lord

Lord Willoughby, and Lord Ferrers, with divers Knights and Esquires, all of them brave Persons, and ten thousand Soldiers; of whom one half were Archers, who besides their Bows and Arrows carry'd Halberts, which they pitch'd on the Ground while their Arrows were shot, and then took them again to do Execution on the Enemy. These landed the third Day of June on the Coasts of Biscay, where within three Days after their Arrival, there came from the King of Spain a Marquess and an Earl to receive them; but without any of those Necessaries promis'd them. After the Army had lain many Days expecting Aid and Provisions from King Ferdinand, at length a Bishop came from that King, desiring them to have Patience for a while, and shortly they should have full Satisfaction. In the mean Time the English Men being forc'd to feed much upon Garlick, and to drink hot Wines, fell into such Sicknes, that many of them dy'd, to the Number of eighteen hundred Persons; upon which Discouragement, the Lord Marquess sent to Ferdinand to know his Resolutions, who return'd Answer, that the Duke of Alva was ready to join him with a great Power. And shortly after the Duke of Alva did advance with a powerful Army, as if he design'd to join him according to Promise; but being come within a Day's March, he suddenly turn'd towards the Kingdom of Navarre, under Pretence it was necessary to begin the Expedition through that Country. Here that King not answering his Expectations, he took the Occasion to drive him out of his Kingdom, and to conquer it for the use of King Ferdinand. This Spanish Policy was no ways pleasing to the English, who finding nothing but Words from the King of Spain, and being weary of so many Delays, they fell upon some Towns in the Borders of Guienne; but for want of a competent Number of Horses, they were unable to perform any Thing of moment. At which Time the Lord Marquess fell sick, and the Lord Howard supply'd the Place of General; to whom the King of Spain once again sent Excuses, desiring him, since the Season was so advanc'd, that he would be pleas'd to break up his Camp, and dispose his Men into the neighbouring Towns 'till the following Spring, when he would not fail to make good all his Promises. King Henry in the mean Time, understanding the King of Spain's Intentions, sent his Herald Windsor with Letters to the Army, ordering them to continue there, for shortly he design'd to send them a new Supply of Forces, under the Conduct of the Lord Herbert his Chamberlain. But this so incens'd the Soldiers, that in a Fury they had slain the Lord Howard, if he had not yielded immediately to return home; who thereupon was forc'd to hire Ships, and in the Beginning of December they landed in England; being taught by this fruitless Expedition what Reliance was to be had on Spanish Promises. King Henry was much offended, and design'd to have punish'd some of his Officers; but it was soon made appear to him, that King Ferdinand was only blamable, who had no greater Design than the Conquest of Navarre.

An Army sent into Spain to invade France.

But to no Advantage.

Tho' this Voyage was successless, yet Sir Edward Howard, who conducted the Marquess to Spain, having with his Fleet first clear'd the Seas from Enemies, landed at a Bay in Bretaign, and march'd seven Miles into the Country, from whence, after burning some Towns, he brought away rich Spoils. Not satisfy'd with this, he put his Men on Shore at Conquet, and several other Places; where the French still receiving the worse, they at last desir'd a Parly. The Substance of which was, That the English should desist from this kind of desultory and cruel War, which tended only to burning of Villages, and ruining the Poor. But he reply'd, He was not to take his Directions from them; that it was the Part of brave Gentlemen to defend their Country, and not meanly to sue for Mercy. After which, and a Banquet in his Ship, they were dismiss'd, and the English Admiral return'd home. The French, in the mean Time, making great Preparations by Sea, King Henry thought fit to reinforce his Fleet, adding to twenty Ships under the Command of his Admiral, twenty five more under the Command of those brave Men that attended him; placing in the chief Ship, call'd the Regent of a thousand Tun, Sir Thomas Knevet, Master of his Horse, and Mr. John Carew, with seven hundred Men; in the Soverain, the famous Sir Charles Brandon and Sir Henry Guilford, with sixty of the tallest Yeomen of the Guard. This choice Fleet meeting with thirty nine Sail coming out of Brest in Bretaign, attack'd them; where two of the greatest Ships on both Sides being grappled, fell on Fire by some Accident, or as the French would have it by the Design of Brimauguet the Commander. The Captains of the English Ship, the Regent, and of the French, call'd the Cordeliere, together with the Soldiers in them, perish'd all, except a few who escap'd by swimming. However the rest of the French were so terrify'd with the Sight, that they immediately stood off, some to Brest, and others to the adjoining Islands. To repair this Loss, King Henry built a Ship the greatest that ever had been seen in England, calling it Henry Grace de Dieu.

Preparations
against France.

King Henry now finding that Affairs were grown to some Extremity between the two Nations, disclos'd his Design of going in Person into France, chusing rather to make War in his Enemies Country, than to attend it at home. That he might the better perform this, he was advis'd to discover what Correspondence he might expect from his Neighbours and Confederates; therefore he had formerly sent Sir Robert Wingfield to negotiate with the Emperor Maximilian, and ingage him to his Party, in which he found no great Difficulty; the Emperor being pleas'd that the warlike Disposition of the young King was turn'd against France, so that with Assurance of his Affection he encourag'd him to proceed. He endeavour'd likewise to gain the King of Spain, and the King of Scotland; but the former, having gain'd his Point as to Arragon, chose rather to be quiet, and the latter had actually enter'd into a League with the French King. For which Reason the King sent his Treasurer the Earl of Surry into Yorkshire and the Northern Parts, to have an Army in Readiness, in case the Scots should move in his Absence. Order was also given that the Fortifications should be repair'd, and all necessary Additions made to his Castles and Fortresses on the Sea-Coast. Together with all this Provision, he thought fit to call a Parliament, where besides enacting divers good Laws, he obtain'd two Fifteenths, and four Demies, besides a large Poll, according to every Man's Quality. In the mean Time Pope Julius the Second, who had kindled the War against France, dy'd; and was succeeded by Leo the Tenth, who pursuing his Predecessor's Designs, encourag'd King Henry in the same War. But he having now accomplish'd the Age of one and twenty Years, needed little Invitation; and the rather because he was assur'd of the Assistance of the Emperor, who was confident that however the Business succeeded between the two Nations, he could make his Advantage. That he might effect this the better, he politickly interpos'd some Difficulties; nor would he be wholly won, 'till he had obtain'd of King Henry a hundred and twenty thousand Ducats towards his Charge in bringing three hundred Horse and eight thousand Foot, which should enter Burgundy, as soon as the King attempted Picardy.

A. D. King Henry being resolv'd to proceed in his Expedition, thought fit in the 1513. first Place to clear the Sea from the French Navy; and therefore he sent out
Reg. 4. his own Fleet, consisting of forty two Sail, under the Conduct of Sir Edward Howard Lord Admiral, accompany'd with the Lord Ferrers, and many other worthy Persons. These sailing to the Coast of Bretaign, arriv'd at Bertram Bay, and there lay at Anchor in Sight of the French Fleet, then commanded by one Pregent, a Knight of Rhodes, who keeping himself close in the Haven of Brest, the English Admiral design'd to attack him in that Place: But because the Ships were too great to enter the Bay, he caus'd certain Boats to be mann'd out, expecting by that means to tow out the French; but this proving ineffectual, he call'd a Council of War, where it was determin'd, that first they should attack Pregent and his Gallies, lying in Blancfable Bay, and then then set upon the rest of the Fleet in the Haven of Brest. And it was further appointed, That the Lord Ferrers, Sir Stephen Bull, and others, should land with a competent Number to attack the Forts, which the French had there rais'd; while the Admiral with little Gallies and Barges enter'd the Bay, so that the French might at once be attack'd by Sea and Land. But tho' this was determin'd by a Council of War, yet the Admiral had a Project by himself, occasion'd by a Spanish Knight, who affirm'd that he might enter the Bay with very little Danger; therefore calling a few select Friends, he made them privy to his Design, which was to take upon him the whole Enterprize, with only their Assistance; and was so confident of Success, that he wrote to King Henry to come in Person and have the Honour of the Enterprize himself; but the King being otherwise diverted, did not come. On St. Mark's Day the Admiral put himself in a small Barge, appointing three little Gallies, and his own Ship-Boat to attend him, with which he suddenly row'd into the Bay, where Pregent had moor'd up his Gallies just to the Ground; from whence and the Forts on the Land came a terrible Storm of Shot: Yet still the Admiral row'd on, and coming to the Gallies bravely drove out the French Soldiers. The Bay was shallow, and the other Ships, by reason of the Lowness of the Tide, could not enter; which the French Men perceiving, they enter'd the Gallies again, and renew'd the Fight with Pikes and other Weapons; whereupon the Admiral attempting to return to his Barge, which the Stream had driven from thence, was with a Pike thrown over-board and drown'd; the just Issue of his inconsiderate Enterprize. Upon which sorrowful Accident, the Lord Ferrers with the rest return'd into England: After whose Departure Pregent put to Sea with his Gallies, and coasting about the County of Sussex, burnt some poor Cottages; but the King suddenly made a new Admiral, the Lord Thomas Howard, Brother to him that was drown'd, who so scour'd the Seas, that the French were no more to be seen on any Coast of England.

A successful Attempt made upon Brest.

All Preparations being made for the Expedition into France, it was yet debated whether King Henry should go in Person: Some urg'd the Affection and Tendernefs of the Nation for his Safety; and that, if he dy'd at this Conjunction, the People were still so affected to the House of York, that they might take Edmund de-la-Pole, Earl of Sussex, out of the Tower, and set him upon the Throne: And that the War in France was not of that Consequence, that the King should make such a Personal Desertion of his own Kingdom. Others alledg'd, That to commit an Army, with the Flower of the Nobility and Nation, to any one Subject, was not only unsafe, but to the Prejudice of many worthy Competitors for that Honour; and that it was no new thing for the Kings of England to march at the Head of their Armies in Foreign Countries. But it was reply'd, That 'till the King had a more numerous Issue, it was against all Reason of State to hazard the Kingdom in such Tumults as might arise; to which Opinion it is believ'd the King would have condescended, had not fresh Letters arriv'd from the Emperor, in the Pope's Name exhorting him speedily to come over, and promising that he would not only meet him, but take Pay under him. Therefore for a full Security, it was thought fit that De-la-Pole Earl of Sussex, who had continu'd many Years Prisoner under Henry the Seventh, should have his Head struck off, as that King had order'd upon his Death-Bed. He was certainly of a turbulent and audacious Spirit; but whether any true Matter was alledg'd against him, does not sufficiently appear by any Record.

The Earl of Sussex overcame.

The King now resolving to go in Person, thought fit to send his Vanguard before; which was commanded by George Talbot Earl of Strawburgh, who was accompany'd by Thomas Stanley Earl of Derby, Thomas Dower Lord Prior of St. John's, the Lords Fitzwater, Hastings and Cobham, Sir Robert Kitchin, Sir Rice ap Thomas, and many other gallant Knights and Squires.

and the Number of above eight thousand Men, who arriv'd at Calais in Mid-May. These were again follow'd by the Middle-Ward of about six thousand more, commanded by the Lord Chamberlain Herbert, and accompany'd by the Earls of Northumberland, Kent and Wiltshire, the Lords Audley, De-la-Ware, Carew and Curson, who came to Calais fifteen Days after. These two Commanders tarrying some Time for the King's Directions, at length march'd in good Order towards Terouënne in Artois, before which Town they arriv'd upon the twenty second of June, pitching their Tents about a Mile distant. This Town was defended by a large Ditch, strong Bulwarks, and sufficiently provided with great Ordnance; there was in it a Garrison of about two thousand Foot, and two hundred and fifty Lances, commanded by Monsieur de Teligny, and Monsieur de Crequy. To relieve which, the French rais'd a puissant Army; to which were added ten thousand Men more under the Duke of Gueldres, and six thousand under

Richard de-la-Pele, Brother to Edmund lately beheaded. In the mean Time King Henry, having constituted Queen Catharine Regent, pass'd over to Calais upon the last Day of June; bringing with him the rest of the Army, which was transported in four hundred Vessels; and with him also the Almoner, and new Favourite Thomas Wolsey. The King, having stay'd a few Days, and receiv'd some Visits and Compliments, hear'd that the French design'd to relieve Terouënne, under the Command of the Duke of Longueville, and Marquess of Rotelin; which occasion'd him to hasten his Departure with his Army, which consisted of about nine thousand fighting Men, besides near three thousand more belonging to the Carriages. The famous Sir Charles Brandon, lately created Viscount Lisle, had the Vanguard, accompany'd by the Earl of Essex: The King came in the main Battel, having the Duke of Buckingham on the right Hand with six hundred select Men, and Sir Edward Poynings on the left with as many more, Sir Henry Guilford carrying the Standard Royal; the Rere-guard being compos'd in a great Measure of the Retinue of Fox Bishop of Winchester, and Thomas Wolsey, was led by Sir William Compton; and after all came Sir Anthony Oughtred and John Nevil with four hundred Spears. This small but well appointed Army was scarce enter'd into the French Confines near Ardres, when News was brought that the Enemy appear'd; but as the English approach'd they thought fit to retire. In the March of the King's Army two Pieces of Ordnance miscarry'd, one of which was lost, the other happily recover'd from the French. Upon the fourth of August the King arriv'd at Terouënne before which he caus'd a sumptuous Pavilion to be erected, and continu'd to shew his usual Splendor and Magnificence.

The Emperor
receiv'd him.

While the King thus lay before Terouënne, the Emperor Maximilian upon the twelfth of August arriv'd at the Camp, in the Quality of the King's Soldier, and therefore not only wore the Cross of St. George, but receiv'd his daily Pay, which was a hundred Crowns a Day: An Honour never shown to any King of England before, for which he was royally receiv'd, and lodg'd in a Tent of Cloath of Gold: And as no Emperor had ever serv'd as a Soldier under a King so no Soldier was ever lodg'd in so much State and Magnificence. At this Time the City of Terouënne being in some Distress for want of Victuals, the French King appointed all his Horse, to the Number of eight thousand, to convey Provisions into the Place: But King Henry, by the Advice of the Emperor, had made Bridges to pass his Men over the River, to the other Side of the Town, where the Access was easiest; in such a Manner, that when the French Convoy came with their Provisions, and thought to have enter'd the Town, they found the English Army there ready to oppose them. Whereupon a fierce Battel was fought between them; but in the Conclusion, the French were put to flight, and with so much Speed and Precipitation, that from thence it was call'd by the Name of The Battel of Spurs, because they more us'd their Spurs in running away, than their Lances in fighting. In this Battel the Duke of Longueville, the Marquess of Rotelin, the Lord Clermont, and several others were were taken Prisoners, with six Standards; for which Success the King and the Emperor congratulated each other upon the Place of Battel, and afterwards assisted at a solemn Te Deum. A few Days after, the English having obtain'd some new Advantages, the Town despairing of Relief surrender'd it self and Ordnance to the King of England, upon Condition that the Garrison might depart in an honourable manner with all their Arms and Baggage. Upon which, on the twenty fourth of August, the King, still having the Precedence of the Emperor, enter'd the Town, and din'd in the Bishop's Palace; where it was at length resolv'd that the Town and Fortifications should be demolish'd, all but the Cathedral Church, and religious Houses; and all the Ordnance was sent to Aire, to be kept there for the King's Use.

After this it was concluded, that the King should lay Siege to the City of Tournay in Flanders; whereupon he set forwards in three Bodies: The Earl of Shrewsbury led the Vanguard; the King and the Emperor the main Battel, and the Lord Herbert the Rere-ward. In this Order the King's Army advanc'd towards Tournay; but by the way, he went and visited young Prince Charles of Spain, afterwards Emperor, and the Lady Margaret his Governess, in the Town of Lisle; where he was entertain'd with all Magnificence and Reverence. Being come within three Miles of Tournay, he sent Garret King at Arms to summon the Place; But the Inhabitants, tho' they had but few Soldiers amongst them, stood upon their Defence. Whereupon the King invested it on all Sides, and made such fierce Batteries upon it, that tho' it was written on the Gates of the Town, Thou hast never lost thy Virginity, yet now it was forc'd to submit, and likewise to pay ten thousand Pounds Sterling, and an annual Pension of four thousand Pound Tournois for the Space of ten Years. And then Thomas Wolsey, the King's Almoner, who was now made Bishop of the Place, calling before him all the Citizens, young and old, swore them to the King of England; the Number of whom was eighty thousand Souls. This done the King enter'd the Town triumphantly, and calling to his Presence Edward Guilford, William Fitz-Williams, John Dansy, William Tyler, William Hussey, Christopher Garnish, and some other valiant Gentlemen, he gave them the Honour of Knighthood. And then remembering the honourable Entertainment the Prince of Spain and the Lady Margaret had given him at Lisle, he invited them solemnly to his new City of Tournay, and conducted them into the Place with great Splendor and Triumph. During their Abode here, among other publick Entertainments, there were held solemn Jufts and Tournaments, the King and his Companion in those warlike Exercises, Brandon Lord Lisle, victoriously answering all Comers. Besides these there were Banquets, Dancings and Masks, after an extraordinary Manner; and this was King Henry's Custom and Disposition, that he could not with-hold from Revellings in the midst of Arms and War; and fair Ladies and brave Soldiers were equally in his Esteem. After he had concerted some new Measures with the Emperor, and finding the Season far advanc'd, he left the Government of Tournay to Sir Edward Poynings, took leave of the Emperor, and return'd first to Calais, and so into England, to the general Reputation of his Arms throughout the Nation.

The King returns to England.

But this was not the only Reputation gain'd by the English Arms this Year: For whilst King Henry was employ'd in his War against France, James the Fourth King of Scotland, retaining in his Mind some Resentments, thought he could not more seasonably revenge himself, and more conveniently oblige the French King, than at this Time to invade the Kingdom of England. Therefore, having first denounc'd War by his Herald, he sent the Lord Humes his Chamberlain, to forage the Borders; which Sir William Bulmer hearing, us'd that Diligence, that he overtook and fought with him in his Retreat, so that he recover'd a rich Booty. King James hereupon in Person, with an Army of fifty thousand Men or more, enter'd the Country, and after a few Days Siege took Norham Castle. Upon which Thomas Earl of Surry hasten'd his Army, consisting of twenty six thousand Men, appointing his Son the Lord Admiral to come by Sea, and meet him near Alnwick; which was perform'd by this gallant Lord, who brought a thousand Men with him; whom when the Earl had view'd, and given necessary Orders, he march'd towards King James, who had remov'd to a Hill call'd Flodden, on the Edge of Mount Cheviot, where he strongly intrench'd his Army. Here the Earl of Surry desir'd nothing more than a Battel, finding all the adjacent Country so forag'd and pillag'd, that he could not long subsist: Therefore on September the fourth he thought fit to send Rouge-Croix Herald, with a Trumpet, and Instructions to King James, to declare to him, That in regard he had violated his Faith and League, and in a Hostile Manner enter'd the English Ground, that on Friday next he would give him Battel, if he would stay so long as to accept it. His Son the Admiral so requir'd the Herald to certifie King James of his Voyage by Sea; and because he could meet no Scotch Ships there, he landed, that he might justifie Andrew Barton's Death: Adding further, As he expected no Mercy from his Enemies, so he would spare none, but the King himself, if he fell into his Hands; and to make all good, he would be in the Front of the Battel. King James receiv'd the Message with Joy, and as he was a Prince of great Courage, by his own Herald he assur'd the Earl, That he did so much desire to ingage with him, that if he had been at Edinburgh, he would have left all Business for that Purpose; and therefore he would not fail to abide Battel at the appointed Day. After that the Herald deliver'd to the Earl a Protestation, and a short Vindication of his Master's Proceedings.

The Earl of Scotch marches

Upon the Return of the Message, the Earl advanc'd within three Miles of Flodden; but perceiving that King James still kept upon the Hill, which was inaccessible, he sent Rouge-Croix again with a Letter subscrib'd by himself, his Son, and divers other Noblemen and Knights, where in respectful Terms, they provok'd him to descend from his Fortifications, and fight in a large Plain between them call'd Milfield, insisting also upon the Validity of his own Message. But receiving no satisfactory Answer, the Earl remov'd with his Army to such a Camp, that if the Scotch did not leave the Advantage of their Situation, he might cut off all their Provisions. This caus'd the King to change his Measures, who firing his Huts, covertly remov'd by the Benefit of the Smoak, but still kept on the high Ground, where he made a Stand. Immediately the Earl travers'd some Bogs and Marshes, 'till he arriv'd at the Bottom of this Bank; where finding the Ascent not very steep, he appointed the Vanguard to his two Sons, the main Battel to himself, and the Rere to Sir Edward Stanley, and then bravely encourag'd his Men to Battel. The King well observing this, and judging the English were making a very disadvantageous Approach, he exhorted his Men to behave themselves like valiant Soldiers, and thereupon join'd Battel. The Earl's youngest Son Sir Edmund Howard at first was in some Distress, by the singular Valour of the Earls of Lenox and Argile, but the Lord Dacres coming to his Succour, as also one Heron, the Fight was renew'd; the Earl's eldest Son the Lord Thomas pursu'd his Cause better, but met with a noble Opposition from the Earls of Crawford and Montross. The King's Battalion and that of the Earl's likewise maintain'd a long and cruel Fight. In the mean Time Sir Edward Stanley, by means of his Archers, constrain'd the Scotch to descend the Hill, and to open their Ranks to avoid the Storms of Arrows, by which they seem'd to give one of the first Overtures of Victory to the English. Which being perceiv'd by the King, he redoubl'd his Courage, and perform'd Wonders; but the valiant Lord Thomas Howard, and Sir Edward Stanley, who had defeated their Opposites, coming in with the Lord Dacres's Horse, the Scotch were so distress'd, that for their last Defence they call themselves into a Ring. No Man perform'd more than the King in his Person; but after a bloody Fight of three Hours, pressing forwards, he was slain in the Field, as the English Writers assert; others say afterwards. In conclusion the Scots were defeated, with the Loss of most of their Nobility, one Arch-Bishop, two Bishops, four Abbots, and about ten thousand others. On the English Side, according to Polydore, there dy'd about five thousand, tho' others say fewer; and this Battel was call'd Floddon-Field, in which the Earl took all the Scotch Ordnance, and particularly seven extraordinary fair Culverins, call'd The Seven Sisters. Then giving God Thanks, the Earl dismiss'd the greatest Part of the Army, and retir'd himself home, 'till the News of King Henry's coming to Richmond brought him thither; taking order in the mean Time, that the dead Body of King James, being embalmed, should be carry'd first to Newcastle, and then to Shene in Surry, where it was honourably interr'd. And thus was King James the Fourth cut off in the thirty ninth Year of his Age, and twenty fifth of his Reign, who in regard of his Princely Virtues, deserv'd a longer Life and Reign; yet we know not how to free him from the Scandal of Breach of Faith in this last Expedition. He was succeeded in his Kingdom by his Son James the Fifth, then but two Years of Age.

King James slain, and the Scots defeated.

King Henry having gain'd such Advantages over Scotland, where his own Sister Queen Margaret was now Regent, he thought he could not act more justly and prudently, than to bestow suitable Recompences upon his brave Commanders who had been most serviceable to him. Accordingly upon the second Day of February, Thomas Earl of Surry was by him created Duke of Norfolk, a Title conferr'd on his Father by Richard the Third, but again extinguish'd; his eldest Son the Lord Thomas Howard being also made Earl of Surry; together with which he had an Augmentation of Arms for his Achievement in Floddon-Field. Sir Charles Somerset, who in Right of Elizabeth his Wife was Lord Herbert of Chepstow, &c. was now created Earl of Worcester. Sir Charles Brandon, Viscount Lisle, was now also created Duke of Suffolk; and Sir Edward Stanley, not long after made Lord Mountcagle. Lastly, the aspiring Almoner Thomas Wolfey, Bishop of Tournay, was also made Bishop of Lincoln. And as the King conferr'd Honours upon others, so not long after he receiv'd some from the Hands of Pope Leo, who sent him a Cap of Maintenance and a Sword; and being provok'd with the French King, he transferr'd, by Authority of the Lateran Council, the Title of CHRISTIANISSIMUS from him upon King Henry. This with great Pomp and Solemnity was publish'd the Sunday following in the Cathedral of St. Paul's, and afterwards attended with extraordinary Revelings, Masques and Tournaments; in which last the King and new Duke of Suffolk were victorious Defendants against all Comers; who having the noble Prisoners Duke of Longueville and the Lord Clermont for their Spectators, spread the Fame of their Valour and Chivalry into Foreign Nations.

New Advancements.

About this Time the great Friendship between King Henry and the Flemmings began to abate upon this Occasion: King Henry the Seventh his Father had concluded a Match between his Daughter Mary, and Charles Prince of Spain; but by reason of her Age, and the want of a secure Jointure, it was deferr'd during his Life. But now the present King seeing his Sister of a suitable Age, began to revive the Contract, and signify'd as much to the Council of Islanders, from which he found nothing but formal Excuses, and unnecessary Delays. The French King had speedy Intelligence how much King Henry was disgusted at these Spanish Proceedings, and resolv'd to make the most advantageous Use of it, which was to gain the Princess Mary for himself, and by that procure Peace with England, now he was ancient and fatigu'd with Wars. For this Purpose, he so far pleas'd the Pope as he became his Mediator; and both of them sent Ambassadors to King Henry, the Pope to persuade him to a Peace with France, the French King to treat about a Marriage with the Princess Mary. Upon whose Embassies, King Henry, partly to satisfy the Pope, and partly to advance his Sister, did not unwillingly hearken to their Proposals. But during this Negotiation, some Acts of Hostility pass'd between the English and French Fleets,

A Treaty with France.

Fleets, and some Ravages were committed in both Nations: Yet in no long Time King Henry, by the Advice of his Council, and especially of his then growing Favourite Wolsey, concluded both the Peace with France, and the Marriage of his Sister Mary with the French King: The Substance of the Treaty and Agreement was, that the King of England was to hold Tournay, and King Lewis oblig'd himself in a Bond of a Million of Crowns, to be paid at several Payments to King Henry, in Consideration of the Expences of the War, and the Arrears of the Pension stipulated in the Year 1492. As to the Marriage, King Henry was to give four hundred thousand Crowns with his Sister, and Lewis to assign her a Jointure as great as any Queen of France ever had, which she was to enjoy during Life, where-ever she resided.

The King's Sister marry'd to King Lewis.

She is crown'd in France.

Her Husband Lewis dies.

These, and some other Articles being concluded, the Princess Mary was brought to Dover by King Henry and his Queen, where with an honourable Train she took Shipping, the Duke of Norfolk, the Marquess Dorset, and the Earl of Salisbury, being her chief Conductors. Their Fleet had not pass'd two Leagues at Sea, before a sudden Storm separated the Ships, whereof some were driven to the Coasts of Flanders, others to Calais, and that of the Princess struck in at Boloign; where by Boats her Train was landed, and her self carry'd on Shore in the Arms of Sir Christopher Garnish. From hence with thirty six Ladies, riding upon fine Horses trapped with Crimson Velvet embroider'd with Gold, her own Horses and Chariot set out with Tissue Cloth of Gold and Crimson Velvet, and her self with those Advantages of Beauty that made her seem more like an Angel than a Human Creature, she met with King Lewis at Abbeville. There on the ninth of October the Marriage was solemniz'd with great Splendor; where the French so gaz'd at their new Queen's Beauty, that neither they nor their infirm old King could be satisfy'd with any other Object while she was present. On the fifth of November she was crown'd Queen of France at St. Denis, at which Time Francis the Dauphin held the Crown over her Head, as being too ponderous for her to wear; and the following Day she was receiv'd into Paris, after a most magnificent manner. In Honour of this Marriage and Coronation, the Dauphin had caus'd solemn Jufts and Tournaments to be proclaim'd in Paris the seventh of November. Upon Notice of which in England, the Duke of Suffolk, the Marquess Dorset, and his four Brothers, with several other Men of Quality, obtain'd leave of King Henry to be at the Challenge; where they all behav'd themselves with great Success and Agility, especially the great Duke of Suffolk, whose Glory the Dauphin so much envy'd, that he caus'd a German, the strongest and tallest in the Court of France, secretly to encounter him, purposely to have him foil'd: But this turn'd to his greater Honour; for by the Blows he gave the German at Barriers, he soon let the Assembly know he was his Superior. King Henry at home was no ways inferior in Magnificence; and at publick Jufts he himself broke no less than three and twenty Spears; and in one single Encounter he overthrew Man and Horse to the Ground. About this Time the King rejoic'd at the Birth of a Son, which in a short Time dy'd. Nor was the Satisfaction of King Lewis much longer; who being aged and infirm, after eighty Days Possession rather than Enjoyment of his Queen, dy'd upon the first of January 1515. He was succeeded by Francis de Valois, a Prince of about twenty two Years of Age; in which, as well as Manners, there was much Conformity between King Henry and him; particularly they were judg'd two the noblest Personages, not only of their Quality, but of their Time.

III.

All Things being now in a State of Peace, and Francis the French King desirous to hold a good Correspondence with England, King Henry sent over Charles Duke of Suffolk and others to the French Court to strengthen the Alliance, and to bring over the Queen Dowager his Sister into England. Here that Lady cast her Eyes upon the graceful Duke of Suffolk, and entertain'd such such an Affection for him, that she made no Scruple to discover her Inclinations to both Kings; desiring Francis to mediate the Marriage, and her Brother Henry to approve of it. Francis, fearing lest Henry by contracting her elsewhere might enter into some greater Alliances, readily consented; but Henry, for the Conservation of his Dignity, kept at a little Distance; however he had long since design'd her for the Duke. The young Queen believing that this Formality was the greatest Impediment, protested by Letters, That if the King would have her marry'd otherwise than to her own Inclinations, she would shut her self up in a Religious House. Therefore to obviate all Difficulties, by a peculiar sort of Courtship, she prefix'd to the Duke the Term of four Days to gain her Consent, in which, if he did not prevail, he should for ever lose all Hopes of obtaining her. And thus without any Pomp they were privately marry'd in France; and by the Intercession of King Francis and Wolsey at home, they soon recover'd King Henry's Favour. After which they took their leave of the French Court; the Queen carrying with her of the Jewels, Plate and Tapestries of Lewis the Twelfth, to the value of two hundred thousand Crowns; among which was a noble Diamond call'd Le Miroir de Naples, which King Francis would have gladly redeem'd at a great Price. Orders were also taken for the Payment of her Jointure, which was sixty thousand Crowns a Year. Being arriv'd in England, the Marriage between them was publickly solemniz'd with great Pomp and peculiar Sort of Tournaments, in which King Henry highly signaliz'd himself; and ever after the Duke continu'd a special Favourite at Court, where he generally shew'd himself more of the brave Courtier, than the profound Statesman.

She marries to Charles Brandon Duke of Suffolk.

But the greatest Favourite of all was Thomas Wolsey, whose Power and Grandeur began now to swell to a prodigious Extent, and to such as had not been known in the English Nation. This extraordinary Person was Son to an honest poor Man of Ipswich in Suffolk; and by means of a handsom Education, his own Parts and Dexterity, he rais'd himself through Variety of Preferments, to the highest Stations both in Church and State, and to the Splendor and Magnificence of any Prince in Europe. His first Preferment was a Fellowship in Magdalen College in Oxford; from whence removing to Calais, he got to be Chaplain to King Henry the Seventh, who successively made him Dean of Lincoln, chief Almoner, and a Privy-Counsellor. The present King Henry coming to the Crown, he so well conform'd himself to his Disposition, that he soon engross'd his Favour to himself. Upon the taking of Tournay, the King made him Bishop of that Place, and not long after Bishop of Lincoln; and this Year upon Cardinal Bembridges's Death, he was made Arch-Bishop of York; and by the Interest of the two Kings of England and France, the Pope made him a Cardinal, and likewise Legate a Latere, by which he had a Power superior to the Arch-Bishop of Canterbury. Then that there might be no interfering between the Legantine and Chancery Courts, he was likewise made Lord Chancellor of England, in Room of Arch-Bishop Warham, who now retir'd to give Place to this aspiring Favourite. Being thus at the Helm of Church and State, he made the most splendid Appearance of any Subject in England, and besides the Purse and Mace, he ever had two large Silver Crosses and Pillars born before him by the tallest Priests in the Kingdom. For the better Maintenance of this chargeable Estate, the King first bestow'd on him the Bishoprick of Durham, and after that the Bishoprick of Winchester and the Abby of St. Albans in Comendam; and with them he held in Farm the Bishopricks of Bath, Worcester and Hereford, injoy'd by Foreign Incumbents; and had likewise the Disposal of all the Ecclesiastical Benefices in England. From all these, and the numerous Presents he receiv'd from Foreign Princes, his annual Incomes equal'd, if not exceeded the Revenues of the Crown; and in this Capacity he kept eight hundred Servants, among whom were nine or ten Lords, fifteen knights, and forty Esquires. All foreign Treaties and Places of Trust at home were of his ordering; he acted as he pleas'd, and his Ascendant over the King was such, that there never appear'd any Party against him all this Time. He us'd the most insinuating Artifices to gain the King to himself; undertaking to ease him of the Burden of Government, and to give him all the Pleasure of it; he was the most earnest and readiest in all the Council to advance the King's only Will and Intention; and whereas others advis'd him to leave his Pleasures, and attend his Affairs, this Prelate persuaded him to what was most agreeable to his Appetite. Having got into such Power, he observ'd the King's Inclinations exactly, and follow'd his Interests closely: For tho' he made other Princes retain him with great Presents and Pensions, yet he never engag'd the King into any Alliance that was not for his Advantage. He was an extraordinary Minister of State, but as a Churchman the Disgrace of his Profession; being lewd and vicious, and exorbitantly proud and ostentatious, and indeed the main Debaucher of his Sovereign Master. In a Word he had all the Qualifications necessary for a great State's-Man, and all the Vices ordinary in a great Favourite.

A. D. 1516. Reg. 7.
Margaret Queen Dowager of Scotland flies into England.
 During the grand Power of this Cardinal, King Henry's Sister Margaret Queen of Scotland, having marry'd Archibald Douglass, Earl of Angus, by reason of Factions among the Lords of Scotland, was compell'd to fly into England with her Husband, and seek Protection from her Brother; who assign'd her the Castle of Harbottle, in Northumberland for her Residence, where she was deliver'd of a Daughter nam'd Margaret. From thence the King sent for her and her Husband to come to his Court; and thereupon, with a noble Attendance, Queen Margaret riding upon a white Palfrey, which the Queen of England had presented to her, behind Sir Thomas Parre, pass'd through London to Baynard's Castle, and from thence to the Court at Greenwich: But her Husband, the Earl of Angus, was secretly before departed into Scotland, upon which King Henry with some Resentment said It was done like a Scot. However she was joyfully receiv'd by the King and Queen, and her Sister Mary Queen Dowager of France; who all enjoy'd a Happiness rare for Princes in that Kind, which was to see each other, after they had been once dispos'd in foreign Parts. But as this was a Meeting of three Queens, so the Occasion of it proceeded from the Marriage of two of them to inferior Persons, the Duke of Suffolk and the Earl of Angus. King Henry, for the more Honour of her Arrival, order'd solemn jousts, in which he himself was the principal Challenger, and overthrew Sir William Kingston, both Man and Horse. In the same Year dy'd Ferdinand King of Spain, Father to Queen Catharine; for whom King Henry caus'd a solemn Obsequy to be kept in the Cathedral Church of St. Paul's. But the Mourning lasted not long; for it was shortly after succeeded by the Birth of the Princess Mary, afterwards Sovereign Queen of England. As to Queen Margaret, after she had been a Year in England, she return'd into Scotland.

The Birth of Queen Mary.

Cardinal Wolsey's Management.

The publick Affairs being now left to the Management of Cardinal Wolsey, several great Men began to withdraw themselves from the Court, as first the Arch-Bishop of Canterbury, and the Bishop of Winchester, who went and liv'd in their respective Diocesses; next the Duke of Norfolk, who having borrow'd Mony of the King for his Journey into France, and being unable through the Cardinal's Opposition to obtain a Remission of it, or otherwise to pay it immediately, he retir'd into the Country; so that the Cardinal had an uncontroll'd Liberty to govern all, under Colour of doing the King Service. For in whatsoever he acted, that was his Pretence, tho' in many Things he rather innovated than reform'd; from whence Clamours often arose among the People, who understanding nothing so much as their Ancient Customs, seldom endure a Change, tho' for their real Advantage. In this Year all who manag'd any Mony for the King in the Wars or otherwise, were by the Cardinal's Command call'd in Question; among whom some by Bribery, and some by Policy escap'd, while others others were condemn'd in great Sums; so that he may be said to have so much of a good Servant, as not to suffer any other to deceive his Master. To accompany this Severity also, he caus'd Perjury to be vigorously punish'd, in which he is much commended. Some Courts also were erected in Favour of poor People, against the Oppressions of the Great, which at first were much frequented; but at last the People receiving many Delays and Disappointments in their Suits, they left them, and had recourse to the Common Law, as too much fearing Innovations. And the Character of Just cannot be deny'd to the Cardinal, in all Affairs of publick Judicature, of which he was ever apparently studious; so that where Disorders were committed, he generally punish'd with Severity. This he did both in Ecclesiastical as well as Civil Affairs, by which means he accidentally became a prime Instrument in that great Work of the Reformation of the Church; which sort of Work is oftentimes by the ordering of Providence effected by the Hands of wicked and scandalous Agents.

About this Time there happen'd a great Riot and Sedition in the City of London, from some Citizens and Apprentices of the poorer Sort, who being offended that all their chief Customers were won from them by the Diligence and Industry of Strangers, and others pretending to have receiv'd some Affronts and Indignities from them, found some Occasion to make an Insurrection against them; and the rather, because the seditious Sermons of one Doctor Bele, by the Instigation of John Lincoln a Broker, had not a little incited them. The Apprentices and others being gather'd together in great Numbers, began with breaking open some Prisons, from whence they took divers Persons committed thither for abusing and hurting of Strangers: Nor could the Mayor or Sheriffs then present hinder this Outrage; nor Sir Thomas More, tho' much respected by them, as being late Judge of the Sheriffs Court, and a Native of the City. The Prisoners now let loose advis'd the Multitude to run to the House of one Mentas a French Man, much hated by them; where they kill'd some, chac'd the rest, and plunder'd all his Goods; from whence they went to other Strangers Houses, which they pillag'd in the like manner. The Cardinal hearing of this, and not being much more in the Peoples Favour than the Strangers, fortify'd his House with Men and Ordnance; but the Lieutenant of the Tower proceeded further, and discharg'd some of the great Pieces among them. This, with the Completion of their design'd Revenge, caus'd them about three a Clock in the Morning to disperse and go home. But on their Way, they were first apprehended by the City Officers, and afterwards by some Followers of the Earls of Shrewsbury and Surrey, who hearing of this Disorder, and taking the Inns-of-Court Gentlemen with them, clear'd the Streets of this unruly Company. The Beginning of the Sedition was hereupon examin'd, and Doctor Bele and John Lincoln sent to the Tower. About three Days after the Duke of Norfolk and the Earl of Surry his Son, with about thirteen hundred armed Men, came into the City, and joining with the Lord Mayor, proceeded legally against the chief Offenders, to the Terror of the Citizens, who were the more apprehensive, because the Duke of Norfolk, upon the killing of a Priest of his, was reported to have said, I pray God I may once have the Citizens in my Power. By the Statute of the Second of Henry the Fifth, they were all found guilty of High-Treason: But however much Mercy was shew'd; for of two hundred and seventy eight Prisoners, only Lincoln and three or four more, were hang'd drawn and quarter'd; and about ten more were hang'd on Gibbets erected in the Streets. All the rest in their Shirts, bound in Ropes and Halts about their Necks, were brought to Westminster-Hall, where the King late attended with his principal Nobility: And when the Cardinal had charg'd them with the Greatness of their Offence, they all cry'd out Mercy, Mercy! upon which the King by the Mouth of the Cardinal pardon'd them all; which Clemency purchas'd the King no small Love amongst the People.

The Beginning
of the Refor-

many.

In this same Year were the Beginnings of a much more remarkable Commotion in Germany, which did not only raise a grand Fermentation in that Country, but in a few Years affected all England, and the greatest part of Christendom. This was in some measure occasion'd from the mighty Progress of Selim the Turkish Sultan, whose powerful Arms Pope Leo propos'd to repel with the utmost Vigour both by Sea and Land. In order to that he sent his Emissaries to all Christian Princes; and to excite the Peoples Devotion, and procure their Alms and Benevolence for so great a Work, he sent several Agents to preach Indulgences in every Province. The Conditions of which were, that without Distinction of Persons or Sins, whosoever perform'd certain Religious Rites, and paid certain Sums of Money, should obtain a full Remission of all their Sins, and several other Benefits besides. The Management and Sale of these appear'd very scandalous to many good People, but especially to a certain Monk nam'd Martin Luther, a Doctor and Reader in Theology in the University of Wittenberg, a Man of a bold Spirit, an impetuous Resolution, and eloquent Tongue. The Agents had furnish'd him with sufficient Matter for Reproach: For they made direct Marchandize of what was judg'd the most sacred Treasures of the Church; they kept their Courts or Shops rather in Taverns, and consum'd a great part of what they collected in Debaucheries; and besides it was certainly known, that the Pope design'd to apply considerable Sums to his own proper Use. Now tho' it was more agreeable to Reason and Policy to have remov'd the occasion of this Clamour; yet Pride and Interest so far prevail'd, that by neglecting, and perhaps despising the Arguments of a private Monk, the Contest soon grew high, and was gradually blown up by Declamations, Theses's, and Books on either Side. Frederick Duke of Saxony, whose Wisdom and Virtue was exemplary in Germany, both maintain'd and animated Luther, for the Honour of his new University of Wittenberg. He at first began with proposing of Doubts, then being hard beset and roughly treated, he engag'd to maintain and make them good; and afterwards meeting with greater Severity, he proceeded openly to declaim against the Pope, the Corruptions and Doctrines of the Church of Rome, so as to bring about that mighty Work of the REFORMATION. So small a Spark as this Collision first made, could never have rais'd so great a Fire, if the World had not been strongly dispos'd to it, by the just Prejudice they had conceiv'd against the Popish Clergy, whose Ignorance and lewd Lives had so expos'd them to Contempt and Hatred, that every one was ready to join with such as oppos'd their Practices.

Wolsey's Grandeur and Power.

The like Corruptions were at the same Time in England, and the Effects of these great Changes in Religion were soon felt in that Country, where now Cardinal Wolsey reign'd like a Pope of this other World. For this Year being made Legate a Latere, he was by a Bull from Pope Leo enabled to visit not only Monasteries, but all the Clergy of England, and to dispence with Church-Laws for one whole Year: Which tho' it gave him great Power, it caus'd much Offence, as abridging the Authority of the Bishops, and scandalizing the whole Clergy, who were extreamly defam'd by the Cardinal's Informations. And now the Pride and Ostentation of this Prelate did so much increase, that on solemn Feast-Days, he would say Mass after the Manner of the Pope himself; not only Bishops and Abbots serving him in the Office, but even Earls and Dukes giving him Water and the Towel. All which was but a kind of Prelude to what follow'd: For, erecting a particular Court of Jurisdiction, which he call'd the Legate's Court, and placing in it as Judge one John Allen Doctor of Law, a Person of Infamy, all manner of Rapines and Extortions were committed there. For making Enquiry into the Lives of every Man, no Offence escap'd Censure and Punishment, unless they privately gave Money: And as the Rules of Conscience are in many Cases of larger Extent than those of the Law, so he found Means to search into their most secret Recesses. Besides, under this Colour, he arrogated a Power to call in question the Executors of Wills and Testaments. He summon'd also all Religious Persons whatsoever; who casting themselves at his Feet, were severely chidden; and terrify'd with Expulsion, 'till they had compounded: Besides all Spiritual Benefits that fell; were conferr'd on his Creatures. The Arch-Bishop of Canterbury understanding how all Orders were thus treated by the Cardinal, went and acquainted the King; who reply'd, He should not have heard of it but from him, and desir'd him to go and tell Wolsey, that if any Thing be amiss, he would amend it. Upon which this grave Person seriously admonish'd him to be cautious, and declar'd That, in concerning himself with the Wills of the Dead, he assum'd a Power not claim'd by the Pope himself; and his disposing some Benefits in the Gift of the Nobility, he thought was an Usurpation upon them. All the Use that Wolsey made of this was to hate the Arch-Bishop, with whom he was formerly offended, only because he stil'd himself his Brother, in the Subscription of his Letter: But to prevent any ill Offices from him he temper'd his Speech for this Time. But shortly after his Agent John Allen being accus'd by one London a Priest, it sufficiently appear'd that all the former Allegations against Wolsey were true; which caus'd the King to rebuke the Cardinal so sharply, that after this Time he became better, or at least more wary than before.

He is a little check'd.

But still the Cardinal lost no part of his Interest or the King's Favour; and still retain'd the same Reputation and Influence in all foreign Courts, and particularly in that of France; between which and that of England he manag'd Affairs with such a nice Policy, that King Henry once openly said, That now he perceiv'd Wolsey would govern both. The French King at this Time being very desirous to have the City of Tournay restor'd to him, by large Presents and larger Promises won the Cardinal to move the King in it; who upon his plausible Persuasions was willing to treat about it. Upon which Account the French King sent the Lord Bonquet High-Admiral of France, and the Bishop of Paris, who with an unruly Retinue of about twelve hundred Men, arriv'd in England; and on the twenty seventh of September were met at Black-Heath by the Earl of Surry, High-Admiral of England, attended with above five hundred Gentlemen and others, who conducted them to London, where they were lodg'd in Merchant Taylor's-Hall. On the last of September, the Ambassadors went to the Court at Greenwich, where after a long Communication, a Treaty was at last concluded under Pretence of a Marriage between the Dauphine of France, then not a Year old, and the Princess Mary, Daughter to the King of England: That in Name of her Marriage Mony, Tournay should be deliver'd to the French King, he paying to the King of England, for the Castle he had built in that City, six hundred thousand Crowns in twelve Years: And if the Marriage should not take Effect, then Tournay should be again restor'd to the King of England. These and other Articles being concluded, noble Entertainments and great Presents being made, the Princess Mary, of two Years of Age, was promis'd and betroth'd to the Dauphine in St. Paul's Cathedral. And the Earl of Worcester, with the Bishop of Ely, and a Train equal to the French Ambassadors, were sent to require Performance from King Francis, who thereupon took his Oath, gave eight Hostages for Payment upon the Surrender of Tournay, and contracted the Espousals in the Name of his Infant Son the Dauphine.

An Embassy from France.

The young Princess Mary contracted to the Dauphine.

In Consequence of this, on the eighth of February following, the Earl of Worcester deliver'd up Tournay to the French King; but before that was perform'd, the Cardinal took such Care that he should have an annual Stipend of twelve thousand Livres Tournois, for relinquishing the Bishoprick of that Place. Thus was Tournay gain'd by the French, and divers concurrent Articles not perform'd afterwards: And here it is observable that it was fatal to the Princess Mary to be a kind of Author of the Loss of all the English Possessions in France;

Tour-

Tournay being restor'd upon Pretence of Dowry now, and Calais lost in the Time of her Match with King Philip the Second. King Francis having obtain'd this Point, about the same Time aspir'd to another much greater, which was to be Emperor of Germany. For in the Beginning of this Year, the Emperor Maximilian dy'd; who having been Knight of the Garter, his Obsequies were solemnly kept in St. Paul's by King Henry and the Knights of that Society. Upon his Death King Francis us'd great Endeavours to obtain the Empire; but after many Contrivances and Struggles, it was given to Charles King of Spain; for Joy of which great Solemnities were perform'd by the Order of King Henry, on the seventh Day of July. In the same Month an Interview had been appointed between the Kings of England and France, but the Death of the Emperor, and what follow'd upon it, caus'd it to be deferr'd till the succeeding Year; both Kings in the mean Time agreeing not to cut off their Beards till they saw each other. Francis having now a second Son, desir'd the King of England to give him his Name; which was kindly acknowledg'd, and his Name call'd Henry, afterwards King, and second of that Name. Nor did Francis omit any thing that might argue his Respect; therefore with continu'd Gifts he solicited Cardinal Wolsey, whom he call'd his Father and Cousin, sent Presents to the Princess Mary, and left nothing unattempted which might secure him on that Side, knowing well how puissant an Enemy the new Emperor might prove. Charles on the other Side, considering how much it concern'd him to keep the Cardinal at his Devotion, soon countermin'd the French King in his own way of Bribes and Presents. Francis fearing the Consequences, timely provided to keep the Scotch his Friends; and tho' it was formerly his Motion to comprise the young King and that Nation in general within his League with England, yet now he strove as much to withdraw them: Therefore when King Henry sent to require their Oath to the Treaty, they refus'd; so that all that Business ended in a Truce only for one Year: And here the Cardinal's extream Ambition began to shew it self more openly; who designing to make himself Pope, always comply'd with those whom he thought his best Assistants. Therefore now that Charles the Emperor was grown the more potent; and besides it being manifest that to which Party soever King Henry inclin'd, he would turn the Balance, he hop'd by favouring of Charles to obtain his Desire. Nor wanted he continual Presents on his Part, which were equal if not exceeding the others; so that now he rejected the Assistance of Francis, tho' he had actually offer'd him the Voices of fourteen Cardinals, and chiefly apply'd himself to the Emperor.

A. D. Yet still the Cardinal promoted the Interview between the two Kings of 1520. England and France, which was appointed to be betwixt Guifnes and Ardres;
Reg. $\frac{11}{12}$. for having an equal Mixture of Pride and Vanity, he was desirous of bringing and seeing those two together, whom he was generally thought to govern.
He knew also that his Presents would not be small; therefore he perswaded King Henry to build a new House near Guifnes, as might be worthy of the Reception of two such Monarchs; and to perform this, two thousand Atticeers were employ'd. He also summon'd the prime Nobility to attend the King this Journey, with that Splendor which might become Persons of their Dignity; and because the Duke of Buckingham repin'd at the Expence, it prov'd one great Step to his Ruin. For the greater Magnificence, a King of Arms was sent to the English on the Part of the French King, with a Proclamation declaring that in June next, two Kings Henry and Francis, with fourteen Aids, would in a Camp between Guifnes and Ardres, answer all Comets at Tent, Tournay and Barriers; and the like Proclamation was made by Cher-renceaux in the French Court. These friendly Deliances stopp'd not here; for they were sent by King Henry to the Low-Countries, Burgundy and Germany, and by King Francis into Spain and Italy. And now the Principal Noblemen more magnificently than the Duke of Buckingham. The King went to Canterbury on the twenty fifth Day of May, designing there to keep his Whitsontide.

In the mean time Charles the Emperor, who much desir'd to break this design'd Interview, had so contriv'd his Voyage from Spain, that the Day following, he himself, accompany'd with many Lords and beautiful Ladies, came unexpectedly to Dover. The Cardinal hearing of this, posted away immediately to assure him of his Welcome; and the King very early next Day came to Dover Castle, where the Emperor was lodg'd, who met him on the Stairs, with all the Marks of Courtesie and Affection. Charles had great Designs at this Time, as well as the French King, therefore he continu'd his Endeavours to break this Interview, as well as all other Correspondence with Francis; and knowing no Prince could so much help or hinder him, as the King of England, he offer'd more advantageous Conditions than Francis had done. And to make all the more acceptable, he made large Presents to the Cardinal, promising upon a Vacancy to make him Pope; and that he might the better exceed his Competitor Francis in Presents, a great Part of the Spoils of Mexico had been brought him. As to the Interview King Henry excus'd himself to the Emperor, as being engag'd in Honour to meet Francis; but as to any Treaty, he would be as serviceable as he could. From thence then King Henry invited him to Canterbury, where he with great Satisfaction saw his Aunt Queen Catharine; but he was much more affected with the admirable Beauty of the Queen Dowager of France, once design'd for his Wife; and such passionate Emotions arose in his Mind, that he could not be persuaded to dance with the rest of the illustrious Company. And now having pass'd over the Whitsun Holy-Days in these Sports and Entertainments which the King gave him, he departed to Sandwich, took Shipping, and arriv'd at his Native Country of Flanders; while King Henry the same Day pass'd to Dover, and from thence with all his noble Train and Company to Calais.

The Emperor endeavours to break it by coming into England.

On the fourth Day of June, King Henry, with the two Queens and the rest of his Train, remov'd to his new built Palace near Guisnes, being a Square of Timber every Side containing three hundred and twenty eight Foot; the Parts of which extraordinary Building, being artificially fram'd in England, were now put together, and afterwards taken asunder, and brought home. King Francis had another Building to answer this, near Ardres, which like the other was most sumptuously furnish'd. Before the Kings met, the Cardinal went to visit Francis, and to treat with him concerning some Particulars relating to the Marriage between the Dauphine and the Princess Mary, which were soon concluded. On the following Day the famous Interview began with a Signal from a Warning-Piece, when both the Kings were mounted, and most magnificently attended. The Meeting of these two great and beautiful Monarchs was with the Sound of Trumpets, and all the Solemnity that could be invented for Persons of their Rank and Character; and being dismounted, after mutual Embraces, they walk'd Arm in Arm to a Pavilion of Cloth of Gold erected for that Purpose; where, after they had made their several Compliments, they took leave, and return'd to their respective Lodgings. Two Days after, both Kings came to view the Camp or Place of Exercise, being three hundred Yards long, and a hundred and six broad, well ditch'd and fenc'd, with convenient Scaffolds on each Side for the Spectators. There were also set up two artificial Trees, with the Arms of the two Kings and their several Assistants, on which were affix'd the Articles of the Juits, Tourney and Barriers. The Assistants or Supporters on the English Side were the Duke of Suffolk, the Marquis Dorset, Sir William Kingston, Sir Richard Jerwingham, Sir Giles Capel, Mr. Nicholas Carew, and Mr. Anthony Knevet: On the French Side were the Duke de Tendenc, Mr. St. Paul, Mr. de Montmorency, Mr. de Bryon, Mr. de St. Aleme, Mr. de Brucall, and Mr. Tabanes. To encounter these many noble

Persons and famous Knights come from Foreign Countries ; who presenting their Arms to the Heralds, were admitted to the Exercise, which was appointed on Monday the eleventh of June, when the Queens and Ladies took their Places, and two Kings with their Assistances enter'd the Lifts after a glorious and magnificent manner. We want Room to particularize the Courses of these Champions, which are more largely describ'd by Hall and Hollingshed ; it may be sufficient to take Notice that none exceeded, if equall'd the two Kings, especially King Henry ; who in the second Course disabled Mr. de Grandeville, and after that successfully encounter'd Mr. de Montmorency. This Exercise continu'd four Days, and on the following Week the Tourney began, in which there was a furious Encounter with Swords ; yet the two Kings and their Assistance beat the Counter-Party to Disarming ; and King Henry particularly got that Honour, that a brave French Nobleman with whom he fought, presented him with his Horse as a Gage of his Victory. The next Day King Henry in Tourney likewise broke the Pouldron of Mr. de Fleuranges, and forc'd him to depart the Field. The following Day the Barriers began, and after that the casting of Hand-Spears or Darts, with the Target, and fighting with the two-handed Sword ; at which sort of Exercise much Commendation was given to King Henry, who with a few Strokes disarm'd his Adversary. Thus with variety of Masks, Interludes, Banquetings, and other Entertainments, and after many Compliments, Embraces and rich Presents, the two Kings took their Leaves on the twenty fourth Day of June, and King Henry came with all his Train to Calais.

Shortly after, the Emperor being at Graveling, with his Aunt the Lady Margaret, King Henry at their Request admitted of a second Interview. And for that purpose going towards Graveling, the Emperor met him in the way, and conducted him thither, giving him and the rest of the English all that good Entertainment so small a Place could afford. The next Day, the Emperor and the Lady Margaret went with King Henry to Calais ; where in the midst of extraordinary Maskings and Entertainments, Business was not forgot. For here all the Articles of the Tripartite League between the Emperor and the Kings of England and France were review'd ; to which the King of France had so fully condescended, that he sent Mr. de Roche to the Emperor with Letters of Credence, That on the Word of a Prince he would inviolably observe them all. But he soon began to change his Pretensions, and from this present Interview he began to be jealous of King Henry's Proceedings, as judging his Affection to himself and the Emperor inconsistent. King Henry having no more Business at Calais, took his Leave of the Emperor, who made him several new Presents, and safely return'd with his Train into England ; having made a Journey that display'd both his own and the Cardinal's Grandeur.

The King
write. against Luther.

IV. All Things being in a peaceable Posture, the Doctrines of Luther began to spread themselves in many Parts, after an extraordinary manner: And King Henry being at leisure, and much delighting in Learning, thought he could not give better Proof either of his Zeal or Education, than to write against Luther. To which also he was exasperated, because Luther had oftentimes spoken contemptuously of the learned Thomas Aquinas, who was esteem'd both by the King and Cardinal. He therefore compil'd a Book, wherein he strenuously oppos'd Luther in the Point of Indulgences, Number of Sacraments, the Papal Authority, and other Particulars, to be seen in that Work of his Entituled De septem Sacramentis. A principal Copy of this being richly bound, was sent to Pope Leo, and presented by Doctor John Clark Dean of Windsor, the King's Ambassador, appearing in a full Consistory: The Pope knowing the glorious Present he brought, first gave him his Foot, and then his Cheeks to kiss; then receiving the Book, he promis'd to do as much for the Approbation of it to all Christian Princes, as ever was done for St. Austin's or St. Jerom's Works; assuring him withal, he would bestow a publick Title upon King Henry, in the very next Consistory. This accordingly was done, and his Holiness gave him the honourable Title of DEFENDER OF THE FAITH, in a pompous Letter sign'd by himself and twenty seven Cardinals: In which the King took great Pleasure, always affecting it beyond all his other Titles, tho' several of the former Kings of England had carry'd the same Title, as Spelman informs us. Being thus inclin'd to Learning, the King was much courted by all necessitous Scholars, who generally over Europe dedicated their Books to him, with such flattering Epistles, that it very much lessens him to see how he delighted in such kind of Extravagances. And indeed of all Things Flattery did generally most affect him; and no sort of Flattery pleas'd him better than to have his great Learning and Wisdom commended. And in this, his Parliaments, his Courtiers, his Chaplains, Forreigners and Natives, all seem'd to vie in their Excesses, and came to speak to him in a Stile that was scarce allowable to any Creature.

But none manag'd him with greater Dexterity than the Cardinal, who had gain'd such an Ascendant in the Nation, that he could sacrifice the greatest Men to his Resentments; the Force of which were about this Time felt by Edward Stafford Duke of Buckingham, eminent both for his high Blood and his large Revenues. The Cardinal had long hated him for speaking certain detracting Words of him; and it was further said, that the Duke once holding the Bason to the King, the Cardinal, as soon as the King had done washing, dipp'd his Hands into the same Water, which rais'd such Indignation in the Duke, that he pour'd the Water upon his Feet; and this so provok'd the Cardinal that he declar'd He would sit upon his Skirts. To make a Jest of this vulgar Expression, the Duke appear'd before the King the next Day in a Garment without Skirts, and told his Majesty That it was by Way of Prevention; which added new Fuel to a Fire that could not be extinguish'd without his Blood; so dangerous it is for great Men to descend to Jestling. To remove all Supporters, the Cardinal had caus'd the Duke's chief Friend and Father-in-law, the Earl of Northumberland, to be imprison'd upon some suggested Crimes; and his Son-in-law, the Earl of Surry, to be sent Deputy into Ireland; so that his Friends being sequester'd from him, he might be expos'd to the worst sort of Accusations. The Duke being in this Condition, the Cardinal treated secretly with one Charles Knevet, whom the Duke had angrily dismiss'd from his Stewardship, and who thereupon discover'd his late Master's Life; confessing that the Duke by Way of Discourse was accus'd to say, That if King Henry dy'd without Issue, he would obtain the Crown, and that he would punish the Cardinal: Besides, that he had spoken the same to George Nevil Lord Abergavenny, who had marry'd his Daughter. The Duke being descended from the Daughter of the youngest Son of King Edward the Third, it was thought sufficient Reason for his Accusation; which was so aggravated to King Henry, that he order'd him to be apprehended and try'd by his Peers, and the Duke of Norfolk appointed Lord High-Steward for that Time. Being arraign'd, he was accus'd by Knevet, a Monk call'd Hopkins, and others, of several treasonable Designs to obtain the Crown of England; for which he was found guilty of High-Treason, and the Duke of Norfolk with a Flood of Tears deliver'd the formal Sentence of Execution. To which the other submitted, but with a Declaration of his Innocence, and Resolution not to sue to the King for his Life. Whereupon he was brought back to the Tower, where all the Favour he receiv'd, was to die the Death of a Nobleman, and be beheaded. Thus ended the Duke of Buckingham, much lamented by the People, who libel'd the Cardinal for it, as being thought criminal rather through folly and rash Words, than any real Intention against the King's Person; and therefore not uncappable of Mercy, if he had su'd for it in proper Terms. the Fifth, we have no great certainty; only we observe, that together with this Duke, that great Place of High-Constable of England remains extinguish'd, unless some extraordinary Occasion revive it.

About the same Time a new War began between two of the principal Monarchs of Europe, the Emperor and the King of France; which at divers Times and Places, continu'd near forty Years, and cost the Lives of above five hundred thousand Men. For the composing or managing of which, the Cardinal was sent over to Calais, with a splendid Attendance of several Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and many Knights and Gentlemen. Arriving on the second Day of August, he was met by the Chancellor of France, and the Count De Palisse, attended with four hundred Horse, as Ambassadors from the French King; and the like Number from the Emperor, with Commissions to treat and conclude of Peace. There were also Ambassadors from the Pope, whom the Cardinal mov'd to have his Holiness to be a Party also in the League; but they wanting full Commissions, Letters were immediately sent to Rome about that Affair; and 'till Answer might be receiv'd, the Cardinal went to Bruges, to consult with the Emperor. After thirteen Days magnificent Entertainment, he return'd to Calais; and then immediately proceeded to the Treaty of Peace with the French Commissioners, but in a colder Manner than before, as having his Fervor abated by some Transactions with the Emperor; so that nothing material was concluded, but that the Fishermen of both Princes might fish in the Narrow-Seas without Molestation, 'till the End of February following, of which he sent Advice to each Prince. During the Time of the Cardinal's Stay at Calais, all Writs and Patents were seal'd by him at that Place; and no Sheriff could be chosen for want of his Presence, having the great Seal with him, and such a Power as if the King had been there in Person. Before he return'd, he made a new and private League with the Emperor, of which the Lord Herbert has the Particulars; and intimated to the French King, That he doubted whether the King of England would hereafter be as much his Friend as formerly. At which, tho' King Francis was much offended, yet he signify'd by his artificial Letters that he would as much as ever continue the King of England's Friend: Only he inveigh'd against the Cardinal, as a Man of no Fidelity, and withdrew many Pensions granted by him to English Men. Shortly after, Tournay was besieg'd by the Lord Moncada, a Spaniard; and tho' the French sent great Forces to relieve it, it was surrender'd to the Emperor on the last Day of November. And here in this Year 1521, we may take notice of the Invention of Muskets, which Bellay says were first us'd in this War. In the same Year, on the first of December, dy'd Pope Leo the Tenth; some say out of Joy, and others by Poison.

A. D. 1522. Reg. 13. 14. Upon News of this Pope's Death, immediately the English Cardinal aspir'd to the Tripple Crown; and sent Dr. Pace, Dean of St. Paul's with all Speed to Rome, to use all possible Means to make him Pope. At the same Time he wrote earnest Letters to the Emperor Charles, first reminding him of his Promise to him; next representing to him how unjust and factious it would be in him, openly to have a Pope of his own nominating; and since it was the Place of King Henry to be Arbiter of Christendom, it would be his also to be the chief Instrument of it, if he were elected. Some other Reasons Pace also was order'd to give among the Cardinals at Rome, where he was to represent how much occasion of Calumny the Lutherans and other Enemies of the Church would find, if an unfitting Choice were made at this Juncture; which must follow, if any belonging to Charles or Francis were elected. The Cardinal also did not forget Francis, to whom Indifferency, if not Favour was promis'd, in case he were Pope; which was more than he could hope for any other Way. But before Pace could arrive at Rome, Adrian Cardinal of Torosa, and Tutor to Charles the Emperor, was chosen Pope on the ninth of January; tho' not with such an universal Consent, but that Cardinal Wolsey had had sometimes nine, sometimes twelve, and sometimes nineteen Voices. Pace, upon this Disappointment, having second Instructions to countenance his Imployment, departed to Venice, where he mediated a Peace between the Emperor and the Venetians; urging them to join with him and the King of England against King Francis, who had first broken the common Peace, made 1518, in which the State of Venice was compris'd. But the Venetians, being engag'd to Francis, only took Time to advise upon it.

In the mean Time King Francis, not being fully provided to war with King Henry, continu'd for some Time his smooth Letters to the Cardinal; but at length between Impatience, and Hopes to give a great Diversion in Scotland and Ireland, he began to declare himself. Therefore, his Subjects having made some Attempts upon the English Merchants, when Satisfaction was requir'd, he deferr'd, or rather deny'd Reparation; which particular Insults were accompany'd with a main Breach of Treaty, as King Henry alledg'd. For the Duke of Albany, who ought to have continu'd in France, was now after five Years Absence return'd to his Charge in Scotland; and the English Merchants discovering an approaching Storm, withdrew their Effects from France, and the Scholars their Persons and Studies from Paris. King Henry also wrote sharply to Francis, declaring, That whatever Excuses he made for sending over the Duke of Albany, he knew nothing was done without his Direction; and that it was the Manner of his Country to make Pretensions; reproaching him also with Breach of his Oath. Francis inrag'd at this rough Expostulation, objected the last Year's secret Treaty at Bruges with the Emperor, requiring King Henry to declare himself; and caus'd all the Remainder of the English Merchants Goods to be seiz'd, especially those at Bordeaux, where they had both paid for their Wines, and Custom for them. King Henry upon this confin'd the French Ambassador to his House, and secur'd all the French and Scotch in his Kingdom for a Time, or 'till they had paid pecuniary Mulcts; and the Vice-Admiral Sir William Fitz-Williams was order'd to Sea with a strong Fleet, to secure the English Merchants, and take what French he could. Moreover because the French deny'd the rest of the Mony due, and detain'd the French Queen's Dower, the King caus'd the French Hostages to be kept under a stricter Guard, without using further Rigour; and because Francis had urg'd him to declare himself, he sent over Clarenceaux his Herald, declaring, That since Francis was the Infringer of the common Peace, the King of England must join with the Emperor against him. Upon which Ambassadors were recall'd on both Sides, and War expected. Howbeit, as the Lord Brook, Sir Edward Poynings, Sir John Peachy, and Sir Edward Belknap, all brave Commanders, dy'd about this Time, of Poison or a Pestilential Air, so King Henry lost those whose Service he now most needed.

Still the Cardinal kept up his Reputation to the Height, and perform'd several popular Acts; and as the Manner of the most subtle Favourites is usually to do great rather than good Actions, so this Cardinal by the perpetual Variation he seem'd to cause in the Affairs of Christendom, not only held the Minds of the People in Suspence, but render'd his Counsels more considerable to the King, than if he had pursu'd any one single Way. The last Change of which he was Author, had its Beginning at Bruges, where among other Things the Emperor resolv'd to repair to England, particularly to consult King Henry concerning the Affairs of Europe, and to treat of a Marriage between him and the King's Daughter the Princess Mary; and lastly, which was a singular Pleasure to King Henry, be personally install'd of the Order of the Garter at Windsor, while he himself sat there as Chief. And now for the more magnificent Reception of the Emperor, the Marquess Dorset was sent to Calais, and the Cardinal with a glorious Train to Dover; where upon the twenty sixth Day of May he assur'd that Prince of his Welcome, which King Henry in Person soon after confirm'd. From hence the King conducted him to his Palace at Greenwich, wich, where the Queen his Aunt receiv'd him with extraordinary Joy. Here to honour the Emperor's Presence, Royal Jufts and Tournies were appointed; where the King, the Earl of Devonshire, and ten Assistants, bravely kept the Place against the Duke of Suffolk, the Marquess Dorset, and ten other Assistants on their Part. On the sixth of June the King and Emperor, with all their Trains rod into London, where the City receiv'd them with all the Ornaments and Magnificence of a Coronation; and the Emperor was lodg'd at the Black-Fryars, and all his Lords in the new Palace of Bridewell. On Whit-Sunday the King and Emperor rod to the Cathedral of St. Paul's, where the Cardinal fung High-Mass with an unusual Pomp; in the Beginning of which two Barons gave him Water; after the Gospel, two Earls; and at the last Lavatory two Dukes held the Basin, which rais'd the Indignation of some of the Spaniards. After many Entertainments, they both repair'd to Windsor, where on the nineteenth Day of June, the Emperor wearing the Robes of the Order, and sitting in his Stall, accompany'd the other Knights in all his Rites and Ceremonies usual at that Time. Which being done, the two great Monarchs receiv'd the Sacrament together, and swore upon the Holy Evangelists to observe the League concluded between them: The Substance of which was, That they should unite their Powers against King Francis, and that the Emperor should marry the Princess Mary, when she should be at a proper Age. Besides which, the Emperor gave his Oath to save King Henry harmless for all the Sums of Money and Pensions, which were or should be due to him from King Francis, upon former Agreements.

Shortly after the Emperor took his leave of the King, and repair'd to Southampton, where the Earl of Surry the English Admiral attended as his Convoy, who by a particular Patent had also been constituted Admiral to the Emperor, on the eighth Day of June. This Earl having accepted of that Honour by King Henry's Consent, landed his Men in Normandy near Cherbourg; and having destroy'd the adjacent Parts, all but religious Houses, he return'd to Portland. From whence setting Sail a second Time, he landed near Morlais in Bretaign, and with seven thousand Men march'd thither; where he fortunately enter'd the Town, which was soon plunder'd and burnt, and a rich Booty carry'd to the Fleet. After which the Earl caus'd sixteen or seventeen French Ships, which he found on the Coasts, to be burnt: And then leaving his Vice-Admiral to scour the Seas, he made certain Knights for their good Services, and return'd to Southampton, from whence he safely convoy'd the Emperor to his Kingdom of Spain. In the mean Time divers inferior Exploits pass'd between the Garrisons of Calais and Boloign, in which the French were for the most Part Losers. Likewise at the same Time the Lords Ross and Dacres of the North, appointed to keep the Borders against Scotland, burnt the Town of Kelfie and fourscore Villages, and overthrew eighteen Towers of Stone, with all their Bulwarks. Shortly after the Duke of Albany, being establish'd Governor of Scotland, rais'd an Army of eighty thousand Men, as some write, with which he approach'd the Borders, but made no Invasion, concluding that the Name of such an Army would terrifie the English. But this did not hinder the Marquess Dorset from entering into Trividale, and to Galloway, where he burnt many Towns and Villages, and carry'd away four thousand Head of Cattle.

These Warlike Exploits being expensive, oblig'd the King to make use of his Subjects Affections; the better to understand which, he caus'd a general Muster or Description to be made of all his Kingdom, commanding that each hundred should certifie the Names of all above sixteen Years of Age: That they should repair to a certain Place assign'd with their Arms, declare their Names, their Parishes, the Lords and Parsons of each Town, the Worth of the Lands and Benefices, and also the Estates and Revenues, as well as the Employments and Occupations of every particular Person: So that this Survey was almost in the Nature of another Domesday Book. The King rejoic'd to find his Kingdom so strong and wealthy; yet as he was not ready for a Parliament, he borrow'd of the Citizens of London twenty thousand Pounds, and sent Privy Seals to several other rich Persons of the Kingdom; in consequence of which, he demanded a Loan of the Tenth of the Temporalty, and a Fourth of the Spirituality: All which extraordinary Ways of furnishing the present Necessities yet ended in a Parliament the next Year. The King having thus rais'd some Mony, proclaim'd open War against France, unless that King made Peace with the Pope or Emperor; and accordingly commanded the Earl of Surry, after his Attempts by Sea, to go over to Calais, and with convenient Forces to join with Florence d' Egmond, General of the Emperor's Troops. These meeting between Ardres and St. Omers, spoil'd and burnt all the Villages in their Way 'till they came to Hesdin, in which the French had put a strong Garrison. But Autumn being far advanc'd, and the Weather unseasonable, they only could take the Town; the Castle being too strong to be attempted at this Season. They march'd therefore towards Dourlans, which they took and burnt, with all the adjoining Villages. The Season still continuing foul, and the English very unhealthful, the Army dissolv'd, and the sooner because the two Generals could not agree about their Designs. Yet before the Earl of Surry departed, he burnt Marquise, and some other Places near the English Pale; after which he return'd home, and gave the King an Account of his Expedition.

Nation

By the Methods of the Cardinal, as it is believ'd, Parliaments had been dissolv'd for about seven Years; but now it was thought necessary to call one upon the fifteenth of April, to be held at the Black-Fryars in London; and here the Cardinal took care that the Spirituality should lead the Way. The Business of a Subsidy therefore being brought into the Convocation, in general met with a fair Passage; yet Fox Bishop of Winchester, and Fisher Bishop of Rocheſter, and Phillips a Canon of Paul's, oppos'd it. But the industrious Cardinal silencing some, and causing others to absent themselves, so far prevail'd, that one half of the Spiritual Revenues for one Year was granted, to be paid in five Years following. From hence the Cardinal went to the House of Commons, where in an eloquent Oration, Breach of Faith was charg'd upon the French King, upon the League sworn for the general Peace of Christendom: And besides, the Default of Payment for Tournay, and other Matters were objected; so that the King could do no less in this publick Cause, than join in War against him with Charles the Emperor. And because the Charge of it was judg'd to amount to eight hundred thousand Pounds, it was requir'd that the foresaid Sum might be rais'd out of the Fifth of every Man's Lands and Goods to be paid in four Years. This being propos'd, the next Day Sir Thomas More, Speaker of the House, enforc'd this Demand, demonstrating how it was not unreasonable on this important Occasion, to pay four Shillings in the Pound. To this many Replies were made, and Objections rais'd; and it was alledg'd, That of the thirteen thousand Parishes then in England, the greatest Part of them could not regularly produce a hundred Marks. At last, after some Debate and Contention, it was agreed that every Man's Estate of twenty Pound yearly, should pay two Shillings in the Pound; and from twenty Pound a Year downwards to forty Shillings, one Shilling in the Pound; and under forty Shillings, every Head of sixteen and upwards should pay four Pence, in two Years. The Cardinal hearing no more intended, with great Warmth enter'd the House of Commons, and told that great Assembly, That he desir'd to reason with those who oppos'd his Demands; but being answer'd, That it was the Order of that House to hear, and not to reason but among themselves, the Cardinal departed without Satisfaction. Yet by the liberal Motion of some, those of fifty Pounds Land and upwards, were induc'd to add one Shilling more, for three Years to come; which at length being continu'd to the fourth Year, was all that could be obtain'd. In this Parliament a College of Physicians was erected, and many Pri-

Privileges granted to the Members of it : And also an Act pass'd, That the King should have Authority for Life by his Letters Patents to reverse and annul all Attainders of High-Treason, and to restore their Heirs, &c. As there had been no Parliament call'd for seven Years before this, so by the Cardinal's Means, there was none summon'd for seven Years after. Then by Vertue of his Legantine Authority, the Cardinal dissolv'd the Convocation at St. Paul's, convok'd by the Arch-Bishop of Canterbury, and call'd him and all the Clergy to St. Peter's at Westminster ; but we do not find any thing material transacted.

The King of Denmark visits
King Henry.

In the mean Time the Scots, joining with the French, began again to threaten the English Nation ; but after some Struggles, they were so discourag'd, that a short Truce was made between the two Kingdoms. This gave King Henry Opportunity of prosecuting more important Affairs in Foreign Countries. But before he could bring them to any great Effect, Christian the Second, King of Denmark, being by his Subjects expell'd his own Country, came from Flanders into England with his Queen, and a small Retinue suitable to their Misfortunes. This did not hinder them from finding a Reception worthy of their Quality ; and Queen Catharine, being Aunt to the other of Denmark, took particular Compassion on them. Therefore after all manner of Royal Entertainment, for the Space of about three Weeks, and divers rich Presents bestow'd upon them, they thought fit, upon some new Hopes of Recovering their Kingdom, to return into Flanders.

An Army sent into France under the Duke of Suffolk.

And now King Henry began to shew himself more and more vigorous against the French ; and in the Month of August sent over the Duke of Suffolk, attended by the Lords Montague, Herbert, Ferrers, Mowney, Sands, Berkley, and Powis, with divers other Knights and Gentlemen, and about thirteen thousand Men. With this small but select Army the Duke march'd from Calais into the Enemy's Country, and took several inferior Places ; then joining with the Emperor's General Florence d'Agmond, the Army amounted to twenty thousand strong ; yet it being near the End of September, and the Weather more unseasonable than usual for that Month, it was difficult to perform any great Action. King Henry order'd them to begin with Boloign ; but the Imperialists alledg'd it was impregnable, and that for entering France, it was better to coast the River Somme ; which they did, with Design to come to Battel. But finding no Forces in the Field, they besieg'd Bray on the River Somme, in which Place was a strong Garrison ; but a Breach being made by the English, and furiously attack'd, the Governor set Fire to the Town, and fled over the Bridge with the Remainder of his Men, with great Loss. From hence passing over the Somme, they march'd towards Roye, taking some lesser Places by the Way. This Town being summon'd, and promising to yield, Sir Richard Cornwall with four hundred Men was sent to take Possession of it. From thence the Army advanc'd towards Montdidier, being oppos'd in the way by two Commanders, who were at last taken Prisoners, with some others of Note. In Montdidier there was a Garrison of twelve hundred Men, under the Command of Roche-baron ; but after some few Hours Discharge of the Cannon, they capitulated and surrender'd. The Duke with his Army had now pass'd the River Oyse, and was come within eleven Leagues of Paris it self ; which threw the Citizens into a terrible Consternation. Nor could the Arrival of Mons. de Vendosme with some Forces, cure them of their Fears. But the Season being far advanc'd, and the Weather so extremely cold, that almost all the Corn in France was frozen and destroy'd this Year, the Army was forc'd to return ; especially since the Lady Regent in the Low-Countries withdrew the Pay from her Soldiers, and let all the Charge fall upon King Henry. However they took the Castle of Bouchain near the Emperor's Territories, before they broke up ; which notwithstanding, with the other Places, was soon recover'd by the French. Thus ended this Year's Campaign,

The Progress

to the Dissatisfaction of King Henry, it being more to the Terror of France, than the Advantage of England.

King Francis was at the same time turning his Forces against Italy, when on the fourteenth Day of September Pope Adrian dy'd, by Poison as it was believ'd. The News of this rous'd the Ambition of Cardinal Wolsey, who by Letters to King Henry humbly intreated him to assist him to the utmost in this important Affair, and likewise to write with his own Hand to the Emperor for his Interest in this Matter. But notwithstanding all these Endeavours, the Emperor a second Time fail'd him, and Julio de Medici was made Pope, by the Name of Clement the Seventh: Upon which, Wolsey artificially dissembling his Resentments, thought fit in Justification of his Merits to write again to the King, declaring, That the Election was not so clearly carry'd, but that many of the Cardinals were for him; tho' by reason of his Absence, and the dangerous State of Italy, which call'd for present Remedies, they insisted on the other. Whereupon it was thought fit by the King and Cardinal to dispatch an Embassie to the new Pope, to congratulate his Election, and to desire him to continue his former Disaffection to France, and to give publick Testimonies of it according to the Greatness of the Power invested in him. The Cardinal also, by a particular Dispatch, desir'd Richard Pace, then at Rome, to procure an Enlargement of his Legantine Authority; protesting, That by reason of the King's Prerogative and other Causes, it was not a thousand Ducats yearly to him; yet if his Power and Faculties might be encreas'd, it should be thankfully acknowledg'd. To all which Pope Clement condescended. and the Legantine Power, which formerly had been granted only for five Years at a Time, was now by a new Precedent given him for Term of Life. Thus, to comfort him after his Repulse at Rome, the Cardinal had a Kind of a Papal Authority in England; of which he made the utmost Use. For forming vast Things in his Mind, and designing two famous Colleges to be erected, one at his native Place Ipswich, and the other at Oxford, towards the carrying on of those Works, he soon procur'd a Bull from the Pope to suppress several of the lesser Monasteries in England. In this he met with some Difficulties from the King; but Henry, who often wanted Mony, considering, that if for his urgent Occasions he was oblig'd at any Time to seize on the other Religious Houses, he might this way discover how the People stood affected, at last granted his Request. And King Henry thus concurring with the Pope, who in Favour of the Cardinal gave way to this Suppression, that Overture was first made, which being afterwards pursu'd by the King's sole Authority, became the final Ruin of all the Monasteries in England.

He gets his Power enlarg'd.

His vast Designs.

The Scots, the ancient Confederates of the French, began again to threaten the English Nation under the Conduct of the Duke of Albany, who had lately been in France, and now approach'd the English Borders, with a numerous Army. Hearing that the Earl of Surry, now by his Father's Death Duke of Norfolk, was aiming against him with a mighty Power, he sent an Herald to him, promising upon his Honour to give him Battel, and if he took him Prisoner, to give him good Quarter: To which the English Duke severely answer'd, That he would not fail to stand Battel; but if he took him Prisoner, the Quarter he would give him should be to cut off his Head, and send it for a Present to his Master the King of England. The English Forces lying at Alewicke, were join'd by the Earls of Northumberland and Westmorland, the Lords Clifford, Dacres, Lumley, Ogle and Darcy, with many Knights and Gentlemen; in all composing an Army of about forty thousand Men. In October the Duke of Albany sent two or three thousand Men over the Water to besiege the Castle of Warke; who by the Battery of their Ordnance won the outward Work call'd the Barnekins; and continuing their Batteries won the second Work; but then Sir William Lisle, Governor of the Castle, sallied out with those few he had left, and bravely repell'd the French Soldiers from the

the Place, with the Deaths of three hundred of them: A memorable Service, for which the Duke of Norfolk afterwards gave him particular Thanks. This brave Duke would gladly have follow'd his Enemies to their own Country, but only his Commission was to defend England, and not to invade Scotland. Shortly after, Queen Margaret, Mother to the young King of the Scots; sent to her Brother King Henry, for a Cessation of Arms 'till they might conveniently have a further Communication; which being granted, the English Army broke up, and the Duke of Norfolk return'd to Court. In the latter End of the Year, and the Beginning of the next Ambassadors from Scotland did negotiate a Peace, and shewing that the Lords of Scotland were content to relinquish the French, upon Condition that a Marriage might be secur'd between their young King and the Princess Mary; but they requir'd that the Promise by which she was engag'd to the Emperor, might first be discharg'd. King Henry answer'd he would first confer with the Emperor about it, and therefore nothing was concluded at this Time but a Truce for three Years and a half. The Emperor hearing of this Treaty, dispatch'd an Embassie from Flanders to require that the Princess Mary might be deliver'd to him, promising hereupon to declare her Empress, and make her Governor of the Low-Countries; her Dower was also requir'd to be paid immediately, and that King Henry in Person would the next Year invade the Kingdom of France.

A Truce concluded with them.

But before King Henry could give a perfect Answer to these Particulars, there happen'd a remarkable Change of Affairs, which did not only affect the Kingdom of France, but had an Influence upon a great Part of Europe. King Francis had this Year vigorously pursu'd his warlike Designs in Italy, in order to recover the Dukedom of Milan; and because the Duke of Bourbon, out of great Disgust, had revolted from him, and was made General of the Emperor's Forces in Italy, King Francis warmly pursu'd him, and closely besieg'd him in the City of Pavia. This Duke had also receiv'd particular Incouragement, and constant Pay from the King of England; but by means of the ambitious Cardinal, who had secret Resentments against the Emperor, the Pay was suddenly stopp'd or withdrawn. This hapning at the Time when the Duke was besieg'd by the French King in Pavia, it drove him to such a Degree of Fear and Despair, that he resolv'd upon a most dangerous Escape. In the midst of a dark Night he order'd Part of his Men to attack the Besiegers on the weakest Side of the Town, while he sally'd privately out of a Postern on the contrary Side. The Watch being slender, and the Soldiers in a secure Sleep, a mighty Terror arose, in which the Besiegers turn'd their Ordnance to the Place of the Outcry, when as suddenly Bourbon gaining upon their Backs, won all their Artillery, discharg'd them against their Owners, slew their Soldiers, cut down their Tents, and lastly by the Vice-Roy of Naples, the French King himself was taken Prisoner in the Field: Behaving himself with the Courage and Bravery of a Monarch, both before and during his Captivity. This remarkable Accident happen'd on the twenty fourth Day of February 1524.

Francis the French King taken Prisoner by the Imperialists.

A. D. V. King Henry had now a greater Opportunity than ever of exerting his Power, and displaying his Grandeur in the general Affairs of Europe; yet he was very cautious how to proceed upon so unexpected a Change. When the News was brought to England, in Council it was thought fit the King should comply with his Confederate Charles, in giving some publick Demonstration of Joy. Therefore the King giong to St. Paul's, and causing a Mass to be sung in a more solemn Manner than ordinary, seem'd to celebrate the Victory; tho' inwardly he was not so well satisfy'd with it: For, as he consider'd the Emperor now grown to a Greatness scarce allowable with Reason of State, or due Terms of Neighbourhood, he deliberated with his Council what was most proper to be done next. Whereupon it was thought fit immediately to send Ambassadors into Spain, to represent to the Emperor, 'How that this War being made at a common Charge, it was reasonable that both should receive the Fruit of it: That the Part to which the King of England pretended, was Inheritance in France, which he desir'd might be restor'd; in which the Emperor's best Assistance could not be doubted, both because it was just in it self, and agreeable to their late Treaty; by Vertue of which he was to require the Emperor to proceed in levying Forces against France, in which his Majesty would likewise concur. Nor was it to be doubted that the Emperor would decline this Motion, since he himself would finally reap the Benefit of it; for as his Majesty was resolv'd to ratifie and confirm the intended Match between the Emperor and the Princess Mary, who was Heir not only to the Crown of England, but to all the Titles in France, so all at last would devolve upon him; which therefore might be thought so advantageous, that he could not think it unreasonable to deliver up King Francis into his Majesty's Hands, upon consigning the Princess to his. This Advice being approv'd by all, an Embassie was dispatch'd into Spain; in which it was further offer'd, That the Princess Mary should be deliver'd into the Emperor's Hands, upon proper Conditions. But the Emperor being resolv'd that none should partake of the Profit or Honour of the late Victory, the Embassie found no real Reception in Spain; upon which King Henry return'd to that brave and wise Resolution he had formerly taken, to make himself Arbitrer of Christendom, and to punish him who interrupted the publick Peace. To which he had also many other Inducements: For the Lady Margaret of Flanders, who by Articles was to have rais'd Forces against the French, began already to treat with them for an Accommodation; and when Demand was made for the Payment of the Mony lent to the Emperor in his greatest Necessity, nothing was return'd but a dilatory Excuse. Nor was the King ignorant of the Treaty which the Emperor had already begun for the ransoming of Francis; of a Match propos'd with Isabella Princess of Portugal, which reflected on his Daughter's Reputation. Lastly the Pope's Breve, representing the Danger of Christendom from the increasing Prosperity of the Turks, had so prevail'd with King Henry, that he thought fit to lay aside all Ambition to recover his Inheritance in France, and to endeavour for an Universal Peace.

In Pursuance of this laudable Design, as the Remembrance of the obliging Interview between King Henry and Francis did not operate a little, so the Reputation that the latter had gain'd by his Courage in this last Action, had kindled in our generous King's Mind a compassionate Zeal for his Delivery. Therefore at the Request of the King of France's Mother, who had much dispos'd King Henry to return to his ancient Friendship, he sent particular Orders to his Ambassadors in Spain, to intercede for the Liberty of King Francis; who had already begun the Way in a particular Letter to the Emperor, in which he declar'd, That the greatest Comfort he found in this abandon'd Condition, was his falling into the Hands of so generous a Prince, who would not oblige him to what might be unjust to require, or impossible to perform: That he therefore hop'd sufficient Security would be accepted for his Freedom, since instead of detaining an unuseful Prisoner, he should make a King his Slave; when it was more advantageous to have him a faithful Friend, than to suffer him to die in Desperation. None yet was so vigilant and intentive in this Affair, or the general Good of the Kingdom, as Madam Lovise, his Mother and Regent of France, who by many forcible and reiterated Embassies, drew most of the Christian Potentates and Republicks to favour the Deliverance of her Son. The Emperor finding such powerful Intercessions, of his own Accord sent some Propositions and Articles to the Captive King; some of which were so hard and displeasing to him, that he is said to have drawn his Dagger, crying, It is better for a King of France to die after this Manner; but was prevented from using it by one of his Attendants. Yet to gratifie the Emperor, he gave Order that two of the chief Prisoners, mention'd in the Proposals, should be set at Liberty. And after that new Conditions were offer'd the Emperor, which tho' advantageous in themselves, yet several Objections were rais'd against them, and nothing was concluded. About this Time the Emperor holding his Cortes or Parliament at Toledo, among other Things it was petition'd by the Estates assembled, that 'the Emperor being now of Age to marry, should take to his 'Wife Isabella the Infanta of Portugal, and not the Princess Mary of England; which was very agreeable to the Mind of him, who now aspir'd to universal Monarchy.

The French King being weary of his Restraint in Italy, at length procur'd himself to be remov'd into Spain, reputing his Change of Prison as a second Liberty. Being brought to Madrid, he fell so dangerously sick, that the Physicians had little Hopes of his Life, unless the Emperor would be pleas'd speedily to visit him; upon whose Visitation, in which there was a pathetick Interview, he soon recover'd his Health, tho' not immediately his Strength. Here new Propositions were made for his Deliverance, and new Objections were rais'd against them. In the mean Time the Pope, the Venetians and Princes of Italy, leagu'd together in Defence of the common Cause against the Emperor, and invited King Henry into the Treaty; nor did it lessen their Suspicion of Charles's aiming at universal Monarchy, because upon his taking Francis Prisoner, he wrote to the King of England and Princes of Italy, That he should not take it well if any of them disturb'd the Dominions of Francis, since being his Prisoner, he could do no less than protect him against all others. Madam Louise the French Regent continu'd her Messages to King Henry, to procure his Assistance for the Redemption of her Son; 'till at length a Treaty for that Purpose was concluded at Moore, August the thirtieth, in which was to be an Amnesty of all Injuries done in the late Wars between England and France, and other Articles confirm'd. And by another Treaty this Year at Lyons, the Regent oblig'd herself to pay all the Arrears due to King Henry's Sister Mary, by Vertue of her Marriage with Lewis the Twelfth, and also to suffer her to enjoy her Jointure without Molestation. At length the Emperor concluded a Match with his Neice Isabella of Portugal; alledging for his Excuse to King Henry, That at the Petition of his States assembled at Toledo he had comply'd with his Subjects Desires, which he hop'd would be understood as no Breach of Friendship. King Henry, considering the tender Age of his Daughter, and that it was incongruous to allie himself with a Prince against whom he might soon draw his Sword, seem'd well satisfy'd to relinquish the Match upon mutual Consent. After which Time the Intimacy and Amity between them became so remiss, that at length it was wholly dissolv'd: Infomuch that the Ambassadors on both Sides were recall'd, and the Emperor, who before us'd to sign all his Letters by the Title of Son and Kinsman, from henceforwards only subscrib'd Charles. It was the less to be wonder'd that the Emperor began now to take such State upon him, since a richer Booty than that of Francis fell into his Hands, that is the Empire of Pern, where the golden Mines of Potosi and many others were first discover'd.

While Affairs thus pass'd in foreign Parts, King Henry, who well knew that to maintain a sure Peace at home was almost as expensive as the making War abroad, advis'd with his Council how to provide himself with Money. Yet as the Cardinal had undertaken the King should never want, as long as he might manage the publick Affairs, so they gladly discharg'd themselves on him. But the Harmony of Government consists in such a nice Proportion, that no one Part can safely be strain'd higher, unless the rest can be well tun'd to it. And this appear'd in the Actions of this Year, when Commissions being granted out into all the Counties of England, for levying the sixth Part of every Lay-Man's Goods, and the fourth of the Clergies, the People in general were so disgust'd, that they were ready to break out into Rebellion; alledging not only their own Poverty, but that the Commissions were against Law. The King upon this resolv'd solv'd to disavow the whole Proceeding; and by Letters to all Parts, declar'd, He expected nothing from them but by Way of Benevolence. This procur'd the Cardinal many Curses, and the King as many Blessings; notwithstanding under the Name of Benevolence, he requir'd great Sums of all his Subjects, and particularly of the Citizens of London. This Way was likewise oppos'd by many, especially in the Country, where some Persons took up Arms; but by the Persuasion of the Dukes of Norfolk and Suffolk, they submitted themselves, and were brought to London, and there secur'd. The King persisting in his Intention not to punish any on this Occasion, brought the Matter to the Council-Table; where the Cardinal by Way of Apology declar'd, He had done nothing without first advising with the Judges, who positively affirmed the King might lawfully demand any Sum by Commission, and that the Council of State confirm'd this Method. But the King declaring That he was assur'd his Subjects were richer than he found them by this Commission, all the Blame was charg'd on the false Informers, and Pardon granted to all those who deny'd the former Benevolence. Hereupon the Delinquents were brought to the Star-Chamber, where after a severe Reprimand given them, the Cardinal said, That notwithstanding their great Offences, the King in Consideration of their Necessities, had granted them his most gracious Pardon, upon Condition they gave in Sureties for their good Behaviours. But they replying They had no Sureties, the Cardinal, to shew a popular Act, offer'd with the Duke of Norfolk to stand bound for them, at which they were discharg'd.

The prodigious Cardinal, who by the Concurrence of the Papal and Regal Authority, had suppress'd several Monasteries, and given such a Terror to the rest as to draw large Sums from them, would not so desist, but still continu'd his Purposes of converting the Profits of all those, to other Uses, which by any Colour might be reputed Supernumerary. And having thus establish'd his extensive Authority, he was judg'd by this Time, between Visitations, making of Abbots, Probates of Testaments, granting of Faculties, Licences, and Dispensations, and many other Ways, besides the great Pensions he had from Foreign Princes, to have made his Treasury equal to the King's, notwithstanding the Sums he often transmitted to Rome. In which way of enriching himself, his Agent John Allen, accompany'd with a great Train, and riding from one Religious House to another, in a kind of perpetual Progress, or Visitation, did the Cardinal no small Service. But as this at last became a publick Grievance, so the King took notice of it in so sharp a Manner, that the Cardinal was forc'd not only to excuse himself with much Submission, but also to promise Amendment; protesting withal, That in his last Will and Testament, he had left a great Part of his Estate to his Highness. He did not only oblige the King by this, but likewise having now built his fair Palace at Hampton-Court, and wisely considering how it would increase Mens Envy against him, he freely gave it to the King, who in Exchange permitted him to live in Richmond House. He always took Care to sooth the warm Monarch in promoting all his private Pleasures, in which he was often too great a Sharer with his Master. One of the Liberties the King took at his leisure Hours was to follow the Charms of Love: For as all Things concurr'd, his noble Presence and Person, being further exalted by his high Dignity and Valour, it was not strange, if among so many beautiful Ladies at Court, and such a Cardinal to encourage him, he both gave and receiv'd Temptation. Among whom Mrs. Elizabeth Blunt, Daughter to Sir John Blunt, was thought, for her rare Ornaments of Nature and Education, to be the Miracle of her Time; which caus'd such a secret Intimacy between them, as at last she bore him a Son. This Child proving so equally like both his Parents, that he became the best Emblem of their mutual Affection, he was call'd Henry Fitz-Roy by the King, and so much avow'd by him, that having at this Time attain'd the Age of six Years, he was publickly made a Knight, and the same Day created Earl of

- Nottingham, Duke of Richmond and Somerset, Lieutenant-General beyond Trent, and Warden-General of the Borders of Scotland, and shortly after Admiral of England: And he was the more cherish'd by the King, because he now expected no Issue Male from his Queen.

A. D. 1526. Reg. $\frac{17}{18}$. Such was the generous Disposition of King Henry, that he not only interceded for the Captive King Francis, but likewise for the expell'd King Christian of Denmark. Therefore he sent Ambassadors to Denmark, to persuade his Subjects to recall him home; from whence nothing had so much chae'd him as the Guilt and Horror of shedding so much Blood among his People; but the exasperated Danes positively refus'd either him or his Son. But he had better Success as to the Liberty of the French King, which after a Year's Captivity was obtain'd upon very hard Terms, if any Thing can be hard that sets a King out of Prison. For in the Beginning of this Year, a Treaty between the Emperor and the French King was concluded, call'd The Concord of Madrid, consisting of forty four Articles, and more Particulars. Among many other Matters it was agreed, that on the same Day Francis was set at Liberty, his two Sons, the Dauphine and the Duke of Orleans, should be deliver'd as Hostages into the Emperor's Hands: After which Francis was to deliver up the Dukedom of Burgundy to the Emperor, restore the Duke of Bourbon and all his Friends, marry the Emperor's Sister Leonora, and indemnifie the Emperor against all Demands on the Part of the King of England. All which at large being solemnly ratify'd, and sworn on both Sides, on the eighteenth of March the French King was exchange'd for his two Sons on the Borders of France with unusual Niceness and Formality; and being once at Liberty, he immediately mounted a Fleet-Horse, and riding with the greatest Swiftness cry'd out I'm a King, I'm a King! in such a Manner, as tho' he then design'd to have little Regard to the late Treaty. King Henry having been a Principal Agent in this Affair, both as to his Captivity and Deliverance, he immediately dispatch'd Sir Thomas Cheyney to congratulate his safe Return, and to take his Oath to the Treaty of Moore; which Francis accepting, sent a Messenger to inform King Henry of the Conditions of his Delivery, and to acknowledge that he chiefly ow'd his Liberty to him; which Acts of Civility, afterwards produc'd a more firm Correspondency between these two Monarchs. By the Treaty of Moore, it was agreed that the French King should pay two Millions of Crowns to the King of England, at some appointed Days; and after that to pay to King Henry during Life the annual Sum of a hundred thousand Crowns. Not long after a new famous League was made between the Pope and Francis, the Venetians, the Florentines, and Francis Sforza Duke of Milan, call'd by the Name of the Clementine League, and sign'd at Coignac in France, May the twenty second, by which the Pope absolv'd the French King from the Oath he had sworn at Madrid, and they all united against the Emperor, and further declar'd the King of England Protector of the League. Upon which King Henry, debating in his Council how he should act in this Affair, it was nicely and succinctly determin'd, That he ought not to be a Party, where he might be a Judge.

The French King releas'd upon hard Terms.

The Clementine League against the Emperor.

The Emperor was exceedingly allarm'd at this League, and solemnly protested against Pope Clement, as an ungrateful Person, who by his Favour had been made both Cardinal and Pope, notwithstanding some Allegations that he was spurious, and incapable of either of those Dignities. He exclaim'd against the French King, as perjur'd and false, and against the Venetians, as wavering and unconstant: However his principal Care was to intangle and divide them. And tho' in Italy, upon publishing the League by the Pope, they levy'd their appointed Numbers, yet Francis being in Hopes of the Restitution of his Children, delay'd so much on his Part, that the Imperial Army gain'd such Advantage, that Sforza was constrain'd to yield the Dukedom of Milan, and fly to the Italian Army under the Duke of Urbino. About the same Time the Emperor peror was inform'd, That in Consequence of the Pope's Relaxation of Francis's Oath, the Parliament of Paris and the King's Council had totally disannull'd the Treaty of Madrid, as being concluded by a Person under Constraint and Imprisonment. Further to colour this Refusal, Francis sent Ambassadors to Spain, again to assure the Emperor, That Burgundy could not be alienated from the French Crown; and that if he would return his Sons at a reasonable Ransom, he would take his Sister Leonora for his Queen; if not, he would recover them by Force. The several Ambassadors also of the Confederates then in his Court, and particularly the English, concurr'd in this Matter; requiring further, That he would recall the Spaniards out of Lombardy, and restore Sforza; relinquish his Pretensions to Naples, and not go to Italy with an Army; and that he would pay the King of England, all the Confederates of the League, in case of Refusal, denouncing War against him. The Emperor answer'd to all these Particulars, and declar'd, He was ready to defend himself against them all. Not long after King Francis sent the Arch-Bishop of Bourdeaux, with others, to desire the Restitution of his Children; to which the Emperor, now more incens'd, reply'd, If he would have his Children, he must according to his Oath and Promise return Prisoner himself. After that he privately desir'd the Ambassador to tell his Master, That by his own Acknowledgment, He had done cowardly and perfidiously in breaking the Treaty of Madrid, and that if he deny'd it, he would make it good in Person against him. King Francis wanted not Courage to reply in the same Language; but in the mean Time he caus'd an Apology to be publish'd, in Vindication of his Breach of Faith, and sent it to all Christian Princes; to which the Emperor reply'd with another, and with as much Severity as the Cause requir'd. In the mean Time King Francis enter'd into a new League with King Henry, which principally concern'd the Restitution of his two Sons, and the Monies due from the Emperor to the King of England. This was scarcely concluded, before the Family of the Columna's in Italy, being of the Imperial Faction, with three or four thousand Men enter'd the City of Rome, and ravag'd part of it; and then forc'd the Pope to fly to the Castle St. Angelo, where he was oblig'd to a Truce of four Months with the Emperor, to withdraw his Forces out of Lombardy, and to pardon all past Offences.

The French King makes a new League with England.

And now King Henry, finding no Advantage to be expected from treating with the Emperor, and understanding with what Indignity the Pope had lately been us'd, he resolv'd according to his former League to join against that Prince who appear'd most refractory. Therefore conceiving the Fault to be in the Emperor, he immediately enter'd into a strict League with Francis, chusing rather to concur with him in particular, than to embrace the Clementine League, as containing many Articles that no ways concern'd him. Therefore he propos'd to the French King the Princess Mary in Marriage, since the Emperor had deny'd him Leonora; and offer'd besides to enter into an offensive League with him for the Recovery of his Children, and forcing the Emperor to reasonable Conditions. Francis joyfully accepting this Motion, demanded the Princess Mary's Picture, which together with the King's was granted, and the Match treated in France by the English Agents, the Bishop of Bath, and Sir William Fitz-Williams. The French King, if he marry'd her, requir'd she should be immediately given into his Hands; but King Henry dissenting, because she was but eleven Years of Age, the Bishop of Tarbe, the Viscount Turme, and the President of Paris, came into England, where on the last of April three Treaties were concluded, as may be seen at large in the Lord Herbert. As to the Marriage, it was agreed that the Princess Mary should be given either to Francis himself, or to his second Son the Duke of Orleans; and that Alternative was to be determin'd by the two Kings at an Interview design'd afterwards at Calais, with Forfeitures on both Sides if the Marriage were hinder'd. Then in Consideration that King Henry and his Successors should never molest the French King in any of those Dominions he now possess'd, Francis did here bind himself and his Successors, to pay every Year at two several Terms, after the Decease of King Henry, to all the Kings of England his Successors, forty six thousand Crowns de Soleil, and twenty four Sols Tournois, without Deduction or Prejudice to the Sums already due to King Henry by the Treaty of Moore in 1525. Further the French King bound himself and his Successors, to give of the Salt of Brovage yearly, as well to Henry as his Successors, to the value of fifteen thousand Crowns, as is above-mention'd. In these Treaties was the first Scruple rais'd by Foreigners, (particularly the Bishop of Tarbe) concerning the Legitimation of the Princess Mary, which caus'd such Com-motions afterwards.

Before the Conclusion of this Treaty, Pope Clement had sent Letters to King Henry, complaining of the Indignities offer'd to his Person by Cardinal Columna and the Imperialists, assuring him, That if he and the French King would effectually assist him, he would break the late Agreement made with the Imperial Party, to which he held himself not oblig'd, because he was under Constraint. Upon which King Henry, who had always been true to the See of Rome, sent him about thirty thousand Ducats for present Use; which so encourag'd the Pope, that he cited Cardinal Columna to appear at Rome upon Pain of Deprivation of his Dignity; while he on the other Side threaten'd to call a Council against him, and depose him for Simony and other Incapacities. Upon which the Pope with an Army enter'd the Kingdom of Naples, and took several Places belonging to that Family; but the Confederates coming slowly to his Assistance, and hearing that great Forces were coming from Spain against him, for to gain a Cessation of Arms for eight Months, he was compell'd to make a dishonourable Compliance, and to give sixty thousand Ducats. Yet after this, being again encourag'd with some Hopes from his Allies, and having by a Simonaical Creation of fourteen Cardinals rais'd three hundred thousand Ducats, he ventur'd upon a second Breach of Faith, and disown'd the last Treaty; giving the Kingdom of Naples to Count Vaudemont, whom he sent with Forces to subdue it. But for this he met with a greater Punishment than before; for the Duke of Bourbon at the Head of the Imperialists prevented all his Designs, and march'd directly with his hungry Army to the Walls of Rome; and giving the Assault, tho' he receiv'd a mortal Wound himself, yet that glorious City was soon taken by Storm, with the Slaughter of several thousands of all Ages. That proud City never saw so sad and dismal a Day, not when it was sack'd by the Goths and other barbarous Nations; for the Soldiers kill'd whomsoever they met, and cut them in Pieces; the Streets flow'd with Blood, the Altars were despoil'd, the Churches and Monasteries ransack'd, the Nuns and Virgins ravish'd, and the Palaces of the Pope, Cardinals and Princes rifled and plunder'd; so that it is impossible to express what Wealth and Riches lay in Heaps, and what precious Commodities belonging to Merchants were made a Prey to common Soldiers. But what made the Spoil greater, was the Number of Prisoners, who were all forc'd to pay such Ransoms as were laid upon them; and to augment the Ignominy as well as Desolation of this miserable State, the Prelates were taken by the Soldiers, and in all their Habits and Poticalibus set upon Asses and Mules, and led through the Streets with Contempt and Derision. The Pope amidst these Distractions fled to the Castle of St. Angelo, with seventeen Cardinals, the Ambassadors of England, France, Venice, and Florence, and about five hundred Soldiers; where being straitly belieg'd, he was forc'd not only to surrender that Castle, with Ostia, Civita Vecchia, and other Places, but also to give Hostages for four hundred thousand Ducats, and after all to surrender himself Prisoner to the Emperor.

Rome plunder'd by the Imperialists.

The Pope taken Prisoner.

This gave mighty Offence to all the Princes of Christendom, except the Lutherans of Germany; of which the Emperor was soon sensible, and immediately thought fit to give them Satisfaction. Among all which none seem'd so considerable as King Henry; to whom by a Letter dated August the second he made a kind of Apology for these Proceedings, declaring also the Causes why his Army could not be with-held from invading Rome; yet so as he disclaim'd any Part, either the counselling or authorising the Fact: He forgot not also, upon the Instance of the English and French Ambassadors for the Pope's Liberty, to write obligingly to his Holiness, offering his Love and Friendship, in case he desir'd it; but to the chief Officers of his Army he sent Instructions, which for some Space amus'd them: For he commanded them to let the Pope at Liberty, Yet so to provide, that from a Friend he should not become an Enemy. This mysterious Message caus'd great Delays in the Pope's Deliverance, and much prolong'd his Misery; which caus'd him to complain to King Henry and the Cardinal, protesting, That all the Help and Succour he could expect in this Extremity, was from England, and therefore he implor'd his Assistance. At the same Time the English Ambassadors in Spain potently mediated for the Deliverance of King Francis's Sons upon more moderate Terms than was formerly propos'd; and in Conclusion so prevail'd, that the Emperor seem'd willing to relinquish his Demand of Burgundy, and to accept of such a Ransom as Francis had once voluntarily offer'd, which was two Millions of Crowns. But all this was again interrupted by the repeated Intelligence of the Pope's Imprisonment, which so rous'd the warm Temper of King Henry, that he would not so much as vouchsafe an Answer to the Emperor's Letter, but resolv'd to join in a stricter League with Francis, concluding that Charles would never have so insolently treated the Head of the Church, if he had not aspir'd to universal Monarchy. Accordingly he enter'd into a new Confederacy with Francis, by which they mutually agreed to desist from their War in the Low-Countries, and to transport it into Italy, with several other Particulars. Upon this, Clarenceaux King of Arms was sent to King Henry's Residenciaries in Spain, who were to declare to the Emperor, That in Regard the King of England was at half the Charge of the War with Francis, the Emperor should send him half the Prize and Booty taken at Pavia, and one of the two Hostages, or else Clarenceaux should denounce War against him. To which rough Message the Emperor return'd a soft and subtle Answer, which shew'd he had no other Design at present but to gain Time.

He begs King Henry's Assistance.

The two Kings of England and France being inform'd of the Emperor's dilatory Proceedings, together with the Pope's Distress, would no longer delay to give Orders for their own, as well as the general Affairs of Christendom. Therefore the Cardinal, as the most proper Person, was order'd to France, both for concluding the Marriage of the Princess Mary, either with Francis or the Duke of Orleans his Son, as also for other Occasions. A more magnificent Embassie than this of the Cardinals was never known, he was attended with all the Pomp and Splendor of a Sovereign Monarch, and a glorious Equipage of a thousand Horse. At Boloign he was met by the Cardinal of Lorrain and the Chancellor of Alanzon with the like Number of Horse, who accompany'd him in his Way to Monstreuil, and afterwards to Abbeville, where he continu'd in great State for some Days. Shortly after the French King, with Madam Lovise his Mother, coming to Amiens, the Cardinal with all his splendid Train set forwards from Abbeville; of which Notice being given, King Francis being Royally attended, met him a Mile and a half from the Town; and the Cardinal was so exact in the honourable Circumstances of Address, that he would not yield to the French Monarch one Step in his Approaches. Being met with mutual Embraces, Francis, after a most obliging Acknowledgment That he owed his Liberty chiefly to the King of England, conducted him to his Lodgings. During many Ceremonies, Entertainments, and Visits, three Treaties were concluded, and concluded on the eighteenth Day of August; by the First of which the Princess Mary was to marry to the French King's second Son the Duke of Orleans, but the Time not exactly appointed. The Second related chiefly to any any Treaty that might be made between either of the two Kings and the Emperor. By the Third it was agreed that no Act, Sentence, Bull, Letter or Breve proceeding from the Pope, during his Captivity, and tending to the Damage of the two Kings, or the Legantine Power of the Cardinal, should be obey'd, or have any Force. And the Power these two Princes assum'd began the Taste that King Henry took of governing the Clergy in chief; of which, as well as the Dissolution of Monasteries, the first Arguments and Impressions were deriv'd from the Cardinal; who having now in a Conference with some Cardinals at Compeign, resolv'd that such a Power for the Government of the Church was in these Times necessary, took on him the Charge of the Ecclesiastical Affairs in England, under the Title of Vicar General. On the sixteenth of September the Cardinal prepar'd to return; whereupon Francis not only richly presented him, but conducted him through the Town, and a Mile beyond, accompany'd with the King of Navarre, the Pope's Legate, and the chief Nobility. The Cardinal now hastning homewards, came to Calais, where having establish'd a Mart, he arriv'd at the English Court in the End of September, where he was receiv'd by the King with great Demonstrations of Affection. To correspond with this Embassie, the French King sent De Montmorency Grand Maistre, and several Noblemen and others, to ratifie the League in England; who, to the Number of six hundred Horse, were conducted to London, and lodg'd in the Bishop's Palace. They were first entertain'd by the Cardinal at Hampton-Court, with an unexpected Magnificence, and shortly after by the King at Greenwich with a Feast surpassing all Imagination, and then with a Comedy, in which his Daughter the Princess had a particular Part. On this Day also the King of England receiv'd at the Hands of Montmorency, the Order of St. Michael; and the King of France, with no less Solemnity, that of the Garter in Paris. Both Princes likewise gave their Oath and Seal of Gold for the Ratification of the late Treaty.

The Emperor's
Designs.

The Emperor not being ignorant of these Treaties, thought fit to prevent the Execution of them, by a timely Compliance with all that could in reason be expected from him. Therefore on the fifteenth of September he offer'd to the French and English Ambassadors residing at his Court, That the Article for the Restitution of Burgundy should be ras'd out of the Treaty of Madrid; That Francis should pay for the Ransom of his Sons, the two Millions of Crowns that were offer'd; and out of them so much should be allow'd, as would pay the King of England. When these and some other Particulars were approv'd on both Sides, the French Ambassadors alledg'd that they wanted sufficient Authority from their King to sign them, which they promis'd to procure; so that the Conclusion of Peace was at this Time deferr'd on their Parts. The Emperor not much dissatisfy'd, return'd to his former Arts of dividing the two Kings; therefore he sent privately to the Cardinal, offering him large Sums for that Purpose, besides his ordinary Pension, which was twenty four thousand Crowns per Annum. Notwithstanding which, because he had prevented him in the Papacy, and deny'd him the Archbishoprick of Toledo, when both had been promis'd to him, he was found inexorable. Therefore on the twelfth of December the English Ambassadors made particular Demands to the Emperor at Bruges; That he would immediately pay to their Master what Mony had been lent him in the Time of Exigency, and pay a Penalty of five hundred thousand Ducats, for not marrying the Princess Mary according to Agreement; as likewise that he would deliver the Pope, and make full Satisfaction for the Damage he had sustain'd. To these the Emperor gave evasive Answers, except to that concerning the Pope, to which he said Orders were given for his Deliverance. This last prov'd true, for the Emperor having brought the Pope to new Terms, order'd him to be set at Liberty; but the Pope prevented them by making his Escape in the Habit of a Merchant, the Night berty.

Night before they promis'd to deliver him. His Hostages yet remain'd 'till the Sum agreed on was paid, towards raising of which, he was forc'd to make several Cardinals for Mony, and granted Licences in the Kingdom of Naples, and other Places for alienating of Ecclesiastical Goods and Possessions; giving therein a Beginning, as some observe, to that Liberty, which was afterwards taken in divers Places. The Pope being at Liberty he gave Notice of it to King Henry and Cardinal Wolsey, acknowledging them great Instruments in the happy Change, and desiring the King to continue his Protection to the See of Rome. Upon which the Cardinal repair'd in solemn Triumph to the Cathedral of St. Paul's, and caus'd Te Deum to be sung, and Bonfires and other Rejoycings to be made.

In the following Year the two Kings proceeded more openly, and sent their several Heralds to the Emperor, Clarenceaux from the King of England and Guyenne from the King of France, to expostulate their Grievances, and upon his refusing to redress them, to defie him as their open Enemy. The Emperor heard the Heralds with great Temper, and answer'd Clarenceaux very mildly, That he knew his Master's Grievances were grounded upon Misinformations, in which he would shortly rectifie him by his Letters, as desiring nothing more than to continue his Friend: But he answer'd Guyenne very roughly, bidding him tell his Master, That he had broken his Faith, in not performing the Covenants agreed upon for his Liberty: And with these Answers he dismiss'd them; only Guyenne thinking it not proper to deliver his Answer by Word of Mouth in such Terms, obtain'd to have it sent in Writing. The Heralds return'd home, and delivering their Answers, the French King was so incens'd, that soon after he sent another Defiance to the Emperor, declaring in plain Terms That he ly'd in his Throat; and thereupon challeng'd him to a single Combate, requiring him to appoint the Field, and he would appoint the Weapons. The Emperor accepted the Challenge, but other Occurrences intervening hinder'd the Performance. In the mean Time the Emperor, being unwilling to make a Breach with England, sent a particular Embassie to King Henry, declaring, That he had been so much oblig'd to him, that he could not take the Defiance given by his Herald, as a full Denunciation of War, 'till he had heard further of his Pleasure. To this King Henry reply'd in these Terms, Tho' we highly respect your Master, yet we cannot suffer him to destroy the Realm of France, which is our true Inheritance, and for which our Brother and Allie the French King, pays us yearly a great Pension and Tribute; wherefore, out of Justice and Equity, we are oblig'd to maintain that Land, that yields us such a considerable Rent and Profit.

The Kings of France and England send Defiances to the Emperor.

Thus stood the Affairs of Europe in this memorable Year 1528: The Emperor at Variance with the French King, and formidable to the Pope and the States of Italy: The King of France joining with the King of England, and both favouring the Pope: The King of England an Arbiter of Christendom, whose Friendship was courted, and his Power dreaded by all of them, and who in a special Manner had oblig'd both the French King and present Pope. A five Years Truce was made with Scotland; Ireland was quieted by the Return of the Earl of Kildare; and England in Peace, but only uneasy under some Managements of the Cardinal, and a little disturb'd by the Progress of Lutheranism. As to the King himself, he had been so great an Enemy to that Doctrine, so faithful a Friend to the Roman Church, and so strong a Support to the Papacy, that if he had dy'd before this nineteenth Year of his Reign, he could scarce have miss'd of being Canoniz'd, notwithstanding all his Faults; for he abounded in those Virtues, which had given Saintship to Kings for near a thousand Years together, and had done more than any of them, by writing in Defence of the Roman Faith.

The State of Europe.

Reg. 10.

VI. The great King Henry had for nineteen Years liv'd in all Splendor and Prosperity, and had enjoy'd all the Pleasure and Glory of a mighty Monarch, who commanded both at home and abroad. His Wars were made with Honour and Reputation, and his Treaties were just and advantageous; and he had no Inquietudes in all his Affairs, but in his Endeavours to raise Money, in which the Cardinal always eas'd and reliev'd him. But at this Time a Domestick Trouble arose, which robb'd him of his former Ease, perplex'd all the rest of his Government, and drew surprizing Consequences after it of the highest Nature. By Virtue of a Bull and Dispensation from Pope Julius the Second, in the Year 1503, King Henry in his Youth had been contracted to his Brother Arthur's Widow; and by Virtue of the same Dispensation, and his Father's Means he marry'd her when he came to the Crown, by the Advice and Consent of his Council, tho' contrary to the last Thoughts of his Father, and the Opinion of some very considerable for Judgment and Learning. For many Years he enjoy'd this virtuous Queen, without any Scruple of the Validity of the Match, or outward Mark of Unkindness between them; she having born him two Sons, who dy'd in their Infancy, and one Daughter, the Princess Mary, now about twelve Years of Age. This Daughter having been offer'd to several crown'd Heads, as has been formerly related, many Doubts began to arise concerning her Legitimacy and Right to the Crown, and the Validity of the King's own Marriage with his Brother's Widow. Now as other Princes had mov'd Scruples against a Marriage with this Princess, the Heir of so great a Crown, so especially the King began to make some himself, or rather to publish those he declar'd he had some Years before. The King insist'd upon all the Arguments of Conscience, and seem'd to lay the greatest Weight on the Prohibition in the Levitical Law of marrying his Brother's Wife; and he being conversant in the Writings of the School-Men, found that they esteem'd these Laws as Moral and for ever binding, and that by Consequence the Pope's Dispensation was of no Force, since his Authority did not extend so far as to dispence with the Laws of God. This caus'd him to reflect upon the Death of his Sons, which he now look'd on as a Judgment from Heaven for that unlawful Marriage; so that he was very desirous to have the Advice and Opinion of the chief Divines in the Nation. All the Bishops of England, except Fisher of Rocheſter, declar'd by a Writing under their Hands and Seals, that they judg'd the Marriage unlawful. And as the Point of Conscience wrought on his Mind, so the Interest of the Kingdom requir'd that there ought to be no Scruples concerning the Succession to the Crown; lest as the bloody War between the Houses of Lancaster and York had been bury'd with his Father, so a new one should arise at his Death.

The King's
Marriage ques-tion'd by Foreigners, and scrupled by himself and his Bishops.

Affairs standing thus, no Probability of the Queen's Fruitfulness appearing, and she having contracted some Diseases that made her unacceptable to the King, he resolv'd to have Recourse to the Court of Rome; comforting himself, that there was no other Difficulty in removing all these Inconveniences, than the obtaining a Dispensation to dissolve that Marriage, which only a Dispensation had first made. He knew that the same Key that had lock'd, could unlock again; and he had reason to expect a quick and favourable Dispatch of his Business at Rome, where Dispensations or Divorces in Favour of Princes usually pass, more with regard to the Merits of the Prince that desires them, than the Cause it self. His Alliance seem'd then necessary to the Pope, who was at that Time in Captivity; nor could the Emperor with any good Pretence oppose his Suit, since he had broken his Contract with his Daughter upon the Account of the Doubtfulness of the Marriage. The Cardinal had also given him full Assurances of a satisfactory Answer from Rome; whether upon the Knowledge he had of that Court, and of the Pope's Temper, or upon any Promise made him, is not certain. But that the Suit might not be shocking and reflecting upon the Authority of the papal Chair, the Reasons to be alledg'd for the annulling the former Bull of Dispensation, upon which the Diverce was to follow in Course, were grounded upon some false Suggestions in the Bull it self, and upon the Protestation the King had made when he came to be of Age. In reality they were so material, that a favourable Pope, left wholly to himself, would have yielded to them without any Scruple. About this Time the King began to shew some Favours to Mrs. Anne Bolen, a Lady at Court, which caus'd many to believe that all this Process was mov'd by the unseen Spring of that secret Affection. But it is not probable that the Ingagement of the King's Affections to any other gave the Rise to all this; for so prying a Courtier as Wolsey was, would have discover'd it, and not have projected a Marriage with the French King's Sister, as he did not long before, if he had seen the King prepossess'd: It is more probable the King conceiving himself in a manner discharged of his former Marriage, gave a free Liberty to his Affections, which soon began to settle upon Mrs. Bolen. This memorable Woman was Niece to the then Duke of Norfolk by her Mother, and related to several good Families, and was for some Years educated in the French Court, where she was much admir'd, and no less in that of England, after her Return. She continu'd to live without any Blemish, 'till her unfortunate Fall gave Occasion to some malicious Writers to defame her in all the Parts of her Life: She wanted no Charms relating to Wit or Person; tho' she was more beautiful than graceful, and more pleasant and witty, than nicely discreet. Upon her coming to the English Court, the Lord Piercy, being then a Domestick of the Cardinal's, bore Love to her, and proceeded so far as to engage himself to marry her; and her Consent shews she had then no Aspirings to the Crown. But the Cardinal, upon some private Reasons, using Threats and other Methods, with great Difficulty put an End to the Design; for which it is said the Lady ever after hated the Cardinal.

and inclines to Anne Bolen.

But to return to the famous Process, Doctor Knight, then Secretary of State, was sent to Rome to prepare his Holiness in this important Affair; and the Family of the Cassali having much of the Pope's Favour, they were likewise employ'd to promote it. The Cardinal sent a large Dispatch to Sir Gregory Cassali, setting forth all the Reasons both in Conscience and Policy, for obtaining a Commission to himself to judge the Affair. Great Promises were made in the King's Name, both for publick and private Services, and nothing was omitted that might probably influence the Pope, or those Cardinals who had greatest Credit and Interest with him. Secretary Knight made Application to the Pope, after the most private Manner, and met with a very favourable Answer; for the Pope readily promis'd to dissolve the Marriage: But a contrary Promise being extorted of him in the Emperor's Name, not to proceed in this Affair, he was reduc'd to exceeding Difficulties, not so much in respect of his Promises, which were impossible to keep on both Sides, as to his Interests. He was then in Captivity, and at the Mercy of the Emperor, whom he hated and distrust'd, and at the same Time was infinitely desirous to serve the King of England; therefore he projected to gain Time, and begg'd That if the King would respite the Matter for a little Space, he should not only have the Dispensation, but every Thing that was in his Power to grant. At the same Time the Cardinal Sanctorum Quatuor made some Scruples concerning the Bull that was demanded, so he rais'd his Price, and got a large Present; and then the Pope actually sign'd both a Commission for Wolsey to try the Cause, and judge in it, and also a Dispensation, and deliver'd them into Secretary Knight's Hands; but with Tears begg'd of him That there might be no Proceedings upon them, 'till the Emperor was put out of Capacity of executing his Revenge upon him, and then he was ready to own this Act of Justice which he did in the King's Favour. And being a very subtle Man, he propos'd an Expedient, which if follow'd by the King, it might have put a quicker and easier End to the Process: He found, that his sending Bulls, or a Legate to England would become publick, draw the Emperor upon him, and admit of dangerous Delays; therefore he propos'd, If the King was satisfy'd in his own Conscience, in which he believ'd no Doctor could resolve him better than himself, then he might without further Noise cause Judgment to be given in England; and upon that marry another Wife, and send over to Rome for a Confirmation; which would be very easily granted, if the Matter was actually done. But still the Pope desir'd that this might be represented to the King as the Advice of the Cardinals, and not as his own. But the King's Counsellors thought this more hazardous than the Way of a Process; for if upon the King's second Marriage, a Confirmation should be deny'd, then the Right of Succession would be still more dubious; therefore they utterly declin'd it.

The Pope was at this Time disgusted with Cardinal Wolsey; for he understood, that during his Captivity, he had been forming a Design to make himself Vicar of the Papacy, and was to have sat at Avignon, which might have produc'd a new Schism. Staphileus, Dean of the Rota, being then in England, was prevail'd upon by the Promise of a Bishoprick, and the Hopes of a Cardinal's Hat, to promote the King's Affair; and by him the Cardinal wrote to the Pope, after the most pressing Manner, for a Dispatch of this Business; and desir'd, That an indifferent and tractable Cardinal might be sent over, with a full Commission to join with him and judge the Matter; proposing Cardinal Campegio to the King's Ambassadors, as the fittest Man; and when a Legate should be nam'd, he order Presents to be made to him, and that they should hasten his Dispatch, and see that the Commission be full. But upon the Arrival of the Couriers from Rome, Gardiner the Cardinal's Secretary, and Fox the King's Almoner, the one a Canonist, and the other a Divine, were sent thither with Letters, both from the King and Cardinal to the Pope; and they carry'd Orders, most like to succeed, which was to make large Presents to the Cardinals. They also carry'd with them the Draught of a Bull, containing all the saving Clauses that could be invented, that it might not fail of Acceptance; one Clause was to declare the Issue of the Marriage good, as being begot bona fide; which probably was inserted to make the Queen more easie, since by that it appear'd, that however it was determin'd, her Daughter would be no Sufferer. The Cardinal in his Letters to Cassali shew'd the Height of his Zeal, and offer'd to take the Blame on his own Soul if his Holiness would but grant this Bull; and with Earnestness as hearty and warm as Words can express, he urg'd the Matter, and added, That he perceiv'd, that if the Pope continu'd inexorable, the King of England would proceed another Way.

These Sollicitations had such Effects, That Cardinal Campegio was declar'd Legate, and order'd to go for England, and join in Commission with Wolsey, for judging this nice Cause. This Cardinal was Bishop of Salisbury, and a tractable Man, as was desired; yet to raise his Price the higher, he mov'd many Scruples, and seem'd to enter upon this Employment with great Fear and Aversion. Wolsey, who knew his Temper, vehemently urg'd him to use Expedition, assuring him of great Rewards from the King; to which he kept so close, that in a Letter he wrote to him, among other Motives to persuade him, that of a good Conscience being put in the first Draught, the Cardinal struck it out as knowing how little it would signifie to Men of his Temper. At length Campegio set out from Rome, and carry'd with him a positive Decretal Bull for annulling the King's Marriage, which was trusted to him, and he was authoriz'd to shew it to the King and Wolsey; but was strictly commanded not to give it out of his Hands to either of them. At this Time Wolsey was seiz'd with the Sweating-Sickness, which then rag'd in England; and by a Compliment which both the King and Mrs. Bolen wrote to him on the same Paper, it appears, he was then privy to the King's Design of marrying her, and design'd to advance himself still higher, by his Merits in procuring her the Crown. This Year also he establish'd his two great Colleges; and finding both the King and People much pleas'd with his converting some Monasteries to such Uses, he design'd to suppress more, and to change them to Bishopricks and Cathedral Churches, which because the Pope was unwilling to grant, by reason of some Oppositions, Gardiner told him, It was necessary, and must be done; therefore a Power for so doing was added to the Legate's Commission.

While Affairs pass'd thus between Rome and England, the Queen labour'd with all those Passions which Jealousie of the King's Affection, Sense of her own Honour, and the Legitimation of her Daughter could produce, and vigorously apply'd her self to her two Nephews, the Emperor and his Brother, to espouse her Cause; complaining much of the King, and more of the Cardinal. The Emperor undertook the Cause more willingly, because the King was then in the Interest of France; and to help forwards this Business, a certain Breve was now found out, or more probably forg'd, of the same Date with the Bull that dispens'd with her Marriage in the Year 1503: But with stronger Clauses in it, to answer those Objections that were made against some Defects in the Bull; tho' it could not seem probable, that in the same Day, a Bull and a Breve should be granted for the same Things in such different Terms. The most considerable Variation was, That whereas the Bull did only suppose that the Queen's Marriage with Prince Arthur was Perhaps carnally consummated; this Breve did suppose it absolutely, without the Word Perhaps. This was thought a Prejudice to the Queen's Cause, as much as the Suspicion of Forgery was a Blemish to her Agents.

In October Cardinal Campegio arriv'd in England, where he was receiv'd with great Solemnity; and in his Speech at his first Audience, he declar'd the King, The Deliverer of the Pope, and the City of Rome. After the first Compliments were over, he privately advis'd the King to desist from the Prosecution of his Suit; and then counsell'd the Queen in the Pope's Name to make her Vows, and enter into a Religious Life, but both were ineffectual; and he by affecting a nice Impartiality, almost lost both Sides. But he in a great Measure pacify'd the King when he show'd him the Decretal Bull he had brought over for annulling the Marriage; but he would not part with it out of his Hands, nor leave it for one Minute either with the King or the Cardinal, declaring, That upon these Terms it was granted, and that he brought it to let the King see how well his Holiness was affected to him. Upon this great Instances were made at Rome, that Campegio might be order'd to show the Bull to some of the King's Counsellors, and proceed to the Determination of the Business, otherwise Wolsey would be ruin'd, and England lost from the Papacy. Yet all this did not prevail in the crafty Pope, who knew what was intended by getting the Bull out of Campegio's Hands, that then the King would leave him to the Mercy of the Emperor; therefore he said, That he would gladly lose a Finger to recover the Bull: Yet still he left the Legates in England free to judge as they saw Cause, and promis'd that he would confirm their Sentence. Upon this Sir Francis Brian and Peter Vannes were dispatch'd to Rome with new Propositions, to offer this Expedient. If both King and Queen took Religious Vows, so that their Marriage was upon that annull'd, whether the Pope would engage to dispense with the King's Vow, or else grant him a Licence for having two Wives: For which there were divers Precedents vouch'd from the Old Testament. Wolsey also offer'd in the King's Name, to settle a Pay for two thousand Men, that should be a Guard to the Pope, and to procure a Restitution of some of his Towns, seiz'd by the Venetians. But the Pope had no Inclination to have his Guards paid by other Princes, which was in Effect to be their Prisoner; and he dreaded every Thing that might bring new Calamities upon him. Therefore he now resolv'd to unite himself firmly with the Emperor, by whose Means only he hop'd to re-establish his Family at Florence; and from this Time forwards, all the Use he made of

The Pope's Policy and Knavery.

King

King Henry's Earnestness in his Divorce, was only to draw in the Emperor on better Terms to his Interest. The Emperor was also at that Time pressing him hard for a general Council; which, besides the general Aversion of the Court of Rome, he had great Reason to fear; for being himself a spurious Issue, he was threaten'd with Deprivation, as incapable of holding his Dignity. Thus pass'd the first Year of this memorable Process, in which it was believ'd that if the King had employ'd that Money, unnecessarily spent at Rome, on a War in Flanders, it had so disturb'd the Emperor, and encourag'd the Pope, that he had sooner granted that, which in a more fruitless Way was sought of him.

A. D. 1529. Reg. 20. Campana sent to deceive the King. The Imperialists at Rome all the Time press'd hard to have the Legates in England inhibited, and the Cause to be recall'd and heard before the Consistory; but the Pope dislik'd that Motion as dangerous: But his constant Maxim being to promise and swear deepest, when he intended least, to mollify King Henry, he sent over Campana, one of his Bed-Chamber, into England, with Compliments too high to gain much Credit. He assur'd the King, That his Holiness would serve him in every Respect, not only in Justice and Equity, but in the Plenitude of his Power; and tho' he had reason to be apprehensive of the Emperor's Resentments, yet that should never divert his Zeal for the King's Interest, in which he would not be wanting, tho' it were with the Resignation of the Popedom it self. He was also order'd to require the Legates to put a speedy Period to the Business; but his secret Instructions to Campegio were of a contrary Strain; he charg'd him to burn the Decretal Bull, and to protract the Matter by all the dilatory Methods he could invent. Yet still the Pope continu'd his Compliments to those the King sent over, and gave new Assurances. That tho' he did not grant a Bull, by which the Divorce should be immediately his own Act, yet still he was ready to confirm the Legate's Sentence. But at the same Time the Pope propos'd a Journey incognito into Spain, and desired Cardinal Wolsey to go with him, in order to obtain a general Peace for Christendom. Tho' in secret he was then making Offer of Compliance with the Emperor, and gave his Agents Assurances, That tho' the Legates gave Sentence, he would not confirm it. Upon which the King's Correspondents at Rome, wrote to him to push on the War more vigorously against the Emperor, for nothing was to be expected at that Court, unless the Emperor's Affairs declin'd.

The Pope sick. But an unexpected Accident put some Stop to all Proceedings in the Court of Rome: For the Pope was taken suddenly ill, and fell into a dangerous Sickneſs; upon which the Imperialists began to prepare for a Conclave; but Jarneze, and the Cardinal of Mantua oppos'd their Designs, and shew'd a great Inclination for Wolsey, whom they reverenc'd as a Deity, as his Correspondents wrote to him. Upon this he sent a Courier to Gardiner, then in his Journey to Rome, with large Directions how to manage the Election; in which it was concluded, That the King of France, joining heartily with the King of England, of which he was confident, there were only six Cardinals wanting to make the Election sure; and besides Sums of Money and other Rewards, he was to give them Assurance, that the Cardinal's Preferments should be divided among them. These were the secret Methods of attaining that Chair, that was believ'd to be attended with Infalibility. But the Pope's Recovery put an End to these dark Intrigues; which yet were soon after reviv'd by a long and threatening Relapse. Then new Labours were undertaken to gain many Cardinals to favour King Henry's Cause; and many Precedents of Divorces were produc'd, that had been granted in Favour of Princes, upon much slighter Grounds. But the Imperialists were so powerful at Rome, that they could not hope for Success, without the Emperor was first gain'd; upon which a secret Negotiation was set on Foot with him, but it had no other Effect, than to give great Jealousie both to the Pope and French King. Another Dispatch wa sent to Rome, to procure a Commission with fuller Power to the Legates, and a Pollicitation under the Pope's Hand to confirm the Sentence: The latter was granted, but the former utterly refus'd; for the Pope was resolv'd to proceed no further in that Matter, tho' Wolsey wrote to Rome, That if any Justice were deny'd the King, not only England, but likewise France would withdraw their Obedience from the Apostolick See; because by that it would be infer'd, that the Emperor had such Influence at Rome, as to oblige the Pope to be partial or favourable as he pleas'd. At this Time the Cardinal was bargaining for his Bulls for the Bishoprick of Winchester, which were rated at fifteen thousand Ducats; but since it was a Translation from Durham, so that a new Composition would arise for that Vacancy, he refus'd to pay above a third of what was demanded.

He is guided by the Emperor's Interest.

As the Pope recover'd his Health, so he inclin'd more to join with the Emperor, who now by his Ambassador at Rome, enter'd a Protestation in the Queen of England's Name against the Legates, as unreasonably partial in King Henry's Favour, which was receiv'd by the Pope, tho' much oppos'd by the English Ambassador. Upon this, Gardiner, who was a Man of great Subtlety and Penetration, wrote to King Henry, assuring him, That he was to expect nothing more from the Pope, who was resolv'd to offend neither the Emperor nor him; therefore he advis'd him to procure the Legates to give Sentence with all possible Expedition; and when it should come to the Emperor's Turn to sollicite for Bulls against the King, the Pope would be as backward as he was now. All this he desir'd might not be shewn to the Cardinal; for he was now making his own Fortunes, and had at the same Time a private Correspondence with Mrs. Bolen, whom he expected would in Time be Queen. In the Pollicitation which the Pope sign'd to confirm the Legate's Sentence, some Clauses were incerted, by which he could easily break loose from it; therefore Gardiner endeavour'd to procure another in fuller Terms, by this Artifice: He told the Pope, That the Courier had met with an Accident in passing a River, by which the Instrument was so defac'd with the Water, that it could not be of any Use. But the Pope was such a Master in the Arts of Dissimulation and Policy, that instead of being catch'd with this, and to grant a new one, he was heartily glad it was defac'd, and positively refus'd to renew it. And a long and earnest Letter wrote from the Legates to the Pope, urging him to end the Matter by a Decretal Bull, assuring him, It was only a Scruple of Conscience that wrought on the King, and no Desire of a new Wife, and that the whole Nation was much offended at the Delays of this Matter, in which all were so nearly concern'd, prevail'd nothing on him; for he consider'd it was only done by them in Compliance with the King, who thought he had entirely gain'd Campegio, since the Scandals of his Life were so publick, that the Motives of Interest must certainly have the Ascendant over him. But by all the Arts that could be invented, they were not able to over-reach the Pope, who whatever he might be in his Decisions, seem'd infallible in his Sagacity and Jealousie. The Queen's Agents still press'd hard for an Avocation; but the Pope was unwilling to grant that, till he had finish'd his Treaty in all other Points with the Emperor, and he began to complain much of the cold Proceedings of the Confederates, and That they expos'd him both to the Emperor's Mercy, and the Scorn of the Florentines; by which it was visible, he was seeking Pretensions for throwing himself into the Emperor's Arms. Great Objections were made to the Motion for an Avocation, That it was contrary to the King's Prerogative to be cited at Rome; wherefore he would seek Justice from the Clergy of England, if deny'd by the Pope: It was also contrary to the Pollicitation under the Pope's Hand, to recall the Legate's Commission, and his Faith often deliver'd by Word of Mouth, chiefly of late by Campana. But verbal Promises did not much bind the Pope, they vanish'd into Air, and Campana swore he had made none; and for the written Pollicitation,

citation, there was a saving Clause in it, by which he could escape; so that he was at Liberty from all Engagements, but those he had privately given in Discourse, and to these he was no Slave.

King Henry being well inform'd of what pass'd at Rome, recall'd Gardiner and Bryan, and sent Doctor Bennet to Rome to hinder the Avocation of the Cause, of which he was so apprehensive, that he not only intercepted those Dispatches sent to Rome from Campegio, or any else, but also those Intelligences which the Queen should give to her Aunt Margaret of the Low-Countries. So that now the King finding his Conscience unsatisfy'd, his Nobility in Suspence, and the People murmuring at these Delays in an Affair of the greatest Importance, he charg'd the two Cardinals to proceed with all Expedition. The Place appointed for hearing and determining the Cause, was the great Hall in Black-Fryars, the Time the thirty first of May; when both the Cardinals appear'd in great Pomp; so that Wolfsey might be said to be now in the Height of his Grandeur, when he sat Judge of his own Sovereign's Cause, upon which no less than the Succession of the Kingdom depended. The Court being sat, a peremptory Citation was issu'd out for the King and Queen, to appear on the eighteenth of June; upon which Day the Queen appear'd in Person, and protested against the Cardinals as incompetent Judges. Endeavours were therefore us'd to terrifie her into some Compliance, and a formal Complaint was made against her, 'That she favour'd some who design'd to destroy the King and Cardinal; That she carry'd her self very disobligingly to the King, and us'd many indecent Arts to render her self popular; That the King was in Danger of his Life by her Means, and therefore he could no longer keep her Company, either as to Bed or Table: But she was a Woman of such Resolution and Constancy, that no Threatnings could intimidate her. At the next Court Day, both the King and Queen appear'd; but the latter instead of answering to the Legates, kneel'd down before the King, and made a Speech that had all the Intinuations to raise Commiseration in the Audience. She declar'd She had been his dutiful Wife for twenty Years, had born him several Children, and had always study'd to oblige him; therefore she beg'd to know where was her Offence. She insisted upon her Virginity when she came to his Bed, alledging, That the Marriage was made by both their Parents, who were wise Princes, and had good Counsellors when it was made; but at present she being a Stranger and a Subject, had neither indifferent Judges to hear, nor indifferent Lawyers to plead her Cause; therefore she could expect no Justice in that Court. Upon which she went out of the Court, and would never after appear in that Place. At her Departure, the King gave her a great Character for her extraordinary Qualities, and protested, He was acted by no other Principle, than that of Conscience, and clear'd Cardinal Wolfsey from being the first Mover in this Suit; declaring, That he first mention'd the Matter in Confession to the Bishop of Lincoln, and had desir'd the Arch-Bishop of Canterbury to procure him the Resolution of the Bishops of England in this Case; and that they had under their Hands declar'd, That his Marriage was unlawful. The Bishop of Rochester deny'd he had sign'd such a Paper; but the Arch-Bishop alleg'd, That he gave him leave to make another write his Name to it, which the other still deny'd. The Legates however, proceeded according to the Forms of Law; but the Queen instead of appearing, appeal'd from them to the Pope, and excepted both against the Place, the Judges, and her Lawyers. Yet still they pronounc'd her contumacious, and proceeded to the Examination of Witnesses for several Days, the Substance of which Allegations were, That there were many violent Presumptions appear'd, That Prince Arthur had Carnal Knowledge of the Queen; and it could not be expected that greater Proofs could be made twenty seven Years after their Marriage.

And now since the Process was thus carry'd on, the Emperor's Agents vehemently press'd the Pope for an Avocation, to remove it to Rome; and all possible Endeavours were us'd by King Henry's Agents to prevent it; they omitted omitted nothing that could operate upon the Pope's Temper, either by Way of Persuasion or Threatning. It was represented to him, That there was a Treaty on foot between the King of England and the Lutheran Princes of Germany; and that upon his Holiness declaring himself so partial, as to grant the Avocation, he would certainly embark in the same Interests with them, and so England would be lost from the Apostolick See. But as the Pope concluded the King was so far engag'd in Honour, that he could not be induc'd to unite with Luther's Followers in Points of Religion; so he did not imagine, that the Effects of his Avocation would be so dismal and fatal as the Cardinal's Creature had represented them, or as he himself afterwards found them. He thought it would probably ruin the King's Affairs, which might occasion his Agents to use such Threatnings; but he did not much regard that, because he hated him in his Heart. In Conclusion, after the Emperor had engag'd to restore his Family to the Government of Florence, he resolv'd to publish his Treaty with him: But that the granting the Avocation might not look like a secret Article, as it was in reality, he resolv'd to begin with that; and with the profoundest Marks of Sorrow, he declar'd to the English Ambassadors, That he could not avoid it, both because all the Lawyers had assur'd him, It could not in common Justice be deny'd, and because he could not resist the Emperor's Forces, which surrounded him on all Sides. Their Endeavours to gain some Time by Delays, were also as fruitless as their other Arts had been; for on the fifteenth of July the Pope sign'd it, publish'd the Treaty on the eighteenth, and sent the Instrument of Avocation on the nineteenth by an express Messenger to England.

Who grants an Avocation, and joins with the Emperor.

During this Management at Rome, the Legates, especially Campegio who was the Senior, protracted the Matter by all the Delays that could be invented, and gain'd much Time under the Pretence of not precipitating the King's Affairs. At last, being reduc'd to a sort of Necessity of pronouncing Sentence, instead of proceeding to that, Campegio unexpectedly adjourn'd the Court till October, declaring, That they being a Part of the Consistory of Rome, were oblig'd to observe their Times of Vacation. The King who was in the next Chamber, was unexpressibly surpriz'd, and the Duke of Suffolk, then in Court in a Rage swore by the Mass, That no Cardinal ever did good in England. To whom Wolsey severely reply'd, If I poor Cardinal had not been here, you would not have kept your Head upon your Shoulders. This was one of the last Flights of the mighty States-Man, whose Grandeur being at the Height, was now ready to sink: Campegio had nothing to lose in England, but the Bishoprick of Salisbury, for which the Pope or Emperor could easily recompence him; but Wolsey began to be under all the Terrors that are incident to an exorbitant Favourite, upon the Change of his Fortune; none being more abject in Misfortune than those who are most elevated with Prosperity. When the Avocation was brought into England, the King submitted so far as to allow the Legates to declare the Commission void; but would by no means suffer the Letters citatory to be serv'd, for he look'd upon it as below the Dignity of his Crown, to be cited to appear at any other Court in Christendom. This was the first Step he made towards the Diminution of the Pope's Authority. Yet upon this Occasion he govern'd himself with more Mildness than was expected from the warmth of his Temper; he civilly dismiss'd Campegio, only his Officers strictly search'd his Coffers, when he took Shipping, with a Design as it was thought, to see if the decretal Bull could be found. Wolsey was now upon the Point of being disgrac'd, tho' the King seem'd to treat him with the same Confidence he had usually shewn to him; it being common for many Princes to hide their Designs of discarding their Favourites, with higher Expressions of Kindness than ordinary, 'till their Ruin, being unforeseen, breaks out with great Violence. Mrs. Bolen, who in the Time of the Process had been dismiss'd the Court, was now return'd; and the King's Thoughts for a while were divided by many Doubts and Perplexities. He had the more Reason to be circum-

cumspet in his Affairs, because the Pope and Emperor were now united in the former Alliance: The Pope's Nephew, who had been lately marry'd to the Emperor's Daughter, was now Duke of Florence. And the Emperor went afterwards in Person, and was crown'd with great Magnificence by the Pope; who when the Emperor was kneeling down to kiss his Foot, humbled himself so far as to draw it back, and kiss his Cheek. In this Year also another Peace was concluded at Cambray between the Emperor, the French King, and the Lady Margaret of Flanders, call'd the Womens Peace; where King Henry first found the Deceitfulness of the French Alliance; for he was not so consider'd in the Treaty as he expected, and he found that Francis would not embroil his own Affairs in favour of his Divorce.

The Treaty of Cambray.

The King wisely judg'd it necessary, to secure himself of the Affections and Confidence of his People, before he venter'd on any Thing that should displease two such Potentates as the Pope and Emperor; therefore he thought fit to call a Parliament, which had been disus'd in England for seven Years, and probably by the Advice of the Cardinal, who before the calling of it fell into a sinking Condition. His too much Obsequiousness to the See of Rome in the last Process, and some inferior Accidents, render'd him obnoxious to the King and his nearest Friends. So that he first commanded him to deliver up the great Seal, which was with great Reluctancy obey'd, and given to Sir Thomas More, who was not only eminent in his own Profession, the Law, but in all Sorts of Learning; being much esteem'd for the Strictness of his Life, and his Contempt of Mony. Shortly after, Hales the Attorney-General put in an Information against the Cardinal in the King's Bench, importing, That notwithstanding the Statute of Richard the Second, against procuring Bulls from Rome upon Pain of Premunire, yet he had procur'd Bulls for his Legantine Power, which he had for many Years executed. To this he pleaded his Ignorance of the Statute, and submitted to the King's Mercy; upon which it was declar'd, That he had forfeited all his Goods and Chattels to the King, and that his Person was liable to be seiz'd. Immediately his rich Palace of York-House, since call'd White-Hall, was seiz'd to the King's Use; together with all that vast Wealth, and Royal Furniture that he had heap'd up together, which was prodigious, and beyond any Thing that had ever been seen in the Kingdom of England. But still the King had no Desire to ruin him intirely, but only to reduce him lower, to see if the Terror of that have any Influence on the Pope; therefore he first granted him his Protection, and then his Pardon, restor'd him to the See of York and Winchester, and gave him back in Mony, Goods and Plate to the Value of above six thousand Pounds. But as he had carry'd his Greatness with most exorbitant Pride, so he was no less meanly abjected with his Misfortunes, and a deep Melancholy overcame his Spirits. The King as he more and more relented, sent him frequent Assurances of his Favour; all which he receiv'd with extravagant Transports of Joy, and he that us'd to join or prefer himself to the King, now fell down on his Knees in the Dirt to a Messenger who brought him a Ring from his Majesty. Yet his Enemies had gone too far, ever to suffer a Man of his Temper and Abilities, to return to Favour. Therefore they found Means to bring in a high Charge of forty four Articles against him in open Parliament. They related chiefly to his Legantine Power, contrary to Law, to his Insolence and Ambition, his lewd Life, and other Things brought to defame his Reputation as well as destroy his Person. These easily pass'd in the House of Lords, where he had but few Friends and many Enemies; but when the Charge was sent down to the House of Commons, it was so manag'd by the Industry of Thomas Cromwell, who had been his Servant, that no Treason could be laid to his Charge, so that the Accusation drop'd.

In this same Parliament, the Commons prepar'd several Bills against some of the Corruptions of the Clergy; one against the Exactions for the Probates of Wills, another for Regulating Mortuaries, and a third against Pluralities of Benefices and Non-residence. The Clergy abhorr'd the Precedent of the Commons, intermeddling in Ecclesiastical Affairs; and Bishop Fisher spoke violently against such Proceedings, declaring, That all flow'd from want of Faith. Upon which the Commons complain'd to the King, for his reproaching their honourable House, while the House of Peers either thought it no Breach of Privilege, or were willing to connive at such a Reflection. But Fisher being hated at Court for his firm Adherence to the Queen's Interest, was put upon his Purgation to explain himself, and the Matter pass'd over, and the Commons proceeded to their Bills; which, tho' strenuously oppos'd by the Clergy, were at length pass'd with the Royal Assent. Besides these, a very peculiar Bill was brought in for the Relief of the King, who in this long Interval of Parliaments had borrow'd several large Sums of his Subjects: Now this Parliament, both to discourage that Way of supplying Kings for the future, and to ruin the Cardinal's Creatures, who had been most ready to lend, as having the greatest Advantages from the Government, did by one Act discharge the King of all those Debts. This occasion'd great Murmurings among the Sufferers; but to qualifie the general Discontent, the King granted a free Pardon to all Offenders; only to terrifie the Pope, and to keep the Clergy in Submission, he excepted such as had incurr'd a Premunire, by acknowledging a Foreign Jurisdiction.

The King had still a particular View to the now submissive Cardinal, and soon found that his Case was not much regarded at Rome: The Emperor hated him for his late Actions, and the Pope was jealous of his vast Aspirings; so that tho' they were not well pleas'd to see a Cardinal so us'd, yet they could behold Wolsey's Downfall without much Concern. This Prelate was fondly desirous to have stay'd at Richmond, which the King had given him in Exchange for Hampton-Court, that he had also built; but that was too near the Court, and his Enemies were resolv'd to remove him further from it. Accordingly he was order'd to repair to his Diocese of York; in which Journey the very Ruins of his State were considerable, for he travell'd with a hundred and sixty Horse in his Train, and seventy two Waggons follow'd him with his Household-Stuff. Having continu'd there a few Months, and perform'd many charitable and popular Acts, he was attach'd for High-Treason by the Earl of Northumberland, and committed to the Custody of the Lieutenant of the Tower, who was order'd to bring him to London. And even then he had gracious Messages from the King, but they gave him no great Relief; for whether he knew himself guilty of some secret Practices with the Pope or Emperor, or whether he could stand no longer under the King's Displeasure and this abject Condition, he was so dispirited, that on his Way to London, he sickn'd at Sheffield in the Earl of Shrewsbury's House, from whence by slow Journies he went as far as Leicester, where he is said to have taken Poison to end his miserable Life. Being near his Departure, among other Things, he spoke this Sentence, worthy to be remember'd by all Favourites, Had I serv'd my God as diligently as I have serv'd my King, he would not have given me over in my grey Hairs; but this is my just Reward. He said further to Sir William Kingston, Lieutenant of the Tower, If ever you be one of the King's Council, beware of what you put into his Head, for you will be never able to put it out again. Thus dy'd this prodigious Man, on the twenty eighth Day of November, who had been the mightiest of all English Subjects, and was the greatest Instance that several Ages had shewn of the Variety and Inconstancy of Human Things, both in his Rise and Fall. By his Temper in both, it appears he was unworthy of his Greatness, which renders his Character more surprising, that he should be able of himself to perform so many Wonders; and it cannot but be accounted a singular Felicity, that during his Administration, all Things succeeded better than afterwards; tho' the Impressions he gave did probably occasion several succeeding Irregularities. Notwithstanding the general Hatred he had rais'd, few ever fell from such a lofty Station, with lesser Crimes objected against him. But as his being so subservient to his Sovereign's criminal Pleasures, was a greater Crime than his own lewd Life, or what was objected against him; so his sacrificing the Duke of Buckingham to his Resentments, was such a Villany as call'd down the Vengeance of Heaven upon him, which rarely suspends its Power, in Case of publick Blood.

The News of the Cardinal's Death being brought to the King, he could not with-hold from expressing a tender Concern, and declaring, That he had rather suffer'd the Loss of twenty thousand Pounds. But now his Thoughts were more possess'd with another rising Favourite, of a finer Spirit, and more real Merit, Doctor Thomas Cranmer, a Fellow of Jesús College in Cambridge, who in the preceding Year, meeting accidentally with Gardiner and Fox at Weltham, and being ask'd to declare his Thoughts concerning the King's Marriage, he propos'd a new and more rational Method: This was, 'That the King should ingage the chief Universities and Divines of Europe, to examine into the Lawfulness of his Marriage; and if they declar'd their Opinions against it, then the Marriage in Course must be pronounc'd void, because the Pope's Dispensation could not derogate from the Laws of God. As this was new, and reasonable in it self, so they propos'd it to the King, who was extreamly affected with it, as a Method that might have sav'd him a vast Expence of Mony and Trouble; and said in a coarse way of speaking, He had been swine by the right Ear. He perceiv'd that this way was more like to be effectual, and would extreamly mortifie the Pope, who had so much deluded him; therefore Doctor Cranmer was sent for to Court, where he so admirably behav'd himself, that the King conceiv'd an high Opinion both of his Learning and Prudence, and of his Probity and Sincerity, which took such a deep Root in his Heart, that no Artifices nor Calumnies were ever able to remove it.

The chief Universities and Divines in Europe declare the King's Marriage null.

This new Method being resolv'd on by the King, he first order'd Doctor Cranmer to write upon the Subject of the Divorce; and then sent to procure the Conclusions of the two Universities of England. Here the King met with greater Obstructions than from the Foreign Universities, by reason that Doctor Cranmer, and Mrs. Bolen, who was now like to be Queen, were thought Favourers of Lutheranism: Yet after a little Space, by a Majority, the Seals of both Universities were obtain'd; and they gave their Opinions, That the Marriage of the Brother's Wife, was contrary both to the Laws of God and Nature. Doctor Crook, a learned Man in the Greek Tongue, was employ'd in Italy, to procure the Resolutions of Divines and Universities there; in which he was so successful, that besides the great Discoveries he made in searching the Manuscripts of the Greek Fathers, concerning their Opinions in this Point, he engag'd several Persons to write for the King's Cause; and also got the Jews to give their Opinions of the Laws in Leviticus, that they were Moral and Obligatory. The State of Venice would not declare themselves, but said they would be Neuters; and it was not easie to persuade the Divines of the Republick to give their Opinions, till a Brief was obtain'd from the Pope, permitting all Divines and Canonists to deliver their Opinions, according to their Consciences; which was not granted but with great Difficulty. For the Pope abhor'd this Way of Proceeding, tho' he could not decently oppose it; yet he said in great Scorn, That no Friar should set Limits to his Authority. Besides many Divines and Canonists, not only whole Houses of Religious Orders, but even the University of Bononia, tho' the Pope's Town, declar'd the Levitical Laws concerning the Degrees of Marriage, were Parts of the Law of Nature, and that the Pope could not dispense with them. The University of Padua determin'd the same, as also that of Ferrara; so that Crook sent over to England an hundred several Books, and Papers, with many Subscriptions, all condemning the King's Marriage as unlawful in it self. At Paris, the famous Sorbon made their Determination with great Solemnity of Masses and Oaths; and after three Weeks impartial Study, they agreed, That the King's Marriage was unlawful, and that the Pope could not dispence with it. At Orleans, Angiers, and Tholouse, and at other Universities in France, they determin'd to the same Purpose.

The King's Cause being favour'd and fortify'd by these, and many other Authorities, he procur'd many Members of Parliament, in a Time of Prorogation, to sign a Letter to the Pope, complaining, 'That notwithstanding the great Merits of their King, the Justice of his Cause, and the Importance of it to the Safety of the Kingdom, yet his Holiness still made new Delays; they therefore earnestly press'd him to dispatch it speedily, otherwise they should be compell'd to seek for other Remedies, tho' they were unwilling to drive Matters to Extremities, 'till it became unavoidable. This Letter was sign'd by the two Arch-Bishops, four Bishops, forty two Peers, twenty two Abbots, and eleven Commoners: To this the Pope wrote an Answer: 'He took notice of the Vehemence of their Stile: He freed himself from the Imputations of Ingratitude and Injustice: He acknowledg'd the King's great Merits, declaring he had done all he could in his Favour. He had granted a Commission, but could not refuse to receive the Queen's Appeal; all the Cardinals had with one Consent judg'd, That an Avocation was necessary. Since then the Delays did not proceed from him, but the King; that he was ready to proceed, and would bring it to as speedy an Issue, as the Importance of it would admit; and for their Threatnings, they were neither agreeable to their Wisdom, nor their Religion. But the King finding the Pope resolv'd to grant nothing, and apprehending that some Bull might be brought into England in favour of the Queen, he set out a Proclamation against any who should purchase or publish any Thing from Rome contrary to his Royal Prerogative, threatening Imprisonment, and other Punishments, which were founded upon the Statute of Provisors and Premunires. After this he caus'd an Abstract of all the Reasons and Authorities of the Fathers, or Modern Writers, against his Marriage, to be publish'd both in Latin and English; by which it appear'd, That according to the Authority given to Tradition in the Church of Rome, the King had clearly the Right on his Side. Yet still the Queen continu'd firm to her Resolution of leaving the Matter in the Pope's Hands; and therefore would hearken to no Propositions that were made to her, for the referring the Cause to the Arbitration of some select Persons on both Sides. In the Judgments that People pass'd, the Sexes were divided; the Men generally approv'd the King's Cause, and the Women as much favour'd the Queen.

The chief Nobility of England write to the Pope.

His Answer,

A Session of Parliament follow'd in the Month of January; in which the King caus'd all the Decisions of the Universities, and the Books written for the Divorce, to be first read in the House of Lords, and then they were carry'd down to the Commons, by the Chancellor More, and twelve Lords, both of the Spirituality and Temporality. There were twelve Seals of the Universities shew'd, and their Decisions were read, first in Latin, and then translated into English. There were also a hundred Books produc'd, written on the same Argument; upon the shewing of which, the Chancellor desir'd them to report to their several Countries, That they now clearly saw, That the King had not attempted this Matter out of his meer Will and Pleasure, but for the Discharge of his Conscience, and the Security of the Succession to the Crown. This Affair was also brought into the Convocation, where the Clergy declar'd themselves satisfy'd concerning the Unlawfulness of the Marriage; but their unfortunate Circumstances at that Juncture, render'd their Declaration less considerable. For Cardinal Wolsey by exercising his Legantine Authority having, as before related, fallen into a Premunire, they by joining in his Courts, were also involv'd in the same Guilt; and this Matter being excepted out of the late Act of Pardon, an Indictment was brought into the King's Bench, against all the Clergy of England, for breaking the Statutes of Provisors and Premunires; by which they were declar'd out of the King's Protection, tection, their Goods forfeited, and their Persons liable to Imprisonment. Now these old Statutes were reviv'd, that the Terror of them might not only mortify the Court of Rome, but also oblige the Clergy to an intire Submission, and to redeem themselves by a considerable Subsidy. They alleg'd that they had err'd ignorantly; for the King by his Favour to the Cardinal, seem'd to encourage that Authority he then exercis'd: It was a publick Error, therefore they ought not to be punish'd for it. To all which it was reply'd, that the Laws which they had transgress'd were still in Force, therefore no Ignorance could excuse the Violation of them. Upon which the Convocation of Canterbury made their Submission, and in their Address to the King, he was still'd The Protector, and supream Head of the Church of England; but some disliking that, they added as far as it is agreeable to the Law of Christ. This was sign'd by nine Bishops, fifty Abbots and Priors, and the greatest Part of the Lower House; and with it they offer'd the King a Composition of a hundred thousand Pounds, and promis'd for the future, not to make or execute any Constitutions, without a Royal Licence. The Convocation of York did with some Reluctancy acknowledge the King the Supream Head, and submitted with an Offer of above eighteen thousand Pounds; all which being well receiv'd, the Clergy were all restor'd and pardon'd. But when the King's Pardon was brought into the Parliament House, the Laity complain'd, That they were not included in it; for many of them were also obnoxious on the same Account, and liable to the same Punishment; therefore they address'd to the King for Ease and Security. The King return'd Answer, That his Mercy was neither to be restrain'd, nor extorted; which put the House of Commons under great Apprehensions. But soon after they had pass'd the Act, the King freely sent a Pardon to all his Temporal Subjects, which was receiv'd with Universal Joy; and they acknowledg'd, That in this Action, his Majesty had happily temper'd his Greatness, with his Clemency.

They submit, and compound with the King.

The Pope joins with France.

These Proceedings were highly mortifying to the Court of Rome, and the Pope, who being about this Time much disoblig'd by the Emperor, resolv'd to unite himself to the Crown of France; and Francis, to gain him more entirely, propos'd a Match between his Second Son Henry and the Pope's Niece, the famous Catharine de Medici; which as it wrought much on the Pope's Ambition, so it was like to prove a great Support to his Family. The Pope joining with the French, and out of Danger from the Emperor, by reason of the present Progress of the Turks, King Henry's Affairs might have easily been adjusted, if he had not proceeded so far already; for the Pope's Conscience being directed by his Interest, it was more than probable that at this Time he would give the King Satisfaction. He saw the Danger of losing England, the Interest of the Clergy sinking, Lutheranism encreasing, and the Protestant Princes of Germany taking Advantage from the present Employment of the Emperor; all which were melancholy Views. At the same Time King Francis enter'd into a League with the Protestant Princes, for the Conservation of their Privileges; and so prevail'd upon King Henry, that he sent over fifty thousand Crowns for the same Design. And now, as it were, declining all Assistance from the Court of Rome, he us'd all Methods to prevail with the Queen to submit; but nothing could remove her Resolutions. And when some Lords represented to her the great Burden of Conscience that lay upon the King's Mind, she pray'd God to send the King a quiet Conscience, for she was his lawful Wife, and would so continue, till the Court of Rome declar'd the contrary. Upon which the King forbore to see her, and order'd her to chuse to which of her Manors she would please to retire; she answer'd That wherever she retir'd, nothing could remove her from being his Wife. Upon which Answer the King took his final Leave of her at Windsor, upon the fourteenth of July, and never saw her more. Here ended all the Temporal Grandeur of Queen Catharine of Spain, after she had been twenty two Years Wife and Queen to one of the greatest Monarchs of the

the Age; who tho' she was a Lady of unquestionable Piety and Devotion, she had both her Marriages attended with uncommon Misfortunes. This latter was examin'd by the Chief of all Christendom, censur'd and pronounc'd Incestuous: But the former, which was seven Years in finishing by the two wisest Kings in Europe, had the Way made to it by the Destruction of the Innocent Earl of Warwick; which made the religious Queen acknowledge, That her Misfortunes were the Hand of Heaven, since her first Marriage was founded in Blood.

VII. King Henry, after four Years' mighty Struggle, had now freed himself from the Person of his Queen; but not being yet regularly divorc'd, the Affair did not end here; and the former Proceedings had still further Effects upon the King, the Clergy, and the whole Body of the Nation. In the Beginning of this Year, a new Session of Parliament was held, in which the Laitie complain'd of the Spiritual Courts, of their Way of Proceeding ex Officio, and not admitting Persons accus'd to their Purgation. But these Complaints were at this Time stifled, by Reason of an ill Understanding between the King and the House of Commons, about a Bill concerning Wards; and tho' the King thought himself disoblig'd, yet the Parliament being compos'd of Men very ill affected to the Clergy, he kept it still in Being, to terrifie the Court of Rome. And in this Parliament the Foundation of the Breach that afterwards follow'd with Rome, was laid, by an Act for restraining the Payment of Annates or First-Fruits to that Court. The Act sets forth 'That they were founded on 'no Law, but being first given to defend Christendom against Infidels, they 'were since kept up as a Revenue to the Papacy, and Bulls were not granted 'till they were paid; for eight hundred thousand Ducats had been carry'd out 'of England to Rome upon that Account, since the Beginning of the last Reign. 'The King was bound by the Royal Care of his Subjects to hinder such Oppressions; therefore all benefic'd Persons were requir'd not to pay First-Fruits 'for the future, under Pain of forfeiting their Goods and Livings: And those 'who were presented to Bishopricks were appointed to be consecrated, tho' their 'Bulls were deny'd at Rome; and were requir'd to pay no more than five per Cent. of the clear Profits of their Sees. If the Pope should upon this proceed to Censures, the Clergy were notwithstanding commanded to perform 'all Divine Offices. But by an extraordinary Proviso, it was deferr'd to the 'King to declare at any Time between then and Easter in the following Year, 'whether this Act should take Place or not. The King, being afterwards provok'd by the Pope, by his Letters Patents declar'd the Act to be in force.

Reg. $\frac{23}{24}$.

A new Session of Parliament.

An Act against Annates paid to Rome.

Before the Parliament broke up, the Pope, upon the Motion of the Imperialists wrote to the King, complaining, That notwithstanding a Suit was depending concerning his Marriage, yet he had put away his Queen, and kept one Anne Bolen as his Wife, contrary to a Prohibition serv'd on him; therefore he exhorted him to live with his Queen, and put away the other. Upon which the King sent Doctor Bennet to Rome, with a large Dispatch, in which he complain'd, That the Pope having proceeded upon the Suggestion of others, who were ignorant and rash Men, he had carry'd himself inconstantly and deviously, and not like Christ's Vicar: He had granted a Commission, with a Promise never to recall it, and had sent over a Decretal Bull determining the Cause. Either these were unjustly granted, or unjustly recall'd; If he had Authority to grant them, where was the Faith of a Friend, or a Pope, who had broke his Promise? If he had not Authority to grant them, he had just Cause to distrust all that came from him. It was therefore plain that he was govern'd more by Interest than Conscience; and that as he had often confess'd his own Ignorance in these Matters, so he wanted learned Men to advise him, otherwise he would not maintain a Marriage which almost all the learned Men and Universities in England, France and Italy, had condemn'd as unlawful. After this this he declar'd, That he would not question his Authority, unless he was compell'd to it, and design'd only to reduce it to its first and ancient Limits, which was much better than to let it run on with Precipitation and Error. This high Letter put the Pope upon a Resolution to proceed and end this great Affair, either by a Sentence or a Treaty. Accordingly King Henry was cited to answer to the Queen's Appeal at Rome in Person, or by Proxy: Upon which Sir Edward Karne was sent thither in the new Character of the King's Excusator, to excuse the King's Appearance, upon such Grounds as could be founded on the Canon Law, and upon the Privileges of the Crown of England; and Doctor Bonner, a forward and ambitious Man, who would scruple at nothing that brought him Preferment, was sent over with him.

Some Cardinals
gain'd to the King's Side.

They arriv'd at Rome in the Month of March, where they found great Heats in the Consistory about the King's Business: The Imperialists vehemently press'd the Pope to give Sentence; but all the wise Cardinals, who observ'd by the Proceedings of the Parliament, that the Nation would adhere to the King, if he should be provok'd to shake off the Pope's Yoke, were very apprehensive of a Breach, and suggested milder Counsels to the Pope; and the King's Agents assur'd him, that if he would give the King Satisfaction, the late Acts against Annates or First-Fruits, should not be put in Execution. At that Time the Cardinal of Ravenna was consider'd as an Oracle in the Consistory, therefore the King's Agents resolv'd to gain him with great Promises; but he subtilly reply'd, That Princes were liberal of their Promises, 'till their Turns were serv'd, and then usually forgot them. Therefore before he would proceed he caus'd Doctor Bennet to give him a Promise in Writing of the Bishoprick of Ely, or the first that became vacant, and he also engag'd that the King should procure him Benefices in France to the Value of six thousand Ducats a Year, for the Service he should do him by his Divorce. This was an Argument of such powerful Efficacy with the Cardinal, that it absolutely turn'd him from being a great Enemy, to be as great a Promoter of the King's Cause, tho' with no small Artifice. Several other Cardinals were likewise mollify'd and prevail'd upon by the same Topicks. The King's Agents put in his Excusatory Plea in twenty eight Articles; and it was order'd that three at a Hearing should be discuss'd before the Consistory, 'till all should be examin'd: But that Court sitting no more than once a Week, the Imperialists, after some of them had been heard, procur'd an Order, that the rest for greater Dispatch should be heard in a Congregation or Committee of Cardinals, before the Pope: Which being refus'd by Karne, it was referr'd back to the Consistory. Against this the Imperialists protested, and refus'd to appear any more; upon which Karne complain'd of their Contumacy, declaring, they were distrustful of their Cause.

A Bull for erecting six new Bishopricks.

During the Examination of this Plea, News were brought to Rome from England, That a Priest for preaching up the Pope's Power was cast into Prison; and that a Person committed by the Arch-Bishop for Heresie, appeal'd to the King as Supream Head, which was receiv'd and judg'd in the King's Courts. The Pope made great Complaints upon this; but the King's Agents only said, The best Method to prevent the like for the future, was to do the King Justice. At this Time a Bull being desir'd, was granted to the King for suppressing some Monasteries, and erecting six new Bishopricks out of them. Chester was nam'd for one; and the Cardinal of Ravenna was so pleas'd with the Revenue design'd for it, that he secur'd it to himself, 'till Ely should fall vacant. In conclusion, the Pope seem'd to favour the King's Excusatory Plea, which rais'd the Clamours of the Imperialists; but this amounting to no more than to excuse the King's personal Appearance, the new-gain'd Cardinals advis'd the King to send over a Proxy for answering to the Merits of the Cause, and not to waste more Time in that Dilatory Plea; and they having before declar'd themselves against the King in that Plea, could now with the better Credit serve him in the Other. The Vacation coming on, it was resolv'd by the Cardinals then neither to admit nor reject the Plea; but both the Pope and College wrote to the King to send over a Proxy for determining the Matter next Winter. Doctor Bonner was also sent to England to assure the King, That the Pope was now so much in the French Interest, that he might confidently refer his Matter to him; and likewise to declare to him, 'That since the grand Question was, Whether the Pope could grant the Dispensation or not, it could not regularly be committed to Legates, but must be judg'd by the Pope and the Consistory.

During these dilatory and fruitless Proceedings at Rome, a new Session of Parliament was call'd in England; in which the Clergy gave in their Answer to the Complaints made of them by the Commons in the former Sessions. But when the King gave it to the Speaker, he express'd his Displeasure against one Tempe, a Member of their House, who had mov'd for an Address, That the Queen might be brought back to the Court, and declar'd, That the Subject touch'd his Conscience, which was not to be determin'd by their House: He wish'd the Marriage was good, but many Divines had declar'd it unlawful: He did not make this Suit out of Lust or foolish Appetite, being then past the Heats of Youth; but as his Conscience was troubled, he desir'd the same might be reported to the House. Shortly after, the King sent again for the Speaker, and told him, That he had found the chief Clergy of the Realm were but half Subjects, or something less. For it appear'd that every Bishop or Abbot, at the entering upon his Dignity, took an Oath to the Pope, inconsistent with that of their Fidelity to the King, which Contradiction he desir'd might be remov'd by the Parliament. Whereupon these two Oaths being by the King's Order read and consider'd, the Parliament so treated the Matter, as it occasion'd the final Renunciation of the Pope's Authority about two Years after. A Plague put a sudden End to this Session; about which Time, Sir Thomas More laid down his Office of Lord Chancellor, which was conferr'd on Sir Thomas Audley. He now saw how far the King's Designs tended; and tho' he was for opposing the Papal Incroachments, and cheerfully concurr'd with the Suit of the Premunire; yet when he saw a total Rupture like to ensue, he could not keep Pace with others, but retir'd to a private Life with a Greatness of Mind equal to what the ancient Greeks and Romans had express'd on such Occasions. He disliked Mrs. Bolen, and her Father, who endeavour'd to fasten some criminal Imputations on him, in the Distribution of Justice; but his Integrity was such, as nothing could be brought against him to blemish his Reputation.

In September following the King created Mrs. Anne Bolen Marchioness of Pembroke, that she might have a gradual Rise to that Height for which he had design'd her. And in October he pass'd the Seas with her, and had a solemn Interview with the French King, according to former Articles; where on both Sides all pass'd all possible Compliments and Endearments, with the utmost State and Magnificence, and a firm Union was concerted of all their Affairs. Extraordinary Entertainments and Diversions were made for them both at Bologna and Calais; and their Rule of Proceeding was, That while Francis was on French Ground, he gave Place, but when he came to the English Pale he receiv'd it. As to the Matter of King Henry's Divorce, Francis encourag'd him to proceed to a second Marriage, promising to assist him in it, if Occasion so requir'd; and assur'd him, That he intended to restrain the Payment of First-fruits to Rome, and would demand of the Pope a Redress of that and other Grievances, which if deny'd, Remedies should be sought in a Provincial Council. An Interview was also propos'd between the Pope and him, at which he desir'd King Henry to be present, to which he was not unwilling, if he could have Assurance that his Business would finally be determin'd. The Pope about this Time offer'd to King Henry to send a Legate to any indifferent Place out of England, to form the Process, reserving only the final Sentence to himself; and propos'd to him, and all Princes, a general Truce, that so he might call a general Council. The King of England in his Reply declar'd, ' That it was ' contrary to his Prerogative to send a Proxy to appear at Rome; That by the ' Decrees of General Councils, all Causes ought to be judg'd on the Place, and ' by a Provincial Council; and that it was more proper to judge it in England, ' than any other Place, That by his Coronation Oath, he was bound to main- ' tain the Dignities of his Crown, and the Rights of his Subjects, and not to ' appear before any other Foreign Court. So Sir Thomas Elliot was sent over with Instructions, to move that the Cause might be judg'd in England: Yet if the Pope had real Intentions to give the King Satisfaction, he was not to insist on that Particular. And to make the Cardinal of Ravenna sure, he sent him the Offer of the Bishoprick of Litchfield and Coventry, then vacant.

But before any Answers could be return'd, the King marry'd the late advanc'd Mrs. Bolen, on the fourteenth Day of November, at Calais; the Office being perform'd by Rowland Lee, afterwards Bishop of Lichfield and Coventry, with great Privacy, tho' in the Presence of the Duke of Norfolk, her Father, her Mother, her Brother, and Doctor Cranmer. It was now concluded among them, That the former Marriage being declar'd void by the profoundest Heads in Europe, the King might lawfully proceed to another: And probably it was hop'd, that as the Pope himself had formerly propos'd the very Method, so he would now readily join with him. But tho' the Pope had join'd himself to France, yet he still so much dreaded the Emperor, that he resolv'd not to provoke him; and therefore would not be prevail'd upon by any of the Expedients which Doctor Bennet propos'd, which was either to determine the Cause in England, according to the Council of Nice, or to refer it to the Arbitration of particular Persons nam'd by the Pope and the two Kings of England and France; for all these he said tended to the Diminution of the Papal Authority. Wherefore a new Citation was issu'd out for the King to answer to the Queen's Complaints; but the King's Agents protested, That as their Master could expect no Justice from Rome, where the Emperor's Power was so great; so he was a Sovereign Prince, and the Church of England a free Church, over which the Pope had no just Authority.

A. D. In the mean Time the threaten'd Breach with the See of Rome was much promoted by a new Session of Parliament, begun on the fourteenth of February, 1533. which pass'd an Act, condemning all Appeals to the Pope; declaring, ' That Reg. $\frac{24}{35}$. ' the Crown was Imperial, and the Nation a compleat Body, with full Power ' to do Justice in all Cases, both Spiritual and Temporal: And that as former ' Kings had maintain'd the Liberties of the Kingdom against the Usurpations of ' Rome, so they found the great Inconveniences of allowing Appeals in Ma- ' trimonial Causes, by occasioning unreasonable Charges and Delays: Therefore ' it was enacted, That those hereafter should be judg'd in the Kingdom, and no ' Regard had to any Appeals to Rome, or Censures from it; but Sentences ' given in England, were to have their full Effect; and all that executed any ' Censure from Rome, were to incur a Premunire. Appeals were to be from ' the Arch-Deacon to the Bishop, and from him to the Arch-Bishop: Only in ' Causes that concern'd the King the Appeal was to be to the Convocation. This Matter was likewise discuss'd in the Convocation, which at present wanted a Head; for in the preceding Year dy'd Warham Arch-Bishop of Canterbury, who had been a great Patron of Learning, a good Canonist, and a wise Statesman, but a cruel Persecutor of Hereticks, and too much inclin'd to believe Fanatical Stories. Doctor Cranmer was then in Germany, disputing in the King's Cause with some of the Emperor's Divines. The King resolv'd to advance him to that Dignity, and sent a Message to hasten his Return; but a Promotion so far above his Thoughts had different Effects on him: He had a true and primitive Sense of so mighty a Charge; and instead of aspiring to it, he was really afraid of it, and he both return'd very slowly to England, and us'd all his Endeavours to be excus'd from that Advancement. At length, by the King's Order, Bulls for his Consecration were desir'd at Rome, notwithstanding the late Act against Annates; which the Pope granted, tho' it could not be grateful to him to send them to one who had so publicly disputed and question'd his dispensing Power: Only a small Composition was paid, and these were the last Bulls that were receiv'd in England during this King's Reign. On the thirtieth of March, Doctor Cranmer was consecrated by the Bishops of Lincoln, Exeter, and St. Asaph; in which the Oath to the Pope rais'd some Scruples: Therefore he made a formal Protestation before he took it, That he conceiv'd himself not bound by it in any Thing contrary to his Duty to God, to his King, or Country, all which he openly repeated when he took the Oath: So if this seem'd too artificial for a Man of his Sincerity, yet still he acted fairly, and without actual Deceit.

Cranmer made Arch-Bishop of Canterbury.

Upon his Consecration and Investiture, he took his Place in the Convocation, where two Questions were then warmly debating: The first was, concerning the Lawfulness of the King's Marriage. and the Validity of the Pope's Dispensation; the other was of Matter of Fact, Whether Prince Arthur had consummated the Marriage or not. To determine both, the Opinions of the Universities and foreign Divines were consider'd, with all the presumptive Evidences of Prince Arthur's Consummation. After a solemn Debate, the King's Marriage was declar'd unlawful and null, and by so great a Majority in the upper House, that it pass'd under the Title of Nemine Contradicente. And the Church of England having made such a full Decision, nothing remain'd but a judicial Sentence of Divorce. The new Queen Anne began to appear big with Child, which was look'd upon as a great Proof of her Chastity with the King before Marriage; and on Easter Eve she was first declar'd Queen of England. Shortly after Arch-Bishop Cranmer, with Gardiner, now Bishop of Winchester, and the Bishops of London, Lincoln, Bath and Wells, with many Divines and Canonists, went and held a Court at Dunstable, near Queen Catharine, who resid'd at Amptbil. The King and Queen were both cited; he appear'd by Proxy, but the Queen, refusing to show any Regard to the Court, after three Citations, was declar'd contumacious; and all the Merits of the Cause, formerly mention'd, were examin'd. At length, on the twenty third of May, Sentence was given, declaring the Marriage to have been null from the Beginning; and some Days after, the Arch-Bishop gave another Judgment, confirming the King's Marriage with Queen Anne. Upon this, on the first Day of June, she was crown'd Queen of England, with such Pomp and Solemnity, as was answerable to the Magnificence of the present Monarch, as may be seen at large in Holingshed and other Writers. Various Censures pass'd upon this; but all admir'd at the new Queen's Conduct, who in a Course of so many Years manag'd the Spirit of a King so violent, as neither to surfeit him with too many Favours, nor to provoke him with too much Niceness. Her being so soon with Child, gave Hopes of a numerous Issue; and they who lov'd the Reformation, expected better Days under her Protection; but many Priests and Friars, both in Sermons and Discourses, condemn'd the King's Proceedings, as preposterous, as well as unlawful. On the seventh of September the Queen brought forth a Daughter, christen'd Elizabeth, afterwards the renown'd Queen of England, and the Arch-Bishop of Canterbury was her God-Father. Great Rejoycings were made at her Birth, and she was soon after declar'd Princess of Wales; tho' Lawyers thought it against Law, for she could only be Heir presumptive, but not apparent to the Crown, because a Son coming after must have been preferr'd.

The Convocation condemn'd the King's first Marriage.

Cranmer gives the final Sentence.

The Birth of Queen Elizabeth.

In the mean Time the King sent Ambassadors to all the Courts of Europe, to give Notice of his new Marriage, and to justify his Proceedings: At the same Time he sent Persons to Queen Catharine, to command her to assume no other Title than Princess Dowager; and to give her Hopes of her Daughter being put next the Queen's Issue in the Succession, if she would submit her self to his Will. But the afflicted Queen would not yield, declaring She would not damn her Soul, nor submit to such Infamy; and resolv'd that none should serve her, who did not treat her as a Queen. All her Servants so adher'd to her Interest, that no Threatnings or Promises could prevail upon them; and what the King did in this was thought below that Height of Mind which appear'd in his other Actions; for since he had stripp'd her of the real Greatness of a Queen, it was too much to refuse her the Pageantry of the Title. The News of these Proceedings made great Impressions in foreign Parts: The Emperor seem'd swell'd with Resentments. The French King was colder than King Henry expected; yet he promis'd to intercede with the Pope, and the Cardinals, on his Account: But he was now so intirely gain'd by the Pope, That he resolv'd not to involve himself as a Party in King Henry's Quarrel; and he also receded from the Designs he once had of erecting a Patriarchate in France, for the Pope had lately granted him a Satisfactory Power over his own Clergy. The Emperor was not a little pleas'd with the French King's Coldness and Backwardness; for this might probably separate those two Kings whose Conjunction had been so dangerous to him. At Rome the Cardinals of the Imperial Faction loudly exclaim'd against the Attempt made on the Pope's Power, since a Sentence was given in England in a Process depending at Rome; therefore they urg'd the Pope to proceed to Censures. But instead of putting the Matter past Reconciliation, there was only a Sentence given, annulling all that the Arch-Bishop of Canterbury had done; and the King was requir'd under Pain of Excommunication to reduce all Things to their former State, before September next; which Sentence was soon after affix'd in Dunkirk.

Yet promises to give Satisfaction to King Henry.

At the same Time King Henry sent a great Embassie to the French King, who was then removing towards Marseilles, where the Pope was to meet him: The Design was to dissuade him from the Journey, unless the Pope might be procur'd to give King Henry Satisfaction. The King of France declar'd he was engag'd in Honour to make that Journey, but assur'd the Ambassadors, That he would remember their Master's Concerns, with as much Zeal, as if they were his own. At Marseilles, the Marriage was concluded between the young Duke of Orleans, afterwards King Henry the Second, and the Pope's Niece; to whom the Pope gave a hundred thousand Crowns, and many Principalities, which he pretended were either Fiefs of the Papacy, or belonging to him in the Rights of the House of Medici. There was a private Agreement made between the Pope and Francis, 'That if King Henry would refer his Cause to the Roman Consistory, with an Exception to the Cardinals of the Imperial Faction, and would in all other Things return to his Obedience to the Apostolick See, then Sentence should be given in his Favour; but this was to be kept secret. So that Bonner, not being trusted with it, and sent thither with an Appeal from the Pope to the next general Council, made it with such Heat and Insolence to the Pope's Person, that he was threaten'd to be thrown into a Cauldron of melted Lead, or to be burnt alive; upon the Apprehension of which he fled away privately. But when Francis return'd to Paris, he sent the Bishop of that City to King Henry, to let him know what he had obtain'd of the Pope in his Favour, and the Terms on which it was promis'd; which so prevail'd upon the King, that thinking them secure, he immediately consented to them. Upon which, the Bishop of Paris, tho' in the middle of Winter, took a Journey to Rome; assuring himself of the Scarlet, if he were instrumental in regaining England, which was then upon the Point of being lost. What the Assurances were that the Pope gave may be gather'd from a Letter wrote by the Arch-Bishop of York and Bishop of Durham, which declares, 'That the Pope said at Marseilles, That if the King would send a Proxy to Rome, he would give Sentence for him against the Queen, for he knew his Cause was good and just.

Upon

Upon the Bishop of Paris's Arrival at Rome, the Matter seem'd determin'd; for it was promis'd, ' That upon King Henry's sending a Writing under his Hand to put Things in their former State, and his ordering a Poxty to appear for him, Judges should be sent to Cambray for making the Procefs, and Sentence should be immediately given. Upon Notice given of this, and of a Day that was prefix'd for the Return of the Courier, King Henry with utmost Expedition dispatch'd a Person, with a formal Promise under his Hand; so now the Contest seem'd at an End, and the Wound that was thought fatal, was almost healed. But God thought fit to ruin the Attempt; and the Messenger, who had a Sea and the Alps to pass, besides ill Ways and Weather to encounter, could not observe the prefix'd Day: Which caus'd the Imperialists to shew their Resentments, and violently to urge the Pope to proceed to Sentence, against one who had abus'd his Easiness. The Bishop of Paris mov'd only for a Delay of six Days, which he thought a reasonable Request for one who had Patience so many Years; but the Design of the Imperialists was to hinder all Terms of Reconciliation; therefore with the utmost Aggravations they urg'd, That King Henry was seeking Delays and Concessions meerly to delude the Pope; and that he had gone so far in his Designs against the Apostolick See, both by Books and Libels, that it was necessary to proceed to Censures. The inrag'd Pope was so fir'd with these Representations, and the News he hear'd from England, that without consulting his ordinary Prudence, he brought the Matter to the Consistory; where the Imperialists being most numerous, it was hurry'd on with such Precipitation, that they transacted that in one Session, which according to Form, should have been done in three. They gave the final Sentence, declaring King Henry's Marriage with Queen Catharine good; and requir'd him to live with her as his Wife, otherwise they would proceed to Censures. Two Days after that the Courier came with King Henry's Submission in due Form, and with earnest Letters from King Francis in his Favour. This so sensibly affected all the indifferent and wise Cardinals, that they begg'd of the Pope to consider the Matter again, before all was lost. A new Consistory was call'd; but the Imperialists press'd with greater Violence than ever, That they would not give such a Scandal as to revoke a definitive Sentence of a Marriage, and give the Hereticks such Advantages by their Unsteadiness in Matters of that Nature. Upon which it was carry'd, That the former Sentence should take Place; and the Execution of it was committed to the Emperor himself. This was amazing to all Europe, to see the Court of Rome throw off England with so much Contempt, as if they had been surfeited with the Obedience and Profits of so famous a Kingdom; and their Proceedings look'd as if they had been secretly directed by a Divine Providence that design'd to draw mighty Consequences from this Breach, and did so insatuate those who were most concern'd to prevent it, that they needlessly drew it upon themselves.

But afterwards proceeds hastily to sentence.

Which causes a final Breach with King Henry.

When King Henry had heard this, and understood that he was us'd with so much Scorn and indignity at Rome, he was extremely inrag'd, and the more because he had made so great a Submission; therefore he resolv'd to make a total Breach with that See, that had put him to such vast and useless Expences, and had treated him for several Years with all the Artifices that could arise from Subtily and Pertidiousness. And in this Matter he had partly anticipated the Designs of that Court; for judging it the best Way to procure a Peace, was to manage the War vigorously, he had held a Session of Parliament from the fifteenth of January to the thirtieth of March, in which he procur'd a great Change in the whole Constitution of the Government of the Church. The Pope's Power had then for four Years together been nicely examin'd and disputed in England; in which the Representatives proceeded by these Steps. They first controverted his Power of dispensing with the Law of God: From that they pass'd on to examine what Jurisdiction he had in England, upon which followed the convicting the Clergy in a Premunire with their Submission:

A. D. 1534. Reg. 25.

The steps towards destroying the Pope's Supremacy in England.

And

And that led them to dispute the Pope's Right to Annates, and other Exactions, which they condemn'd: And the condemning all Appeals to Rome, naturally follow'd that. And now so many Branches of that Power being cut off, the very Root was next struck at, and the Foundations of the Papal Authority were examin'd. For near a Year together there had been many publick Debates about it; and both in the Parliament and Convocation the Subject was long canvass'd, and all that could be alledg'd on both Sides maturely consider'd. The several Arguments being fully open'd in many Disputes, and publish'd in several Books, all the Bishops, Abbots and Priors in England, excepting Fisher Bishop of Rocheſter, were so far satisfy'd with them, or so unwilling to leave their Preferments, that they resolv'd to comply with the Changes which the King was resolv'd to make: Fisher was in great Esteem for Piety and Strictness of Life, therefore great Pains were us'd by the Arch-Bishop and others to bring him to a Compliance, but with no Effect.

It is destroy'd by Act of Parliament.

Every Sunday during this famous Session of Parliament, a Bishop preach'd at St. Paul's, and declar'd, That the Pope had no Authority in England: Before this, they had only said That a general Council was above him, and the Exactions of the Roman Court, and Appeals to it were unlawful; but now they rais'd a Strain higher, to prepare the People for receiving the Acts then in Agitation. On the ninth Day of March the House of Commons began the noted Bill for taking away the Pope's Power, and sent it to the Lords in five Days Time; who after six Days longer pass'd it without Opposition. In this Bill 'They set forth the Exactions of the Court of Rome, grounded on the Pope's 'Power of Dispensing; and that as none could dispence with the Laws of God, 'so the King and Parliament only could dispense with the Laws of the Land: 'Therefore such Licences or Dispensations as were formerly in use, should for 'the future be granted by the two Arch-Bishops, some of which were to be 'confirm'd under the great Seal; and they appointed that hereafter all Commerce with Rome should cease. They also declar'd, That they did not design 'to alter any Article of the Catholick Faith of Christendom, or of that which was 'declar'd necessary to Salvation. They confirm'd all the Exemptions granted 'to Monasteries by former Popes, but subjected them to the King's Visitation; 'and gave the King and his Council Power to examine and reform all Indulgences and Privileges granted by the Pope: The Offenders against this Law 'were to be punish'd according to the Statutes of Premunire. This Act reducing the Monasteries entirely to the King's Authority, put them in no small Confusion; and those who lov'd the Reformation, rejoyc'd both to see the Pope's Power extirpated, and to find the Scriptures made the Standard of Religion.

the Succession.*

After this, another remarkable Act pass'd both Houses in six Days Time, and without any Opposition, 'Settling the Succession of the Crown; confirming the Sentence of Divorce, and the King's Marriage with Queen Anne, 'and declaring all Marriages within the Decrees prohibited by Moses to be 'unlawful: All that marry'd within them were appointed to be divorc'd, 'and their Issue illegitimated; and the Succession to the Crown was settled 'upon the King's Issue by the present Queen Anne, or in Default of that, to 'the King's right Heirs, for ever. All were to take a particular Oath, to maintain the Contents of this Act, against all manner of Persons whatsoever; and 'if any refus'd the Oath when requir'd, or should say any Thing to the Slender 'of the King's Marriage, he was to be judg'd guilty of Misprision of Treason, 'and to be punish'd accordingly. And thus was the King's Marriage confirm'd 'by Parliament; and when the Commons return'd this Bill to the Lords, they sent them another with it, which was receiv'd and pass'd, regulating the Proceedings against Hereticks, 'That whereas by a Statute of Henry the Fourth, 'Bishops might commit Persons upon Suspicion of Heresie; and Heresie being 'generally defin'd, To be whatever was contrary to the Scriptures, or Canonical Sanctions, which was liable to great Ambiguity; therefore that Statute ‘was repeal’d, and none were to be committed for Heresie, but upon a Presentment made by two Witnesses; and none to be accus’d for declaring against Things only grounded upon the Pope’s Canons. Bail was to be taken for Hereticks, and they were to be brought to their Trials in open Court; and if upon Conviction they did not abjure, or were Relapsers, upon the King’s Writ obtain’d, they were to suffer the former Punishment of Burning. This was a mighty Check to the Tyranny of the Popish Bishops, and gave no small Satisfaction to all that favour’d the Reformation.

As the Parliament was proceeding in these useful Laws, there came a Submission from the Clergy, then sitting in Convocation, to be pass’d into an Act. In it ‘They acknowledg’d that all Convocations ought to be assembled by the King’s Right, and promised upon the Word of Priests, never to make or execute any Canons, without the King’s Assent: And since many of the received Canons were found to be contrary to the King’s Prerogative, and the Laws of the Land, there was to be a Committee of thirty two, the one half out of both Houses of Parliament, and the other of the Clergy, to be nam’d by the King, and empower’d to abrogate or regulate them, as they should see Cause. Appeals to Rome were again condemn’d, and an Appeal was allow’d from the Arch-Bishop to the King, upon which the Lord Chancellor was to grant a Commission for a Court of Delegates. A Proviso was added, that till the Committee of thirty two should settle a Regulation of these Canons, those then in Force should still take Place, except where they were contrary to the King’s Prerogative, and the Laws of the Land. In this Parliament another Act pass’d, for the better regulating the Elections and Consecrations of Bishops; Condemning all Bulls from Rome; and appointing, That upon a Vacancy, the King should grant a Licence for an Election, with a missive Letter signifying the Person nam’d to be elected: Within twelve Days after, the Dean and Chapter, &c. were requir’d to return an Election of the Person nam’d by the King, under their Seals. The Bishop Elect was to swear Fealty, and a Writ to be issu’d out for his Consecration after the usual Manner: After which, he was to do Homage to the King, and be restor’d to the Spiritualties and Temporalties of the See; and Bishops were to exercise their Jurisdiction as they had done before. All Transgressors of this Act were made guilty of a Premunire. A private Act also pass’d, depriving Cardinal Campegio, and Jerome di Ghinuccii of the Bishopricks of Salisbury and Worcester; the Reasons given for it were, ‘Because they did not reside in their Dioceses, for preaching the Word of God, and keeping Hospitality, but liv’d at the Court of Rome, and carry’d no less than three thousand Pounds a Year out of the Kingdom.

The Submission of the Clergy.

An Act for Election of Bishops.

The last Act of a publick Nature, tho’ relating only to private Persons, was concerning one Elizabeth Barton call’d The Holy Maid of Kent; who was the first Occasion of shedding any Blood in the Quarrel, which was much cherished by all the Superstitious Clergy, that adher’d to the Interests of Queen Catharine, and the Pope. This Barton, a Nun of Kent, being suborn’d by Monks, to use some strange Gesticulations, and to produce some feign’d Miracles, accompany’d with Prophetical Sayings, she drew much Credit and Concourse to her; insomuch that some Persons of the highest Note, as the late Arch-Bishop, the late Chancellor Sir Thomas More, and Bishop Fisher, gave no little Countenance to her; and notwithstanding the Danger of encouraging a particular Prediction of hers, That the King should not live one Month after his Marriage with Mrs. Bolen, she was still applauded for her extraordinary Gifts. But the Plot being at last discover’d, she was attainted of Treason in this Parliament, and shortly after executed with her chief Accomplices; at which Time also she confess’d the Names of such as had been Promoters of the Design, among whom were More and Fisher. Upon the first Discovery of this Cheat, Cromwell, now Secretary of State, sent Fisher’s Brother to him to reprove him for his Carriage in that Business, and to advise him to ask the King’s Pardon

The Attainder of the Nun of Kent.

She is executed.

Pardon for the Incouragement he had given to the Nun. But that Bishop excus'd himself, declaring, He had only try'd whether her Relations were true or not; and that he thought it necessary to discover what she said concerning the King's Death, because he knew that she had told the same to the King; therefore he desir'd to be no more troubled with that Matter. But upon this Answer, Cromwell wrote him a sharp Letter, shewing him, That he had proceeded rashly; being so partial to the Matter of the King's Divorce, that he believ'd every Thing that seem'd against it; that the highest Caution was to be us'd before new Revelations were receiv'd; otherwise the Peace of the World would be in the Power of every bold and crafty Impostor. Yet in Conclusion, he advis'd him to ask the King's Pardon for his Rashness, for he was confident, that he was ready to forgive that, and every Thing else, by which he had offended him. But Fisher was still obstinate, and would make no Submission, and so was included in the Act for Misprision of Treason; yet it was not put in Execution, till he drew a heavier Storm of Indignation upon himself.

The Oath of Succession sworn.

More and Fisher refuse the Oath.

For which they are imprison'd.

The King by Act of Parliament made Supreme Head of the Church of England.

Upon the breaking up of the Parliament, both the Regular and Secular Clergy did in all Places take the Oath of Succession; and none more zealously promoted it than Gardiner, Bishop of Winchester. And the religious Orders, being apprehensive of the King's Jealousies, sent in Declarations under the Seals of their Houses, 'That in their Opinion the King's present Marriage was lawful, and that they would ever acknowledge him, Head of the Church of England; That the Bishop of Rome had no Authority out of his own Diocese, and that they would continue obedient to the King, notwithstanding his Censures; That they would preach the Gospel sincerely according to the Scriptures, and pray for the King as Supream Head of the Church of England. A Meeting of the Council fate at Lambeth, to which many were cited in order to take the new Oath; among whom was Sir Thomas More, and Bishop Fisher. More declar'd He neither condemn'd such as made the Act, nor such as took the Oath, and was willing to swear to the Succession of the Crown, but he could not take the Oath as it was now made; and Fisher made the same Answer, but all the rest took the Oath. The Arch-Bishop told More, If he did not condemn those who took the Oath, he was not persuaded it was a Sin, and so was only doubtful of it; but he was sure he ought to obey the Law, if it was not sinful; so there was a Certainty on one Side, and only a Doubt on the other, therefore the former ought to determine him. More said, If the Parliament of England was against him, he believ'd the rest of Christendom was on his Side. In Conclusion both he and Fisher declar'd, That they believ'd it in the Power of the Parliament to settle the Succession to the Crown, therefore they were ready to that Particular, but not to the rest of the Oath, that pronounc'd the King's Marriage unlawful. The Arch-Bishop wisely urg'd that this might be accepted; for if they swore to maintain the Succession, it would conduce much to the Quiet of the Nation. But sharper Counsels were then more acceptable; so they were both committed to the Tower, and Pen, Ink and Paper deny'd them; and the old Bishop was treated with such Hardship, as to Diet and Cloaths, as can never be excus'd.

In Winter another Session of Parliament was held, in the Beginning of which that memorable Act was made, declaring The King to be the Supream Head on Earth of the Church of England, and appointing that to be added to his other Titles; empowering also him and his Successors to reform all Heresies and Abuses in the Spiritual Jurisdiction. By another Act they gave the King the First-Fruits and Tithes of Ecclesiastical Benefices, as being the Supream Head of the Church; for the King being put in the Pope's Room, it was thought reasonable to give him the Annates, which the Popes had formerly exacted. Another Act pass'd, declaring some Things Treason; one of which was the denying the King any of his Titles, or calling him Heretick, Schismatick, tick, or Usurper of the Crown: And by another Act Provision was made for erecting twenty six Suffragan Bishops over England, for the more speedy Administration of the Sacraments, and the better Service of God. In this Parliament Subsidies were also granted, which had been difus'd for about twelve Years; and now introduc'd with the highest Preamble of the Nation's Felicity under the King's Government these twenty four Years, that Eloquence and Flattery could dictate. Fisher and More by two special Acts were attainted of Misprision of Treason; and five other Clerks were in like manner condemn'd, for refusing to take the Oath of Succession. Thus all Things conspir'd to pull down the Power of Rome, and to make a greater Change than ever had been known in the Kingdom of England.

But before these Things were accomplish'd, the present Pope Clement dy'd, The Pope dies. who was one of the greatest Dissemblers and State-Jugglers that ever mounted the Chait: He was succeeded by Alessandro of the House of Farnesi, under the Title of Paul the Third.

VIII. The mighty King having pass'd through the Traverses and Tossings of his famous Suit, and having with the Concurrence of his Clergy and Parliament compass'd what he had projected, seem'd now at ease in his own Dominions. But tho' these Matters were smoothly and successfully carry'd in publick Assemblies, yet the Change was so shocking, that it caus'd many secret Discontents, which being fomented both by the Pope, and the Emperor's Agents, wrought him infinite Trouble, so that the rest of his Life was fill'd with Vexations and Disquiets. The Nobility and Gentry were in general well satisfy'd with the Change; but the Body of the People were more subject to the Power of the Priests, who endeavour'd to infuse great Fears of a Change in Religion: It was continually insinuated, That the King was joining himself to Hereticks, and that they were favour'd by the new Queen, Arch-Bishop and Secretary. The Monks and Friars saw themselves left to the Mercy of the King, and that their Bulls could be no longer useful to them; and they had some Intimations that Cromwell was forming a Project for suppressing them. So they thought it necessary for their own Preservation to embroil the King's Affairs as much as was possible; therefore both in Confessions and Discourses, they were instilling into the People a Dislike of the King's Proceedings, which had such Effect upon them, that if the Emperor's Affairs would have permitted him to make War upon the King, he might have done it with great Advantage, and found a strong Party in England on his Side. But the Practices of the Clergy at home, and of Cardinal Pool, an Englishman, abroad, the Libels that were publish'd, and the Rebellions that were afterwards rais'd in England, wrought so unhappily upon the King's busie Thoughts, that he lost much of his former Temper and Patience, and became too ready upon slight Grounds to bring his Subjects to the Bar; and his new Title of Head of the Church, seem'd to have increas'd his imperious Temper, and made him fancy that all his Subjects were oblig'd to regulate their Belief by the Measures he set them. Yet it does not appear that Cruelty was natural to him, or that he thirsted after Blood; for in twenty six Years Reign, none had suffer'd for any Crime against the State, but La Pole Earl of Suffolk, and Stafford Duke of Buckingham, and both under reasonable Pretensions. But in the ten last Years of his Life, tho' he always proceeded upon Law, yet there occur'd many Instances of Severity, for which this King is rather to be pity'd, than either imitated, or severely censur'd. If there had been the least Hope of Impunity, the last part of his Reign would have been one continu'd Rebellion; therefore to prevent a more profuse Effusion of Blood, it seem'd necessary to execute Laws severely in some particular Instances.

When the Supremacy was invested in the King, by Law, it was made a Premunire not to swear to it; but it was made Treason to deny it, or speak any Thing against it. As there were several of the Pope's Agents that ventur'd to break this Law, and sometimes with no small Insolence and Obstinacy, so it was thought necessary by the King and Council, to make a speedy Redress of these Mischiefs. Therefore some Priors, and other Ecclesiasticks, that were criminal in this Matter, being found guilty by the new Statute, were this Year executed as Traitors, being the first that suffer'd in this Kind. This Piece of Justice was not yet become so familiar to the King, which caus'd him not only to mourn inwardly, but also to have his Head bald, and his Beard, formerly shaven, to be cut round; for which his Enemies maliciously said, It was only putting a new Countenance upon a new Dignity. But if he proceeded thus rigorously against the Opposers of his Supremacy, he did no less punish the many pretended Reformers or Contradictors of the Roman Catholic Religion. Therefore, as in the last Year he had condemn'd John Frith, a Sacramentary, to the Fire, so he now caus'd divers Hollanders in London, who invented some different Religious Opinions, to be burnt in Smithfield. Shortly after, some others again were executed for denying the Supremacy; so that on both Sides it prov'd a severe Season. Only, as King Henry found the Terrors already given, not sufficient to keep the rest in awe, he resolv'd to make some great Examples, and proceed against Bishop Fisher and Sir Thomas More. As to the former, the Pope's officious Kindness to him in declaring him a Cardinal, when in Prison, did hasten his Ruin; tho' he valu'd the Honour so little, that he said, That if the Hat were lying at his Feet, he would not take it up. He was try'd by a Jury of Commoners, and found guilty of Treason, for having declar'd against the King's Supremacy; and was condemn'd to be beheaded, which was executed on the twenty second Day of June. On that Day he dress'd himself with more than ordinary Care, declaring, He was now to be a Bridegroom; and being led out he open'd the new Testament at a venture, and pray'd that such a Place might turn up as might comfort him in his last Moments. The Words on which he cast his Eyes were, This is Life Eternal to know Thee, the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom thou hast sent. On the Scaffold he repeated the Te Deum, and then laid his Head upon the Block, which was sever'd from his Body in the eightieth Year of his Age. He was a learned and devout Man, but much addicted to Superstition and Severity. He had been long Confessor to the King's Grandmother, the Countess of Richmond, and it was believ'd that he perswaded her to those Noble Designs of Founding two Colleges in Cambridge, Christ's and St. John's, and Divinity Professors in both Universities; in Acknowledgment of which, he was chosen Chancellor of Cambridge. King Henry the Seventh made him Bishop of Rocheſter, which he would never exchange for any other, saying, His Church was his Wife, and he would not part with her because she was poor; and he was much esteem'd by the present King, 'till his strict Adherence to his Marriage, the Pope's Supremacy, and the Nun of Kent, brought this Misfortune upon him.

His Character.

The Sufferings of Sir Thomas

It was more difficult to find Matter against Sir Thomas More; for he was very cautious, and satisfy'd his Conscience by not swearing to the Supremacy, but would not declare against it. Yet he said, The Act was like a Sword with two Edges, for if a Man answer'd one Way, it would confound his Soul, and if another, it would condemn his Body. This was all the Message he sent to Fisher, when he desir'd to know his Opinion about it; he had also said the same to the Duke of Norfolk and some Counsellors that came to examine him. When Rich, the King's Solicitor, came as a private Friend to persuade him to take the Oath, urg'd him with the Act of Parliament, and ask'd him, If he should be made King by Act of Parliament, whether he would acknowledge him? He answer'd, He would; because a King might be made or depos'd by a Parliament; but the Matter of the Supremacy was a Point of Religion, to which the Power of Parliaments did not extend. All this being witness'd against against him, these Particulars were laid together, as amounting to a Denial of the King's Supremacy, and upon this he was judg'd guilty of Treason. He receiv'd his Sentence with that equal Temper of Mind which he had shew'd in both Conditions of Life; expressing great Contempt of the World, and much Weariness in living in it. His usual Facetiousness remain'd with him to the last Moment on the Scaffold; and that Way of Railery had been so customary to him, that Death did not discompose him, nor put him out of his ordinary Humour: Which some too justly censur'd as little and indecent, and as having more of the Stoick, than the Christian in it. He was beheaded on the sixth of July, in the fifty third Year of his Age; being a Man of great Capacities and eminent Virtues, who in his Youth had freer Thoughts, but was afterwards much corrupted by Superstition, became fierce for all the Interests of the Superstitious Clergy, and wrote much in Defence of the old Abuses. The Execution of these two great Men, chiefly upon a Point of Conscience, may justly be reckon'd among the Blemishes of that Reign: Yet we cannot but observe the Justice of Heaven, in thus retaliating their own Severities to others; for as Fisher grievously prosecuted the Preachers of Luther's Doctrine, so More's Hand was heavy upon them, as long as he had Power, and he shew'd them no Mercy, but the Extremity of the Law, which himself felt now to be very heavy indeed.

His Character.

These Instances and Examples, unquestionably struck a Terror into the Nation, and much hasten'd that great Work of the Reformation, so much desir'd by many pious Persons in the Kingdom. Queen Anne gave particular Encouragement to it, and took Latimer and Shaxton to be her Chaplains, and promoted them to the Bishopricks of Worcester and Salisbury. Arch-Bishop Cranmer was fully convinc'd of the Necessity of it, and that he might carry it on with true Judgment, and justify it by good Authorities, he made a famous Collection of the Opinions of the ancient Fathers, and later Doctors, in all the Points of Religion. He was a Man of rare Candor, Patience and Industry; and so on all Accounts admirably prepar'd for that Work, to which Providence did now call him; and tho' he seem'd in some Things too much subject to the King's Imperious Temper, yet he always shew'd he wanted not the Courage that became a Bishop in such critical Times. Next to him was Secretary Cromwell, his great and constant Friend; a Man of mean Birth, being the Son of a Blacksmith, but of noble and shining Qualities, as appear'd in two signal Instances; the one was his hearty Pleading in Parliament for his fallen and disgrac'd Master the Cardinal, when others more oblig'd had abandon'd him; a rare Demonstration of Gratitude in a Court, to a sinking Favourite. The other was, That when he was in the height of his Greatness, hapning to see a decay'd Merchant of Lucca, who had pity'd and reliev'd him, when he was a poor Stranger in Italy, but did not as much as know him, or pretend to any Returns for the small Favours formerly shew'd him, he treated him with such extraordinary Acknowledgments, that it became the Subject of several Pens, which shew'd who should most celebrate his Generosity. Having by his great Qualifications rais'd himself to the King's Favour, he was this Year made Vicar General, and Visitor of all the Monasteries and Churches of England, with a Delegation of the King's Supremacy to him; he was also empower'd to give Commissions subaltern to himself; and all Wills, where the Estate exceeded two hundred Pounds, were to be prov'd in his Court. This Power was afterwards enlarg'd, and he was made not only a Baron and Privy-Seal, but likewise the King's Vice-gerent in Ecclesiastical Matters, and had the Precedence of all Persons next the Royal Family; and his Authority was in all Points the same, that the Legates had in the Time of Popery: For as the King's Authority succeeded that of the Pope, so the King's Vice-gerent was the same in Power that the Legate's had formerly been.

The Regular Clergy hate the present Establishment.

The King and his Ministers being resolv'd to proceed, the Bishops and Abbots us'd all reasonable Methods to free the King of any Jealousies that might be rais'd concerning them. At Oxford a publick Determination was made, to which every Member assented, That the Pope had no more Authority in England, than any other Foreign Bishop. But the Regular Clergy, the Monks and Friars, whose Houses and Government was generally exempted from their Bishop's Jurisdiction, and more immediately dependent on the Pope, 'till this late Change, were secretly averse, tho' openly complying. And having by a thousand Artifices gain'd the Opinion of the People, it was therefore resolv'd that some effectual Means should be taken for lessening their Credit and Authority among the Vulgar. Upon which Doctor Leighton, who had been in the Cardinal's Service with Cromwell, propos'd a general Visitation of all the Monasteries and Religious Houses in England; and judg'd that nothing could reconcile the Nation so much to the King's Supremacy, as to see some good Effects flow from it. Others thought this too bold a Step, and that it might prove too dangerous a Provocation to the Religious; yet it was known that they were guilty of such prodigious Disorders, that nothing could so effectually keep them in awe, as a strict Enquiry into them. To this the Arch-Bishop led the Way by a Metropolitan Visitation, for which he obtain'd the King's Licence; he took care to see the Pope's Name struck out of all the Churches, and to have the King's Supremacy acknowledg'd.

A general Visitation of the Monasteries.

In October the grand Visitation of the Monasteries began, to the Terror of great Numbers of impious and scandalous Persons of both Sexes. They were then about six hundred in Number, and very lowly valu'd at near two hundred thousand Pounds per Annum, besides vast Riches in many of them; and several of them had the Privilege of Sanctuaries to all that fled to them. The numerous Abuses, arising from the Nature of their Institutions, as well as the Practices of the Monks, caus'd many to desire a Dissolution; and the King himself urg'd it forwards upon several Accounts. He design'd to erect new Bishopricks, in order to which it was necessary to convert some of their Revenues: He also apprehended a War from the Emperor, and for that end, he intended to fortifie his Harbours, and to encourage Shipping and Trade, upon which the Ballance of the World began then to turn: And in order to that he resolv'd to make use of the Wealth of those Houses, and judg'd the best Way to effect it would be first to expose their Abominations, that they might lose their Esteem, and make way for their Suppression. The Arch-Bishop promoted the same, both because these Houses were founded upon gross Errors and Abuses, and subsisted by them, and that these were necessary to be remov'd, if a Reformation was pursu'd. The Extent of several Dioceses were too great to be manag'd by one Bishop; therefore he design'd to have more Bishopricks founded, and to have Houses at every Cathedral for the Education of those who should be employ'd in the Pastoral Charge. For this famous Visitation many Commissioners were employ'd, and nice Instructions were given to them, desiring them to inquire into all manner of Abuses and Neglects. These went all over England, according to their Precincts, and found in many Places most monstrous Impieties and Disorders. All the Sins of Sodom were found in many Houses, great Factions and barbarous Cruelties were in others, and in some they found Instruments for Coining Mony. The Report which was made at their Return contain'd many abominable Particulars, not fit to be mention'd by a Christian, or a modest Pen; some of which were Printed, but the greatest Part are lost. Upon these Discoveries, some of the Houses immediately surrender'd to the King, the first of which was Langden in Kent; which Example was follow'd by two others in the same Year, and four more in that which follow'd.

Reg. 27.

The same Year the Parliament met in February, after a Prorogation of fourteen Months; and one main Business of this Session was the suppressing all the Monasteries under two hundred Pounds a Year. Accordingly an Act was made,
Setting

Setting forth the infinite Disorders of those smaller Houses, and the many unsuccessful Attempts that had been made to reform them; therefore the Religious that were in them, were order'd to be remov'd into the larger Houses, where Religion was better observ'd, and the Revenues of them were given to the King. Those Houses, which were three hundred and seventy in Number, were much richer than they seem'd to be: For an Abuse that had run over Europe, of keeping the Rents of the Church at their first Rates, and exacting great Fines upon all Occasions, was so gross in those Houses, that some rated but at two hundred Pounds were in real Value worth many thousands. In this Parliament an Act was made of another Nature, which had been long projected, which was for the intire uniting and incorporating of the Principality of Wales with the Kingdom of England; which was now completely effected, two hundred and fifty two Years after that Country had been conquer'd or reduc'd by King Edward the First. In the Convocation, which sat at the same Time, a Motion was made for translating the Bible into English, which had been formerly promis'd when Tindal's Translation was condemn'd. The Matter was fully debated on both Sides, and at length by the Means of the Arch-Bishop and some others, it was carry'd in the Affirmative; and by Queen Anne's Interest it was so far promoted at Court, that Orders were given for the performing of it with all Expedition. After all Business was finish'd, this famous Parliament, which had done the King such eminent Service, and had now sat six Years, was dissolv'd on the fourteenth of April.

The lesser of them suppress'd by the Parliament.

The Parliament dissolv'd.

But before this happen'd, the afflicted and unfortunate Queen Catharine, who had often been the Subject of their Debates, dy'd at Kimbolton, in Huntingtonshire. Her Sufferings begot great Compassion in the People, and all the superstitious Clergy zealously supported her Interests; but now her Troubles ended with her Life. She desir'd to be bury'd among the Observant Friars, who had suffer'd most for her; and order'd five hundred Masses for her Soul, and that one of her Women should go on Pilgrimage to our Lady of Walsingham, and give two hundred Nobles on her Way to the Poor. When she found Death approaching, she wrote to the Emperor, earnestly recommending her Daughter Mary to his Care; and likewise to the King, with this Inscription, My dear Lord, King and Husband: In which, 'She forgave him all the Injuries he had done her, desiring him to have regard to his Soul: She recommended her Daughter to his tender Care, and begg'd of him to provide Matches for her three Maids, and to pay her Servants a Year's Wages; and concluded thus, Mine Eyes desire you above all Things. She dy'd in the fiftieth Yeath of her Age, and thirty three after she came into England; and was a sufficient Instance that Greatness and Happiness are of two distinct Natures. She was a devout and exemplary Lady, who us'd to work much with her own Hands among her Women; and the Severities and Devotions that were known to her Priests, and her Alms-Deeds join'd to her Misfortunes, rais'd a high Esteem of her in all sorts of People. The King indeed often complain'd of her uneasy Temper; but that perhaps was to be imputed as much to the Provocations he gave her, as to any Soweriness in her own. The King receiv'd the News of her Death not without Tears; and order'd her to be bury'd in the Abby Church at Peterborough. But Queen Anne did not carry her Death so decently as became a happy Rival; expressing too much Joy, both in her Behaviour and her Habit.

The Death of Queen Catharine.

Her Character.

It was but a few Months after, that this flourishing Queen met with a Fall more unfortunate and fatal than the other; which in all Probability was occasion'd by those who now began to be distinguish'd by the Name of the Romish Party. For the King now proceeding both at home and abroad in the Point of Reformation, they found that the Interest the Queen had in him, was the great Obstacle of their Designs: She increas'd not only in the King's Esteem, but in the Love of the Nation; and in the last nine Months of her Life, she gave above fourteen thousand Pounds in Alms to the Poor, and was much employ'd in doing of Good. But many Circumstances contributed to her Ruin. Soon after Queen Catharine's Death, she brought forth a dead Son, which was believ'd to have made some unfortunate Impression on the King's Mind. It was also consider'd by some Courtiers, That now Queen Catharine was dead, the King might marry another Wife, and be fully reconcil'd with the Pope and Emperor: And the Issue by any other Marriage would never be question'd; whereas, while Queen Anne liv'd, the Ground of the Controversie still remain'd, and her Marriage being accounted null from the Beginning, would never be allow'd by the Court of Rome, or any of that Party. With these Reasons of State, the King's Affections too much concurr'd; for he now entertain'd a secret Love for the Lady Jane Seymour, who had all the Charms of Youth and Beauty, and her Humour temper'd between the Gravity of Queen Catharine, and the Gaiety of Queen Anne. The poor unfortunate Queen us'd all possible Arts to blow up an expiring Flame in his Breast; but the King was chang'd, and instead of being warm'd by her Cares, he began to consider them as Artifices to varnish over some other criminal Affection. Her chearful Humour was not always govern'd by the most nice Decency, and exact Rules of Discretion; and her Brother's Wife, a Woman of Infamy, being jealous of her Husband and her, possess'd the King with her own Apprehensions, and fill'd his furious Head with many Stories. Norris, Weston and Brereton the King's Servants, and Smeton a Musician, were by her Enemies thought to be too officious about her; and something was pretended to have been sworn by the Lady Wyngfield at her Death, that determin'd the King, but we find nothing particular. It is reported besides, that when the King held a Tournament at Greenwich, he was displeas'd at the Queen for letting her Handkerchief fall to one for wiping his Face; but this seems a Fiction, because the Parliament was summon'd the Day before that, and then was her Ruin determin'd.

The King jealous of her.

She is imprisoned.

However it was, upon that Day the King confin'd her to her Chamber, and order'd her Brother, and the four foremention'd Persons to be committed to the Tower, and her self to be sent after them the Day following. On the River some Privy-Counsellors came to examine her, but she made deep Protestations of her Innocence; and as she landed at the Tower, she fell down on her Knees, and pray'd Heav'n so to assist her, as she was free from the Crimes laid to her Charge. The Confusion she was in soon rais'd a Storm of Vapours within her; sometimes she laugh'd, and at other Times wept excessively: She was also devout and light by Turns; and sometimes she stood upon her Vindication, and at other Times she confess'd some Indiscretions, which she afterwards deny'd. All about her took Advantage from every Word that fell from her, and sent it immediately to Court. The Duke of Norfolk and others that came to examine her, the better to make Discoveries told her, That both Norris and Smeton had accus'd her; which tho' false had this Effect on her, that it caus'd her to confess some slight Acts of Indiscretion, tho' no ways essential, which totally alienated the King from her. Yet whether these small Acknowledgements were real Truths, or the Effects of Imagination and Hysterical Emotions, is very uncertain. All the Court now turn'd against the miserable Queen, and began to adore a rising Sun; but Cranmer was a Stranger to those Arts, and had a more noble Soul; therefore her Enemies procur'd an Order for him not to come to Court. Yet he put all to hazard, and wrote the King a long and nice Letter in that critical Juncture, in which 'he acknowledg'd if the Crimes reported of the Queen were true, it was the greatest Affliction that ever befel the King, and therefore exhorted him to bear it with Patience and Submission to the Will of God: He confess'd he never had a better Opinion of any Woman than of her; and that next the King, he was more oblig'd to her, than to all Persons living; and therefore he begg'd the King's leave to pray

‘pray that she might be found Innocent: He lov’d her not a little, because of the Love which she seem’d to bear to God, and his Gospel; but if she were guilty, all that lov’d the Gospel must hate her, as having given the greatest Slander to the Gospel: But he pray’d the King not to entertain any Prejudice to the Gospel on her Account, nor give the World reason to say, That his Love to that was founded on the Power she had with him. But jealousy, and the King’s new Affection; had now defac’d all the Remainders of Esteem for his once belov’d Queen: Therefore Norris, Weston, Brereton and Smeton were all brought to their Trial at Westminster-Hall. They all pleaded not guilty; only Smeton, probably in hopes of saving his Life, confess’d Lewdness with the Queen; and he with the other three were pronounc’d guilty, and condemn’d to die as Traitors.

Three Days after the Queen of England by an unheard of President was brought to the Bar, and indicted of High-Treason, before the Duke of Norfolk, as High-Steward, and a Court of twenty seven Peers. Her Brother, then a Peer, was also try’d with her, and the Crime charg’d upon her was, That she had procur’d her Brother and four others to lye with her, and had often said, That the King never had her Heart; all which was to the Slander of the Issue begotten between the King and her, and was Treason by the Act that confirm’d her Marriage: So that the same Act that was made for her Marriage, was now turn’d to her Ruin; which had too near Resemblance to a Punishment from Heaven. It does not appear that any living Evidence was brought against her; for Smeton, already condemn’d, could be of no use; and he never being brought to confront her, gave great Suspicion, that his Confession was extorted by bare Practices. All the Evidence we find, was the Declaration of a dead Woman; yet this, or rather the Terror of offending the King, so wrought on the Lords, that they found her, and her Brother guilty; and Judgment was given, that she should be burnt, or beheaded at the King’s Pleasure. Yet all this did not satisfy the enraged King; he resolv’d likewise to illegitimate his Daughter Elizabeth, and in order to that to annul his Marriage with the Queen. It was now remember’d that the Earl of Northumberland had said to Cardinal Wolsey, That he had engag’d himself so far with her, that he could not recede; which perhaps was done by some Promise conceiv’d in Words of the Future Tense, tho’ no Promise, unless in Words of the Present Tense, could annul the subsequent Marriage. Perhaps the Queen did not understand that Difference; or probably the Terrors of her Execution wrought so upon her, that she confess’d a Contract with the Earl; tho’ that Lord positively deny’d it, and took the Sacrament upon it, with a Wish that it might turn to his Damnation, if ever there were either Contract or Promise of Marriage between them. However she was secretly carry’d to Lambeth, where upon her Examination, and her own Acknowledging a Precontract, her Marriage was regularly declar’d null from the Beginning. These two Sentences pass’d upon her were inconsistent and contradictory; for if she never was the King’s Wife, she could not be guilty of Adultery; because, if she was not truly marry’d, there could be no Breach of the Faith of Wedlock. But the impatient King was now resolv’d to be freed from her, and the Succession of her Issue; and in that Transport did not consider, That the Method he took, discover’d the Injustice of his Proceedings.

The abandon’d Queen having Intimations given her to prepare for Death; among other Things she reflect’d on her Carriage to the Princess Mary, to whom she had been too severe a Step-Mother: Therefore causing one of her Women to sit in the Chair of State, she fell down on her Knees before her, and with a Flood of Tears charg’d her to go to the Princess Mary, and in that Posture, and in her Name, to ask her Forgiveness for all she had done against her. This generous Tenderness of Conscience gave much Credit to the continual Proclamations of her Innocence, which she made to the last. The Day before her Death,

Death, she sent her last moving Message to the King, asserting her Innocence, and recommending her Daughter to his Care; and particularly she thank'd him for advancing her from a Gentlewoman to be a Marchioness, and then to be a Queen, and now when he could raise her no higher on Earth, for sending her to be a Saint in Heaven. On the Day she dy'd, the Lieutenant of the Tower wrote to Secretary Cromwell, 'That it was not fit to publish the Time of her Execution, for the fewer that were present it would be the better; since he believ'd she would declare her Innocence at the Hour of her Death; for that she had made great Protestations of it, when she receiv'd the Sacrament, and seem'd to long for Death, and had great Joy and Pleasure in it: She was glad to hear the Executioner was good, for she said she had a little Neck, at which she laugh'd heartily. A little before Noon, on the nineteenth of May, she was brought a pitious Sight to the Scaffold, where were present some of the chief Officers and great Men of the Court, to behold the last Scene of this fatal Tragedy. It seems she was prevail'd out of Regard to her Daughter, to make no Reflexions on the Hardships she sustain'd, nor to say any Thing touching the Grounds on which Sentence pass'd against her, only she desir'd, That all would judge the best: She highly commended the King, and so took her leave of the World. She was for some time in her private Devotions, and concluded To Christ I commend my Soul; upon which the Executioner, who was brought from Calais on this Occasion, dextrously sever'd her Head from her Body; and both were put into an ordinary Chest, and bury'd in the Chappel in the Tower. Norris was much urg'd to accuse her, and had his Life promis'd him upon that Condition; but he generously rejected the base Offer, declaring, That he knew her Innocent, and he would die a thousand Deaths rather than defame her: So he and the other three were beheaded, and all continu'd to vindicate her to the last Moment. Smeton only was hang'd, and it was said, that he retracted all before he dy'd, but of that, there is no Certainty. Thus fell the unfortunate Queen in the twenty ninth Year of her Age, after she had been marry'd about four Years and a half; and this uncommon Transaction met with various Censures. Some observ'd that she who had supplanted Queen Catharine, did now meet with harder Measure; and they judg'd her faint Way of speaking concerning her Innocence at last, was too great a Compliment to the King: Yet she wrote a Letter to the King in so high a Strain both of natural Wit and Eloquence, in her Justification, that it may be reckon'd one of the best compos'd Pieces of that Time. The violent and jealous Behaviour of the King in this Matter can never be vindicated; and nothing more clearly discover'd the secret Cause of the Queen's Ruin, than his marrying Jane Seymour, Daughter to Sir John Seymour, the very next Day after her Execution. This Lady gain'd more upon him than any of his Wives; for she was so happy as not to out-live his Love to her.

Her Execution.

The King's third Marriage with Jane Seymour.

A. D. IX. The active and disturb'd King Henry, from the Blood of his Subjects, had now ventur'd upon that of his Wife; and upon this Turn of Affairs there succeeded a great Change of Counsels. There was nothing now that kept up the Breach between him and the Emperor, but the Illegitimation of the Princess Mary, now about twenty Years of Age; and if that Matter could be adjusted, the King would meet with no further Disturbance from him: Therefore it was propos'd, that she might be restor'd to Favour, upon making her Submission to her Father. She offer'd to confess the Fault of her former Obstinacy, and in general, to yield up her Understanding entirely to the King: But that would not satisfy, unless she would be more particular; so that at length she was contented to do it in the fullest Terms that could be desir'd: 'She acknowledg'd the King to be the Supream Head of the Church of England under Christ, and utterly renounc'd the Authority of the Bishop of Rome, and promis'd in all Things to be obedient to the Laws then made; all which

The Princess Mary's Submission.

flow'd from her inward Belief and Judgment, in which she would for ever continue: And she also did acknowledge that the King's Marriage with her Mother, was unlawful and incestuous, both by the Laws of God and Man. All this she wrote with her own Hand, and subscrib'd it; upon which she was receiv'd into Favour, and an Establishment was made for a Family about her, in which forty Pound a Quarter was all the Allowance for her Privy-Purse, so great was the Frugality of that Time. The hopeful Princess Elizabeth continu'd to be educated with great Care, and was so forward, that before she was four Years old, she both wrote a good Hand, and understood Italian; and there are Letters extant written by her in that Language to the new Queen Jane, when she was with Child, in which she subscrib'd her self Daughter.

About this Time a new Parliament was summon'd, which met on the eighth Day of June: When the Chancellor told them, That the King had call'd them to settle the Succession of the Crown, in case he should die without Children lawfully begotten, and to repeal the Act made concerning his Marriage with Queen Anne. After some Debates and Consideration, upon the thirtieth of June a Bill was brought in accordingly, which was soon dispatch'd without Opposition: 'By it the Attainder of Queen Anne and her Accomplices was confirm'd, as likewise were both the Sentences of Divorce upon the King's two former Marriages; and the Issue by both was Illegitimated, and for ever excluded from claiming the Crown by Lineal Descent: And the Succession was establish'd on the King's Issue by the present Queen, or any to whom he might afterwards marry. But because it was not proper to declare who should succeed in Default of that, lest the Person so nam'd should raise Com-motions, in Confidence of the King's Wisdom, and Affection to his People, he was allow'd to nominate his Successor, either by Letters Patents, or by his last Will sign'd by his Hand. It was declar'd Treason to maintain the Lawfulness of his former Marriages, or of his Issue by them; and it was made not only Treason, but a Forfeiture of the Right of Succession, if any of those whom the King should name in Default of others, should endeavour to usurp before them. The Scots complain'd of this Act, by which the King was now made Sovereign indeed, and had the Crown put intirely into his Hands, to be dispos'd of at his Pleasure; and his Daughters were now wholly to depend upon his Will: By this also he had it in his Power in a great Measure to pacifie the Emperor, by providing that his Kinswoman Mary might succeed to the Crown.

About the same Time the new Pope Paul, who upon the Execution of Bishop Fisher, had thunder'd out a formidable Sentence of Deposition against the King, the Queens Catharine and Anne, who were the Occasions of the Breach, being now dead, he thought it a proper Season to endeavour for a Reconciliati-on; and therefore order'd Cassali to acquaint the King, That he had always favour'd his Cause when he was a Cardinal, that he was forc'd contrary to his Inclinations to pass Sentence against him; and that now it would be easie for him to recover the Favour of the Apostolick Sec. But the King instead of harkning to the Proposition, procur'd two Acts to be pass'd, 'The one was for the utter extinguishing the Pope's Authority; and it was made a Premu-nire, for any to acknowledge it, or persuade others to it: And a strict Charge was given to all Magistrates under severe Penalties to enquire after all Offenders. By another Act, All Bulls, and Privileges flowing from them, were declar'd null and void, excepting Marriages, or Consecrations of Bishops; all which were also requir'd to be brought into Chancery, upon which the Arch-bishop was to make a new Grant of them, which being confirm'd by the great Seal, was to be of full Force in Law. In this Parliament another Act pass'd, explaining an Exception that was in the Act for the Residence of all Incum-bents, by which those who were in the Universities were dispens'd with Non-Residence. Another Act pass'd in Favour of the King's Heire, if they should reign before they were of full Age; 'That whatever Acts were made before they 'were twenty four Years of Age, they might repeal and annul by their Letters 'Patents. From all these Acts it appears, that the King was absolute Master both of the Affections and Fears of his Subjects, when in a new Parliament suddenly call'd, and sitting but six Weeks before it was dissolv'd, Acts of such high Importance were pass'd, without any publick Protestation or Opposition.

The Acts of the Convocation.

Articles concluded.

During this Session of Parliament the Convocation was no less busily employ'd; and one of the first Things they did was to confirm the Sentence of the Divorce of the King's Marriage with Queen Anne. They acknowledg'd the King Supream Head of the Church, and proceeded to many Points of Religion, and to many Complaints of Corruptions and Abuses. Most Mens Eyes began now to be open'd, yet many being blinded by Interest and Design, several Contests were rais'd, and some Attempts made to the Detriment of Cranmer, Shaxton and Latimer, and other Promoters of the Reformation. But all Projects fail'd that were levell'd at Cranmer, who was fully establish'd in the King's Favour; and Cromwell was sent to them with a Messagc from the King, 'That 'they should reform the Rites and Ceremonies of the Church, according to the 'Rules of Scripture, which ought to be prefer'd to all Glosses or Decrees of 'Popes. This being debated it occasion'd new Discussions and Disputations, which might have been prosecuted with too much Warmth, had not the King to end Differences sent a Scheme of about ten Atticles to be consider'd by that learned Body. These establish'd the Authority of Scriptures, the three Creeds, and the four general Councils; as likewise three of the seven Romish Sacraments, Baptism, the Eucharist and Penance, with a truer Notion of Justification, and the Use of some Ceremonies. After some Consideration these Articles were sign'd by Cromwell, the two Arch-Bishops, sixteen Bishops, forty Abbots and Priors, and fifty of the lower House; to which the King join'd a Preface, declaring the Pains he and his Clergy had undergone for removing of all Differences in Religion, approving of the Articles, and requiring all his Subjects to accept them with the like Unanimity with which they were subscrib'd. These Articles did not satisfy either the strict Reformers, or the Romish Party: Yet the former were well pleas'd to see Things brought under Examination; and since some Things were at this Time chang'd, they did not doubt but more Changes would follow: They were glad to find the Scriptures and the ancient Creeds made the Standards of Faith, without Tradition, and that the Nature of Justification was rightly stated, and that some gross Abuses were remov'd, tho' there remain'd still some hard of Digestion. Some of the stricter Sort thought that these Articles had too much of a Political Compliance; and that it was agreeable with the Sincerity of the Gospel, still to allow of so many Errors. To which it was answer'd, 'That our Saviour did not deliver all Things to his Disciples, 'till they were able to bear them; and the Apostles did not at once abolish all the Rights of Judaism, but by a gentle Progress wean'd their Christian Converts from them. The Clergy were to be drawn by slow and easie Steps out of their Ignorance and Superstition; whereas driving forwards with Precipitation, might ruin the Design, and alienate those who by slower Methods might be gain'd; and it also might much endanger the Peace of the Nation.

When these things were known in Foreign Parts, the Court of Rome made great Advantage of them, to let all Princes see the Necessity of adhering to the Holy See; for as soon as England departed from that, it began also to change the Doctrine. The Pope had issu'd out Summons for a general Council at Mantua, and had cited the King to it; from which the King appeal'd to a general Council rightly constituted. And a Motion being made that the Convocation should deliver their Opinion in this Particular, they drew up a Paper, 'In which they set forth the great Good that might follow from a general 'Council rightly call'd; but that nothing could be more mischievous, than one call'd call'd on private Malice and Design: And they thought neither the Pope, nor any one Prince, had sufficient Authority to call one, unless all Princes, who had intire and supream Government over all their Subjects, did agree and concur. This was sign'd by the whole Body on the twentieth of July, and so the Convocation dismiss'd. Shortly after the King publish'd a long and severe Protestation against the Council summon'd by the Pope; first denying that he had any Authority to summon his Subjects, and next shewing that no Advantage could be expected from any Council where the Pope presided, Since the restraining his exorbitant Power was one of the chief Occasions that the World had for a Council. Many Books were written on both Sides, upon this and other Subjects, in these busie Times: But none appear'd more industrious than Cardinal Pool, who by his Mother was descended from the Duke of Clarence, Brother to King Edward the Fourth; and was likewise by his Father the King's near Kinsman. To this high Quality was join'd a great Sweetness of Temper, and Disposition for Letters, which the King cherish'd much, and gave him the Deanery of Exeter, and some other Preferments, designing him the highest Dignities in the Church. He liv'd many Years in foreign Parts; and at Paris he first incurr'd the King's Displeasure, in obstructing the Determinations of the French Universities for his Divorce; yet after that he came to England, and was present when the Convocation declar'd the King to be their Supream Head. But the King suffering him to go out of the Nation, he could never draw him back again: Instead of which he wrote severely against all the King's Proceedings, comparing him to Nebuchadnezzar; and addressing himself to the Emperor, he pray'd him rather to turn his Arms against King Henry than the Turk. This Indignity, which was High-Treason in a Subject, so far provok'd the King, that it afterwards drew a heavy Storm upon all his Kindred.

Cardinal Pool's Actions.

But nothing could stop the Progress of the vigorous King and his Ministers, who pursuant to the Act of Parliament, now proceeded to the Dissolution of the lesser Monasteries. Commissioners were appointed, and requir'd to carry along with them the Concurrence of the Gentry near them, and to examine the exact Value of their Revenues and Goods: They were to try how many of the Religious would take Capacities, and return to a secular Course of Life; but those who design'd to continue in that State, were to be sent to the larger adjacent Monasteries; and a Pension was to be assign'd to the Abbot, or Prior, during Life. There were loud Complaints made against the Proceedings of these Commissioners, both of their Violences and Briberies, and probably not without Reason, in the midst of so many Temptations and Opportunities. About ten thousand of the Religious were sent to seek their Livings, with forty Shillings and a Gown to each Man. The Goods and Plate were estimated at a hundred thousand Pounds, and the valu'd Rents of their Houses at thirty two thousand Pounds, which were really worth above ten Times as much. The Churches and Cloisters were in most Places pull'd down, and the Materials sold; all which gave a general Discontent, and the Monks were now as much pity'd, as they were formerly detested. It was thought prodigious to see the King devour what his Ancestors had dedicated to God and his Saints. The Nobility and Gentry, who often provided for their younger Children and Friends in those Sanctuaries, were sensible of their Loss: The People, who had been fed at the Abbot's Tables, and in Travelling found those to be Places of Reception for Strangers, immediately saw the Inconvenience: But the more superstitious, who thought their Friends must now lye still in Purgatory, without that Relief procur'd by their Masses, were out of measure offended at these Proceedings. The mighty Disorders of these Houses had now but small Effects upon the People, who alledg'd That there was no Reason to destroy whole Foundations for the sake of some vicious Persons, who ought to have been expell'd and made Examples.

The Dissolution of the lesser Monasteries.

Great Discon-tents.

Cromwell's Policy.

To remove this general Discontent, the politick Cromwell advis'd the King to sell these Lands at very easie Rates to the Nobility and Gentry, and to oblige them to retain the wonted Hospitality; which would be both grateful to them, and engage them to assist the Crown in all the late Alterations; and would be pleasing to the People, when they found the the old Hospitality preserv'd. And upon a Clause in the Act empowering the King to found a-new such Houses as he should think fit, there were fifteen Monasteries, and sixteen Nunneries, which were more regular than the rest, refounded, or rather re-priev'd, 'till the general Dissolution came afterwards. But all this did not so pacifie the People, but still there was a great Outcry fomented by many of the Clergy, who laid great Weight upon this Notion, That King Henry, being an Heretical Prince, and actually depos'd by the Pope in the preceding Year, was no longer to be acknowledg'd; and this for five hundred Years had been receiv'd as an Article of Faith, and was decreed in the same Council that establish'd Transubstantiation. To allay or divert these Disturbances, some Injunctions were publish'd in the King's Name by Cromwell, relating chiefly to the regular Behaviours, and faithful Duties of the Clergy of the Nation, which was the first Act of pure Supremacy done by the King. This increas'd the ill Disposition; for the Romish Clergy detested this President of the King's giving Injunctions without the Concurrence of a Convocation, and by which, they alledg'd, they should be made Slaves to his Vice-gerent: They also complain'd of those heavy Taxes that were laid upon them; and that Images, Relicks, and Pilgrimages would by these Injunctions be brought under great Contempt. Both the Regular and Secular Clergy were so sensibly concern'd in these Things, that they us'd all Methods to inflame the People. The great Abbots were not wanting in the same Design; they were now burden'd with the Crouds of those who were sent to them from the suppress'd Houses, and they expected to meet with the same Fate: Nor were the Fears remov'd by a Letter that was sent about in the King's Name for silencing all Reports that were given out of his Intentions to suppress them; for this rather increas'd than lessen'd their Jealousie.

New Complaints.

A Rebellion in Lincolnshire.

The People continu'd quiet 'till they had reap'd their Harvest; but in the Beginning of October twenty thousand rose in Lincolnshire, led by one Doctor Mackrel, Prior of Barlings in that County, and disguis'd like a Cobler. They took an Oath to be true to God, the King, and the Common-wealth, and sent a Paper of their Grievances to the King; 'In which they complain'd of some 'Acts of Parliament, of the Suppression of many Religious Houses, of mean 'and ill Counsellors, and bad Bishops; praying the King to redress their Grievances by the Advice of the Nobility: But still they acknowledg'd him to be 'their Supream Head, and that the Tenths and First-Fruits of Livings belong'd 'of Right to him. The King sent the Duke of Suffolk to levy Forces against them, and to give an Answer to their Petition; declaring, 'It was not the 'Business of the Multitude to direct Princes what Counsellors to chuse: The 'Religious Houses were suppress'd by Law, and the Heads of them had under 'their Hands confess'd such scandalous Enormities as were a Reproach to the 'Nation; and since in many of them there were not above four Persons, who 'wasted the whole Rents in riotous Living, it was much better to apply them 'to the common Good of the Nation, than leave them in such Hands: He requir'd them to submit to his Mercy, and to put two hundred of their Leaders 'into the Hands of his Lieutenants. The discontented Clergy having brought such Numbers together, us'd all Methods to inspire Heat and Spirit into them, and perswaded them, That if they did not now maintain their Faith and Liberties, both would be lost. Some of the Gentry were compell'd to join with them for their own Preservation; and they sent Advices to the Duke of Suffolk, to procure the Offer of a general Pardon from the King, which would effectually dissipate them. At the same Time there was a more formidable Insurrection

in Yorkshire, which being in the Neighbourhood of Scotland, was like to draw Assistance from that Kingdom; tho' their King was then gone into France, to marry Francis's Daughter. This mov'd King Henry to use more Expedition in settling the Affairs of Lincolnshire: He sent them secret Assurances of Mercy, which so prevail'd on the greatest Part, that they dispers'd themselves, and the most obstinate repair'd to them in Yorkshire. Mackrel the pretended Cobler, and some few others, were taken and executed.

As to the Northern Rebellion, the Distance of the People from the Court, gave them Time to form themselves into a better Method: One Ask, a Gentle- ^{Another in} man, commanded in Chief, and perform'd his Part with great Dexterity. ^{Yorkshire} Their March and Progress was call'd The Pilgrimage of Grace, having on their Banners and their Sleeves the five Wounds of our Saviour; and they took an Oath to restore the Church, suppress Hereticks, preserve the King and his Issue, and drive from him all mean born Men and ill Counsellors. In a few Days their Number increas'd to forty thousand; and meeting with no Opposition, they forc'd the Arch-Bishop of York and the Lord Darcy to swear to their Covenant, and to go along with them. They invested Skipton, but the ^{more formidable.} Earl of Cumberland secur'd it against them; and Sir Ralph Evers bravely held out Scarborough Castle, tho' for twenty Days he and his Men had no Provisions but Bread and Water. There was also an Insurrection in all the other Northern Counties, against whom the valiant Earl of Shrewsbury made Head; and the King sent several of the Nobility to his Assistance, particularly the Duke of Norfolk, who join'd him with some regular Troops. These Noble Men possess'd themselves of Doncaster, and resolv'd to secure that Pass 'till the rest of the Forces order'd by the King should come up to them; for they were not in a Condition to engage with such Numbers of desperate Men; and it was probable, upon any Misfortune, the People would have risen on all Sides. Therefore the Duke of Norfolk resolv'd to keep intirely to Doncaster, and suffer the Rage as well as Provisions of the Rebels to spend, and then by gaining a little Time, they might pobably fall into Factions, and so dissolve their Power. They were now decreas'd to thirty thousand; but the King's Forces were not above the sixth of that Number. The Duke of Norfolk politically propos'd a Treaty, and caus'd some to go amongst them as Deserters, and spread Reports that their Commanders were making private Terms for themselves. They were perswaded to send their Petitions to the Court; and the King to satisfy them of their Security, discharg'd a Rendezvous that he had appointed at Northampton, and sent them a general Pardon, excepting six by Name, and reserving four to be afterwards nam'd: But this threw them all into such Apprehensions, that it made them more resolv'd and desperate; yet the King, to give his People some Content, put out Injunctions, requiring the Clergy to continue the Use of all the Ceremonies of the Church.

At length three hundred were employ'd to carry the Rebels Demands to the King, which were, 'A general Pardon to be granted; a Parliament to be held ^{The Rebels} at York, and Courts of Justice erected there: That some Acts of Parliament ^{Demands.} might be repeal'd; That the Princess Mary might be restor'd to her Right of Succession, and the Pope to his wonted Jurisdiction; That the Monasteries be again restor'd; That Audley Lord Chancellor, and Cromwell Privy-Seal, be remov'd from the King, and that some of the Visitors of Monasteries be imprison'd for Bribery and Extortion. But these being rejected, the Rebels reassum'd their Courage; upon which the Duke of Norfolk advis'd the King to gentle Methods: He in his Heart wish'd that all their Demands might be granted; and the Lord Darcy afterwards accus'd him, as if he had encourag'd them to make them. The King sent him a general Pardon without any Exception, to be us'd according to his Discretion. In the mean Time the Rebels, finding that with the Loss of Time they lost Strength, resolv'd to attack him and force him from Doncaster: But at two several Trials, when they had agreed to pass the River, there fell such Rains, as made it impracticable; which being magnify'd as a Miracle, caus'd very discouraging Impressions. The King sent a long Answer to their Demands, in which ' He assur'd them he would live ' and die in the Defence of the Christian Faith; but the Multitude ought not to ' prescribe to him, and the Convocation in that Matter. As to the Monasteries, he gave the same Answer as he had done to the Men of Lincolnshire. For the Laws, ' They were not to presume to alter what was establish'd; and ' he had govern'd them twenty eight Years with Security to their Estates, and ' Clemency to their Persons. And whereas it was reported that when he began to Reign, he had many of the Nobility in his Council, and now none ' but those of mean Extract; this was false, for at first he found but two Noblemen of his Council, and at present there were seven Temporal Lords and ' four Bishops in it. He found it necessary to have some that were conversant in the Laws of England, and Treaties with Foreign Princes; therefore ' he had call'd Audely and Cromwell to the Board. If they had any Complaints ' to make of any about him, he was ready to hear them; but would not suffer ' them to direct him what Counsellors to employ; nor could they judge of ' the Bishops that were promoted, who were unknown to them: He charg'd ' them not to believe Lies, nor to be govern'd by Incendiaries, but to submit ' to his Mercy. Accordingly on the ninth Day of December, he sign'd a Proclamation of Pardon without any Restrictions.

When this was fully known, and the Rage of the People abated, they were willing to take the Advantage of it; and all the Artifices that some of the Clergy and their Commanders could use, had no other Effect but to draw such Numbers together as brought them under new Guilt, and caus'd them to forfeit the Benefit of the King's Pardon. Many came in and renew'd their Oaths of Allegiance, promising all future Obedience; and Ask was invited to the Court and well treated by the King, that he might learn from him all the secret Correspondences they had in other Parts of the Kingdom; for the Disposition to rebel was general, only all had not the like Opportunities. It was particularly believ'd that the great Abbots cherish'd the Rebellion; for which some of them were afterwards try'd and attainted. The Lord Darcy earnestly pleaded his great Age, being then fourscore, and the eminent Services he had done the Crown for fifty Years together, and that he was compell'd for his own Preservation to go along with the Rebels; but yet he was put into Prison. This gave the Clergy an Occasion to infuse into the People, that the King's Pardon was precarious; so that eight thousand flock'd together again, and endeavour'd to surprize Carlisle; but the Duke of Norfolk set upon them and routed them, and by Martial Law hang'd their Captains and seventy other Persons. Others design'd to have surpriz'd Hull, but were likewise defeated, and many of them executed. Many other small Insurrections were soon dispers'd; and the Duke of Norfolk's Vigour and Vigilance was so remarkable, that he was ready for them in all Places, before they could make their Numbers considerable; so that in a few Months from the Beginning, the Country was absolutely at rest. Ask left the Court without leave, but was soon retaken and hang'd at York. The Lords Hussy and Darcy were arraign'd at Westminster, and condemn'd by their Peers; the one for the Lincolnshire, and the other for the Yorkshire Rebellion. Hussy was beheaded at Lincoln, and Darcy on the Tower-Hill; the last being much lamented upon the Account of his old Age and former Services. In his Trial he accus'd the Duke of Norfolk of favouring the Rebels; but his late Services were such, as the King would not seem to have any Jealousie of him. After these and other Executions, the King proclaim'd a general Amnesty in July, by which the Nation was again put in a quiet Condition; and the threatening Storm dissipated without the Effusion of much Blood but what was drawn by the Sword of Justice. At the same Time James King of Scotland, returning from France with his new Queen, Daughter to

to the French King, and touching on the Court of England, many of the People fell down at his Feet, begging him to assist them, and he should have all; but he was then bound up by his Father-in-law, and therefore return'd home without giving them any Incouragement. And thus ended this Rebellion, which was chiefly promoted by the Romish Clergy, under the Pretence of Religion.

To crown the King's Happiness, not long after, upon the twelfth Day of October, he had a Son born at Hampton-Court; who three Days after, with great Splendor and Solemnity was baptiz'd by the Name of Edward; the Arch-Bishop, and the Duke of Norfolk being his God-Fathers. After he was Christen'd by one of the Bishops, his Name was aloud proclaim'd by Garret King at Arms, and call'd Prince Edward, Duke of Cornwall and Earl of Chester; and so attended by the two Princes, Mary and Elizabeth, he was carry'd to the Queen's Apartment with great State and Magnificence. But the Joy of his Birth was much allay'd by the Departure of the admirable Queen, who, contrary to the common Opinion of many Writers, dy'd twelve Days after the Birth of this Prince, as appears from unquestionable Manuscripts; having been well deliver'd, and without any Incision, as others have maliciously reported. On the twelfth of November, her Body was with great Solemnity convey'd to Windsor, and there magnificently interr'd in the midst of the Choir. This was a great Affliction to the King; for of all his Wives, she was the dearest and most charming to him; and his Grief for that Loss is given as the Reason, why he continu'd two Years a Widower.

The Death of Queen Jane.

X. The prevailing King was now deliver'd from all his Apprehensions of Disturbances at home; he was Master of his own Subjects, and no longer to be disobey'd. For he had not only broken the Rebellion of his People, and by Alliance secur'd himself from the Dangers threaten'd by the Pope; but all the Romish Expectations from the Princess Mary were now clouded by the Birth of Prince Edward. Being thus encourag'd, he resolv'd to proceed in his Designs of suppressing the rest of the Monasteries, and reforming some other Points of Religion. Accordingly a new Visitation was appointed to enquire into the Conversation of the Monks, how they stood affected to the Pope, and how they promoted the King's Supremacy; and likewise to examine what Impostors were among them, either in Images or Relicks, which might work upon the Superstition of the credulous Vulgar. Some few Houses of greater Value, were prevail'd with the former Year to surrender to the King. Many of the Houses that had not been dissolv'd, tho' they were in the former Act, were now suppress'd; and many of the greater Abbots were wrought on to surrender to the King by several Motives: Some had been culpable during the late Rebellion, and so offer'd a Resignation to prevent a future Storm: Others approv'd of the Reformation, and were willing to comply: Some were found guilty of such horrid Disorders, that to prevent a shameful Discovery, they offer'd their Houses to the King, and others had made such Wastes and Dilapidations, that having provided for themselves, they had no Concern for others. Many Abbots and Monks were willing to accept of Pensions for Life, which was generally proportion'd to the Value of their Houses, and Innocence of their Lives. Some who favour'd the Reformation, desir'd to convert their Houses to better Uses, for Preaching, Study and Prayer; and Bishop Latimer earnestly press'd the Vice-gerent Cromwell, that two or three Houses might be reserv'd for such Purposes in every County. But the Resolution was at once taken to extirpate all; and the Visitors proceeded with that Vigour and Expedition, that a hundred and twenty one Houses were this Year resign'd to the King, and thirty three more before the Parliament met. And what further promoted the Downfall of the Monasteries, besides the shameful Disorders of the House, was that many of the Abbots and Priors were found guilty of Rebellion and Treason, for which several were executed.

Yet

Several Impostures discover'd.

Yet all these personal Blemishes did not work much on the Peoples Mind, to whom it seem'd unreasonable to extirpate noble Foundations, for the Crimes of some Individuals. Therefore another Method was pursu'd, which had better Effect: They discover'd many Impostures about Relicks, and wonderful Images, to which Pilgrimages were usually made. Among many other, The Rood of Grace at Boxley in Kent, had been highly esteem'd, and drawn many Pilgrims to it. It was observ'd to bow, and roll its Eyes, and at particular Times look well pleas'd or angry, to the great Admiration of the credulous Multitude: But all this was discover'd to be a Cheat, and it was brought to St. Paul's Cross, where all the Springs were openly shown, that govern'd its several Motions. Many other notorious Impostures were also discover'd, both as to Relicks and Images, which contributed much to the undeceiving the People. The richest Shrine in England was Thomas Becket's at Canterbury, whose Actions and Behaviour may be read in the Reign of King Henry the Second. By the Incouragement of the Court of Rome, his Shrine grew to be of inestimable Value: He had two Holy Days appointed for him, and a Jubilee every fifty Years, with Indulgences granted to all who visited his Tomb; which in the Year 1420 brought no less than a hundred thousand Pilgrims to the Place. It is hard to tell whether the Hatred to his seditious Practices, or the Love of his rich Shrine, did most incite King Henry to Unsaint that Prelate. His Shrine was broken, and the Gold of it was so heavy, that it fill'd two Chests, which were as much as sixteen Men could carry out of the Church; and his Skull, which had been so much worshipp'd, was prov'd to be an imposture; for the true Skull was with the rest of his Bones in his Coffin. His Bones were burnt, according to some; but others say they were so mingled with other Bones, that nothing but a Miracle could have distinguish'd them afterwards.

The Pope's Bull against the King.

When these Transactions were known at Rome, all the eloquent Pens were there employ'd to represent King Henry as the most sacrilegious Tyrant that ever reign'd; who made War with Christ's Vicar on Earth, and his Saints in Heav'n; and he was compar'd to the worst Princes that the World ever saw. In many of these Cardinal Pool's Stile was sufficiently known, and they were all at least much encourag'd by him; which provok'd the King to show implacable Resentments against him and his Family. The Pope proceeded further; for now he publish'd all those Fulminations with which he had threaten'd him three Years before: In which 'He profess'd himself to be God's Vicar on Earth, 'who had Power to eradicate and destroy, and had Authority over all the Kings 'in the World: And therefore after he had enumerated all King Henry's Crimes, 'he requir'd him to appear within ninety Days at Rome, and his Accomplices 'within sixty Days; which if refus'd, he declar'd him to have fallen from his 'Crown, and them from their Estates. He put the whole Kingdom under an 'Interdict; and absolv'd all his Subjects from their Oaths of Allegiance: He 'declar'd him and his Accomplices Infamous; and put their Children under 'Incapacities. He requir'd all the Clergy to go out of England within five 'Days after the prefix'd Time should expire; leaving only so many as might 'serve for baptizing Children, or giving the Sacrament to such as dy'd in Peni- 'tence. He charg'd all his Subjects to rise in Arms against him, and that none 'should assist him. He absolv'd all other Princes from their Confederacies with 'him, and obtested them to have no Commerce with him. He requir'd all 'Christians to make War on him; and to seize on the Persons and Goods of 'all his Subjects, and make Slaves of them. He charg'd all Bishops to publish 'the Sentence with due Solemnities: and ordain'd it to be affix'd at Rome, Tour- 'nay and Dunkirk. This was first given out in the Year 1535; but it had been all this Time suspended, till the Suppression of Monasteries, and the Rumour of burning of Becket's Bones, did so inflame the Pope, that he resolv'd upon the utmost Extremities. Therefore this Year he publish'd the Bull which he declar'd He had long suspended at the Intercession of some Princes, who hop'd that King Henry might have been reclaim'd by gentler Methods; and therefore since his Impieties daily increas'd, he was compell'd to proceed to his highest Censures. The Pope also wrote to the Kings of France and Scotland, to excite them against King Henry; and if this had been an Age of Croisades, no doubt one had been undertaken against him. And thus the Breach between King Henry and the Pope was now past Reconciliation; and at Rome it was declar'd equally meritorious to fight against him, as against Turks and Infidels; and Cardinal Pool made it more meritorious, in a Book of his writing.

The Thunders of the Vatican had now lost their Force; yet to prevent any Inconveniences that might arise, the King procur'd all the Bishops and eminent Divines of England, to sign a Declaration against all Churchmen who pretended to the Power of the Sword, or to Authority over Kings; and all who assum'd such Powers, were Subverters of the Kingdom of Christ. Many of the Bishops did also sign another Paper, declaring the Limits of the Regal and Ecclesiastical Power, that both had their Authority from God, for several Ends, and different Natures; and that Princes were subject to the Word of God, as well as Bishops ought to be obedient to their Laws. There was also another Declaration sign'd by Cromwell, the two Arch-Bishops, eleven Bishops, and twenty Divines, asserting the Distinction between the Power of the Keys, and the Power of the Sword. And to give the clearest Lights, this Year the English Bible was finish'd and publish'd; and Cromwell procur'd a general War-rant from the King, allowing all his Subjects to read it, for which Cranmer wrote his Thanks to Cromwell, Rejoicing to see the Day of Reformation now risen in England, since the Word of God did shine over it all, without a Cloud. Not long after Cromwell issu'd out Injunctions to the Clergy, requiring them all to set up Bibles in their Churches, and to encourage all to read them; with some other Particulars which struck at some of the main Points of the former Superstition, both concerning Images, Pilgrimages, and the Invocation of Saints: But the free Use of the Scriptures gave the most deadly Blow; yet all the Clergy submitted to the Injunctions without Murmuring.

Thus the Reformation increas'd and succeeded daily; yet still the Doctrines of the Real Presence, and of Transubstantiation were retain'd with great Strictness by the King and most Divines. Bishop Gardiner, a subtle Man and secret Enemy to the Reformation, us'd one Topick which prevail'd much with the King, That his Zeal against Heresie was the greatest Advantage that his Cause could have over all Europe; and therefore he press'd him to begin with the Sacramentaries, the Deniers of the Corporal Presence; and those being condemn'd by the German Princes, he had the less Reason to fear the imbroiling his Affairs by his Severities against them. Accordingly a considerable Divine, call'd Lambert, was brought before the King, and with great Solemnity try'd in his Presence, and condemn'd to be burnt for denying the Corporal Presence in the Eucharist. His Execution in Smithfield was very barbarous: For there was not Fire enough under him to consume him suddenly; so that his Legs and Thighs were burnt away while he remain'd alive; yet he bore it with admirable Patience, and continu'd to cry out, None but Christ, none but Christ! This gave some Satisfaction and Life to the Romish Party, and added Vanity to the King, who now made some new Promotions in the Church. Doctor Bonner was advanc'd to the Bishoprick of Hereford, by the Death of Fox; and Stokesby dying not long after, he was translated to London. Cromwell thought he had rais'd a Man that would be a faithful Friend to Cranmer in his Designs of Reformation, who indeed needed Assistants; not only to ballance the Opposition made him by other Bishops, but to diminish the Prejudices he suffer'd by the Weakness and Indiscretion of many of his own Party. For such great Complaints were brought to Court of the Rashness of the new Reforming Preachers, that Cranmer's Interest was sunk so low, that he had scarcely any to depend on but Cromwell. There now wanted a Queen in the King's Bosom to support them; therefore Cromwell continually endeavour'd to ingage the King in such an Alliance with the Princes of Germany, as might prevail with him both in Affection and Interest, to carry on what he had thus began. And the Beauty of Anne of Cleve, Sister to the Duke of Cleve, was so represented to him, that he resolv'd to effect that Match.

A. D. 1539. Reg. 30.
A new Parliament.
The Act of the Six Articles.

But before this could be accomplish'd, a new Parliament was summon'd to meet on the twenty eighth Day of April; to which all the Miter'd Abbots had their Writs. After many Struggles by Cranmer, and some of the Reformers to oppose the present Proceedings, the famous Bill pass'd against Diversity of Opinions in Religion. The Substance of it was, 'That the King being sensible of the Benefit of Union, and the Mischief of Discord, in Matters of Religion, had come to the Parliament in Person, and there laid open many Points of high Learning; and that with the Assent of both Houses, he set forth these six Articles. 1. That in the Eucharist, there was no Substance of Bread and Wine, but only the Natural Body and Blood of Christ. 2. That Christ being entirely in each Kind, the Communion in both was not necessary. 3. That Priests by the Law of God ought not to marry. 4. That Vows of Chastity, taken after the Age of twenty one Years, ought to be kept. 5. That private Masses were lawful and useful. 6. That Auricular Confession was necessary, and ought to be retain'd. Such as did speak or write against the First of these, were to be burnt, without the Benefit of Abjuration; and it was made Felony to dispute against the other Five: And such as did speak against them, the first Offence was Premunire, and the second Felony. Marry'd Priests, who did not put away their Wives, were made guilty of Felony; in those that liv'd incontinently, the first Offence was a Premunire, and the next Felony; and the Female Criminals to be punish'd after the same manner. Those that contemn'd Confession and the Eucharist, and abstain'd from it at the accustom'd Times, for the first Offence incurr'd a Premunire, and the second was Felony. All Proceedings were to be made in the Forms of Common Law, by Presentments and a Jury; and all Churchmen were commanded to read the Act in their Churches once a Quarter. These were call'd the six bloody Articles, which were bravely oppos'd by Arch-Bishop Cranmer in the Parliament, who declar'd himself bound in Conscience to vote against the Act, tho' he was sure it would pass. This Act was receiv'd with great Joy by all the Romish Party, who concluded they had gain'd their Cause: The unhappy Reformers were now expos'd to the Rage of their Enemies, and had no Comfort from any Part of it, but that they were not deliver'd up to the Cruelty of the Ecclesiastical Courts, but were to be try'd by Juries: Yet the Denying the Benefit of Abjuration, was a Severity without Precedent, and was forcing a Martyrdom upon them, since they could have no Advantage from their Apostacy. However they might have some Comfort from what the King declar'd to the German Ambassadors, who were disgusted at the Act, That he did not design to put it in Execution, but upon great Provocation.

An Act for Suppressing the Monasteries.

This Act being pass'd, to the Satisfaction of the Romish Party, another for Suppressing all Monasteries found a more easie Admittance. The Words of the Act seem to run otherwise. 'For by it no Monastery was directly suppress'd, but only the Resignations made, or to be made, were confirm'd; and the King's Right founded either on their Surrenders, Forfeitures, or Attainders of Treason, was declar'd good in Law: All Churches belonging to them, and formerly exempted, were put under the Jurisdiction of the Bishop, or of such as should be appointed by the King. Which last Proviso produc'd a great Mischief to the Church; for many that purchas'd Abby-Lands, had this Clause put in their Grants, That they should be Visitors of the Churches; and by this they still do, or pretend to continue exempted from the Episcopal Jurisdiction.

jurisdiction. As the Monasteries were to be suppress'd, so to counter-balance their Loss, another Bill was brought in to 'empower the King to erect what Bishopricks he thought fit, and to assign what Limits and Divisions, and appoint them what Statutes he pleas'd. The first Draught of the Preamble of this Act was written by the King himself; and indeed he us'd extraordinary Care in correcting both Acts of Parliament and Proclamations with his own Hand. All Papers in Matters of Religion, publish'd by Authority, were revis'd by him, and in many Places large Corrections were made by his own Hand; which manifested both his great Judgment, and his extraordinary Application to Business: And as he was fond of his two acquir'd Titles of Defender of the Faith, and Supream Head of the Church, so he affected nothing more, than to discover his Learning and Understanding in Matters of Religion. He also writ a List of all the new Bishopricks he design'd to erect, which were for the Benefit of nineteen several Counties; and he had form'd a glorious Design of endowing many Sees, and making many other noble Foundations; yet the great Change made in the Councils and Ministry before this took Effect, caus'd but too small a Part of his Designs to be accomplish'd.

In this Parliament several other Statutes were made; particularly an Act to enforce due Obedience to the King's Proclamations, which in some Cases was made Treason. An Act was also made, establishing the Precedence of the Bishops; by which the two Arch-Bishops first, then the Bishops of London and Durham, and then Winchester, as Prelate of the Garter; and all other Bishops were to take Place according to the Date of their Consecrations. Lastly, a Bill of Attainder pass'd, not only confirming the Sentences that had been given against the Marquess of Exeter, the Lord Montacute, and others, that had been condemn'd at Common Law; but of some that were newly attainted without a Trial: Of these some were absent, and others in Prison; but it was not thought convenient to bring them to make their Answers. The principal of these were the Marchioness of Exeter, and the Countess of Salisbury, Mother to Cardinal Pool. It was question'd whether this could be done in Law or not: The Judges deliver'd their Opinion, that it was against natural Justice to condemn any without hearing them, and then when the Parliament proceeded as a Court, they were oblig'd to follow the common Rules of Equity; but if they acted otherwise, yet since they were the Supream Court of the Nation, it could not be revers'd. In conclusion, the latter Part of this was insist'd on, and the former neglected; so the Act pass'd: And this Counsel was ascrib'd to Cromwell; and he being the first that was executed upon such a Sentence, gave occasion to many to observe the Justice of Heaven, in making ill Counsels turn upon those that give them.

When the Parliament was prorogu'd, the King remember'd his truest Friend Craumer, and the Apprehensions he might have from the six Articles; therefore he sent both Cromwell and the Duke of Norfolk to dine with him, and assure him of the Constancy of his Kindness to him. At the Table they express'd great Esteem for him, and acknowledg'd he had oppos'd the Articles with so much Learning and Gravity, that those who most differ'd from him, could not but highly value him; and that he needed not fear any thing from the King. Cromwell said, the King made that Difference between him and the rest of his Council, that he would not so much as harken to any Complaints made against him; and comparing him to Cardinal Wolfey, he said, The one lost his Friends by his Pride and Ostentation, and the other gain'd his Enemies by his Humility and Mildness. The Arch-Bishop was not only encourag'd by the King, but was also allow'd by him to write his Reasons against the six Articles, for the King's Use; all which he perform'd, to the great Hazard of his Person and Fortunes. But the Act fell much heavier upon many other Persons; Shaxton and Latimer not only resign'd their Bishopricks, but being presented for Words spoken against the Articles, they were put in Prison,

The Bishops hold their Sees by a new Tenure. son, where they continu'd 'till a Recantation discharg'd one, and the King's Death freed the other. There were about five hundred others presented on the same Account; but upon the Intercessions of Cranmer, Cromwell, and others, they were set at Liberty, and a Stop was put to the Execution of this Act 'till Cromwell's Fall. The Bishops of the Popish Party took unjustifiable Methods to insinuate themselves into the King's Confidence; for they took out Commissions by which they acknowledg'd, 'That all Jurisdiction, Civil and Ecclesiastical, flow'd from the King, and that they only exercis'd it at the King's Courtesie; and as they had this of his Bounty, so they were ready to deliver it up, when he should think fit to call for it: And therefore the King did empower them in his Steed, to Ordain, give Institution, and exercise all the other Parts of the Episcopal Function, which was to last during his Pleasure. By this they were in Reality made the King's Bishops; in which Bonner set an Example to the rest; but it does not appear that Cranmer took out any such Commission all this Reign.

All the Monasteries suppress'd. And now follow'd the final Dissolution of the Monasteries of England, of which fifty seven had surrender'd this Year, and twelve of them Parliamentary Abbies. When all had thus resign'd, Commissioners were appointed by the Court of Augmentations to seize on the Revenues and Goods belonging to those Houses, and to establish the Pensions that were to be given to the Abbots and Monks, and to pull down the Churches, or such other Parts of the Fabrick, as they judg'd superfluous, and to sell all the Materials. The number of the Monasteries first and last suppress'd were six hundred and forty five; of which twenty eight were in this Reign Mitred or Parliamentary Abbies, whose Abbots sat in the House of Lords, which were as following. St. Albans, in Hertfordshire; St. Peter's, in Westminster; St. Austin's, in Canterbury; Glassenbury, in Somersetshire; St. Edmund's Bury, in Suffolk; St. Benner's in the Holm, in Norfolk; Bardney and Croyland, in Lincolnshire; St. Mary's in York, and Selby in Yorkshire; Shrewsbury, in Shropshire; Evesham, in Worcestershire; Glocester, Tewsbury, Winchelcomb, and Cirencester, in Glocestershire; Abington and Reading, in Barkshire; Malmesbury, in Wiltshire; Peterborough, in Northamptonshire; Thorney, in Cambridgeshire; Ramsay, in Huntingtonshire; Battel, in Sussex; Hide by Winchester, in Hampshire; St. John's, in Colchester, and Waltham, in Essex; Coventry, in Warwickshire; and Tavestock, in Devonshire. The valu'd Rents of all the Abby Lands in England were exceeding low; but the real Worth and Value of them was judg'd at that Time to amount to above fifteen hundred thousand Pounds per Annum. So that never any King in England had such mighty Advantages of enriching the Crown, and making noble Foundations. But whether out of Policy to satisfy the Gentry, by selling them at low Rates, or out of Easiness to his Courtiers, or out of his unmeasur'd Expences, all this melted away in a few Years, and his great Designs were never accomplish'd. He design'd to have founded eighteen new Bishopricks, but he founded only six; and other noble Projects also became abortive. In particular one that was design'd by the famous Sir Nicolas Bacon, which was a Royal Seminary for Ambassadors, Statesmen and Historians; which would supply one Loss proceeding from the Fall of Abbies, in most of which was kept a Chronicle of the Times. However the King laid out great Sums in building and fortifying many Ports, in the Channel, and other Ports of England; and in the demolishing these Houses, he had so tender a Regard to Learning, that he not only prefer'd many able Persons he found there, but took special Care to preserve the choicest Books of their well furnish'd Libraries. All the Ground that Cranmer gain'd this Year, in which there was so much lost, was a Liberty that all private Persons might have Bibles in their Houses; and tho' it was violently oppos'd by Gardiner, yet a particular Patent for that Purpose was issu'd out, and put to the Management of the Vicegerent Cromwell.

This great Minister was now projecting a Match for the King, that might support him and his Friends; and tho' Persons were propos'd both by the Emperor and the King of France, yet Cromwell's Management prevail'd, and the King fix'd upon Anne, Sister to the Duke of Cleve, whose eldest Sister had been marry'd to the Duke of Saxony. Homs Holbin, the famous Painter of that Age, took her Picture very much to her Advantage; for the nice King never lik'd the Original, as he admir'd the Picture. The Duke of Saxony discourag'd the Match, because the King was making backward Steps in the Matter of the Reformation; but Cromwell pursu'd it with a fatal Assiduity. It was said, the Lady had great Charms in her Person; but she could speak no Language but Dutch, which the King understood not; nor was she bred to Musick, which he admir'd: And she had a Stiffness in her Breeding, not at all accommodated to the King's Inclinations. The Match was at length concluded; and in the end of December, the Lady was brought over into England. The King was impatient to see her, and went incognito to Rockester; but the Sight of her damp'd all his Ardour. There appear'd such Unpoliteness in her Person and Behaviour, that the King swore, They had brought over a Flanders Mare to him, and immediately conceiv'd an incurable Aversion to her. He resolv'd to break the Match, if it were possible; but his Affairs then requir'd the Friendship of the German Princes; so that he did not think it advisable to put any Affront upon the Dukes of Cleve and Saxony. The Emperor had at this Time made a hasty Journey through France; and Francis and he had a magnificent Interview, where as the King was inform'd, by the Pope's Instigation a Project was forming against him. Francis was also contriving how to take Calais from him; it was easie for him to have engag'd the King of Scotland against him; and the People in the North were thought to retain their former Disposition to rebel; so that a War made on the King in such Circumstances, would probably find him at a great Disadvantage. This caus'd the King to be more tender of offending the Germans; but hearing there had been a Contract between the Duke of Lorrain and his intended Bride, he resolv'd to try if that would furnish him with a fair Excuse to break off the Match. The King express'd his great Trouble and Uneasiness, both to Cromwell, and many of his other Acquaintance; upon which one of them said, That mean Persons had this Advantage over Princes and great Men; that the former chose their own Wives, while the latter were oblig'd to take such as were brought them. But nothing could be founded on that Pre-contract, which was only an Agreement between the Fathers, when their Children were under Age, and which was afterwards broken and annull'd by their Parents. So Cranmer and Tonstall being requir'd to give their Opinions as Divines, declar'd, There was nothing in it to hinder the King's marrying with the Lady.

At length the King finding himself press'd on all Sides, on the sixth Day of January, marry'd her; but express'd his Dislike of her so manifestly, that all about him were apprehensive of it; and the Day after he told Cromwell, as an intimate Friend, That he had not consummated the Marriage, and believ'd he never should: He suspected she was no Virgin, and had such ungrateful Smells about her, as had increas'd his Aversion to an insuperable Degree. This was a mortal Stab to Cromwell, who well knew how delicate the King was in these Matters, and that so great a Misfortune must needs fall heavy upon him, who was the chief Promoter of it. He us'd all Methods to overcome these Inclinations, but to no Effect; and tho' the King liv'd five Months in her Company, and lay often in Bed with her, yet his Aversion rather increas'd, than abated. She seem'd not much concern'd at it, and express'd a great Readiness to concur in every Thing that might disengage him from a Marriage so highly unacceptable to him. Instruments were brought over, to shew that the Contract between her and the Prince of Lorrain was void; but the King's Advocates took some Advantage, because it was not declar'd whether the Contract tract was in the Words of the Present, or of the Future Tense, and resolv'd to make use of that upon a proper Occasion.

Cromwell sent to the Tower.

Notwithstanding the King's insuperable Dislike of this Match, he was so far from discarding the chief Promoter of it, that two Days after a Sessions of Parliament was call'd, he created Cromwell Earl of Essex, upon the fourteenth of April; the Male Line of the Bourchiers, who had born that Title, being extinguish'd. So that being now Earl of Essex, Lord Privy-Seal, Lord Chamberlain, Knight of the Garter, and Master of the Rolls, and above all, the King's Vicegerent, he was arriv'd at the Height of his Grandeur, and equal to that of any Subject in England. This last Title of Earl, was too much like Lightning before a dreadful Storm of Thunder; for suddenly after, the Duke of Norfolk, who had secret Resentments against him, arrested him of High-Treason, and sent him Prisoner to the Tower, to the great Surprize of all his Friends. He had many Enemies: The Meanness of his Birth caus'd the prouder Sort of the Nobility to be disgusted, when they saw the Son of a Blacksmith advanc'd above them all. The Romish Clergy had conceiv'd insuperable Prejudices against his Actions and Authority: They imputed the Suppression of Monasteries, and the Injunctions laid on them, to proceed chiefly from his Counsels; and it was believ'd, that principally by his Means the King and the Emperor continu'd in such Misunderstandings. The King by his late Informations was now sensible, that no Accommodation was like to be made between the Emperor and the French King; and he was sure that either of them would court his Friendship, in case of a War, which made him less concern'd for the Favour of the German Princes. This caus'd Cromwell's Counsels to be of less Moment; with which concurr'd a more near and secret Reason: The King did not only hate his new Queen, but had now settled his Affections upon the Lady Catharine Howard, Neice to the Duke of Norfolk; which both rais'd the Interest of that Relation, and depress'd Cromwell, who had made this late Match. The King was also too willing to throw upon him all the Errors that had been committed of late, and by making him a Sacrifice, he hop'd to regain the Affections of his People. The King had also Informations brought him, That he secretly encourag'd those who oppos'd the six Articles, which highly provok'd his Majesty; so that his Fall was as inevitable, as it was unexpected.

All forsake him but Cranmer.

In his Fall he had the common Fate of all disgrac'd Ministers, to be forsaken by his Friends, and insulted by his Enemies: Only the generous Cranmer so retain'd his former Simplicity, that he could never learn these Court Arts. Therefore the next Day he wrote earnestly to the King in his Favour, 'Declaring he had found that he had ever lov'd the King above all Things, and 'had serv'd him with such Fidelity and Success, that he believ'd no King of 'England had ever a more faithful Servant: And he wish'd the King might 'find such a Counsellor, who was both willing and able to serve him as he 'had done. So great a Soul had Cranmer, that he could not be turn'd by the Changes of his Friend's Fortunes, nor the Dread of an imperious Prince; for had not the King's Kindness been deeply rooted, this Letter had ruin'd him. But the King was now resolv'd to ruin Cromwell; and that unjust Practice of Attainting, without hearing the Parties answer for themselves, which he had too much promoted, was now turn'd upon himself. He had such Enemies in the House of Lords, that the Bill of Attainder was dispatch'd in two Days, during the Absence of Cranmer, when no one durst venture to plead for him. He met with more Justice in the House of Commons, where it remain'd ten Days; but in Conclusion, a new Bill was drawn against him, and sent up to the Lords, where it pass'd theirs and the Royal Assent. It consisted of an Accumulation of several Crimes, Misdemeanors and Suggestions, and of several Heretical Principles and Practices, and indeed of some great Improbabilities; for which he was attainted both of High-Treason and Heresie. In all this Matter, he is thought to have met with great Hardships; not only because he was not permitted to answer, but because the principal Matters objected against him might easily have been clear'd, he being able to have produc'd the King's Orders for most of them.

Matter,

Cromwell's Fall was the first Step to the King's Divorce; for immediately after, an Address was mov'd to be made to him by the Lords, that he would permit his Marriage to be examin'd. Cranmer and others were sent down to desire the Concurrence of the Commons; and they order'd twenty of their Number to go along with the Lords in one Body to the King. The Matter being concerted before, he granted their Desire, and Commission was sent to the Convocation to discuss it. Gardiner open'd the Cause to them, and they appointed a Committee for Examination of Witnesses. The Substance of the whole Evidence amounted to these Particulars; That the Matter of the Pre-contract between the Queen and the Prince of Lorrain, was not fully clear'd; That the King had marry'd her against his Will, without an inward Consent; and that he had never consummated the Marriage, so that they saw he could have no Issue by the Queen. Upon these Grounds the whole Convocation with one Consent annull'd the Marriage, and declar'd both Parties free; which was the grossest Compliance that the King had from his Clergy in his whole Reign. For as they knew that there was nothing material in the Pre-contract; so by vacating the Marriage, because the Consent was not internal and free, they made a most pernicious Precedent for breaking all publick Treaties. But in reality, the King was resolv'd to be freed from the Queen, and the Clergy resolv'd not to disoblige him; and they rather sought out Reasons to give Colour to their Sentence, than pass'd it on the Force of those Reasons. Cromwell in the Tower was requir'd to send a Declaration of all he knew concerning the Marriage, which he did; but being overwhelm'd with the Greatness of his Fall, he ended with these abject Words, Written with the heavy Heart, and trembling Hand, of your Highness's most heavy, and most miserable Prisoner, and poor Slave, Thomas Cromwell: And under his Subscription he wrote, Most sacred Prince, I cry for Mercy, Mercy, Mercy. The Judgment of the Convocation, and their Reasons, were reported to the Parliament; and both Houses rested satisfy'd. The following Day some Lords were sent to the Queen, who had retir'd to Richmond, and told her, The King was resolv'd to declare her his adopted Sister, and settle four thousand Pounds a Year upon her, if she would consent to it; which she chearfully embrac'd: And it being left to her Choice, either to live in England, or return to her Brother, she prefer'd the former; and was likewise prevail'd on to write to her Brother, that all this was done with her free Will; that the King had us'd her like a Father, and that he and the other Allies should not take the Matter amiss. When Affairs were thus prepar'd, the Parliament pass'd an Act conforming the Judgment of the Convocation, without Opposition.

The King's last Marriage annull'd.

The King and Queen separate.

In this Parliament there pass'd several other Acts; particularly one for Suppressing the Knights of St. John of Jerusalem, since call'd the Knights of Rhodes and Malta, who succeeded the Knights Templars. Another Act pass'd to mitigate one Clause in the Act of the six Articles; 'by which the Pains of Death for the Marriage or Incontinency of the Clergy, were chang'd into a Forfeiture of their Goods and Benefices. Another Act pass'd, 'Authorising those Committees of Bishops and Divines, nominated by the King, both for the Doctrine and Ceremonies, to proceed in it; and appointing, That what should be concluded by them, and publish'd with the King's Approbation, should bind the Subjects. But a Proviso was added, 'That nothing might be done by them contrary to the Laws then in force; which Contradiction in the Proviso's seems to have been made to keep all Ecclesiastical Proceedings under the Inspection of the Secular Courts. Another peculiar Act pass'd, 'That no Pretence of a Pre-contract should be us'd to annul a Marriage duly solemniz'd and consummated;

Several Acts pass'd.

‘summed; and no Degrees of Kindred, but those enumerated in the Laws of Moses, might hinder a Marriage. This last Clause was added to enable the King to marry to the Lady Catharine Howard, who was Cousin German to Anne Bolen, which was one of the Degrees prohibited by the Canon Law. The Province of Canterbury gave the King a Subsidy of four Shillings in the Pound, to be paid in two Years, with a Preamble of high Acknowledgments of their Happiness under his Protection. A Subsidy was also demanded of the Laity, but it was much oppos’d in the House of Commons: Many alledg’d They had given the King the Abby Lands, in Hopes that no Subsidies should be demanded for the future; and it shew’d a strange Profuseness, that one should be demanded within one Year after. But it was answer’d, That the King had been at great Charges in fortifying his Coasts, and supporting such foreign Leagues as preserv’d the Nation in Safety; therefore a Tenth, and four Fifteens were granted. Several Bills of Attainder were pass’d; and in Conclusion, the King sent a general Pardon, out of which Cromwell, and several others were excepted, and on the twenty fourth Day of July the Parliament was dissolv’d.

His Character.

And now the unfortunate Cromwell, who had been six Weeks a Prisoner, was brought to his Execution, notwithstanding all his Endeavours for his Preservation. Once he wrote to the King in such melting Terms, that he caus’d the Letter to be read thrice, and was sensibly affected with it; but the Charms of Catharine Howard, and the Endeavours of the Duke of Norfolk and the Bishop of Winchester at length prevail’d: So a Warrant was sent to cut off his Head on Tower-Hill, on the twenty eighth of July. Being brought to the Scaffold, his Kindness to his Son made him very cautious in what he said, ‘He thanked God for bringing him to die in that Manner, which was just, on the Account of his Offences against God and his Prince. He declar’d he doubted of no Article of the Catholick Faith, nor of any Sacrament of the Church. He said he had been seduc’d, but now he dy’d in the Catholick Faith; and deny’d that he had supported the Preachers of evil Opinions. Then praying fervently for the King, and the Remission of his own Sins, upon giving the Sign, the Executioner cut off his Head very barbarously. Thus fell that wonderful Minister of State, who had rais’d himself meerly by the Strength of his natural Parts. For tho’ his Extract was mean, and his Education and Learning as low; yet his mighty Wisdom and Dexterity in Business, mounted him through various Ascents, till he had gain’d the utmost Height of a Subject. He carry’d his Greatness with an admirable Temper and Moderation; and fell more under the Weight of a popular Odium, than any real Guilt, with which he was charg’d. Yet he cannot be excus’d in two Particulars: His too boldly dipping his Hands in Sacrilege, and his too ready joining in condemning Persons unheard. The last of which prov’d his own Fate; which seems more like the Vengeance of Heaven, than the Punishment of Men. With him fell the Office of the King’s Viceroy; and none after ever aspir’d to that Title and Character, that prov’d so fatal to him who first bore it. The King is said to have lamented his Death when it was too late; and the Miseries that fell on the new Queen, and on the Duke of Norfolk and his Family afterwards, were look’d upon as so many Scourges of Providence, for their implacable Prosecution of this unfortunate Minister.

The King’s fifth Marriage, with Catharine Howard.

With his Fall, the Progress of the Reformation stopt; for Cranmer could never gain much Ground after this, and indeed many hop’d to see him made the next Sacrifice; and some complain’d of him in the House of Commons, and Informations were brought to the King, that the chief Incouragement that the Hereticks had, came from him. In the mean Time the King pursu’d his Amours, and marry’d the Lady Catharine Howard, and shortly after upon the eighth Day of August, shew’d her publicly as Queen. Still the Ecclesiastical Committees were employ’d by the King, and gave their last finishing to a Book formerly formerly prepar'd, but at this Time corrected and explain'd in many Particulars. This was pursuant to the late Act of Parliament, and was an Explanation of Faith, Justification, the Apostles Creed, the Sacraments, the Ten Commandments, the Lord's Prayer, Free-Will, Good Works; all writ in a plain and masculine Stile, and accommodated to any Capacity. This was publish'd by Authority, and the People requir'd by the King to read it, and print it in their Hearts. Tho' this Book in many Particulars condemn'd the Romish Tenets, yet that Party reassum'd much Courage, and Bonner began to show his Severity and Cruelty, which occasion'd Barnes, Gerrard, and Jerome, three Preachers, to be condemn'd for Hereticks. When they were carry'd to Smithfield, three others, Abel, Featherston, and Powel, who were attainted for denying the King's Supremacy, were coupled with them in the Hurdles that carry'd them; the King affecting in this an extravagant Appearance of Impartiality in his Justice. In the end of this Year, the King began to endow his new Bishopricks: Westminster was the first; after which he endow'd Chester, Glocester and Peterborough, and lastly Oxford and Bristol. And here ends the Series of the King's Advances towards a Reformation, which was now digested and form'd into a Body. What follow'd was not in a Thread, but by Starts, sometimes in favour of the one, and sometimes of the other Party. Nor was he truly steady in his Councils as to State Affairs; for since Cromwell's Death he had no Minister about him, that had a just Ascendent over him. So that the King was now left too much to himself, at a Time when Years, Sickness and Opposition had made him more humorous and impatient than formerly; so that more Errors were committed in the last seven Years of his Government, than in all his Reign besides.

Several suffer for Religion.

XI. In the latter Part of this Reign, by the Commotion of the unsettled Times, and the growing Indispositions of the King, Bloodsheds and Executions became more frequent in the Nation than formerly. A little Rebellion now appearing in Yorkshire, in which Sir John Nevil was an Accomplice, the King took Order to suppress it in due Time, and commanded that Knight to be put to Death at York. Shortly after follow'd the Execution of the Countess of Salisbury; which was probably occasion'd by the late Rebellion, as being judg'd of her Son Cardinal Pool's Instigation. The old Lady, above seventy Years of Age, being brought to the Scaffold, erected in the Tower, was commanded to lay her Head on the Block; but she positively refus'd, saying, So should Traytors do, but I am none. Nor did it avail, that the Executioner told her It was always customary; but turning her gray Head every Way, she cry'd out, If you will have my Head, get it as you can: So he was constrain'd to take it off barbarously. And thus ended the last of the right Line of the famous Plantagenets. There still remain'd one of that Name, Arthur a natural Son to King Edward the Fourth, who this Year dy'd with Joy at Calais.

The Execution of the Countess of Salisbury.

The End of the Plantagenets.

In Summer, the King with his fair and beloved Queen went to York, to meet his Nephew the King of Scotland, who promis'd to give him an Interview in that City. He was an extraordinary Prince, a great Promoter both of Learning and Justice; but still unmeasurably addicted to his Pleasures. The Clergy of Scotland were very apprehensive of his seeing his Uncle Henry, lest he should persuade him to follow the Copy he had set to his Neighbours; and they us'd such Persuasions, that being seconded by a Message from France, they diverted him from his Purpose; which provok'd his Uncle, and gave Occasion to a Rupture not long after. King Henry being arriv'd at York, he issu'd out a popular Proclamation, 'That all who had been aggriev'd for want of Justice, by any whom he had formerly employ'd, should repair to him and his Council for Redress; all which was done to cast all past Miscarriages on Cromwell, and to put the People in Hopes of better Times.'

The King and Queen go to York

The Queen's ill Life discover'd.

He was now so captivated with the Charms of his Queen, at his Return to London, he gave publick Thanks to God for the Happiness he enjoy'd by her Means. But this prov'd very short-liv'd Pleasure; for the next Day the Arch-Bishop of Canterbury came to him, and deliver'd him a melancholy Account of the Queen's lewd Life, as it had been brought him by one John Lassels; who had told him from his Sister, an old Servant belonging to the Duke of Norfolk, and concern'd in the Queen's Education, that the Queen had often been wicked with two Persons nam'd Deirham and Mannock, with other scandalous Circumstances not fit to be related. By the Advice of the Lord Chancellor and other Privy-Counsellors, Cranmer put down the Particulars in Writing, and deliver'd it to the King, as not well knowing how to open it in Discourse. When the King saw it, he was much confounded, but he lov'd the Queen so tenderly, that he at first look'd upon it as a Forgery; so that if full Evidence had been wanting, it had certainly turn'd to the Arch-Bishop's Ruin. The King import'd the Matter to some other Counsellors, and with the utmost Secrecy sent to examine Lassels and his Sister; which being confirm'd by them, he order'd Deirham and Mannock to be arrested upon some other Pretences. But they being examin'd, not only confess'd what was inform'd, but reveal'd some other Circumstances that shew'd the Queen had laid aside all Sense of Modesty, as well as the Fear of a Discovery; three several Women having been Witnesses to her lewd Practices. The Report of this struck the King into a most profound Pensiveness, and caus'd him with a Flood of Tears to lament his Misfortune. The Arch-Bishop and some other Counsellors were sent to examine the Queen; who at first deny'd every Thing, but finding it was already known, she confess'd all and set her Hand to it. It also appear'd that she had intended to continue in that impious Course of Life, for she had brought Deirham into her Service; and at Lincoln, by the Lady Rockford's Means, one Culpepper was brought to her in the Night, and stay'd many Hours with her in a Cellar; and at his Departure, she gave him a Gold Chain. Culpepper being examin'd, confess'd the Crime; for which, both Deirham and he suffer'd; and others were indicted of Misprision of Treason, and condemn'd to perpetual Imprisonment.

A. D. 1542. This unfortunate Affair occasion'd a new Parliament to be summon'd on the sixteenth of January; in which a Committee was particularly appointed to examine the Queen: Their Report is recorded only in general, that she confess'd, but no Particulars are mention'd. Upon which they pass'd an Act in the Form of a Petition: 'After desiring the King not to be griev'd at this Misfortune, they pray'd, that the Queen and her Complices, with her Procuress the Lady Rockford, might be attainted of Treason: And that all those who knew of the Queen's vicious Course before her Marriage, might be attainted of Misprision of Treason, for not revealing to the King in due Time; among whom were her Father and Mother, and her Grand-Mother, the Dutchess of Norfolk. It was also declar'd Treason to know any thing of the Incontinence of any Queen of England for the future, and not to reveal it. And it was made Treason, in any whom the King intended to marry, judging they were Virgins, not to reveal it, if they were not really such. This remarkable Act being pass'd, the Queen, and the Lady Rockford, were beheaded on Tower-Hill the twelfth of February; about seventeen Months after she was marry'd to the King, and had founded her Greatness in the unfortunate Blood of Cromwell. The Queen confess'd the Miscarriages of her former Life, before the King marry'd her, which had brought her to this fatal End; but did positively deny, before God and his Angels, and upon the Salvation of her Soul, that she was ever guilty of betraying her Sovereign's Bed; yet the unbounded Looseness of her former Course of Living, inclin'd the World to believe the most scandalous Things that could be reported. But all observ'd the Judgments of Heaven upon the Lady Rockford, who had a principal Part in the Death of Queen
Anne

An Act of Attainment against

The Queen be-

Anne Boleyn, and her own Husband; and her appearing so vile a Woman, tended much to raise their Reputations again, in whose Fall her Spite and other Artifices had so criminal a Share. The Attainting her Kindred and Parents, for not discovering her former Lewdness, was thought extream Severity; for in them it would have been a hard Piece of Duty to have discover'd such a Secret: Yet tho' they lay some Time in Prison, the King pardon'd them all when his Rage was a little qualify'd. That other Proviso, which oblig'd a young Lady to discover her own Frailties, if the King should please to make Love to her, was thought a Piece of grievous Tyranny: Upon which, those who thought fit to rally the Sex, took Occasion to say, That after this no one, reputed a Virgin, could be induc'd to marry the King: So that it was not so much Choice, as Necessity, that caus'd him to marry a Widow two Years after.

In this Parliament there pass'd another Act that made way for the Dissolutions of Colleges, Hospitals, and other Foundations of that Nature. The Courtiers had been practising with the Presidents and Governors of some of these, to make Resignations to the King; which were conceiv'd in the same Style with the Surrenders of Monasteries. Eight of these were already procur'd; but they could not make any great Progress, because by their local Statutes it was provided, that the Consent of all the Fellows, was necessary to make their Deeds good in Law; which were not so easily obtain'd. Therefore all such Statutes were now annull'd; and none for the future were any more to be sworn to them. In this Parliament it was observ'd, That the Kings of England for many Years had govern'd Ireland by no other Title than Lords of that Island; King Henry now thought fit to change the Style, and honour a populous and warlike Nation with the Title of a King. Therefore in a Parliament held at this Time in that Country, he gave Orders to be declar'd King of Ireland; which was also proclaim'd in England during this Parliament, and afterward finally enacted in the thirty fifth Year of this Reign.

The Kings of England first stild Kings of Ireland.

This gave Offence to James King of Scotland; and by the Instigation of the French King, a War broke out between the two old contending Kingdoms. King Henry set out a Declaration, importing that the Crown of Scotland ow'd Homage to that of England; and cited many Precedents to shew that it had been done not only by their Kings, but by Consent of their States; for which he appeal'd to Original Records. The Scots asserted they were an independent Kingdom, and the Homages they paid were for Lands in England, or else were extorted by Force of Arms. And thus a War began in October, when the Duke of Norfolk made an Inroad into Scotland with twenty thousand Men; but after he had burnt some small Towns, and wasted Teviotdale, he return'd into England. In the End of November, an Army of fifteen thousand Scots, with a good Train of Artillery, was gather'd together, with a Design to march into England by the Western Road. King James repair'd thither in Person; but he was at this Time violently disturb'd in his Fancy, and imagin'd the Ghost of one whom he had unjustly put to Death, follow'd him continually; so that he not only left his Army, but Commission'd Oliver Sinclair, then called his Minion, to command in chief. This highly disgusted the Nobility, who were weary'd out with the Insolence of that Favourite; insomuch that they refus'd to march, and were beginning to separate. While they continu'd in this inglorious Disorder, five hundred Englishmen appear'd; and the Scotch apprehending it was an advanc'd Part of the Duke of Norfolk's Army, refus'd to fight: So the English set upon and dispers'd them, and took all their Ordinance and Baggage, and a thousand Prisoners, of whom two hundred were Gentlemen, the Earl of Glencarn and Cassiles being the chief. This unexpected News so overcharg'd the melancholy King, that he dy'd shortly after; leaving only an Infant Daughter newly born to succeed him. The Scotch Lords that were taken, were brought to London, and lodg'd in the Houses of the English Nobility: Cassiles was sent to Lambeth, where he receiv'd those Seeds of Knowledge, which afterwards produc'd a plentiful Harvest in Scotland. The other Prisoners were also so well instructed, that they soon had very different Thoughts of the Changes made in England, than what the Scotch Clergy had taught them; who had given the greatest Incouragement to this War. The King's Death, and the Crown falling to his Daughter, caus'd the English Council to make use of this as a proper Conjuncture for uniting the whole Island; therefore they sent to the Scotch Lords, and propos'd the marrying the young Prince Edward with their Queen; which was so acceptable, that they promis'd to promote it to their utmost Power. But that unfortunate Princess was not born under such happy Stars, tho' she was Mother to him, in whom this long desir'd Union took Effect. However upon giving Hostages for Performance of their particular Promises, the Lords were sent home honourably; being highly pleas'd both with the Splendor of the King's Court, and with the Way of Religion which they had seen in England.

But the Negotiation did not so well succeed in Scotland, where the Earl of Arran, next in Blood to the Infant Queen, was establish'd in the Government during her Minority. King Henry sent Sir Ralph Sadler to him to induce him to promote the Queen's Match with Prince Edward, and to offer the young Princess Elizabeth to his Son. This was so acceptable, that it was agreed and confirm'd in Parliament, That the young Queen should be bred in Scotland till she was ten Years old, and the King of England to send a Nobleman and his Lady with others not exceeding twenty, to wait on her, after which Age she was to be sent into England; and in the mean Time, six Hostages were to be given. But all the Clergy, headed by Cardinal Beaton, together with the Queen-Mother, violently oppos'd this Design; and it was alledg'd, That a Match with the French would be more advantageous to the Nation, who being at so great a Distance could not so easily oppress them as the English: For if the French oppress'd them, it would be the Interest of the English to protect them; but if they came under the Yoke of England, they could expect no Protection from any other Prince. This meeting with that Antipathy then form'd between the two Nations, and being inflam'd by the Clergy, turn'd the People in general to prefer a Match with France before the other propos'd with Prince Edward. The French sent over the Earl of Lennox to make a Party against the Governor, together with the Governor's natural Brother; who together us'd such Threatnings and Artifices, as had their full Effects upon him: For he turn'd off wholly from the Interests of England, and gave himself up to the French Councils. When they had thus resolv'd to break the Match with England, the Lords who had left Hostages with King Henry for the faithful Performance of their Promises, now little regarded either their own Honour, or the Safety of their Hostages. Only the brave Earl of Cassies thought it unworthy of him to break his Faith in such a mean manner; therefore he went into England, and generously deliver'd himself Prisoner to King Henry; who express'd the highest Value for him, and call'd him a second Regulus, but treated him after a better manner. For he gave him his Liberty and a noble Present, and sent him back honourably to Scotland with all his Hostages; but he resolv'd to take a severe Reparation of those who had fail'd him in that Kingdom.

At the same Time he resolv'd upon a War against France, their great Supporter on all Occasions; for which there were many Reasons and Provocations. Among others one was, That King Francis had fail'd in the Matter of shaking off the Pope's Authority, and advancing a Reformation, in which he had promis'd to second him. But before this was undertaken, the King resolv'd upon another Marriage, in which he met with some Difficulty, by Reason of the late Act concerning the Virginity of the Person to be marry'd with him: Therefore at length he fix'd upon the Lady Catharine Parr, Widow to the Lord Latimer; who as she was a Lady of much Integrity and Worth, and some Maturity of Years, so the King for the most part liv'd happily with her. She was a secret Favourer of the Reformation; yet could not divert a Storm, which at this Time fell on some of her Party at Windsor, particularly Person, Tesswood, Filmer and Marbeck, all but the last of whom were burnt alive; tho' some of their Accusers were afterwards convicted of Perjury. Others were also accus'd and threaten'd by the Romish Party, but none so industriously aim'd at as the Arch-Bishop himself. The Plot against him was laid very deep by Bishop Gardiner and several others, and a long Paper of his Heretical Principles and Practices were deliver'd to the King; who in this shew'd himself so true a Friend to him, and the other so true a Christian, that it sunk and vanish'd into Air. Shortly after when Cranmer gain'd the most apparent Advantage over his Enemies and Accusers, he would make no other Use of it than to display his Readiness to forgive, and to do Good for Evil; for which he became so celebrated, that it was commonly said, That the best way to obtain his Favour, was to do him an Injury.

Reg. 35.

The last Act of Succession.

Other Acts.

The King makes War both with France and Scotland.

XII. We are now arriv'd at the latter Scenes and Transactions of this bute and memorable Reign; when a new Parliament was summon'd that pass'd the last remarkable Act for the Succession of the Crown. By this it was enacted, 'That in Default of Heirs of Prince Edward's Body, or of Heirs by the King's present Marriage, the Crown should devolve on the Lady Mary; and in Default of Heirs of her Body, or if she did not observe such Limitations or Conditions as should be declar'd by the King's Letters Patents, or by his last Will under his Hand, it should next fall to the Lady Elizabeth, and her Heirs; or if she had none, or should not keep the Conditions declar'd by the King, it should fall to any other nominated by the King's Letters Patents, or his last Will sign'd with his Hand. An Oath was also appointed both against the Pope's Supremacy, and for the maintaining the Succession according to this Act, which all were requir'd to take under the Pains of Treason, and it was made Treason to say or write any thing contrary to this Act, or to the Slender of any of the King's Heirs nam'd in it. By this, tho' the King did not Legitimate his Daughters, yet it was made Treason to declare them Spurious. In another Act, 'The Stile of King of England, France and Ireland, Defender of the Faith, and of the Church of England and Ireland, in Earth the Supream Head, was united and annex'd for ever to the Imperial Crown of England. Another Act was pass'd, qualifying the Severities of the Act of The Six Articles; 'by which none were to be imprison'd, but upon a legal Presentment, except upon the King's Warrant; and none was to be challeng'd for Words, but within a Year, nor for a Sermon, but within forty Days. All this was to prevent such Conspiracies as had been discover'd the former Year. Another Act renew'd the Authority given to thirty two to reform the Ecclesiastical Law, which Cranmer much promoted; and to effect it, drew out of the Canon Law a Collection of many things inconsistent with the present Establishment, to show that such a Book ought not to continue in Credit in England: But he could not bring this to a good Issue, during this Reign. By another Act all the King's Loans were discharg'd, and such as had receiv'd Payment, requir'd to bring back the Mony into the Exchequer. This was censur'd as a direct Piece of Injustice; and it was thought strange, that since the King had done this once before, he could have the Credit to raise more Mony, and be tempted to do it a second Time. Lastly, a general Pardon was granted, out of which, Heresie was excepted; and so the Parliament was prorogu'd 'till the next Winter.

The valiant King was now engag'd in a War, both with France and Scotland; and to make his Treasure more effectual, he embas'd the Coin in a very extraordinary Manner. The Earl of Hartford was sent with an Army into Scotland, who landing a little above Leith, burnt both that Town and the Capital City Edinburgh; but did not stay to take the Castle of Edinburgh, or to fortifie Leith, but wasted all the Country between that and Berwick. He perform'd too much, if it was intended to gain the Hearts of that Nation; and too little, if it was design'd to subdue them: For this did only more highly inflame their Spirits, by which they were so implacably united against England, that the Earl of Lennox, who had been thrown off by France, and had join'd with the English Interest, could form no Party in his Country, but was constrain'd to fly into England for Preservation. In the mean time Audley, the Chancellor, deceasing, Wriothesly, who was of the Romish Party, was put in his Place; and in his Room, Docter Petre, a great Friend to Cranmer, was made Secretary of State; so equally did the King preserve the Ballance between both Parties. And being ready to cross the Seas, he left a Commission for the publick Administration, during his Absence, to the Queen, the Arch-Bishop, the Chancellor, the Earl of Hartford, and Secretary Petre: And if there should be Occasion to raise any Forces, he appointed the Earl of Hartford his Lieutenant.

nant. He gave order also to translate the Prayers, Processions and Litanies, into the English Tongue, which gave the Reformers some new Hopes that he had not quite abandon'd of correcting of such Abuses, as had crept into the Worship of God.

Affairs being thus settled at home, the gallant King having sent his Forces before him, cross'd the Seas with his usual Pomp, the Sails of his Ship being of Cloath of Gold. He landed at Calais on the fourteenth of July; and the Emperor press'd his marching directly to Paris. But he judg'd it of more Importance to take Boloign; and after a two Months brave Siege, it was surrender'd to him; so that in a short time, he is observ'd to have gain'd that, which neither his Father, nor the former Kings of England could ever win. After a triumphant Entrance into the Place, he found that the very next Day, the Emperor, to carry on his Designs in Germany, had unfairly concluded a Treaty with the French King, upon the nineteenth of September, which is set down at large by the Lord Herbert. On the thirtieth of that Month, the King return'd into England with fresh Laurels; and to prevent future Insults, he caus'd Fortifications to be made at Gravesend, and Tilbury, and afterwards at Dover, Portsmouth, and many other Places. He also took an exact Account of his Ordnance; and he himself invented certain small Pieces of Artillery, not unlike Drakes, for Defence of his Waggon, as also certain Forms of Bulwarks: For as he was a great Soldier, so he had a singular Capacity in apprehending all the new Inventions daily appearing; and as the Musket was first in use in this Reign, so in this Year the Pistol came first in request among the French Horse.

He goes into France.

He takes Boloign

The following Year, the French King resolving to recover Boloign, and to take Calais, and so expel the English out of France, intended first to make himself Master of the Sea. Accordingly he set out a great Fleet of a hundred and fifty larger Ships, and sixty of a lesser Sort, besides many Gallies brought from the Streights. But after the French Fleet had view'd the English Coast, unsuccessfully attempted to land, both in the Isle of Wight and Sussex, and had engag'd in a Sea-Fight for some Hours, they return'd without any considerable Action: Nor did they perform any thing at Land. But King Henry's Fleet made a successful Descent upon Normandy, and destroy'd the Country; so that this Year prov'd likewise glorious to the King. The Emperor had now effected what he had long design'd; and therefore being courted by both Crowns, he undertook a Mediation, that under Colour of that, he might the better keep up the War. The Princes of Germany saw what Mischiefs were threaten'd them; and the famous Council of Trent was now open'd, and was condemning their Doctrine. A League was also concluded between the Pope and the Emperor, for procuring Obedience to their Canons and Decrees; and an Army was rais'd. The Emperor was also reviving ancient Contests with some of the Princes; and a firm Peace was concluded with the Turk. So that if the Crowns of England and France were not brought to an Agreement, they might be ruin'd; therefore they sent Ambassadors to both Courts to mediate a Peace. With them Cranmer join'd his Endeavours, but he wanted a Cromwell in the Court to manage the Temper of the King; who was so exasperated with the ill Treatment from France, that he would not come to any Agreement; nor would he restore Boloign, without which the French would hear of no Peace. Cranmer had now almost prevail'd with the King to make further Steps in a Reformation; but Gardiner, then Ambassador in the Emperor's Court, wrote to the King, that the Emperor would certainly join with France against him, if he made any further Innovation in Religion. This diverted the King from the Design; and in August this Year the only great Friend Cranmer had in the Court dy'd, Charles Brandon, Duke of Sussex, who for many Years continu'd in the Height of Favour; which was ever preserv'd, not only by an Agreement of Dispositions between the King and him, but by the constant Success that attended his vali-

The Parliament meets.

In November following, a new Parliament was held, where towards the Expence of the King's Wars, the Spirituality gave him a Subsidy of six Shillings in the Pound, payable in two Years. The Temporality also not only gave him a Subsidy for the War, but confirm'd all the Surrenders that had been made of Chantries, Chappels, Colleges, Hospitals, and other Foundations, for saying Masses for departed Souls; and they empower'd the King during his Life to grant Commissions for seizing on the rest of them. Yet the King found that this would probably give new Discontent to the Gentry, to whom these belong'd; so he made but a small Progress in it, and many were reserv'd to be devour'd by his Son's Courtiers. The King dismiss'd the Parliament with a long Speech, which

The King's Speech.

In it, 'After he had thank'd them for their Bills in his Favour, he earnestly exhorted them to Charity and Concord in Matters of Religion; and to forbear all Terms of Reproach, such as Papist and Heretick: He complain'd much of the Obstinacy of some Churchmen, and of the Indiscretion of others, who both gave ill Examples, and sow'd the Seed of Discord among the Laity: He, as God's Vicar on Earth, thought himself oblig'd to see these Abuses reform'd. He also reprov'd the Temporality for the ill Use they made of the Scriptures; for instead of being taught by it to live better, and to be more Charitable to one another, they only rail'd at each other, and made Songs out of it, to disgrace those that differ'd from them; so he exhorted them to serve God, and to love one another, which he would esteem the best Expression of their Duty and Obedience to him. The King had appointed a Distribution of five hundred and fifty Pounds a Year in several Cathedrals, for the Poor, and about four hundred Pounds a Year for High-ways; so this Year some Bishops were appointed to see whether these Payments were made as he had order'd or not. The two Universities were now in great Danger of having their Colleges suppress'd by the late Act of Parliament; but upon their Applications to the King by Doctor Cox, Tutor to Prince Edward, they were deliver'd from their Fears.

A. D. We are now enter'd upon the last Year of this King's Reign; in which the 1546. War with France was manag'd with doubtful Success; yet the Losses were Reg. 37. greater on the English Side. And the Forces being commanded by the Earl of
38. Surry, who was brave but unsuccessful, he was not only blam'd, but recall'd, and the Earl of Hartford sent to command in his Room. But Surry being of an aspiring Spirit, and disdaining to see the Earl of Hartford exalted above him, dropt some Words of a high Resentment, and violent Contempt, which not long after caus'd his Ruin. The King was now single in the War, which was very chargable to him; and observing the Progress that the Council of Trent was making, where Cardinal Pool was one of the Legates, he had reason to expect some severe Decree to be made against him, since none was so much hated by the Court of Rome as himself: Therefore he harkned to Counsels of Peace. And tho' he was not old, yet he was extreamly corpulent, and felt such Decays in his Strength, as he judg'd he could not live long: Therefore that he might not leave his young Son involv'd in so great a War, a firm Peace was concluded in June, which was manag'd much to the King's Honour and Wisdom, tho' the taking and keeping of Boloign for eight Years, according to Articles, cost him above a million and three hundred thousand Pounds. The Peace was proclaim'd in London with a general Procession; and all the richest Silver Crosses out of the Parish Churches were carry'd, and the finest Copes worn, for the greater Solemnity; which was the last time that they were publicly us'd. The two Kings had new Projects for Reformation on foot, and the Annosities which the former War had rais'd between them, were converted into a firm Friendship; which became so strong in King Francis, that he never was seen to rejoice at any Thing, after he heard of King Henry's Death.

A Peace with France.

In

In this Year dy'd the famous Martin Luther, in the seventy third Year of his Age. Luther's Death.

There was at this Time a new Prosecution of those that deny'd the Corporal Presence in the Eucharist; and Shaxton was accus'd of some Words about it, but he abjur'd and comply'd so entirely, that soon after he preach'd a Sermon at the Execution of Anne Aiscough, a Gentlewoman who was first barbarously rack'd, and then burnt at Smithfield, with two others. In this Year there were also two burnt in Suffolk, and one in Norfolk, on the same Account. But the chief of the Romish Party were not satisfy'd with these finaller Sacrifices; therefore they perswaded the King that Cranmer was the Source of all the Heresie in England, but because of his great Favour to him none durst appear against him: So they desir'd that he might be once put in the Tower, and then it would appear how many would inform against him. The King seem'd to consent to this, and they resolv'd to execute it the next Day; but in the Night the King sent for the Arch-Bishop, and generously told him the whole Design. He thank'd the King for not suffering him to be surpriz'd, and submitted to it; only he desir'd he might be heard to answer for himself before indifferent Judges who understood these Matters. The King was amaz'd to see him so little apprehensive of his Ruin, and kindly told him, He must take Care of him, since he took so little Care of himself. He therefore gave him Instructions to appear before the Council, and to desire to see his Accusers before he was sent to the Tower; and that he might be us'd by them, as they would desire to be us'd in the like Case: And if he could not prevail by the Force of Reason, then he was to appeal to the King in Person, and was to shew the King's Seal-Ring, which he took from his Finger and gave him; which was so well known to them all, that they soon stopp'd when they once saw that. According to his Expectation, being summon'd before the Council next Morning, he came over to White-Hall, where he was unhandsonly detain'd in the Lobby, before he was call'd in. When he appear'd, and had observ'd the Method the King had order'd him to use, and had at last shown the Ring, they all rose in great Confusion, and went to the King, who had designedly absented himself that Day. He severely reprimanded them, and express'd his Esteem and Kindness for the Arch-Bishop in such Terms, that his Enemies were glad to retreat, by pretending they only design'd to clear his Innocence in a publick Trial; and were now so convinc'd of the King's unalterable Favour to him, that they never made any more Attempts upon him.

But what they durst not attempt in Relation to the Arch-Bishop, they thought they might more safely experience against the Queen, who was known to love the Reformation, and to have Sermons in a Privy-Chamber; which could not be so secretly carry'd, but that it came to the King's Knowledge. Yet her Conduct in all other Respects was so exact, and she express'd such a tender Care of the King's Person, as she gain'd much upon his Affections; but his Peevishness being increas'd by his Distempers, made him often uneasy, and sometimes to her. They frequently discours'd of Points of Religion, and often concerning the Reformers; and once in Defence of them she provok'd the King's Humour so far, that before he was cool, he express'd his Displeasure to Bishop Gardiner; who greedily seiz'd on this Opportunity to persuade the King, That she was a great Cherisher of Hereticks. Chancellor Wriothesly join'd with him in the same Artifice, and fill'd the angry King's Head with many Conjectures and Surmises; insomuch that he sign'd the Articles upon which she was to be impeach'd. But the Chancellor carelessly dropping the Paper, it was accidentally taken up by one of the Queen's Friends, who carry'd it to her. Upon which she repair'd to the King, and ingeniously brought in a Discourse about Religion; and after a little Opposition, she artificially yielded, and seem'd convinc'd by the King's Arguments, and told him, That she only argu'd with him by way of Instruction; sometimes to ingage him in Discourse, and to divert his Pains; and this she seconded with such nice Flattery, that he was perfectly satisfy'd, and reconcil'd to her. The following Day, as they were walking in the Garden, the Chancellor came thither with a Design to have carry'd her to the Tower; but the King stepping aside, chid him severely for his Attempt, and was heard to call him Knave and Fool. The good natur'd Queen innocently interpos'd to mitigate his Displeasure; but the King handsomly told her, She of all others had least Reason to plead for him. Thus the Design vanish'd, and Gardiner, who promoted it, intirely lost the King's Favour.

The Fall of the Duke of Norfolk and his Son the Earl of Surry.

But the chief of the Party, the Duke of Norfolk, and his Son the Earl of Surry, fell under deeper Misfortunes. The Father had many Years been Treasurer, and had serv'd the King with great Fidelity and Reputation: His Son was a Man of rare Qualities, great Wit, and more than ordinary Learning; but particularly hated the Earl of Hartford, and despis'd an Alliance with him, which his Father had projected; which was to unite his Family to the Seymours, by marrying his Son to the Earl of Hartford's Daughter, and his Daughter the Dutcheß of Richmond, to Hartford's Brother, Sir Thomas Seymour. But both his Children refus'd to comply in this Matter: The Seymours were apprehensive upon the King's Death, of the Opposition they might meet with from the Earl of Surry, who was of a high Spirit, had a vast Fortune, and was the Head of the Romish Party; and it was likewise suspected, that he kept himself unmarried in Hopes of gaining the Princess Mary. The Duke's Family was also fatally divided: His Dutcheß had been separated from him about four Years, and now turn'd Informer against him: His Daughter hated her Brother, and was a Spy upon him; and one Holland, a jilting Mistress of the Duke's, did also betray him, and discover'd all she could; yet all amounted to no more than some Complaints of the Father, who thought his great Services too little regarded, and some indiscreet Threatnings of the Son. It was also alledg'd, that the Father gave the Coat of Arms belonging to the Prince of Wales, and his Son gave the Arms of Edward the Confessor; but this seem'd rather a Pretence to create a Clamour among the People, and to cover the Want of more material Objections against them. One Southwell indeed alledg'd Matters of a higher Nature against the Earl of Surry; which he deny'd, and desir'd a Trial by Combate, and to fight in their Shirts. But all Challenges avail'd nothing, for the Father and the Son were, upon Reasons of State, mark'd out for Ruin, and both sent Prisoners to the Tower.

A. D. The Earl of Surry being but a Commoner, was try'd by a Jury of nine 1547. Knights and three Esquires; by whom he was found guilty of Treason, and Reg. 38. had Sentence of Death pass'd upon him, which was executed on the nineteenth of January at Tower-Hill. This was generally condemn'd as an Act of great Hardship and Severity, which loaded the Seymours with a popular Odium that they could never overcome. He was much pity'd, as a Man of great Parts and Courage, and other noble Qualifications; but yet was thought to have too much dipp'd his Hands in the Blood of Cromwell, and others of his Party.
The Storm fell next upon the old Duke, who saw a Parliament call'd to destroy him by an Act of Attainder, since there was not Matter enough to ruin him by common Law: Therefore to prevent that, he made such an humble Submission to the King, as might have mollify'd the most obdurate Disposition. He wrote to him, 'That he had spent his whole Life in his Service, without entertaining one 'Thought to his Prejudice; and that he had obey'd all his Laws, and was re-
'solv'd to obey all that ever he should make. He earnestly begg'd that he might 'be hear'd with his Accusers Face to Face; and that the King would take all 'his Lands, and Goods, and only restore him to his Favour, and grant him 'such an Allowance for his Subsistence, as he thought fit. Because this had no Effect, he proceeded further, and set his Hand to a Confession of several Crimes; 'as First, his revealing the Secrets of the King's Council; Secondly, his 'concealing his Son's Treason in giving the Arms of Edward the Confessor;
'and

and Thirdly his own giving the Arms of England, with the Labels of Silver belonging only to the Prince; which he acknowledg'd to be High-Treason, and therefore humbly begg'd the King's Mercy and Compassion. But all this had no Effect upon the King, who, as one expresses it, never hated or ruin'd any Body by halves.

When the Parliament met, the King was not able to come to Westminster, but he sent his Pleasure to them by a Commission. He declar'd his Intention was to have his Son Edward crown'd Prince of Wales; and therefore desir'd they would make all possible Haste in the Attainder of the Duke of Norfolk, that so the Places which he held by Patent might be dispos'd of to others, who should assist at the Coronation: Which, tho' it was a very slight Excuse for so high a Piece of Injustice, yet had that Effect, that in seven Days both Houses of Parliament pass'd the Bill. On the twenty seventh of January, the Royal Assent was given by those commission'd by the King; and the Execution was positively order'd to be the next Morning. There was no special Matter in the Act, but that of the Coat of Arms, which he and his Ancestors were wont to give, according to Records in the Herald's Office; so that this was condemn'd by all Persons as a most inexcusable Act of Tyranny. But the Death of the King that Night put a Stop to the Execution, which, tho' it was conceal'd three Days from the Nation, yet we are assur'd it was reveal'd by an extraordinary Vision to the Duke that Morning, by which he narrowly and fortunately escap'd. Yet both Parties made their Inferences from this Calamity that befel him. The Romanists said it was God's just Vengeance upon him, for his too great Obsequiousness to the King in many Particulars. But the Reformers said, it was a just Return upon him, for what he had acted against Cromwell, and many others upon the Account of Opinions. The Arch-Bishop would not concern himself in that Affair, but retir'd himself to Croydon; whereas Bishop Gardiner, who had continually been his Friend, still kept to the Court.

He is Attainted in Parliament.

He escapes narrowly.

The King was now overgrown with Corpulency and Fatness, and became so exceeding unwieldy, that he could not go up or down his Stairs, but as he made use of an Engine for that Purpose. He had an old Ulcer in his Leg, which became very uneasie to him; and all the Humours of his Body sinking down thither, he was much afflicted, and became exceeding froward and intractable, to which his late Severities may be in a great measure imputed. His Servants durst scarcely speak to him, to put him in mind of his approaching End, lest they might be brought within the Statute that made it Treason to foretel the King's Death. His Will was made ready, and was sign'd, or rather stamp'd, on the thirtieth Day of December. He had finish'd one at his last going over to France; and all the Change he made in this was, that he order'd Gardiner's Name to be struck out, for in his former Will he was nam'd one of the Executors. When Sir Anthony Brown endeavour'd to persuade him not to put that Disgrace upon an old Servant, he continu'd positive in his Resolution, and declar'd, That he knew Gardiner's Temper sufficiently; and tho' he could govern him, none of them would be able to do it, if he were put into so high a Trust. The most material Clause in this Will was, That in the Succession of the Crown, he preferr'd the Children of his second Sister by Charles Brandon, to the Children of his eldest Sister, the Queen of Scotland. On his Death-Bed he finish'd the Foundation of Trinity-College in Cambridge, one of the noblest in Europe; and likewise founded Christ's-Church Hospital near Newgate; yet this last was not so fully settled as was needful, till his Son compleated what he had begun. On the twenty seventh of January his Spirits sunk so low, that it was apparent he had not long to live; and when all declin'd touching upon so unwelcome a Subject, Sir Anthony Denny had the Honesty and Courage to do it, desiring him to prepare for Death, and to call upon God and Jesus Christ for Mercy. Upon which the King express'd his Sorrow for the Sins of his past Life; yet he said, he trusted in the Mercies of Christ, which were greater than his his Sins. Then Denny ask'd him if any Churchman should be sent for, and he answer'd, If any, it should be Arch-Bishop Cranmer. Upon which Cranmer was sent for to Croydon; but before he arriv'd, the King was speechless. Therefore Cranmer desir'd him to give some Sign of his Dying in the Faith of Christ; upon which he tenderly squeez'd his Hand, and shortly after dy'd, upon the twenty eighth Day of January, and fifty sixth Year of his Age; after a most active and wonderful Reign of thirty seven Years, nine Months, and five Days. His Funeral Obsequies were as pompous and magnificent as his Reign, as appears from Sandford and others; being bury'd at Windsor, where he had begun a noble Monument, and founded a College for thirteen poor Knights, and two Priests. Nor were these last Rites perform'd by his own Subjects only; but a solemn Obsequy was kept for him by King Francis, at the Cathedral of Paris, notwithstanding his Excommunication, and all the Fulminations of the Court of Rome.

His Death and Obsequies.

His Character.

To say something of the Person and Qualifications of this wondrous Prince; his History will be his truest Character and Description, which contain'd an uncommon Variety, in all his Capacities; as a Man, a King, and a Christian. He had all the Qualifications of Nature and Education, with no less Perfections of Body and Mind. His Person was extraordinary tall and majestick, of a mighty Strength and Activity; his Looks great and surprizing, and his whole Countenance bespoke the Monarch. His Mind was still more capacious than his Body, vigorous and vast, his Temper generous and fiery, his Spirit magnanimous and invincible, and his Judgment profound and penetrating; so that with all his Failings he was every way a proper Instrument to effect those great Works design'd by Providence. As to Matters of State, never Prince proceeded upon truer Maxims for this Kingdom, which was to make himself Arbiter of Europe; in which, instead of being a bare Spectator, he was so much an Actor, that there was no Treaty or State Assembly in Christendom, in which he had not his particular Agent and Interest; which was one of his extraordinary Ways of spending Mony. At home, it was his Manner to treat much with his Parliaments, where he sometimes made use of rough Methods; yet none of his Predecessors understood the Temper of Parliaments better than himself, or more dexterously prevail'd upon such a numerous Body. His Disposition was certainly very aspiring, and his Ambition very extensive; which by Means of Flattery and ill Counsel, in the latter Part of his Reign produc'd Effects very formidable to his Subjects: So that he has been too justly charg'd with Cruelty, Rapaciousness and Lust; all which have been unmeasurably aggravated by his Enemies, whose Numbers were very great. His Cruelties appear both from the Number and Manner of the Executions in his Reign, which were generally towards the latter End of it, at a Time when he had met with unsufferable Provocations and Oppositions, and when less Severities might probably have ruin'd him and all his Designs: And really it is extraordinary wonderful that such Alterations in the Nation should be made with so little Bloodshed. His Rapaciousness appears from his Sacrilegious swallowing such vast Quantities of Church Revenues: To palliate which, besides its being done by the Representatives of the Nation, it has been alledg'd that the Religious Orders of the Kingdom would have assisted those who threaten'd Invasion from abroad, and that he had no other Means but their Revenues left to defend himself. However he had laid noble Designs for Reparation, and tho' he accidentally fell short of them, yet he actually founded six Bishopricks, endow'd Deaneries, Prebends, and other Offices, in fourteen several Sees, and founded Christ-Church Hospital, Trinity College in Cambridge, Professors in both Universities, and many Grammar Schools. As to his Lusts, they are as much aggravated as any other of his Vices; of which the Number of his Wives are but a weak Proof. Fornication in Princes is never to be excus'd by a Christian Politician; yet this may be alledg'd for him, that he was not so exorbitant as many other Princes, Princes, and we find but one Mistress that he kept, which was in his younger Years, when encourag'd by a Churchman, and indulgent Confessor. It is true, the general Steps he made were sometimes bold and desperate, yet with all his Crimes he was one of the most glorious Princes of his Time; and if his Crimes were still greater, it would be no just Aspersions upon the Reformation he effected; since Providence often brings about the noblest Designs by the most exceptionable Instruments, when the best Men have been deny'd that Honour. In short as his Reign affords the greatest Varieties, so in his Character there was a wonderful Mixture of Virtues and Vices; and the Hand of Heaven seem'd to lye heavy upon him and his Family; for notwithstanding all his extraordinary Methods to obtain Posterity, and his peculiar Establishments of the Succession, from six several Wives he was not able to produce one Grand-Child.

This Prince had a most noble Education given him by his Father, who at six Years of Age put him under the Government of Doctor Cox and Mr. Cheek; the one his Preceptor for Philosophy, Morality and Divinity, and the other for Languages and Mathematicks. He was also provided with Masters for the French Tongue, and other Parts of Learning becoming a Prince, who was Heir to such famous Dominions. He gave early Indications of a rare Disposition to Knowledge, of a most wonderful Probity of Mind, and of the highest Veneration for Religion and Piety: So that once in his Childish Diversions, somewhat being wanted which he and his Companions could not reach, one of them laid a great Bible on the Floor to step on, which he beholding with Indignation, reverently took it up, and gave over his Play. He was so forward in Languages, that besides his Proficiency in French, Italian and Spanish, at eight Years of Age he frequently wrote Latin Letters to the King, to the last Queen, the Arch-Bishop of Canterbury, and his Uncle the Earl of Hartford. In all things he was a Prince of extraordinary Hopes; but such unusual Beginnings seem'd rather to threaten the too early End of a Life, that was to produce such astonishing Things.

His Father's Death was conceal'd from the Publick for three Days; during which time, his Uncle the Earl of Hartford, and Sir Anthony Brown, were sent by the Council to Hartford where he resided, to conduct him to the Tower of London. Having brought him to Ensfeld, with his Sister the Princess Elizabeth, they told him that his Father was actually dead; which News was receiv'd with such real Sorrow, that it was hard to know whether Tears did more obscure or illustrate their Beauties. At the Tower, his Father's Executors, with the rest of the Privy-Council, receiv'd him with a profound Respect due to their King; so tempering their Sorrows for their Master's Decease with their Satisfaction for his Son's succeeding him, that by an Excess of Joy they might not seem too soon to have forgot the one, nor by Extremity of Grief to apprehend Ill from the other. The first Thing they did was the opening of King Henry's

Henry's Will, by which they found that he had nominated sixteen Persons to be his Executors, and Governors of his Son 'till he should be eighteen Years of Age. These were the Arch-Bishop of Canterbury, the Lord Chancellor Wriothesly, the Lord St. John great Master, the Lord Russel Privy-Seal, the Earl of Hartford Lord Great-Chamberlain, Viscount Lisle Lord Admiral, Tonstall Bishop of Durham, Sir Anthony Brown Master of the Horse, Sir William Paget Secretary of State, Sir Edward North Chancellor of the Augmentations, Lord Chief Justice Montague, Judge Bromley, Sir Anthony Denny, and Sir William Herbert chief Gentlemen of the Privy-Chamber, Sir Edward Wotton Treasurer of Calais, and Doctor Wotton Dean of Canterbury and York. By the Consent of these Sixteen, the King and his Sisters were to be dispos'd in Marriage; but with this Difference, that it was only order'd that the King should marry by their Advice; but the Sisters were so limited in their Marriages, that they were to forfeit their Right of Succession if they marry'd without their Consents; it being of greater Importance to the Good of the Nation, who should be their Husbands, if they come to the Crown, than who should be the King's Wife: And King Henry was empower'd by Act of Parliament to leave the Crown to them with what Limitations he should think fit to appoint. Besides these Sixteen there was a Privy-Council nominated to be their Assistants in the Government; and if any of the Sixteen dy'd, the Survivors were to continue in the Administration, without a Power of substituting others in the Rooms of the Deceas'd. He also charg'd them to pay all his Debts, the Legacies he left, to perfect all the Grants he had begun, and to make good every thing he had promis'd. It was now propos'd that one should be chosen out of the Sixteen, to whom Ambassadors should address themselves, and who should have the chief Direction of Affairs; but should be restrain'd from acting without the Consent of the major Part of the rest. The Chancellor, who thought the Precedence in secular Affairs fell to him by his Office, oppos'd this much, and said it was changing the King's Will, who had made them equal in Power and Dignity; and if any were rais'd above the rest in Title, it would be impossible to keep him within just Bounds, since great Titles made way for exorbitant Power. But the Earl of Hartford had so prepar'd his Friends, that it was voted that he should be declar'd The Governor of the King's Person, and the Protector of the Kingdom; with this Restriction, that he should not act without the Advice and Consent of the rest. Upon this Advancement, and the Opposition made against it, two several Parties were form'd, the one headed by the new Protector, and the other by the Chancellor: The Favourers of the Reformation were for the Former, and the Opposers of it were for the Latter.

A Protector chosen.

The Bishops Commissions.

After this the Chancellor was order'd to renew the Commissions of the Judges and Justices of Peace; and King Henry's Great Seal was to be us'd, 'till a new one should be made. Then all the Executors took their Oaths to execute their Trust faithfully; and the Privy-Counsellors were brought into the King's Presence, who all express'd their Satisfaction in the Choice of the new Protector: and it was order'd that all Dispatches to Foreign Princes should be sign'd only by him. All that held Offices were requir'd to come and renew their Commissions, and to swear Allegiance to the King; and even the Bishops themselves took out such Commissions as were granted in the former Reign; only by those they were subaltern to the King's Vicegerent, but none being now in that Office, they were immediately under the King: And by them they were to hold their Bishopricks only during the King's Pleasure, and were empower'd in the King's Name, as his Delegates, to perform all the Parts of the Episcopal Function. The ill Consequences of this unjustifiable Method being soon foreseen, the Bishops afterwards promoted, were not put under such unreasonable Obligations, but were appointed to hold their Bishopricks during Life. After a Dispatch of some Business relating to Scotland, the Protector knighted the young young King, being authoriz'd to do it by Letters Patents ; and the King at the same time knighted Sir John Hublethorn, the Lord Mayor of London. An Account of some Disturbances being now presented to the Council, concerning the pulling down some Images in Churches, Orders were sent to the Justices of the Peace, to take Care of the Peace and Government of the Nation, to meet frequently, and every six Weeks to advertise the Protector of the State of the Country where they resided.

On the thirteenth Day of February, the Obsequies of the late King were solemniz'd with the utmost Degree of Pomp and Magnificence. Shortly after follow'd the Diversions of the Coronation; before which, according to the late King's Intentions, the Protector was made Duke of Somerset, the Earl of Essex Marquess of Northampton, the Lords Lisle and Wriothesly Earls of Warwick and Southampton; Seymour, Rich, Willoughby and Sheffield were made Barons. In order to the King's Coronation, the Office of that Ceremony was now review'd, and much shorten'd: One remarkable Alteration was, that formerly the King was always presented to the People at the Corners of the Scaffold, and they were ask'd, If they would have him to be their King? Which look'd more like a Rite of an Election, than a Ceremony of Investing one who was already King. This was now chang'd, and the People were desir'd only to give their Assents and good Will to his Coronation, as they were bound by their Duty of Allegiance. On the nineteenth Day of February, the King rode in great State and Splendor from the Tower, to the Palace of Westminster; and the following Day he was crown'd by the Arch-Bishop of Canterbury, according to the Form prescrib'd. We are assur'd that when three Swords were deliver'd to him as King of England, France and Ireland, he said, He wanted another Sword yet, the Holy Bible, the Sword of the Spirit, without which they could all do nothing. At this Time a general Pardon was proclaim'd to all Offenders, six only excepted, namely the Duke of Norfolk, Cardinal Pool, Edward Courtney, Mr. Fortescue, Mr. Throgmorton, and Doctor Pates Bishop of Worcester, who was fled to Rome, to avoid the Oath of Supremacy; all which six continu'd unpardon'd, 'till the first of Queen Mary's Reign, and then were restor'd.

The Lord Chancellor, who was esteem'd the Head of the Romish Party, now gave an Advantage against himself, which soon occasion'd his Disgrace. He granted a Commission to the Master of the Rolls and three Masters of Chancery, to execute his Office in the Court of Chancery, as if he were present; only the Decrees were to be brought to him to be sign'd, before they should be Inroll'd. This being perform'd without any Authority from the Protector, and the other Executors, was thought a high Act of Presumption, since by this he devolv'd that Trust on others which was deposited in his own Hands. Several Lawyers complain'd of this Practice to the Protector, being apprehensive of some dangerous Innovations in that high Court. The Judges being desir'd to give their Opinions, made Report, That what the Chancellor had acted, was against Law, that he had forfeited his Place, and was liable to Imprisonment during the King's Pleasure. But he carry'd it with a high Hand, and with Threats both to the Judges and Lawyers; and when it was urg'd, That he had forfeited his Place, he alledg'd He had it from the late King, who had likewise nominated him one of the Executors during his Son's Minority: To which it was answer'd, That the Major Part had Power over any of the rest, otherwise one of them might rebel, and pretend the rest could not bring him to Punishment. Being driven from this Hold, he became more humble, and acknowledg'd he had no Warrant for granting the Commission, but thought he might lawfully do it by his Office: He ask'd Pardon for his Offence, and begg'd that he might lose his Place with as little Disgrace as was possible; upon which it was resolv'd the Seal should be taken from him, and a Fine laid upon him as should be thought proper. He was per-permitted to go home with the Seal ; but the Lord Seymour and some others were sent to demand it of him. He was also confin'd to his House, and kept under the Terror of an arbitrary Fine ; but upon giving a Bond of four thousand Pounds to be paid upon Demand, he was freed from his Confinement. Yet he was not remov'd from the Trust of the King and Government ; for probably the Council look'd upon that to be out of their Power. The Protector, the better to secure himself, took out a Patent for his Office under the Great Seal, ' by which he was confirm'd in his Authority, 'till the King should be eighteen Years of Age ; he was also authoriz'd to bring in new Counsellors, besides those enumerated in the Patent, who were both the Executors and Counsellors nominated by the late King : The Protector, with so many of the Council as he thought fit, were empower'd to administer the Affairs of the Kingdom ; but the Council was limited not to act any thing without his Advice and Consent. And thus was he as fully establish'd in his extraordinary Authority as Law could do it : He had a Negative on the Council, but they had none on him ; and he could either bring his own Creatures into it, or select a Cabinet-Council out of it, at Pleasure : And the other Executors having by this Patent deliver'd up their Authority to him, were only Privy-Counsellors as the rest, without retaining any Authority peculiar to themselves, as was particularly provided by King Henry's Will.

Designs in Germany.*

The first foreign Affair that requir'd great Consideration, was the German War, then begun between the Emperor and the Princes of the Smalcaldick League ; by which the Emperor, if successful, was in a probable Way, both to extirpate Lutheranism, and to make himself absolute Master of Germany. But he politickly disguis'd his great Design to other Princes : To the Pope he pretended it was only to extirpate Heresie ; to other Princes, that it was only to suppress some Rebels, and deny'd all Intentions of suppressing their new Doctrines ; all which he manag'd so artificially, that he divided Germany itself, and gain'd some Lutheran Princes to declare for him, and others to be Neutrals : And having, by granting an Edict for Liberty of Religion, obtain'd a liberal Supply for his Wars with France and the Turk, he made Peace with both those Princes, and resolv'd to imploy the Money the Germans had given him, against themselves. That he might deprive them of their chief Allies, he us'd all Means to engage King Henry and Francis in a War ; but that was compos'd chiefly by their Interposition : And now when the War was to be pursu'd with great Vigour, they lost both those Princes ; for as Henry dy'd in January, so Francis dy'd the March following. Many of their Confederates began to capitulate and fall off ; and the divided Command of the Duke of Saxony and Prince of Hesse, lost them great Advantages the former Year, in which they might have easily driven the Emperor out of Germany. The Pope desir'd to engage the Emperor in a War with Germany, that Italy might be unmolested ; in order to which, and the imbroiling the Emperor with the Lutherans, he publish'd his Treaty with him, to shew the World that the Design of the War was to extirpate Heresie, tho' the Emperor was making great Protestations to the contrary in Germany. He also open'd the Council of Trent, which tho' formerly desir'd by the Emperor, was now unreasonable to his Affairs : For the Protestants all declar'd, That they could not esteem it as a free General Council, since it was so intirely at the Pope's Devotion : Nor could the Emperor prevail with the Council to relax their Proceedings against Heresie ; but the more he obstructed it by his Delays, the more vigorously the Pope drove it on, to open the Eyes of the Germans, and engage them more unanimously against the Emperor, who now gave them such secret Assurances of tolerating the Ausburg Confession, that the Marquess of Brandenburg declar'd for him ; and this, join'd with the Hopes of an Electorate, drew in Maurice of Saxony. The Count Palatine was old and feeble, the Arch-Bishop of Coloign would make no Resistance, but retir'd, and many Cities submitted :

*The Council of

and Maurice by falling into Saxony, forc'd the Elector to separate from the Prince of Hesse, and return to the Defence of his own Dominions. This was the general State of the Affairs in Germany: So that it was a difficult Point to determine, what Answer the Protector should give to the Duke of Saxony's Chancellor, whom he sent over to ~~beg~~ an Aid in Mony, for carrying on the War. It was certainly of great Importance to the Safety of England to preserve the German Princes; and yet it was very dangerous to begin a War of such Consequence under an Infant King. However at present they promis'd within three Months to send the Duke fifty thousand Crowns by certain Merchants to Hamburg; but resolv'd to do no more till new Emergencies should lead them to new Counsels.

The German Princes sue to England.

The Nation was now in an ill Condition for a War with such a mighty Prince, the Government in several Things disjointed, labouring under great Distractions at home; the People generally cry'd out for a Reformation, they despis'd the Romish Clergy, and lov'd the new Preachers. The Priests were for the most part very ignorant and scandalous in their Lives and Conversations; and were many of them degraded Monks crept into small Benefices. These were zealously engag'd against all Changes, and were encourag'd in their Opposition, by the Protection they expected from Gardiner, Bonner and Tonstall, who were Men of great Reputation, and in high Stations: And above all the Princess Mary did openly declare against all Changes, till the King should be of Age. But on the other Hand the diligent Cranmer, who possibly had been too obsequious to King Henry, being now at Liberty, resolv'd to proceed more vigorously: The Protector was firmly united to him, as also the young King's Tutors; and he himself was as much engag'd as could be expected from so young a Person; for both his Knowledge and Zeal were far above his Years. Doctor Ridley, now made Bishop of Rockester, and Doctor Latimer by his popular Sermons, were both very serviceable in this Affair. Most of the Privy-Council were consenting towards a further Reformation; and according to the Power invested in them, it was resolv'd to begin with a general Visitation of all England, which was divided into six Precincts; and two Gentlemen, a Civilian, a Divine, and a Register, were appointed for each. But before they were sent out, Letters were written to all Bishops, giving them Notice of it, and suspending their Jurisdiction, while the Commission lasted. The greatest Difficulty that the Reformers found, was in the Want of able and prudent Men; and those that were most eminent were to be employ'd in London and the Universities. Therefore the only Thing by which the People could be universally instructed, was a Book of Homilies; so the twelve first Homilies in the Book, still known by that Name, were compil'd to be us'd by every Minister. Orders were also given, that a Bible should be kept in every Church, which tho' it was commanded by King Henry, yet had not been generally obey'd; and for understanding the New Testament, the Paraphrase of Erasmus was publish'd in English, and appointed to be set up in every Church. They also renew'd the Injunctions made by Cromwell in the late Reign, which after his Fall had been neglected, as those for instructing the People, for removing of Images, and abolishing all Customs abus'd to Superstition; for reading the Scriptures in English, for frequenting Sermons and Catechising, for the exemplary Lives of the Clergy, and the other Parts of their Functions.

Decisions in England.

A Visitation of all Churches.

Whilst these and many other Things were transacting towards a Reformation, a War with Scotland was under a close Consultation: But the Protector being apprehensive that France would engage in the Contest, sent an Embassie to congratulate the new King Henry the Second, to desire a Confirmation of the last Peace, and to complain of the Scots, who had broken their Faith with King Edward on the Point of the Marriage of their Queen. The French King refused to confirm the Treaty, till some Articles were first explain'd, and demand'd what had been done by his Father's Agent Poligny; and for the Scots,

The War with Scotland.

he declar'd he could not abandon them, if they were in Distress. The English alledg'd that Scotland was subject to England, but the French had no Regard to that, and would not so much as look on the Records that were offer'd to prove the Subjection; declaring, That they would esteem the Cause as they found it, and not look back to a Dispute of two or three hundred Years old. This caus'd the English Council to be more cautious in beginning one War, which in all Probability would bring another upon them from France. The Castle of St. Andrews was surrender'd, and all the Pensioners in Scotland were not able to do them much Service: The Scots were now much elevated; for as England was under the Government of a Child, so the Court of France was govern'd by the Scotch Queen Dowager's Brothers. The Scots began to make Inroads upon England, and Descents into Ireland; Commissioners were sent to the Borders to treat on both Sides; and the Protector rais'd a powerful Army, which he bravely resolv'd to command in Person. But the Meetings on the Borders were soon ended; for the Scots had no Instructions to treat concerning the Marriage, and the English were order'd to treat of nothing else, 'till that should be first concluded. As to the Records that were shown to prove the Homages of the Scotch Kings to the English, they had no great Effect; for the Scots either said they were forc'd or extorted from some weak Princes, or were only Homages for their Lands in England, as the Kings of England did Homage to the Crown of France, for their Lands in that Country. They also shew'd their Records, by which their Ancestors had asserted themselves free and independent of England.

The Protector

an Army.

All Hopes of Peace vanishing, on the twenty first Day of August the Protector took out a Commission to be General, and to make War in Scotland; in order to which he left Commissions of Lieutenancy to his Brother and other Noblemen, and during his Absence devolv'd his own Power on the Privy-Council. He came upon the Borders by the End of August, and enter'd the Scotch Ground the second of September; where he found the Passes abandon'd, and small Forts that were in his March were surrender'd upon Summons. On the ninth, he arriv'd at Falside, where there was a long Struggle in several Parties, in which thirteen hundred of the Scots were slain. And now they were in Sight of the Scotch Army, which for Numbers of regular Men was one of the greatest they had ever brought together, consisting of thirty thousand Men, with a fair Train of Artillery both of Brasses and Iron Guns. On the other Side, the English Army consisted of about fifteen thousand Foot, and three thousand Horse, but all excellently well appointed. The Scots were now inflam'd with the old National Quarrel to England; it was rumour'd that the Protector was come to carry away the Queen, and enslave the Kingdom; and for their encouragement, it was said, that the French were coming with a great Fleet to their Assistance. The Protector sent a Message to the Scots, 'Inviting them by all the most insinuating Arguments, to consent to the Marriage; and if that would not be granted, he desier'd Ingagements from them, that their Queen should be contracted to no other Person, at least 'till she came of Age, and by the Advice of the Estates, should chuse a Husband for her self. All this the Protector offer'd, that he might be disingag'd from this unreasonable War upon honourable Terms; but the Scotch Lords thought this great Condescension the Effect of Fear, and believ'd the Protector was straiten'd for Want of Provisions; so instead of publishing this Offer, they resolv'd to fall upon him the next Day: And all the Return that was made, was, that if the Protector would march back without any Act of Hostility, he should not be molested; which the Protector rejected, as knowing that so mean an Action at this nice Conjuncture would ruin his Reputation. At the same Time a Person went officiously with the Trumpeter, and challeng'd the Protector in the Earl of Huntley's Name, to decide the Contest in their private Valour; but the Protector answer'd, He was oblig'd to fight no Way but at the Head of his Army; yet the Earl of Warwick accepted the Challenge, but it appear'd that Huntley had given no Commission for it.

On the tenth of September the two Armies drew out, and ingag'd in the Field of Pinkey near Musselburgh; in the beginning of which Action, a Cannon Ball from the Ships cut off a whole Lane of Men, and so disorder'd the Highlanders, that their Commanders could not make them keep their Ranks. The Earl of Angus made a brave Charge, but still was repuls'd; and the English upon this broke in with such a dreadful Fury upon the Scots, that they threw down their Arms and fled. About fourteen thousand were kill'd, and fifteen hundred taken Prisoners, among whom was the Earl of Huntley, and five hundred Gentlemen; and all the Artillery was taken. This Loss quite dishearten'd the Scots, so that they all fled to Striveling, and left the whole Country to the Mercy of the Protector; who the next Day went and took Leith, and the Soldiers in the Ships burnt some of the Sea-Towns of Fife, and recover'd some English Ships that had been taken from the Scots. The Protector sent some Ships to the Mouth of the Tay, and took the Castle of Broughty, that commanded that River, and likewise wasted Edinburgh it self, with other Places. If he had follow'd this remarkable Blow, and march'd directly to Striveling, where the Governor of Scotland and the young Queen were retir'd, it is probable that under that great Consternation he might have taken the Place, and put an End to the War. But the Party his Brother was making at Court, gave him such an inward Alarm, that he drew off before he had finish'd his Work; and the Scots making Overtures for a Treaty, which was only to gain Time, he order'd them to send their Commissioners to Berwick, and so march'd back. The ambitious Earl of Warwick, who had a large Share in the Honour of the Victory, but knew that the Errors in Conduct would much diminish the Protector's Glory, which otherwise might have been too exorbitant, was not displeas'd at it. Yet still he wanted not new Opportunities of Triumphant; for in his Return he took all the Castles in the Counties of Merch and Teviotdale, and caus'd all the Gentry to swear to be true to King Edward, and to promote the Marriage. After twenty five Days Continuance in Scotland, the Protector return'd into England, cover'd with Glories, having in the whole Expedition lost but sixty Men, taken eighty Pieces of Cannon, bridled the two chief Rivers of the Kingdom by Garrisons, and gain'd several strong Places. And now it may easily be imagin'd how much this rais'd his Reputation in England, especially since he had done such great Services in France, so that all had great Expectations under his Government. And if the Breach between his Brother and him had not lost him the present Advantages, this Action had laid a Foundation of prodigious Fortunes to him.

The Scots sent no Commissioners to Berwick, but instead of that, they sent some to France, to offer their Queen to the Dauphine, and to throw themselves on the Protection of that Crown; and so the Earl of Warwick, whom the Protector left to treat with them, return'd back, with no small Share in the other's Glory. This remarkable Man was Son to that Dudley who was attainted and executed in the first Year of the late Reign, and was one of extraordinary Abilities, had not insatiable Ambition and profound Dissimulation stain'd his other noble Qualities. By means of the Scots the Wars were continu'd, and manag'd the following Year by the Lord Gray of Wilton with various Success. The Earl of Shrewsbury was also sent with fifteen thousand Men; against him, for the Assistance of the Scots, was sent the Rhinegrave with ten thousand French; who entering into a Consultation how to remove the young Queen beyond the English Power, provided a Fleet, and sailing round the North of Scotland, notwithstanding the English Fleet lay in readiness to stop their Passage, yet she was convey'd safely into France, being about six Years of Age, and was long afterwards marry'd to the Dauphine of France.

The Affairs of Germany.

II. The Protector having obtain'd such signal Advantages, proceeded in the Business of the Reformation, and to summon a new Parliament. As to the former, great Inferences were made from one Particular, that on the same Day in which the Images were burnt in London, the English Army obtain'd a signal Victory in Scotland, which was the same Day of the Victory of Flodden Field, thirty four Years before. All submitted to the new Visitors, only the two Bishops Bonner and Gardiner, for refusing the Injunctions, were both imprison'd. Upon the fourth of November the Parliament was open'd; the Day before which the Protector gave too publick an Instance how he was elevated by his Prosperity: For by a Patent he was authoriz'd to sit under the Cloath of State, on the right Hand of the Throne; and to have all the Honours and Privileges that any Uncle of the Crown ever had, with a Non-obstante to the Statute of Precedence. The Lord Rich was made Lord Chancellor; and the first Act that pass'd was 'A Repeal of all Statutes that had made any thing Treason or Felony in the late Reign, which was not so before; particularly of the Six Articles, and the Authority given to the King's Proclamations, as also of the Acts against Lollards. All who deny'd the King's Supremacy, or asserted the Pope's, the first Offence was forfeiture of Goods, the second a Premunire, and the third Treason: But if any intended to deprive the King of his Estate or Title, that was made direct Treason. It also repeal'd the Power the King had of annulling all Laws made, 'till he was twenty four Years of Age, and restrain'd it only to the annulling them for the time to come, but that it should not be of force for the declaring them null from the Beginning. In passing of this Act five Bishops dissented; and another Act pass'd with the same Dissent, 'For the Communion in both Kinds, and that the People should always Communicate with the Priest; and by it Irreverence to the Sacrament was condemn'd under severe Penalties. Another Act pass'd without any Dissent, 'That the Conge d'elire, and the Election pursuant to it, should cease for the future, and that Bishops should be nam'd by the King's Letters Patents, and thereupon consecrated; and should all hold their Courts in the King's Name, excepting the Arch-Bishop of Canterbury; and were to use the King's Seal in all their Writings, excepting Presentations, Collations, and Letters of Orders, in which they might use their own. After an Act against idle Vagabonds, came the Act for giving the King all the Chantries, which the late King had not seiz'd by virtue of the Grant made to him of them. Crammer, with seven other Bishops dissented, but could not prevent the Act from passing at last. Last of all came the King's general Pardon, with the common Exceptions, among which the Duke of Norfolk was named. And thus ended this Session; when the Protector, being establish'd in his Power without Contradiction, took out a new Commission, in which besides his former Authority, he was empower'd to substitute one in his Room, during his Absence.

During these Transactions at home, the poor German Princes, who rely'd upon the Assistance of England, were ruin'd by the Emperor: The Duke of Saxony was defeated and taken Prisoner; the Prince of Hesse was perswaded to submit, and by an Artifice detain'd Prisoner; upon which all the Princes and Towns of the Smalcaldick League submitted, and purchas'd their Pardon, at what Terms the Conqueror was pleas'd to impose. Now all Germany, except Magdebury and Breme, was at the Emperor's Mercy; some Cathedrals were again restor'd to the Bishops, and Mass was said in them; a Diet was also held, in which the Emperor obtain'd a Decree, by which Matters of Religion were referr'd wholly to his Care. The Pope instead of rejoicing at this Blow given to the Lutherans, was extremely concern'd at it: For the Emperor had now in one Year finish'd a War, which he hop'd would have imbroil'd him his whole Life; so that Italy was more than ever expos'd to his Arms, where he had many Reasons to be jealous of his Power. The Emperor's Ambassadors became very uneasy to the Legates at Trent, and urg'd a Reformation of Abuses, and endeavour'd to restrain them from proceeding in Points of Doctrine; upon which they took advantage from the Death of one who seem'd to have some Symptoms of the Plague, and remov'd the Council to Bononia in Italy. By this all the Advantages the Emperor had from the Promises of the Protestants to submit to a free General Council assembled in Germany, were defeated: And it was judg'd a wonderful Turn of Providence, that when Lutheranism was so near its Extirpation, a Stop was put to it by what was least imagin'd; since it was highly probable that perfecting such a Design would have reconcil'd the widest Differences between the Pope and the Emperor. So unexpected an Accident caus'd the Favourers of the Reformation to ascribe it to the immediate Care that Heaven had of that Work, at a Time when all human Supports were remov'd. However upon the Emperor's Advantages, the Foreign Reformers, who generally made Germany their Sanctuary, were now forc'd to come into England: Peter Martyr and Bernard Ochinus came over first, and Bucer and Fagius follow'd. They were invited over by the generous Cranmer, who entertain'd them at Lambeth, till Provision was made for them; Martyr was sent to Oxford, and Bucer and Fagius to Cambridge, where shortly after the latter dy'd. In this Year there were some Differences between the French and English, concerning some new Forts, which were made about Boloign, on both Sides, yet a Truce was concluded; for the Protector, who began to have Troubles in his own Family, had no Desire to ingage in a War against France.

The Foreign Reformers repair to England

The great Work of the Reformation was still carry'd on by continu'd Steps and Progressions; and much Care was taken to remove what related to Ignorance and Superstition. As Candlemass and Lent were approaching, Cranmer procur'd an Order of Council against the carrying of Candles on Candlemass-Day, of Ashes on Ash-Wednesday, and Palms on Palm-Sunday. By a Proclamation, the creeping to the Cross, and taking Holy Bread and Water were abolish'd; and Power given to the Arch-Bishop of Canterbury to certify, in the King's Name, what Ceremonies should be afterwards laid aside. Shortly after, a general Order follow'd for a Removal of all Images out of Churches, of which some were of a very gross Nature: The only Occasion given to censure this Order, was that all Shrines, and the Plate belonging to them, were appointed to be brought in to the King's Use. Eighteen Bishops, and some Divines, were now employ'd to examine the Offices of the Church, and to see which of them needed Amendment. They began with the Eucharist, and the first Step now made was a new Office for the Communion, and the Distribution of the Sacrament; which differ'd not much from what is still in Use, and was printed with a Proclamation, requiring all to receive it with such Reverence and Uniformity, as might encourage the King to proceed further. Auricular Confession was also examin'd, which being then us'd as a mere Trade, it was now thrown out of the Church, and private Confession was declar'd indifferent. After this a general Reformation of the whole Liturgy was under Consideration, that all the Nation might have an Uniformity in the Worship of God, and be no more content'd to the several Uses of distinct Dioceses. It was resolv'd to have a Liturgy, as might bring the Divine Worship to a fit Medium, between the Pomp of Superstition, and a naked Flatness: And it was resolv'd to have nothing chang'd meerly in Opposition to receiv'd Practices, but rather in Imitation of what Christ did, in the Institution of the two Sacraments of the Gospel, that consisted of Rites us'd among the Jews, but bless'd by him to higher Purposes, to comply with what had been formerly in use, as much as was possible, thereby to gain the People. It was also resolv'd to have the whole Worship in the vulgar Tongue; and the Morning and Evening Prayers were put almost in the same Method, in which they are still us'd, only there was no Confession or Absolution. The Liturgy thus compil'd, was publish'd with a Preface concerning Ceremonies; the same that is still in the Common-Prayer-Book, written with extraordinary Judgment and Temper. The Marquess of Northampton's Divorce.

The Affairs of State took up the Council, as much as the Matters of Religion imploy'd the Bishops; the War with Scotland became chargeable, and was supported from France, but the Sale of the Chantry Lands brought in some Money to the Council. About the same time Bishop Gardiner, who was lately releas'd from his Imprisonment, again rais'd some Disturbances against the Re-forming Preachers; for which, not without some Hardship, he was sent to the Tower. Another Accident also rais'd no small Disputes in the Court, which was the second Marriage of the Marquess of Northampton, which was try'd at this time, for his first Wife being convict of Adultery, he and she were separated. He had mov'd at the end of the late Reign, that he might be suffer'd to marry again; therefore a Commission was then granted, and was renew'd in the present Reign to some Delegates to examine what Relief might be given to the innocent Person in such a Case. But this being new, and Cranmer proceeding in it with his usual Exactness, which was often accompany'd with Slowness, the Marquess became impatient, and marry'd a second Wife. This gave Offence to the Council, who order'd them to be parted 'till the Delegates should give Sentence; which after famous Debates, and Consideration of all Arguments, was at length given in his Favour, and his second Marriage confirm'd. Yet four Years after, he was advis'd to have a special Act of Parliament for confirming this Sentence.

Affairs in Scotland.

The War with Scotland still continu'd, where being encourag'd by a great Supply from France, the Clergy could not be satisfy'd, 'till they had put all things out of their Power, by sending away their Queen into France, as was before-mention'd. The English had fortify'd Haddington, a Scotch Town well situated, and in a fruitful Country; upon which the Governor of Scotland, joining with the French, sat down before it; a great Recruit sent to the Garrison from Berwick was intercepted and cut off, but they were well supply'd with Ammunition and Provisions. Some Castles that the English had gain'd were taken by Surprise, and others by Treachery: A Fleet was sent to waste the Coast of Scotland, under the Admiral's Command; but he only made two Descents, in both which he had such ill Success, that he lost near twelve hundred Men. The Earl of Shrewsbury advanc'd with a considerable Army to the Relief of Haddington, broke up the Siege, and well supply'd the Place. But as Dessy the French General march'd back to Edinburgh, his Soldiers committed great Outrages upon the Scots, so that Shrewsbury might have taken great Advantages, since the Scots were so weary of their imperious Friends the French; but he march'd back, having perform'd his Commission. Dessy follow'd him, and made a great Inroad into England, but would not give the Scots any Share of the Spoil, and treated them in all Things as a conquer'd People; and being justly apprehensive of them, he fortify'd himself in Leith, which before was but an inconsiderable Village. He also attack'd the Fort which the English had in Inchkeith, and took it; but he was recall'd upon the loud Complaints that were sent to the Court of France against him. Now the People began to be sensible of their Slavery, and to detest those who had advis'd the sending their Queen to France, particularly the Clergy; and were by that the more dispos'd to hearken to such Preachers, as discover'd their Superstition and Corruptions. And thus ended this Year's War between England and Scotland, with a Mixture of good and bad Success. The English had preserv'd Haddington, but lost all Hopes of the Marriage, and were in danger of being engag'd in a War with France, at a time when the King's Affairs were in an ill Condition, his People divided and discontented at home, and his Treasure much exhausted by the present Expences. The

The Protector had us'd several Methods to bring the Scots to a ten Years Truce, but with no Effect; for he had now most unhappy Troubles rais'd in his own Family by the Ambition of his Brother the Admiral, who being also Uncle to the young King, expected to have still a larger Share in the Government. This aspiring Man had formerly made his Addresses to the Princess Elizabeth the King's Sister, but finding no hopes of Success, he made early Applications to King Henry's Queen Dowager, who comply'd with him a little undecently; for it was afterwards objected to him, that he marry'd her so soon after the King's Death, that if she had conceiv'd immediately after this Marriage, it might have been dubious whether it was by the late King or himself. Yet the Marriage was for some Time conceal'd, and the Admiral subtilly mov'd the King and his Sisters, to write to the Queen in his Favour: The Princesses excus'd themselves, that it was not proper for them to interpose in such a Matter; but he prevail'd upon the young King, and upon his Letter the Queen publish'd her Marriage. The Admiral being by this possess'd of great Wealth, and finding the King frequently repairing to the Queen's Lodgings, he endeavour'd to gain him, and all that were about him; and often took Occasion to furnish the King with small Sums of Mony. Having thus insinuated himself to the King's Acquaintance, his Design was this; that whereas, in former Times, when Infant Kings had two Uncles, one was Protector of the Realm, and the other Governor of his Person, so now these two Trusts might be divided, and that he might be made Governor of the King's Person. This is the most probable Foundation of the Breach between the unfortunate Brothers; for the vulgar Story of the Quarrel between their Wives about Precedence, seems an ill-grounded Fiction: For there was no Pretence of a Competition between the Queen Dowager and the Dutches of Somerfet; only the latter being of a most haughty Spirit, might probably inflame her Husband's Resentments, over whom she had an unreasonable Power, which gave rise to the Story, and to other Mischiefs. At first the Protector was easie to be reconcil'd to his Brother; but after the numerous Provocations he receiv'd from him, he too much threw off Nature. When he was in Scotland, the Admiral was daily forming a Party against him; and the good Advices given him by Paget, to treat such as Enemies as were making a Breach between them, had no Effect to cure a Mind impetuously hurry'd on by a fatal Ambition. During the last Session of Parliament the Admiral prevail'd with the King to write a Message with his own Hand to the House of Commons, to make him Governor of his Person; and when his Brother and his Friends endeavour'd to divert him from this Design, he declar'd, That if he was cross'd in his Attempt, he would make this the blackest Parliament that ever was in England. Upon this he was sent for to appear before the Council, but he refus'd to come; but when they threaten'd to turn him out of all his Places, and to send him to the Tower, he submitted, and he and his Brother seem'd perfectly reconcil'd.

The Parliament being broke up, in the Month of September, the Admiral's Wife, the Queen Dowager dy'd, not without Suspicion of Poison; upon which he boldly renew'd his Addresses to the Princess Elizabeth. But finding it vain to expect that his Brother and the Council would consent, and knowing that if she marry'd without their Consent, she would be excluded the Succession, he resolv'd to secure the King's Person, till he had made a sufficient Change in the Government. Accordingly he fortify'd his House in the Country, prepar'd Magazines, list'd great Numbers of Men, and openly complain'd That his Brother design'd to enslave the Nation, and govern all, and he also enter'd into a Treaty with several of the Nobility, who envy'd his Brother's Greatness, promising that they should be of the Council, and that he would dispose of the King in Marriage to one of their Daughters. The Protector employ'd many to divert him from these desperate Designs; but his restless Ambition being incurable, he was oblig'd to proceed to Extremities, and to send him Prisoner soner to the Tower, together with his Confederate Sharington, who being Vice-Treasurer of the Mint at Bristol, had supply'd him with Mony, and had coin'd much base Mony for his Use. Many were sent to persuade him to a better Temper of Mind, and his Brother was again willing to be reconcil'd to him, if he would retire from the Court and publick Business; but he was still violent and intractable. Upon which many Articles were drawn up against him, both of his Designs against the State, and of his Maleverfation in his Office, several Pirates having been entertain'd by him; and many Witnesses and Letters under his own Hand, were produc'd against him. The greatest Part of the Council went to the Tower, and examin'd him; but he refus'd to give any particular Answers, but declar'd he expected a fair and open Trial. The whole Council upon this, acquainted the young King with it, and desir'd him to refer the Matter to the Parliament then sitting; which he granted with a Caution and Respect becoming one of riper Years. Upon which some Counsellors were again sent to him to see what they could draw from him; but he shew'd a peculiar Sullenness, and after he had answer'd to three of the Articles, denying some Particulars, and excusing others, he refus'd to proceed any further.

Reg. 3.

A Session of Parliament.

The old Parliament met in the latter End of the Year 48, but no Bills were finish'd before February following: The first was concerning the marry'd Clergy, which was finish'd by the Commons in six Days, but lay six Weeks before the Lords; nine Bishops and four Temporal Lords protesting against it. 'By it, it was declar'd that tho' it was better for Priests to live unmarried, and free from worldly Cares; yet since the Laws compelling it had occasion'd great Filthiness, and other Inconveniences, they were all repeal'd. Another Act pass'd, confirming the Liturgy, which was now finish'd; eight Bishops, and three Temporal Lords only protesting against it. There was a long Preamble, 'setting forth the Inconvenience of the former Offices, and the Pains taken to reform them; and that divers Bishops and Divines had, by the Aid of the Holy Ghost, with an uniform Agreement concluded on the new Book: 'Therefore it was Enacted, That all Divine Offices should be perform'd according to that; and whoever us'd other Offices, for the first Offence should suffer six Months Imprisonment, loss of Benefice for the second, and perpetual Imprisonment for the third. There was also another Act pass'd concerning Fasting, declaring, 'That tho' all Days and Meats were of themselves alike, yet Fasting, being a great Help to Virtue, and to the subduing the Body to the Mind, and a Distinction of Meats conducing to the Fishing Trade, it was Enacted, That Lent, and all Fridays and Saturdays, and Ember Days should be Fish-Days, under several Penalties, excepting to the Weak, or those that had the King's Licence. These and some other Things being pass'd, and Subsidies granted to the King, the Parliament was prorogu'd in March to November.

The Admiral
attainted.

But what occasion'd as great Discourse as any Thing in this Parliament was the Attainder of the Admiral; which was begun in the House of Lords, who had been too much accusom'd to pass such Bills in the late Reign. All the Judges and the King's Council deliver'd their Opinions, that the Articles produc'd against him were Treason. When the Evidence was produc'd, many Lords gave it so fully, that all the rest with one Voice consented to the Bill; only the Protector, for the sake of natural Pity, desir'd Leave to withdraw. The Lords dispatch'd it in two Days; but in the House of Commons many argu'd against such unjust Attainders without a Trial, or bringing the Party to make his Answers. At length a Message was sent from the King, desiring them to proceed as the Lords had begun; and the Lords who had given Evidence against him in their own House, were sent down to the Commons. Upon which the Bill pass'd, and had shortly after the Royal Assent. On the seventeenth of March the Council sign'd a Warrant for his Execution, to which both both the Lord Protector, and the Arch-Bishop of Canterbury, set their Hands. And on the twentieth he was beheaded on Tower-Hill; but we find not his Behaviour on the Scaffold, only that he declar'd, That he had never committed, or meant any Treason against the King or Kingdom. Thus fell Thomas Lord Seymour, Lord High-Admiral of England; a Man of high Thoughts, of great Violence of Temper, and unmeasurably aspiring; so, as other ambitious Men, he was like a Bubble, which is swell'd by every small Breath, and broken by every great Blast. This Execution caus'd divers Censures, particularly against the Protector, who set his Hand to the Warrant; for the popular Notion, of its being against Nature for one Brother to destroy another, was easily entertain'd by the Multitude, who could not penetrate into the Mysteries of State. Then the Attainting of a Man without hearing him, was condemn'd as contrary to natural Justice; so that the Protector lost one who could have been a mighty Prop, and suffer'd almost as much by his Death, as he could have done by his Life.

He is beheaded.

III. The Protector having now lost the chief Support of his House, design'd to repair that Ruin, by erecting a magnificent Palace. Accordingly he cast his Eyes upon a Piece of Ground in the Strand, on which stood one Parish-Church and three Episcopal Houses; the former dedicated to the Virgin Mary, and the latter belonging to the Bishops of Worcester, Litchfield and Landaff: All which he assum'd into his Hands without any great Opposition. Having clear'd the Place and projected the intended Fabrick, the Workmen found that more Materials would be wanting to finish it, than the demolish'd Churches and Houses could afford. He therefore resolv'd to take down the Parish-Church of St. Margaret's in Westminster, and appointed a particular Portion of the Abby-Church to be mark'd out for the Use of the Parishoners. But in this his Workmen were prevented by an Insurrection of the Multitude, who manfully discourag'd the Undertaking. In the next Place he was inform'd of some superfluous, or rather superstitious Buildings about St. Paul's, as a regular Cloyster with a Chappel, and a fair Charnel House, and another Chappel belonging to it. This was conceiv'd to be a safer Undertaking, while the Churchmen continu'd to be little better than Tenants at Will; and thereupon he employ'd his Workmen to take all down, and convert the Stone, Timber, Lead and Iron, to the use of his intended Palace, leaving the Bones of the dead Bodies to be bury'd in the Fields. But all this not being sufficient for his Work, the Steeple, and the greatest Part of the Church of St. John's of Jerusalem, not far from Smithfield, a beautiful Building, was pull'd down, and the Stone employ'd to the same Purpose. Such was the Ground, and such were the Materials of the Duke's new Palace, call'd Somerset-House; which either he liv'd not to finish, or else it must be unaccountably strange, that after the demolishing of two Churches, two Chappels, and three Episcopal Houses, to build one Palace, there should be no particular Room erected for Religious Offices.

The Building of Somerset-House.

As this Year began, so it proceeded; in which nothing more was to be found than Troubles, Commotions and Disquiets, both in Church and State. For about this Time there started up a sort of Men, call'd by the Name of Gospellers, who held peculiar Notions as to Punishments and God's Providence, and making God the Author of Evil. And at the same Time the Anabaptists from Germany began to vent their Opinions in England, which were not only a Denial of Infant Baptism, but also of the Trinity, the Divinity of Christ, and other Heretical Principles. For the stifling of this Mischief, some of the Principal of them were conven'd before the Arch-Bishop of Canterbury, and other Divines and Civilians; and being convicted of their Errors, some of them were dismiss'd only with Admonition, some sentenc'd to a Recantation, and others condemn'd to bear their Faggots at St. Paul's Cross. But they proceeded further with one Joan Bocher, commonly call'd Joan of Kent, who deny'd the Incarnation of Christ; and being unmeasurably vain and conceited of her Notions, she scornfully rejected all Instructions that were offer'd her. Upon which she was condemn'd as an obstinate Heretick, and deliver'd to the secular Power; but it was very difficult to persuade the tender King to sign the Warrant for her Execution: He thought it an Instance of the same Spirit of Cruelty, for which the Reformers condemn'd the Papists; and that it was unreasonable to burn a Person for some wild Opinions, especially when they seem'd to flow from a disturb'd Brain. But Cranmer persuaded him that being God's Lieutenant, he was oblig'd to punish direct Blasphemers, according to the Laws of Moses. This rather silenc'd than satisfy'd the young King; who sign'd the Warrant with Tears in his Eyes, and told the Arch-Bishop, That since he resign'd himself to his Judgment, if he sinn'd it should lye at his Door. This sensibly struck the Arch-Bishop; and both he and Ridley took her to their Houses, and try'd how far Reason, join'd with Gentleness, could prevail. But being still more insolent, at last she was burnt, and ended her Life with such indecent Jeers and Reproaches, that she was thought a Person more fit for a dark Chamber than a Stake. Afterwards a Dutchman, nam'd George van Parre, was also condemn'd and burnt, for denying the Divinity of our Saviour, who was a Man of exemplary Piety, and suffer'd with great Composedness of Mind. These Things cast a great Blemish upon the Reformers, who were said to condemn Cruelty only when it was exercis'd on themselves; and the Papists made great use of this in the next Reign; and when Cranmer and Ridley suffer'd, it was thought a just Retaliation upon them, by that Providence that does Justice to all Mankind.

Great Tumults about Inclosures.

At this Time a sort of Contagion of Rage and Violence ran over all the Commons of England: The Nobility and Gentry finding more Advantage by the Trade of Wool than by their Corn, did generally inclose their Grounds, and turn them to Pasture; and so kept but few Servants, and took large Portions of their Estates into their own Hands. Yet still the Numbers of the People increas'd; since Marriage was allow'd to all; and the Abrogation of many Holy-Days, and the putting down of Pilgrimages, gave them also more Time to work. By these Means the Commons were under terrible Apprehensions, and fear'd to be reduc'd to great Misery. Some propos'd a sort of Aggrarian Law, for regulating this threatening Inconvenience; and the King himself wrote a Discourse about it, that there might be some Equality in the Division of the Soil among the Tenants. The Protector, being naturally just and compassionate, was a great Friend to the Commons, and much complain'd of the Oppression of the Landlords. There was therefore a Commission issu'd out, to enquire concerning Inclosures and Farms, and whether those who purchas'd the Abbey Lands, and were oblig'd to keep up Hospitality, perform'd it, or not; and what Incouragement they gave to Husbandry. This having but little Effect, the Commons rose in most Parts of the Nation, but chiefly in the Inland Counties; but they were easily dispers'd, with a Promise that their Grievances should be redress'd. The Protector, contrary to the Council's Opinion, set out a Proclamation against all new Inclosures, and for indemnifying the People for what was past. Commissioners were also sent into most Counties, to hear and determine all Complaints; but the Power that was given to them was so arbitrary, that the Landlords call'd it an Invasion of Property, when their Rights were thus subjected to the Pleasure of such Men. The Commons understanding that the Protector was so favourable to them, soon fell into greater Outrages than ever: Insomuch it was afterwards objected to him, that the Convulsions of England were chiefly owing to his ill Conduct; in which he was the more blam'd because he acted against the Opinion of the Majority of the Council.

The most dangerous Commotions, which continu'd so long, as to gain the Name of Rebellions, were those of Devonshire and Norfolk; Counties remote from each other, but such as seem'd to have communicated Counsels, for carrying on the Design. The first was in Devonshire, where the Insurrection was very formidable, the Superstition of the Priests joining with the Rage of the People; so that they soon became ten thousand strong. The Lord Russett at first was sent against them with a small Force, and was order'd to try if he could compose the Disturbance without Bloodshed; but Arundel, a Man of Quality, commanding the Rebels, they prov'd not a loose Body of Men, easily dissipated. They boldly sent their Demands to the Court, ' That the old Service and Ceremonies might be restor'd; That the Act of the Six Articles, and the Decrees of General Councils might again be in Force; That the Bible in English might be call'd in; That Preachers should pray for the Souls in Purgatory; That Cardinal Pool should be restor'd; That half the Abby Lands should be restor'd, to found two Abbies in every County, and that Gentle-men of a hundred Marks a Year should have but one Servant: And they desir'd a safe Conduct for their chief Leaders, in order to redress their particular Grievances: Afterwards they moderated their Demands, only to Points of Religion. Arch-Bishop Cranmer wrote a large Answer to these, ' shewing the Novelties and Superstition of those Rites and Ceremonies, and of the whole Way of Worship of which they were so fond: That the Amendments and Alterations had been made according to the Scriptures, and the Customs of the Primitive Church; and their being fond of a Worship they did not understand, and desirous to be kept still in Ignorance without the Scriptures, shew'd that their Priests had a greater Influence over them, than the common Reason of all Mankind: As for the Six Articles, that Act had never pass'd if the King had not gone in Person to the Parliament, and argu'd for it; yet he soon saw his Error, and was slack in executing it. After that there was a high threatening Answer sent them in the King's Name, condemning them for their Rebellion, and blind Obedience to their Priests: In which, the King's Authority under Age was largely set forth; because the Pretence of the King's Minority caus'd the People in general to believe, that their Insurrection was no Rebellion. In Conclusion, ' They were earnestly invited to the King's Mercy, as others had done, whom the King had not only pardon'd, but had redress'd their just Grievances.

A Rebellion in Devonshire, commanded by Arundel.

But this giving no Satisfaction, the Rebels march'd with all their Forces to besiege Exeter; carrying before them in their March the consecrated Host, born under a Canopy, with Crosses, Banners, Candlesticks, and other Utensils. But all these had no Effect upon the Citizens, who were no less gallantly resolv'd to make good the Town, than the other were desperately bent to force it. To which Resolution of the Citizens, the natural Defences of the City gave not more Incouragement, than some insolent Speeches of the Rebels, boasting, That they would shortly measure all the Silks and Sattens in it, by the Length of their Bows. They set Fire to the Gates, and wrought Mines, but all to no Effect; at length they resolv'd to try how far Famine would prevail, and after many Days Siege, they reduc'd the Citizens to great Extremities. They were forc'd to feed upon Horses, especially for twelve Days; during which Time, they were encourag'd by an Aged Citizen, who brought out all his Stores, and declar'd, That he would eat one Arm, and fight with the other, before he would yield to the Seditious. After they were reduc'd to these Necessities, the Lord Russett with his small Army resolv'd to attack the Rebels; who had possess'd themselves of a Bridge behind him, both to surround him, and to hinder others from joining him: But he suddenly march'd back, and soon beat them from the Bridge with the Loss of six hundred of their Men; by which Attempt he perceiv'd how easie a Work it would be to disperse them. Shortly after the Lord Gray, and Spinola, commanding some Germans, joining him, he proceeded to raise the Siege of Exeter. They had block'd up the Ways, and left two thousand Men to keep a Bridge, where the King's Forces were to pass; but the Lord Ruffel bravely broke through them, and kill'd about a thousand of them; upon which they were forc'd to raise the Siege and retire to Lanceston. Having pursu'd them with new Slaughter, the Lord Ruffel enter'd the City of Exeter on the sixth of August, where he was joyfully receiv'd by the half starv'd Citizens; whose Loyalty the King rewarded with an Encrease of Privileges, and the Manor of Eviland. This very Day has been ever since observ'd amongst them for an annual Feast, in perpetual Gratitude to God, for their happy Deliverance. Arundel, and the rest of the Heads, were taken and executed; and the Vicar of St. Thomas, a principal Incendiary, was hang'd on the Top of his own Tower, in his Popish Attire, and his Beads at his Girdle. And thus was the Rebellion happily suppress'd in the West, to the great Honour of the Lord Ruffel, who finish'd it with little or no Loss.

The Rebels
incamp before Norwich.

In the mean Time the Norfolk Rebellion broke out, on the twentieth Day of June, beginning at a Place call'd Attleborough; but was not considerable either for Power or Numbers, 'till the sixth of July; when it was greatly increas'd by Robert Ket a Tanner of Windham, who undertook to lead the Multitude. These Men at first pretended only against Inclosures, and Religion seem'd to be kept as a Reserve; but when their Numbers were greatly increas'd, their Insolence was such, as nothing would satisfy them, but the total Suppression of the Gentry, the placing of new Counsellors about the King, and other Things to be done in favour of the old Religion. Concerning which they made large Remonstrances both to the King and People. The Sheriff of the County came boldly to them, and requir'd them in the King's Name to disperse and go home; but had he not been well mounted, they would have put him to a cruel Death. After this they march'd directly towards Norwich, and possess'd themselves of Moushold-Hill; which gave them a full Prospect over, and a compleat Command upon that large City, where they had many Friends. To this Place great Numbers resorted out of Suffolk as well as Norfolk, many for Want, and many upon a turbulent Mind and a weak Notion of Levelling the World; and in all Parts Beacons were fir'd and Bells rung, to promote the Insurrection; so that in a short Time the Multitude increas'd to twenty thousand, which were rather to be esteem'd a Number than an Army. Their Companies rang'd through all the neighbouring Parts, and took what Goods they thought fit; and besides Deer out of Parks, they brought such Quantities of Beasts and Provisions, that a fat Sheep was sold for four Pence. This was interpreted as a present Plenty, but it afterwards made such a Scarcity, as could not be repair'd in several Years. Their Actions were disguis'd with the usual Coverings in Time of Rebellion, which were Religion and Justice: For the former they had one Coniers for their Chaplain, an idle vicious Person, who Morning and Evening read Prayers to them, and often Preach'd. But Doctor Parker, afterwards Arch-Bishop of Canterbury, coming to Preach before them, so fully laid open their notorious Impieties, that he was in Danger of his Life. As for Justice, Ket assum'd to himself the Power of Judicature, and in Imitation of the ancient Druids, under an old Oak, since call'd The Oak of Reformation, together with two of each Hundred in the County, did such Justice as might be expected from such a Judge, and in such a Camp.

The Marquis of Northampton was sent against them.

The Marquis of Northampton was sent against them, but with Orders to keep at a Distance from them, and to cut off their Provisions; for it was hop'd that without much Bloodshed, they might in Time be reduc'd. But at the same Time there was an Insurrection in Yorkshire, the Commons being further encourag'd by a Prophecy, That there should be no King nor Nobility in England, that the Kingdom should be rul'd by four Governors chosen by the Commons, who should hold a Parliament in Motion, to begin at the South and North Seas; which they apply'd to the Devonshire Men on the South Seas; and

and to themselves on the North Seas. They at their first Rising fir'd Beacons, and so gather'd the Country as if it had been for the Defence of the Coasts; and meeting two Gentlemen and two others, they without Provocation murder'd them, and left their naked Bodies in the Road. At the same Time the French King resolv'd to take Advantage of these Commotions, and to regain the Town of Boloign: Three Days before he march'd with his Army, the English Ambassador pressing him upon the Intimations that were given him of his Designs, he assur'd him, On the Faith of a Gentleman, he would not begin a War, till he had first given Warning: But many Princes reckon it a Part of their Prerogative, to be exempted from such Obligations as bind poor Subjects. All these Misfortunes falling upon the Government at once, it may easily be imagin'd that the Council was under no small Consternation. Therefore a solemn Fast was proclaim'd at Court, where Arch-Bishop Cranmer preach'd with a true Christian Freedom and Vehemence. This was the more seasonable, because the Marquess of Northampton was at this Time unsuccessful in Norfolk; for having eleven hundred Men with him, he did not strictly observe his Orders, but enter'd the City of Norwich. The Rebels rejoic'd at an Occasion to engage with him, and fell in upon him the next Day with great Fury; and the Place not being tenable, he was forc'd to quit it, with the Slaughter of a hundred of his Men, among whom was the Lord Sheffield, who was much lamented. The Rebels also took about thirty Prisoners, fir'd great Part of the City, and return'd in Triumph to their Camp.

The French take Advantage.

This being understood at Court, the Protector suffer'd his most dangerous Enemy the valiant Earl of Warwick, to march against the Rebels with six thousand Foot, and fifteen hundred Horse, that were prepar'd for an Expedition to Scotland. He with difficulty enter'd the City of Norwich, but was scarce able to defend it, nor was he well assur'd of the Inhabitants. But he entertain'd the Rebels with frequent Skirmishes, and so cut off their Provisions, that having wasted all the Country about them, they forsook the Hill, and retir'd to a Place call'd Dussing-Dale, where by a Prophecy they expected great Success. Here they came to a Battel, where the Rebels plac'd in the Front all the Gentlemen they had taken Prisoners, designing that they should be first slain; but the brave Earl of Warwick so manag'd his Men, that without any great Hurt to the Gentlemen, he defeated the Rebels with the Death of above two thousand of them. And now again the Earl offer'd them Pardon, if they would submit; but notwithstanding all their Losses, they continu'd still obstinate. At last, the Earl sent to know, if they would accept of a Pardon, if he should come in Person to offer it to them: This so sensibly mov'd them, that they answer'd, They knew him to be so honourable, that from himself they would embrace it. Whereupon the Earl riding to them, and causing their Pardon to be read, they threw away their Arms, and cry'd Long live King Edward! The Principals of them were taken and deservedly executed: Robert Ket was hang'd in Chains upon Norwich Castle, and his Brother William upon the Top of the high Church-Tower of Windham: Nine of his chief Followers were hang'd on as many Bows of the Oak of Reformation, where Ket held his Courts; of whom two were Seducing Prophets, and one a most excellent Canonier, who had done extraordinary Service to the Rebels. This great Deliverance was celebrated in the City of Norwich by a publick Thanksgiving, on the twenty second Day of August, which has been since annually observ'd. The Rebels in Yorkshire, who were no more than three thousand in Number, hearing of this Success, accepted of the Pardon that was sent them; only some few of the Ringleaders, continuing obstinate, were executed at Zork. After this, the Protector publish'd a general Pardon, in the King's Name, of all that had been done, with some few Exceptions; tho' many of the Council oppos'd it, as Mercy too profuse, judging it better to keep the Commons under the Lath; but the Protector and his Friends thought, that in this Case Fear was a greater Cause of Disorders than Impunity. Thus was England deliver'd from one of the most threatening Storms that had broke out for many Years; in which Deliverance the singular Prudence and Temper of the Protector seems to have had no small Share.

The English Affairs in Foreign Parts were very unsuccessful this Year; for when England was so distracted at home, it was no wonder if the French and Scots took what Advantages they could. Most of the Forts about Boloign were taken by the French; but those who commanded them, for their Excuse alledg'd they were ill provided; yet Thuanus says they were all well stor'd. From these they came and fate down before Boloign, with their King in Person; and tho' the Plague broke out in the French Camp, yet the Siege was not rais'd; but the King left the Army under the Command of Coligny, the famous Admiral of France. He found the only Way to take the Place was to cut it off from Sea, and so to keep out all Supplies; in order to which he design'd to have sunk a Gally full of Stones and Gravel in it; but this and several other Attempts prov'd unsuccessful. The Winter coming on, compell'd him to raise the Siege; but he lodg'd the greatest Part of his Army in the adjacent Forts, so that the Town was in danger of being lost the next Year. In Scotland there was also a great Turn; the Castle of Broughty was taken by the Scots, and the Garrison almost intirely cut off. The English took particular Care of Haddington, to supply it well, expecting a Siege, upon which the Scots desisted from attacking it; yet the Charge of keeping it was so great, and the neighbouring Country so wasted, that it was necessary to send all their Provisions from Berwick: So that the Protector thought it more advisable to abandon it; and upon that sent Orders to the Garrison to demolish the Works, and return into England. So that now the English had no Place beyond the Borders but Lauder; and Thermes the French General fate down before that, and if a Peace had not been concluded, it would have fallen into his Hands.

*Several Expedients
propos'd.*

Affairs being in this Disorder both at home and abroad, the Protector had nothing to depend on, but the Emperor's Aid; who was so dissatisfy'd with the Changes made in Religion, that much was not to be expected from him. At this Time the Emperor brought his Son Philip into the Netherlands, that he might put him in Possession of those Provinces; where he settled several Limitations both as to Civil and Military Power, and made a special Provision, that in Case his Son should break these Rules, the Provinces should not be oblig'd to obey him any longer: Which was the chief Ground both in Law and Conscience, upon which they afterwards justify'd their shaking off his Yoke. The Emperor was now Master of the Princes of Germany, who saw no Way to recover their Liberty but by the Assistance of the French King; therefore Applications were made to him, which were chearfully receiv'd, only he was resolv'd first to make himself Master of Boloign, and then to turn his whole Force towards Germany. Advertisements were given of this to the Protector, who thereupon enter'd into a deep Consultation with his Friends what was proper to be done in so critical a Conjunction; whether it was better to deliver up Boloign to the French by a Treaty, or to engage in a War to preserve it, which would not only be vastly expensive, but highly dangerous in these unsettled Times. He himself was inclin'd to deliver up Boloign; but his Enemies, who were a Majority in the Council, saw the Continuance of the War like to ruin him, whereas a general Peace would put the whole Nation into his Hands; therefore they set themselves against all Motions for a Treaty, declaring that the Sale of such a Place as Boloign would be a lasting Reproach to the Government. Many considerable Arguments were us'd on both Sides; and the Issue of their Consultations was the sending over Sir William Paget to the Emperor, to learn what might be expected from him. His publick Instructions were some superficial Matters relating to former Treaties and Trade; but his secret Instructions were to see whether the Emperor would include Boloign in the Defensive League, and so protect it; or whether he would take it into his Hands, and what what Recompence he would give for it; the Emperor long shifted him off with Delays and Pretences of great Business, and at last would give him no satisfactory Answer as to Boloign: So he was oblig'd to return home, and give an Account of his Negotiation to a divided Council.

Upon this ill Success the Protector found that his Power was in a declining Condition. But to finish this perplexing Affair, it was propos'd in Council, Whether since Boloign by a former Treaty was to be deliver'd up within a few Years, it were not better to prevent a new War and a Siege, where the Issue was like to prove very dangerous, and to enter into a Treaty for doing it immediately; and at the same Time, whether it were not more advisable to finish the War with Scotland, since there was no Possibility of compassing the Marriage, for which it was first begun. Upon this Motion, all the Protector's Enemies took off the Mask, and declar'd themselves against it. The Earl of Southampton and the Earl of Warwick were chief of the Party; the one hated him for turning him out of his Office, and the other expected to be the principal Man in Business, if he should be remov'd. Various Things concurr'd to raise the Protector many Enemies: His Partiality to the Commons provok'd the Gentry; his cutting off his Brother's Head, and his Palace in the Strand, sacrilegiously erected in the Time both of War and Plague, disgusted the People. The Clergy hated him, not only for his promoting the Changes made in Religion, but for his enjoying so many of the Bishop's best Manors: His entertaining Foreign Troops, both Germans and Italians, tho' done by the Consent of Council, yet gave a general Dislike: And the high Station he had obtain'd, wrought much on himself and others; raising the Pride of the former, and the Envy of the latter. The Privy-Counsellors complain'd, that he was become so Arbitrary in his Proceedings, that he scarcely regarded the Opposition made by the Majority to any of his Designs. All these Particulars concurr'd to beget him many Enemies; and except the generous Cranmer, who never forsook his Friend, and Paget and Smith, all turn'd against him, and violently oppos'd his Proposition for a Treaty with France. They also complain'd that the Places about Boloign were lost by his Carelessness, and Neglect of well furnishing them, and that he had recall'd the Garrison out of Haddington. They put him in mind of the Conditions, upon which he was first made Protector, by which he was limited to act nothing without their Advice; tho' he had since that taken out a Patent, which invested him with far greater Power. Then they charg'd him with ordering Paget to procure no better Answer from the Emperor, that he might be furnish'd with an Excuse for a dishonourable Treaty with France. Thus all the Month of September there were great Heats in the Council, when several interpos'd to no Effect; for the Faction against him was now so strong, that they resolv'd to strip him of his exorbitant Greatness, and reduce him to an Equality with themselves.

Upon these Animosities, the Protector carry'd the King to Hampton-Court, and put many of his own Creatures about him, which increas'd the former jealousies; therefore nine of the Privy-Council met at Ely House, and assum'd to themselves the Name and Authority of the Council; and Secretary Petre being sent by the King, to demand the Reason of their Meeting, instead of returning, join'd himself to them. They made a large Declaration of the Protector's Male-Administration and dangerous Designs, and of his engaging the King to sign Letters for raising of Men, and for dispersing seditious Papers; therefore they resolv'd to provide for the Safety of the King and Kingdom. Both the City of London, and the Lieutenants of the Tower declar'd for them; and they also sent Letters all over England, desiring the Assistance of the Nobility and Gentry. They were join'd by seven more Privy-Counsellors; and all wrote to the King 'Complaining of the Protector's Obstinacy, and his refusing to hearken to their Counsels, tho' the late King had left the Government of his Person and Kingdom to them in common, and the Protector was advanc'd

‘ to that Dignity over them, upon the Conditions which he had little regarded; ‘ therefore they desir’d that the King would make a good Construction of their ‘ Intentions and Proceedings. The Protector had remov’d the King from Hampton-Court, as being an open Place, to Windsor, which had some better Defence about it; and had arm’d some of his own Servants, and plac’d them about the King’s Person, which still encreas’d the former Jealousies; yet seeing himself abandon’d by most of his Friends, and finding the Party against him so formidable, that it would be in vain to struggle any longer, he offer’d to submit himself to the Council. Accordingly a Proposition of a Treaty was set on Foot; and the Lords at London were desired to send two of their Number with their Propositions, and a Passport was sent them for their Safety.
Cranmer, Paget and Smith wrote to the Council, to dispose them to an Agreement, ‘ and not to follow cruel Counsels. Many false Reports, as is usual in all such Occasions, were carry’d of the Protector, as if he had threaten’d, that if they design’d to put him to Death, the King should die first; which serv’d to improve their Prejudices against him. The Council wrote to Cranmer and Pa- get, ‘ Charging them to look well to the King’s Person, that he should not be ‘ remov’d from Windsor, and that the Duke of Somerset’s Servants might be ‘ remov’d from his Presence, and his own sworn Servants admitted to wait; ‘ protesting also that they would proceed with all Moderation and Favour that ‘ was possible towards the Duke of Somerset.

The Protector’s Fall.

The Council understanding that all Things were prepar’d, as they had desir’d, first sent three of their Number, to take care that the Protector, and some of his Favourites, Smith, Stanhope, Thynne, Wolf and Cecil should be confin’d to their Lodgings; and on the twelfth of October the whole Council went to Windsor, and made great Protestations of their Duty to the King, which he receiv’d favourably, and assur’d them he took all they had acted in the best Sense. The Protector, with the rest of his Friends, except Cecil, were sent to the Tower, and many Articles were drawn up against him, ‘ That he being ‘ Protector, with this Condition, that he should act nothing, but by the Con‘ sent of the other Executors, had separately treated with Ambassadors; had ‘ made Bishops and Lord-Lieutenants without their Knowledge; had held ‘ a Court of Requests in his House; had embas’d the Coin of the Nation;
 ‘ had neglected the Places the King had in France; had encourag’d the Con-‘ mons in their late Insurrections, and had given out Commissions, and pro‘ claim’d a Pardon without their Consent: That he had animated the King ‘ against the rest of the Council, and had proclaim’d them Traitors; and had ‘ put his own Servants armed about the King’s Person. And thus fell the Duke of Somerset from his high Offices and great Trust; but it appears by the Articles that what was charg’d upon him were rather Errors and Infirmities, than notorious Crimes, such as are incident to all who are suddenly exalted to a disproportion’d Greatness. He was not charg’d with Cruelty, Rapine or Bribery, or yet Sacrilege; and his embasing the Coin was done upon a common Mistake of weak Governments, which in the Necessity of Affairs usually fly to that as their last Refuge. He bore his Fall more equally than he had done his Prosperity; and in his Imprisonment, he set himself to the Study of moral Philosophy and Divinity, and wrote a Preface to a Book of Patience, which had noble Impressions upon his Mind. However his Fall was a great Affliction to all who lov’d the Reformation; which was increas’d by the surprehensions they had of the two chief Men of the Party against him, Sou- thampton and Warwick; the one a known Papist, and the other esteem’d as a Man of no Religion: And both at the Emperor’s Court, and in France, it was expected, that upon this Revolution, Matters of Religion would be reduc’d back to the same Posture, in which King Henry had left them. The Duke of Norfolk, and Bishop Gardiner, now hop’d to be set at Liberty; and Bonner, who for his Principles and Disobedience had this Year been depriv’d of his Bishoprick, expected to be re-establish'd; and all the People began much to decline from the Use of the new Service. But the Earl of Warwick, finding the King so zealously addicted to the Reformation, as nothing could more recommend a Man than that, soon forsook the Popish Party, and appear'd a mighty Promoter of that Work. Upon this the Earl of Southampton left the Court in great Discontent: He was neither restor'd to his Office of Chancellor, nor made Lord Treasurer, nor one of the Six who had the Charge of the King's Person, as he expected. Therefore he began to lay a Train against the Earl of Warwick, who being too quick for him, he retir'd, and not long after dy'd, by the Force of Poison or Grief.

In November, a Session of Parliament met; in which an Act was pass'd, declaring it Treason to call any to the Number of twelve together, about any Matter of State, if being requir'd, they did not disperse themselves: Other Riotous Assemblies were also declar'd Felonious; and the giving out of Prophecies concerning the King, or Council, was also made penal. Another Law was made against Vagabonds, the former Statute was repeal'd, as too severe, and Provisions were made for the Relief of the Sick and Impotent, and employing such as were able to Work. The Bishops made a great Complaint, of the Growth of Vice and Impiety, and that their Power was so much abridg'd, that they could not suppress it: Therefore a Bill was read, enlarging their Authority, which tho' great, was at length so moderated, that the Lords pass'd it. But the Commons rejected it; and instead of that, sent up a Bill, that empower'd thirty two, who were to be nominated by the King, the one half of the Spirituality, and the other of the Temporality, to compile a Body of Ecclesiastical Laws, within the Compass of three Years; and that those, not being contrary to the Common or Statute Law, and approv'd by the King, should have the Force of Ecclesiastical Laws: Of the thirty two, four were to be Bishops, and as many to be common Lawyers. Six Bishops and six Divines were also empower'd by an Act to prepare a new Form of Ordination, which being confirm'd under the Great Seal should take place after April following. On the second of January, a Bill was brought in against the Duke of Somerset, containing the Articles formerly mention'd, with a Confession of them, sign'd by his own Hand. But some objected, that they ought not to proceed, 'till they knew whether his signing of it was voluntary or not: Accordingly some were sent to examine him, to whom he acknowledg'd that he had done it freely, but protested that his Errors had flow'd rather from Indiscretion than Malice, and positively deny'd all treasonable Designs against the King or the Realm. Upon which he was fin'd in two thousand Pounds a Year, and in the Loss of all his Offices and Goods. He complain'd of the great Weight of this Censure, and earnestly begg'd to be restor'd to the King's Favour, and promis'd for the future to carry himself so humbly and obedient, as should make full Amends for his past Follies: All which was thought by some to be the Sign of an abject Spirit; tho' others excus'd it, for that the Power and Malice of his Enemies was so predominant, that he could not be safe, while he continu'd a Prisoner. He was discharg'd in the Beginning of February; shortly after he had his Pardon, and did so manage his Interest with the King, his Nephew, that he was brought both to the Court and Council in April. And thus the Storm pass'd over him more gently than was expected; but his Carriage in it was thought to have so little of the Heroe, that after this he was never much consider'd.

A Session of Parliament.

The Protector fin'd.

And restor'd to Favour.

IV. After this Disturbance and Confusion was over, the Reformation was again carry'd on with great Vigour. The Council sent Orders over all England, to require all to conform to the new Service, and to call in all the Books of the old Offices. To give a more publick Declaration of their Zeal, an Act pass'd in Parliament to the same Effect; by which all the old Books and Images were appointed to be defac'd, and all Prayers to Saints were to be struck out.

out of the Primers publish'd by the late King. A Subsidy was granted, and the King gave a general Pardon, out of which all State Prisoners and Anabaptists were excepted. In this Session it is observ'd, that the eldest Sons of Peers were first allow'd to sit in the House of Commons. The Committee appointed to prepare the Book of Ordination, finish'd their Work with common Consent; only Heath Bishop of Worcester refus'd to sign it, for which he was imprison'd by Order of Council. While the Reformation thus succeeded in England, Pope Paul dy'd; and Cardinal Pool, the grand Enemy to the Work, for his great Services and Sufferings was elected Pope, in the Night Time. He did by no means aspire to this Dignity; so that when a full Number had agreed, and came according to Custom to adore him, he receiv'd it with his usual Coldness, and said, God lov'd Light, advising them to defer the Matter 'till the Morning. The Italians, among whom Ambition passes for Greatness of Mind, look'd on this as an unsufferable Piece of Dulness and Stupidity; upon which the Cardinals thrunk from him before Day, and chose de Monte to be Pope, who reign'd by the Name of Julius the Third. The first Promotion he made was very extraordinary, for he gave his own Cardinal's Hat, to a Servant that kept his Monkey; and being ask'd what he observ'd in him to make him Cardinal, he answer'd, As much as the Cardinals had seen in him to make him Pope.

A Treaty with France.

At this Time the Council was daily perplex'd concerning the Affair of Boloign; and tho' they had oppos'd the Surrender of it by the Protector, yet that great End being serv'd in pulling him down, they were convinc'd of the Necessity of doing of it, and so were induc'd to hearken to the Proposition that one Guidotti, an Italian, made for a Treaty. He was imploy'd by the Constable Monmorancy, and gave them Assurances, that as soon as that was effected, the French King would ingage in favour of the oppress'd Princes of the Empire. For this End Ambassadors were sent over to France, the Lord Ruffel, and Paget now made a Lord, with some others, to settle the Treaty of Peace. They were order'd in the first Place to demand the Delivery of the Scotch Queen, and the Payment of the perpetual Tribute or Pension from France to England: But the French refus'd to treat upon these Heads; their Master design'd to marry the Scotch Queen to the Dauphine, and would not be so tributary to another Prince as to pay a perpetual Pension; but they offer'd a particular Sum of Mony for Boloign. Some Difficulties were rais'd about demolishing the Fortifications in Aldernay and Sark, two small Islands in the Channel which the French expected; and about the Surrender of Roxburgh and Almouth to the Scots, then in the Hands of the English. The Council order'd the Commissioners to insist upon these Particulars, and to offer to break the Negotiation rather than yield to them; but if that had no Effect upon the French, then they were to drop them as honourably as they could. In Conclusion, the English, after a special Protestation, by which they reserv'd to their King all the Rights he had at the Beginning of the War, agreed to deliver up Boloign, and all the Places about it, with all the Ordinance in it, except what the English had cast; for all which the French were to pay four hundred thousand Crowns, each amounting to the Value of an English Noble. Likewise all the Places which the English held in Scotland were to be deliver'd up, and the Fortifications demolish'd; and six Hostages were to be dispos'd on both Sides for the Performance of Articles, who were the Sons of Men of the highest Quality. Thus was the Peace fully concluded; and the Articles were exactly perform'd on both Sides. The Council all approv'd of the Proceedings of their Plenipotentiaries; only the high Earl of Warwick, who had violently declared himself against the Delivery of Boloign, pretended Sickness, and absented himself when the Peace was proclaim'd, on the twenty ninth Day of March.

Boloign deliver'd

French.

A Treaty concluded.

And now the King was entring in the fourth Year of his Reign, free from all Wars, which had hitherto distracted his Government, so that the Council was more at leisure to settle Affairs at home. But the Earl of Warwick beginning to form great Designs, resolv'd first to make himself popular, by calling all concern'd in the King's Affairs to a strict Account; and either to make them compound for large Sums, by which the King's Debts should be paid, or to keep them under Power, 'till he had made them subservient to his Ends. He began with the Earl of Arundel, who being charg'd with many Things, submitted to a Fine of twelve thousand Pounds, to be paid in twelve Yearstime. This was the more publickly observ'd, because Southampton, Arundel and he, with Sir Richard Southwell Master of the Rolls, had been the chief Contrivers of the Protector's Fall: Southampton was disappointed and driven away, Arundel was fin'd, and Southwell soon after imprison'd for dispersing some seditious Papers. This wrought much on the Vulgar, who imputed it to a secret Curse, on those who had conspir'd against the Protector; and the Delivery of Boloign still made it more apparent, that the Charge against him was chiefly grounded on Malice. After Arundel's Disgrace, all the Protector's Friends made their Compositions, and were discharg'd. Sir Thomas Smith, Sir Michael Stanhop, Thomas Fisher, and William Gray, each of them acknowledg'd they ow'd the King three thousand Pounds; and Sir John Thynn submitted to six thousand Pounds Fine.

The Earl of Warwick's
Designs.

All Things being now quieted at home, and compos'd abroad, there was a Discourse on Foot of a Marriage between the King, and a Daughter of France, which griev'd the Reformers, who more desir'd him to marry a Sister of Maximilians, who was believ'd to favour the Reformation, and was esteem'd one of the best Men of the Age. Old Latimer upon this Occasion preach'd at Court, and freely warn'd the King of the ill Effects of Marriages, made up only as Bargains, without Affection between the Parties, which occasion'd shameful Whoredoms and Divorces: He also complain'd of the Luxury and Vanity of the Age, and of many call'd Gospellers, who were concern'd for nothing but Abby and Chantry-Lands, pressing for a primitive Discipline in the Church: He complain'd that the King's Debts were not paid, and yet his Officers became vastly rich. He preach'd this as his last Sermon; and therefore us'd the greater Freedom. The Reformation still was carry'd on with Success; and Ridley Bishop of Rochester, a most learned and zealous Reformer, was made Bishop of London, in the Room of Bonner depriv'd. Gardiner was still kept a Prisoner, and treated with a Severity not altogether excusable. Doctor Hooper was at this Time made Bishop of Glocester, who being over Scrupulous about the Church Vestments, unhappily gave Rise to Disputes and Heats about indifferent Things, which have continu'd to this Day. This Dispute was too much promoted by John a Lasco, a German Reformer driven from his Country, who being allow'd to set up a Congregation in England, took an undecent Liberty in the English Affairs, and wrote against the Habits, and kneeling at the Sacrament. About the same Time, the famous Polydore Virgil, who had been now almost forty Years in England, growing old, desir'd leave to go nearer the Sun, all which was allow'd; and in Consideration of the publick Service he was thought to have done the Nation by his History of England, he was permitted still to hold his Arch-Deaconry of Wells, and Prebend of Nonnington. He is said to have pillag'd the publick Libraries at his Pleasure; and at last to have sent over a whole Ship Load of Manuscripts to Rome. At this Time the Young King, now thirteen Years of Age, began to display his Parts and Abilities by Means of his industrious Pen, which still went beyond his Years: Particularly he wrote a Journal with his own Hand of his Reign, and of all Foreign Affairs; and wrote a Scheme for amending many Things amiss in the Government; and so another Discourse in French against Idolatry, with a Preface to it, dedicated to his Uncle the Protector.

The Progress
of the Reformation

The young
King's Abilities

A. D. 1551. The Government was now free from all Disturbances, the Coin was regulated, and Trade encourag'd; and the Faction in the Court seem'd to be extinguish'd, by a Marriage between the Earl of Warwick's Son and the Duke of Somerset's Daughter. All which gave Opportunity for the Reformation to be carry'd on with great Vigour and Success; and the Romish did now generally comply with every Change that was made in the Church. The Principle by which most of that Party were govern'd, was this; They believ'd they ought to oppose all the Changes, before they were establish'd by Law, yet when once done, they might afterwards comply with them. Cranmer, who was of great Temper and Prudence, was willing to accept of any thing they offer'd, rightly judging, that whether they acted sincerely or not, their Compliance would be a Means to quiet the Nation; and he was so naturally compassionate, that he would not use Extremities, against Men that were grown old in their Errors, and could not easily be wean'd from them. Only Gardiner and Bonner were such deceitful and cruel Men, that he thought it more excusable to make Stretches, for delivering the Church from them; for as Bonner had formerly lost the Bishoprick of London, so this Year Gardiner was formally depriv'd of Winchester, and Poinet put in his Room. About the same Time that eminent Reformer Martin Bucer dy'd at Cambridge, a Man of great Learning and excellent Temper of Mind; and by Order from Cranmer and Sir John Cheek, he was bury'd with the highest Solemnities that could be invented, to express the Esteem the University had for him. By this Time the greater Number of the Bishops were Men that heartily receiv'd the Reformation; so it was resolv'd now to proceed to a Settlement of the Doctrine of the Church. Accordingly, after some mature Debates and Considerations, they fram'd a Body of Articles, which contain'd the Doctrine of the Church of England: They were cast into forty two Articles, and afterwards some few Alterations being made in the Beginning of Queen Elizabeth's Reign, they were reduced to THIRTY NINE; which continue in Use and Force to this Day. Altars began to be put down, and Communion-Tables were plac'd in their Room: and the Common-Prayer Book was review'd and alter'd, and put in the same Order and Method, in which it continues to this Day, excepting only some inconsiderable Variations, that have been made since. At this Time six of the most eminent Preachers were appointed to wait on the Court by Turns, two at a Time, and the other four were sent as Itinerant Preachers, into all the Counties of England, in a Circuit, for supplying the Defects of the Clergy, who were generally very weak and faulty.

The Princess Mary a great Opposer of it.

The greatest Opposer of the Reformation was the Princess Mary; and the Mass constantly said in her Chappel, was now again disputed. The Court became less apprehensive of the Emperor's Displeasure than formerly, and therefore would no longer bear with so publick a Breach of Law; and the Promise they made being but temporary, and not in Writing, they were not under any further Obligation. But the Emperor assuring her, that he had an absolute Promise for that Privilege, she was so much encourag'd, that when the Council wrote to her to desist, she declar'd She would adhere to the Catholick Church and her Father's Religion. She still meeting with Opposition, a strange Project was form'd, which was to have a Ship ready upon the Coast of Essex, to convey her suddenly into Ilanders; and if this had taken Place, she must have been intirely shut out from succeeding to the Crown. The Emperor so warmly espous'd her Cause, that he threaten'd to make War, if she met with any hard Usage; and the English Merchants having then great Effects at Antwerp, it was not thought Policy to give him a Pretence to seize them; so the Council was willing to let the Matter fall of it self, and only advis'd her to have her Mass said privately: Yet the conscientious King could not easily be induc'd to yield to that, for he said He ought not to connive at Idolatry. By Order of Council, Cranmer, Ridley and Poinet went to satiate him in the Point; and they convinc'd him, That tho' he ought not to consent to any Sin, yet he was not at all Times oblig'd to punish it: Upon which he burst out into Tears, lamenting his Sister's Obstinacy, and his own hard Circumstances, that oblig'd him to comply with such an impious Way of Worship. After new Messages to the Emperor to no great Effect, the Council seiz'd two of her Chaplains; and after much struggling, gain'd this Point, that for the future she had her Mass said so secretly, that she gave no Occasion of publick Offence. As to the King's Sister Elizabeth, she in all Things conform'd to the Laws; for her Mother at her Death had earnestly recommended her to the Care of Doctor Parker, a great Reformer, who well instructed her in the Principles of the Christian Religion.

Pont

While the Affairs of Religion were thus in Debate, the aspiring Earl of Warwick began to form vast Designs of bringing the Crown into his Family: The Earl of Warwick's vast Ambition. He found the King was now alienated from his Sister Mary, and the Privy-Council had so nearly concern'd themselves with her, that they would be easily engag'd against her. The Pretence against both the Sisters was the same, that they stood Illegitimated by two Sentences in the Spiritual Courts, confirm'd by Acts of Parliament; so that it would be a Dishonour to the English Nation to suffer the Crown to devolve upon spurious Issues. And since the Apprehensions of the Revenge of the Princess Mary, made the Council willing to exclude her; he found that the only Reason on which they could ground that, must likewise take Place against the Princess Elizabeth. And therefore tho' the Crown was appointed to them, both by Act of Parliament, and the late King's Will; yet these being founded on an Error that was insuperable, which was the Illegitimacy of their Descent, they ought not to take place. They being thus laid aside, the Daughters of the French Queen by Charles Brandon Duke of Suffolk, stood next in the Act; tho' there was a strong Suspicion that they were also Illegitimate, by reason of a prior and secret Marriage, he was suppos'd to have made with one Mortimer. The Duke's two Sons dy'd both in one Day of the sweating Sickness, which rag'd in England this Year: His eldest Daughter was marry'd to Gray Marquess of Dorset, a weak and good Man, who was made Duke of Suffolk, and had three Daughters; of which the Eldest the Lady Jane had all the charming Qualities of her own Sex, and was judg'd to be the Wonder of both. So the Earl of Warwick projected a Match between her and his fourth Son Guilford, his three eldest being already marry'd; but because the Princess Elizabeth was like to be the most effectual Obstacle, a Design was laid to send her out of England, and a Match was treated for her with the King of Denmark. To amuse the King himself, a most splendid Embassie was sent into France with the noble Order of the Garter. The Marquess of Northampton carry'd it, accompany'd with three Earls, the Bishop of Ely, five Barons, and above two hundred Gentlemen. They were to make a Proposition of a Marriage for the King with the French King's Daughter Elizabeth. The Bishop of Ely made the first Speech, which was answer'd by the Cardinal of Lorrain, and it was soon concluded; yet neither Party was to stand oblig'd, either in Honour or Conscience, till the Lady should be of Years to give Consent. In return a magnificent Embassie was sent from France to England, with the Order of St. Michael. The French Ambassadors desir'd in their Master's Name the Continuance of the King's Friendship, and that he would not be mov'd by vain Rumours and malicious Reports, to break the Alliance. Upon this the wondrous young King immediately returned this Answer with his own Mouth, That Rumours were not always to be credited, nor always to be rejected; for it was no less vain to fear all things, than to doubt of nothing: If any Differences should arise, he should be always more ready to determine them by Reason than Force, so far as was consistent with his Honour.

But

But while all this was in Agitation, there was a Design laid to destroy the Duke of Somerset; who had now such Access to the King, and such Freedom with him, that the Earl of Warwick expected no less than the Ruin of his Projects. Therefore to prevent that, and to raise himself and his Friends higher, he procured a great Creation of new Honours: He himself was made Duke of Northumberland, the Blood of the Percies being then under an Attainder; Pawlet was made Marquess of Winchester, Herbert was made Earl of Pembroke, and a little before this, Russel had been made Earl of Bedford, and Darcy was made a Lord. There was none so likely to take the King out of the new Duke of Northumberland's Hands, as the Duke of Somerset, who was beginning to form a new Party about the King; therefore upon some Informations, both the Duke of Somerset and his haughty Dutchess, Sir Ralph Vane, Sir Thomas Palmer, Sir Thomas Arundel, and several others, of whom some were Gentlemen of Quality, and others Servants to the Duke, were all committed to the Tower. The Commitment of Palmer was to delude the World, for he had really betray'd the Duke, and was secur'd as an Accomplice, and then pretended to discover a Conspiracy: He declar'd, that the Duke design'd to have rais'd the People, and that when Northumberland, Northampton and Pembroke, had been invited to dine at the Lord Paget's, he determin'd to have set upon them by the Way, or to have kill'd them at Dinner; that Vane was to have two thousand Men in Readiness; Arundel was to have seiz'd on the Tower, and all the Gens d'Arms were to have been cut in Pieces. All these Particulars were related to the young King with such aggravating Circumstances, that he too easily believ'd them; and upon that was much alienated from his Uncle, as one really guilty of so shameful a Conspiracy. It was added by others, that the Duke design'd to have rais'd the City of London, and one Crane confirm'd Palmer's Testimony; so that both the Earl of Arundel, and the Lord Paget were also committed as Accomplices.

His Defence.

On the first of December, the unfortunate Duke was brought to his Trial: The Marquess of Winchester was Lord High-Steward, and twenty seven Peers sat to judge him, among whom were the Dukes of Suffolk and Northumberland, and the Earl of Pembroke. The Particulars charg'd upon him were, a Design to seize on the King's Person, to imprison the Duke of Northumberland, and to raise the City of London: But it seem'd prodigious to see Northumberland sit a Judge, when the Crime objected, was a Design against his Life; for tho' by the Law of England no Peer can be challeng'd in a Trial, yet by the Law of Nature no Man ought to judge where he is a Party: And what still made the Design appear worse, was that the Lord Chancellor, tho' a Peer, was left out, upon Suspicion of a Reconciliation, which he was making with the Duke. In this Trial, the Duke not being well skill'd in Law, neither objected to the Indictment, nor desir'd Council to plead for him, but only answer'd to Matters of Fact: 'He deny'd all Designs to raise the People, or to 'assassinate Northumberland; and if he had mention'd it, it was in Passion without any Intention: And it was ridiculous to believe, that he with a small 'Troop should design to destroy the Gens d'Arms, who were nine hundred in 'Number. The armed Men he had about him, were only for his own Defence; 'he had done no hurt to his Enemies, tho' it was once very much in his Power; 'and he had surrender'd himself without making Resistance: He also desir'd the 'Witnesses might be brought Face to Face, and objected many Things against 'them, especially Palmer. But this last was not allow'd; and their Depositions were read. The King's Council pleaded upon the Statute against unlawful Assemblies; that to contrive the Death of Privy-Counsellors was Felony, and to have armed Men about him for his Defence was also Felony. The material Defence was unhappily omitted; for by that Statute those Assemblies were not Felonious, except the Parties refus'd to disperse themselves, after they were legally requir'd; and it did not appear that any such Proclamation had been been made in this Case. The Proofs of his raising Rebellion were altogether insufficient, so he was acquitted of Treason, which immediately rais'd a mighty Shout of Joy, that was heard as far as Charing-Cross; but this was soon allay'd when they heard he was found guilty of Felony, in intending to imprison the Duke of Northumberland. During the Trial he carry'd himself with great Temper; and the Sharpness which the King's Council express'd in pleading against him, did not provoke him to any indecent Passion. But when Sentence was given he sunk a little under the Weight, and ask'd Pardon of the three Lords that were his Enemies, for his ill Designs against them, and made Sute for his Life, and for his Wife and Children. It was generally concluded, That nothing being found against him, but an Intention to imprison a Privy-Counsellor which never took Effect, one so nearly related the King would not have suffer'd Death upon such an Account. It was therefore necessary to raise in the King a strong Aversion to him; accordingly a Story was brought to the King, as if in the Tower he had confess'd a Design of employing some to assassinate those Lords; and the Persons nam'd for that impious Purpose, were also perswaded to undertake it. This being unfortunately believ'd by the King, he took no further Care to preserve him; and Assassination being a Crime of that barbarous Nature, it possess'd him with the utmost Horror, even against his Uncle; and therefore he was deliver'd up to the Rage of his Enemies.

He is found guilty of Felony.

Sir Michael Stanhop, Sir Miles Partridge, Sir Thomas Arundel and Sir Ralph Vane, were next brought to their Trials; the two first were not much pity'd, for they had made a very ill Use of their Interests in the Duke, during his Greatness; but the other two were much lamented. Arundel's Jury was shut up a whole Day and a Night; and those who were for acquitting him, were compell'd by the Fury of the rest; only that they might save their own Lives, and not be starv'd. Vane had done noble Services in the Wars, but carry'd himself with a Magnanimity that was too extravagant: They were all four condemn'd, and Partridge and he were hang'd, and the other two were beheaded. As to the Duke himself, the Lord Chancellor Rich was now become a secret Friend to him; which was thus unhappily discover'd: He once went aside at Council and wrote a Note, giving the Duke Notice of what was then in Agitation against him, and indors'd it only For the Duke, and sent it to the Tower; but his Servant not having particular Directions, imagin'd it was for the old Duke of Norfolk, and not Somerset, and carry'd it to him. This Duke, to make Northumberland his Friend, sent it to him; upon which the Chancellor, understanding the Mistake into which his Servant had fallen, prevented the Discovery, and went immediately to the King, and pretending some indispositions desir'd to be discharg'd; and upon that he took his Bed, so that it seem'd too barbarous to proceed any further against him; only the Great Seal was taken from him, and was given to the Bishop of Ely.

Two Months had almost pass'd between the Duke's Sentence of Condemnation and his Execution, in all which Time no one either did or could plead sufficiently in his Favour; so that on the twenty second Day of January, he was brought to his Scaffold on Tower-Hill. His whole Deportment was very compos'd, and agreeable to the melancholy Occasion: He first kneel'd down and pray'd, and then rising up he made a Speech to the People, 'Vindicating himself from all ill Designs against the King or Government: He confess'd his private Sins, and acknowledg'd the Mercies of God in granting him such Time for Repentance: He declar'd he had acted sincerely in all he did, in Matters of Religion, while he was in Power; and heartily rejoic'd for his being Instrumental in so good a Work: He exhorted the People to live suitably to the Doctrine receiv'd amongst them; otherwise they were to expect signal Judgments from Heaven. As he was proceeding, there was a prodigious Noise heard in the blowing up of some mighty Fabrick; which so extremely terrify'd the People, that many ran away without knowing the Reason. At the same Time Sir Anthony Brown came riding hastily towards the Scaffold, which caus'd the People with the greatest Acclamations to cry out, A Pardon, a Pardon, God save the King! by which it was perceiv'd how dear he was to the People. But this proving a Mistake, the Duke in a compos'd Manner proceeded in his Speech. 'He declar'd his chearful Submission to the Will of God, 'and desir'd them likewise to acquiesce in it: He earnestly pray'd for the King 'and the Council, and exhorted the People to continue obedient to them: And 'lastly he sincerely ask'd Forgiveness of all, whom at any Time he had offended. Then taking leave of all about him, he undress'd himself for the Block, without any Change of Countenance: He continu'd calling Lord Jesus save me! 'till the Executioner sever'd his Head from his Body.

his Execution.

His Character.

Thus fell the Duke of Somerſet from the highest Places, Station and Titles in the Kingdom; a Person of extraordinary Virtues, of great Candor, and eminent Piety; who was always a Promoter of Justice, and a Patron of the Oppressed. He was really a better Captain than a Counsellor; and was too easie and open-hearted, to be so cautious, as such Times, and such Employments requir'd. It was generally believ'd, that all this Conspiracy, for which he and the other four suffer'd, was only a Forgery; all the other Accomplices were soon discharg'd, and Palmer, the chief Witness, became Northumberland's particular Confident; and the indiscreet Words spoken by the Duke, and his gathering armed Men about him, was imputed to Palmer's Artifices, who had put him in Fear of his Life, and made him act and speak those Things, for which he lost it. His four Friends did all end their Lives with the most solemn Protestations of their Innocence; and Vane added, That his Blood would make Northumberland's Pillow uneasy to him. The People, tho' formerly disgusted, were infinitely affected with this Execution, and many threw their Hankerchiefs into the Duke's Blood, to preserve the Remembrance of him; and one Lady that met Northumberland, when he was led through the City in the next Reign, shook her bloody Hankerchief at him, crying, Behold the Blood of that worthy Man, that good Uncle of that excellent King, which shed by thy malicious Practice, does now apparently revenge it self on thee. His Innocence as to this Crime, made others to believe this Punishment to be more the Hand of Heaven; particularly for the Attainder of the Duke of Norfolk, and the Death of the Earl of Surry, occasion'd likewise by a Conspiracy of their own Servants, in which he was thought to have been too active. It is hard to vindicate his sacrilegious Attempts upon Churches and Bishops Lands, which lay heavy upon him and his Family; but the frequent Remark made by modern Writers, that for that Reason he wanted a Heart to beg the Benefit of his Clergy, is founded upon an palpable Error. For in the Act by which he was condemn'd, it was particularly provided that no Clergy should be allow'd.

A. D. V. The pious King Edward, tho' very young, had liv'd to see the violent Deaths of his two Uncles, and was now in a great Measure thrown into the Hands of the aspiring Duke of Northumberland, who was daily grasping at Power, Wealth and Grandeur. And now a new Session of Parliament being met, and finding that Tonstall Bishop of Durham was imprison'd upon some treasonable Suspicions, he cast his ambitious Eye upon his Honours and Revenues: He design'd to erect a great Principality for his Family in the North; and the Accession of the Jurisdiction of the County Palatine, lodg'd in that See, seem'd so considerable, that to make way to it he resolv'd to ruin the Bishop; who being a Man of Candor and Temper, tho' an Opposer of the Reformation, Cranmer stood up for him, and protested against a Bill of Attainder that was brought against him, by which he absolutely lost the Duke of Northumberland. Yet all the Popish Lords and Bishops went along with it, and some Depositions being read amongst them to justify the Bill, it pass'd in that House; but when the Bill was sent to the House of Commons, they resolv'd to put a Stop to it.

that Way of condemning Men unheard. Therefore they sent a Message to the Lords, that he and his Accusers might be heard Face to Face; which not being done, they let the Bill fall. By these Indications, it appear'd that the House of Commons had no great Affection for this powerful Duke; and many of them had been oblig'd to the Duke of Somerset: For which Reason it was resolv'd to have a new Parliament; and this which had sat almost five Years was dissolv'd on the fifteenth Day of April.

But before this happen'd, several considerable Acts were pass'd: The first was to establish the Common-Prayer Book as it was last amended; to which only one Earl, two Bishops, and two Barons dissented. ' By this the Book was appointed to be receiv'd in all Places of publick Worship from All-hallows next; and ' the Bishops were requir'd to proceed by the Censures of the Church, against such as ' did not come thither: They also authoriz'd the Book of Ordinations, and enacted ' the same Penalties against Offenders, that were in the Act for the former Book ' three Years before. Another Act pass'd for the Marriage of the Clergy, with the Dissent of four Earls and six Barons, ' Declaring that whereas the former ' Act concerning it was only thought a Permission of it, as some other unlawful Things were conniv'd at; upon which the Wives and Children of the ' Clergy were reproachfully treated, and the Word of God was not heard with ' due Reverence, therefore their Marriages were declar'd valid and good. An Act also pass'd, empowering Church-Wardens to gather Collections for the Poor, and the Bishops to proceed against such as refus'd to contribute; which tho' it was a Bill that tax'd the People, yet had its first Rise in the House of Lords. The Bishoprick of Westminster was by an Act reunited to London, only the Collegiate-Church was still continu'd. As to Temporal Matters, a Bill concerning Treasons pass'd with little or no Opposition in the House of Lords, but it was much oppos'd by the Commons; for the multiplying of Treasons was always esteem'd a Severity in the Government. One Bill was rejected, but another was pass'd, ' If any call'd the King, or his Successors, nam'd in the Statute of the thirty ' fifth of Henry VIII. Heretick, Tyrant, or other approbrious Name, the first ' Offence was Forfeiture of Goods, the second a Premunire, and the third ' Treason; but if done in Printing or Writing, the first Offence was Treason. ' None were to be prosecuted for Words, but within three Months; and two ' Witnesses were made necessary, who should aver their Depositions to the Party's Face. This last seems to relate to the Proceedings against the Duke of Somerset, in which the Witnesses did not appear; when many Times Innocence and Guilt discover themselves, by the Party's being confronted. As to this Duke, a Bill was sent to the House of Commons, sign'd by the King, repealing the Settlement of his Estate, formerly made in Favour of his Children by his second Wife, to exclude the Children by his first, from whom are descended the Seymours of Devonshire; which some imputed to a Jealousie he had of his first Wife, and others ascrib'd it to the Ascendant the second Wife had over him. But the Commons were very unwilling to vacate a Settlement confirm'd in Parliament, and so for fifteen Days it was debated: A new Bill was drawn up, which was much alter'd, but was not quite finish'd 'till the Day before the Dissolution of the Parliament.

The Common-Prayer Book establish'd.

Other Acts.

In the mean Time the Convocation sat and confirm'd the Articles of Religion that had been prepar'd the former Year; and thus was the Reformation of Worship and Doctrine now brought to such Perfection, that since that Time there have been very little Alterations made in either. But another Branch of it was yet unfinish'd, and was now under Consultation, touching the Government of the Church, and the Rules of the Ecclesiastical Courts. Great Pains and Industry was shewn by the most eminent Men of the Nation, to bring these Matters to Perfection; and at length they reduc'd all to a Method, and cast the Work into fifty one Titles; which if put in Force and Practice, might have been of admirable Use to the Church: But the King's Death, and other Accidents,

*The Poverty of

dents, put an End to that noble Design, which was never after reassum'd. There were also at this Time Remedies under Consideration, to correct those Disorders, of the Clergy, arising from their extream Poverty; but the Laity was so nearly concern'd in this, that there was no great Hopes of a Redress, till the King should come of Age, and by his Authority recover a competent Maintenance for the Clergy, out of the Hands of those who had devour'd their Revenues. Both Heath and Day, the Bishops of Worcester and Chichester, were this Year depriv'd of their Bishopricks, by a Court of Delegates that were all Lay-Men; but it does not appear, for what Offences they were so censur'd. In every See, as it fell vacant, the best Manors were seiz'd by such voracious Courtiers, as had the Interest to procure the Grant of them. It was thought by many, that the Bishops Sees were so unmeasurably enrich'd, that they could never be made poor enough; but such Haste and Heat was shown in pillaging them, that they were reduc'd to so low a Condition, that it was scarcely possible for a Bishop to subsist in them. If what was thus taken had been converted to pious Uses, and to the supplying the inferior Clergy, it had been some Mitigation of so heinous a Robbery: But their Lands were frequently snatch'd up by Lay-Men, who thought of making no Compensation to the Church, for the Revenues thus swallow'd by them.

Many Agents call'd to an Account.

There was also at this Time a very strict Enquiry made into the Accounts of all Ministers and Agents, who had been employ'd in the former Part of the Reign; for it was believ'd that the Visitors had embezell'd much of the Plate of the Churches; and these being the Creatures of the Duke of Somerset, it caus'd Northumberland to examine and prosecute them with the utmost Strictness and Hatred. But on none did the Storm break more severely than the Lord Paget; who was not only fin'd six thousand Pounds, but was degraded from the Order of the Garter, with a particular Mark of Infamy on his Extraction; yet he was afterwards restor'd to it with as great a Degree of Honour and Applause. He had been a constant Friend to the Duke of Somerset, and that caus'd his Enemies to execute so severe a Revenge upon him. Northumberland was industriously preparing for a new Parliament, and being a Man of an insolent Temper, as abject in Adversity, as swell'd in Prosperity, he thought the highest Severity the only Way to oblige the Nation to comply with his Administration; but this Method, tho' for some Time successful, when he most needed its Support, turn'd violently upon his own Head: For nothing can so effectually prevail with a free People as Justice and Clemency in the Government.

The Increase of Trade.

In this Year the good King proceeded in paying his Debts, reforming the Coin, and other Ways that might make the Nation great and wealthy; and a great Design was now settled, that prov'd to be the Foundation of all that Riches and Trade, that has since that Time so much flourish'd in the Nation. Henry III. had been much supported in his Wars by the Assistance he got from the free Towns of Germany, in Recompence of which hein gave them great Privileges in England; where they were form'd into a Corporation, and liv'd in the Still-yard near London Bridge. They had sometimes exceeded the Limits of their Charters, which were thereupon judg'd to be forfeited, but by great Presents they purchas'd new ones: They traded in a Body, and ruin'd others by underselling them; and by making Presents at Court, or lending great Sums, they had the Government on their Side. Trade was now much increasing, and Courts began to be more magnificent in Habits; so that there was a greater Consumption of Cloath in particular, than formerly. Antwerp and Ham-burgh, lying one near the Mouth of the Rhine, and the other at the Mouth of the Elbe, had then the chief Trade in these Parts of the World; and their Factors in the Still-yard had all the Markets in England in their Hands, and set such Prizes as they pleas'd both on what they imported or exported, and broke all other Merchants to such a Degree, that in the last Year they shipp'd forty thousand Cloths, when all the other Traders had not shipp'd above

eleven hundred. Upon this the Merchant-Adventurers complain'd of the Still-yard Men; and after several Hearings, it was judg'd that they had forfeited their Charter, and that their Company was dissolv'd: Nor could all the earnest Application of the Hanse Towns, seconded by the Emperor's own Intercession, ever procure them a new Charter.

About this Time, Cardan, the great Philosopher of that Age, pass'd through England, as he return'd from Scotland; where the Arch-Bishop of St. Andrews Cardan in England. had sent for him out of Italy, to cure him of a Dropsie: In this he had great Success; but being much conversant in Astrology and Magick, he told him, That tho' he had sav'd his Life, he could not change his Fate, which was to die upon a Gallows. He waited on King Edward as he return'd, who receiv'd him with great Honour and Civility; and Cardan was so charm'd with his mighty Knowledge and rare Qualities, that he always spoke of him as the most extraordinary Person he had ever seen: And after his Death, when Flattery could be no Advantage to him, he wrote a Character of him, in which for Learning, Parts and all Abilities, he represented him as a Miracle of Mankind.

To conclude this Year, there was a great and unexpected Turn of Affairs in Germany. The Council was open'd at Trent, where the Emperor by means of The Affairs of Germany. the Spanish Bishops, began so much to bear down the Power of the Court of Rome, that the Pope united himself to France, and resolv'd to break the Council on the first Occasion, and in order to that the Legates suspended it for two Years. At the same Time Maurice of Saxony, who was set up by the Emperor, form'd great Designs, set up for the Liberty of Germany and the Protestant Religion, and took Ausburgh and several other Towns. The King of France also fell in upon the Empire with a great Power, and made himself Master of Metz, Toul and Verdun, and was near gaining of Strasburgh; while the Emperor was so surpriz'd and press'd by Maurice, that he fled into Italy. Thus that very Army and Prince, that had been chiefly instrumental in the Ruin of the Empire, did now assert its Freedom; and the Emperor's great Design on Germany was now so blasted, that he could never after this put any Life into it: He was forc'd to discharge his Prisoners, call in his Proscriptions, and by the Edict of Passaw allow the free Exercise of the Protestant Religion: And thus ended the Storm that had almost overwhelm'd the Princes of that Persuasion. The Emperor's Misfortunes increas'd upon him; for against all Reason he besieg'd Metz in December, but after he had wasted his Army before it, he was compell'd to raise the Siege. Upon that he retir'd into Flanders, in such Discontent, that for some Time he would admit none to come near him. Here it was believ'd that he first form'd that Design, which some Years after he effected, of forsaking the World, and exchanging the Magnificence of a Court for the Retirement of a Monastery. As to the Council of Trent, we may dismiss the Subject with observing, That this Council had been An Account of the Council of Trent. much desir'd both by Princes and Bishops, in hopes of composing the Differences of Religion, and reforming the Corruptions of Rome, which caus'd the Popes to be very apprehensive of it: But such was the Subtility of the Legates, the Voices of the Italian Bishops, and the Dissensions of the European Princes, that it had Effects directly contrary to what all Sides expected. The Breaches in Religion were now put past Reconciliation, by the positive Decisions they made; the Abuses of the Court of Rome were confirm'd by the Proviso's for the Privileges of the Apostolick See; and the World was so cured of the Longings for a General Council, that none has been desir'd since that Time.

We are now arriv'd at the last and fatal Year of this young King's Life and A. D. Reign; and the first thing done was a Regulation of the Privy-Council, where 1553. several Committees had proper Work assign'd them, and Directions given them Reg. 7. for their Conduct; of which there remains an exact Account corrected with A new Parliament meets. King Edward's own Hand. A new Parliament was also call'd, the second in this this Reign, which fate the first of March; where a Motion was made for a Subsidy of two Tenths, and two Fifteenths to be paid in two Years, which was granted. At the passing of the Bill, a great Debate arose in the House of Commons, which seems to have been concerning the Preamble; for it contain'd a high Accusation of the Duke of Somerset's Administration, which was promoted by the Duke of Northumberland's Party, to make the King sensible how well pleas'd the Representatives of the Nation were with his Fall. At this Time the Sons of the Nobility and Gentry had frequently Prebends given them, under a Pretext of following their Studies, and fitting themselves for Holy Orders; which was like to be very prejudicial to the Clergy, when so many Church Dignities were in Lay-Hands. Therefore the Bishops procur'd a Bill to be pass'd in the House of Lords, that no one might hold such, who was not either Priest or Deacon; but at the third Reading, it was thrown out by the Commons. Another Bill pass'd for suppressing the Bishoprick of Durham, and erecting two new Sees, the one at Durham, and the other at Newcastle; but tho' the Secular Jurisdiction of that See was given to the Duke of Northumberland, yet the King's Death stopt the further Progress of this Affair. Bishop Tonstall was depriv'd, as Heath and Day were, by a Court of Lay-Delegates, upon the Informations that had been brought against him of Misprision of Treason, and was kept in the Tower 'till Queen Mary set him at Liberty. At the End of the Parliament the King granted a general Pardon, and so dissolv'd that Body on the last Day of March, after but one Month's Session. For it seems either the Duke of Northumberland was not pleas'd with the Proceedings of the House of Commons, or that he was resolv'd to call frequent Parliaments, and wholly to vary from the Measures of the Duke of Somerset.

Another Visitation of Churches. Shortly after Visitors were sent out to examine what Plate was in every Church, and to leave them one or two Chalice of Silver, with Linnen, for the Communion-Table and for Surplices, and to bring in all other Things of Value to the Treasurer of the King's Household, and to sell the rest, and give it to the Poor. This was still a new Rifling of Churches, by which it appear'd some were resolv'd not to desist, 'till they had reduc'd them to a Primitive Poverty, as well as the Reformers design'd to have rais'd them to a Primitive Purity. The King himself set his Hand to these Instructions; from which some have severely inferr'd, That he was ill principled in himself, when at such an Age he join'd his Authority to such Proceedings. But he was now in his last Sickness, and so weak, that it is probable he set his Hand to every Thing sent him by the Council, without anxiously examining the Contents of it. He had now contracted great Colds by violent Exercises, which in January settled into a deep Cough; and all Medicines proving ineffectual, there was a strong Suspicion blown and spread over all Europe, that he was poison'd: But of that we find no certain and convincing Proofs.

His Care for publick Charities. During his Sickness, Bishop Ridley preach'd before him, and took an Occasion to launch out in the Subject of Charity, and the Obligations that lay on Men of high Condition to be eminent in Works of that Nature. This so sensibly touch'd the pious King, that immediately after Sermon he sent for the good Bishop; and commanding him to sit down and be cover'd, he resum'd most of the Heads of the Sermon, and declar'd, That he look'd upon himself, in his Station, to be principally concern'd in it; desiring, as he had already given him the Exhortation in general, to direct him how to perform his Duty in that Particular. The Bishop, astonish'd and overjoy'd at the generous Tenderness of so young a Prince, broke out into Tears and Transports to find such noble Inclinations; and told him he must take time to consult with the Lord Mayor and Court of Aldermen about a Matter of that Importance; upon which the King wrote by him to them to consult speedily how the Poor should be reliev'd. After some Consideration, the Bishop brought the King a Scheme of several Foun-

Foundations, one for the Sick and Wounded, another for such as were wilfully Idle or Mad, and a third for Orphans. Upon which he made several munificent Endowments, St. Bartholomew's Hospital for the First, his Palace at Bridewell for the Second, and Christ-Church near Newgate for the Third; and also he enlarg'd the Grant he made the former Year, for St. Thomas's Hospital in Southwark. And when he set his Hand to these Foundations, which was done upon the twenty sixth Day of June, he heartily thank'd God for prolonging his Life, till he had finish'd that good Design. These Houses, by good Government, and the Charities of others, continu'd to be so useful, and became so well endow'd, that now they may be reckon'd among the noblest Foundations in Europe.

His noble Foundations.

Before these were compleated, several Marriages were at once solemniz'd by means of the Duke of Northumberland: The Duke of Suffolk had only three Daughters, the eldest of whom was marry'd to the Lord Guilford Dudley, younger Son to Northumberland, the second to the Earl of Pembroke's Son, and the third, who was crooked, to one Keys the King's Groom-Porter; and Northumberland to strengthen his Family also marry'd his own two Daughters, the one to Sir Henry Sidney, and the other to the Earl of Huntington's eldest Son. These Marriages at this Time were much observ'd; and the People were highly inflam'd against the insolent Duke, for it was generally reported, that he was Sacrificing the King to his own extravagant Ambition. He seem'd little to regard their Censures, but constantly attending the languishing King, he resolv'd to improve all the Apprehensions he had concerning Religion, to the Advantage of his Son's Wife the Lady Jane Gray. The King was easily perswaded to order the Judges and his learned Council to put some Articles, which he had sign'd for the Succession of the Crown, into the common Form of Law. They answer'd, That the Succession being already settled by Act of Parliament, it could not be alter'd by any other Power; yet still the King requir'd them to perform what he had commanded. The next Time they came to the Council, they further declar'd, That it was made Treason to change the Succession by any Act pass'd in this Reign, so they could not concern themselves in it. Montague was Chief Justice, and spoke in the Name of the rest; upon which Northumberland flew into a violent Passion against him, and call'd him Traitor, for not obeying the King's Commands; the common Language of an Arbitrary Minister who acts against Law. But the Judges were not shaken by his Threatnings; and when they were again brought before the King, who sharply rebuk'd them for their Delays, they said, That all they could do would be of no Force without a Parliament. Upon which the King said, He would call a Parliament shortly, and have it ratify'd there; and requir'd them to do it in the best Manner they could. At last Montague desir'd that they might have a Pardon, for what they were to do; and that being granted, all the Judges, except Gosnald and Hales, agreed to sign the Patent, and deliver'd their Opinions, That the Lord Chancellor might put the Seal, and then it would be good in Law: Yet Gosnald was at last prevail'd upon to sign it, so Hales was the only Man who intirely stood out; who tho' he was a zealous Protestant, yet would not give his Opinion against his Conscience, upon any Considerations whatsoever. The Privy-Counsellors were next requir'd to set their Hands to it: Cecil, in a Relation he wrote of this Transaction, says, That hearing some of the Judges declare so positively, that it was against Law, he refus'd to set his Hand to it as a Privy-Counsellor, but sign'd it only as a Witness to the King's Subscription. Cranmer long stood out, he came not to the Council when it was pass'd there, and refus'd to consent when he was urg'd to it; for he said, He would never be concern'd in the dismembering his late Master's Daughters. But the dying young King was at last set upon him, and being assur'd by the best Lawyers That he might legally

In the whole Course of the King's Sickneſs, he expreſs'd a great Submiſſion to the Will of God, and ſeem'd pleas'd at the gradual Approaches of Death; only the Conſideration of Religion and the Church ſenſibly touch'd him, and upon that account he ſaid, He was deſirous of Life. When the Phyſicians began to deſpair of his Recovery, a confident Woman undertook his Cure, and he was put into her Hands; but ſhe left him in a worſe Condition than ſhe found him; all which increas'd the Jealouſie of the Duke of Northumberland, who had introduc'd her, and remov'd his Phyſicians. At laſt to crown all his Deſigns, he procur'd the King to write to his Siſters to deſire them to come and divert him in his Sickneſs; and the Buſineſs of the Excluſion had been carry'd ſo ſecretly, that they apprehending no Danger, had already begun their Journey. Shortly after he felt Death nearly approaching, and prepar'd himſelf for it after the moſt ſolemn and devout Manner. His whole Exerciſe was in ſhort Prayers and Ejaculations; and a few Moments before his Death he was heard, with the utmoſt Reſignation to pray earneſtly, That God would deliver him out of this miſerable and wretched Life: He committed his Spirit to him, and interceded very fervently for his Subjects, that God would preſerve England from Popery, and maintain his true Religion amongſt them. Seeing ſome about him, he ſeem'd concern'd that they were ſo near, and had heard him; but then with a ſmiling Countenance he ſaid, He had been praying to God. Soon after, the Pangs of Death coming upon him, he ſaid to Sir Henry Sidney, who tenderly embrac'd him in his Arms, I am faint, Lord have Mercy on me, and receive my Spirit! And thus calmly breath'd out his pious Soul, upon the ſixth Day of July, in the ſixteenth Year of his Age, after a moſt Religious Reign of ſix Years, five Months, and nine Days.

Concerning the Perſonage of this admirable young Prince, he was of a ſtrait and well-proportion'd Body, of a ſweet and beautiful Aſpect, eſpecially in his Eyes, which ſeem'd to have a ſtarry Livelineſs and Luſtre in them. As there was a great Vivacity in his Looks, ſo the Beauties and Perfections of his Mind were incomparable for his Age. He was not only learned in the Tongues, and the Liberal Sciences, but was well ſkill'd in the State of his Kingdom: He kept a Table-Book, in which he had writ the Characters of all the eminent Men in the Nation; he ſtudy'd Fortification, underſtood the Mint, and knew all the Ports, Havens and Harbours in his Dominions, with the Depth of the Water and Way of Acceſs to them. He was ſo well verſ'd in Foreign Affairs, that the Ambaſſadors that were ſent into England, publiſh'd extraordinary Things of him in all the Courts of Europe. He had great Quickneſs of Apprehenſion, but being diſſident of his Memory, he took Notes of every material Thing he heard, in Greek Characters, which he afterwards copy'd out fair in the Journal he kept. His Virtues were admirable, being truly juſt and merciful in his Diſpoſition; and taking ſpecial Care of the Petitions that were given him by the poor and oppreſs'd. But his pious Zeal for Religion crown'd all the reſt; which did not proceed from an angry Fieat, but from a true Tenderneſs of Conſcience, founded on the Love of God, and his Fellow-Creatures. Theſe extraordinary Qualities, adorn'd with a charming Sweetneſs and Affability, made him univerſally belov'd by all his People. Some call'd him their Joſias, others Edward the Saint, and others the Phoenix that roſe out of his Mother's Aſhes; and all concluded that the Sins of England muſt have been very great, ſince they provok'd God to ſnatch away ſo ſignal a Bleſſing from the Nation. As to the Reign it ſelf it was generally weak and tumultuous, defam'd by Sacrilege, and diſtracted by Parties and Factions. Great Complaints were made by good Men of the Vices of this Time, which were grown ſo common, that many Men became Strangers to all Shame. Luxury, Oppreſſion, sion, and a Hatred to Religion had over-run the higher Rank of the People, who countenanc'd the Reformation meerly to rob the Church; by which and their other Practices, they became a Scandal to so noble a Work. Such open Offence was given by the Spoil made of so many rich Endowments, that they who understood little of Religion, labour'd under great Prejudices against any Thing that was advanc'd by such mercenary Instruments. And these Things, as they rous'd up the Vengeance of Heaven, so they dispos'd the People much to that dismal Catastrophe in the following Reign.

was an insuperable Disadvantage, the Members of that Government became still more relax'd and disjointed; all which were Divine Judgments due to the Sins and Corruptions of the People. But before the Time came, that God was pleas'd to restore the Glory of a degenerate Nation, he thought fit to punish it with a Reign more calamitous and dishonourable than the worst Years of the two last; which was unfortunately introduc'd by an Interregnum, and the setting up a popular, but unexpected Title. For by King Edward's Death, according to King Henry's Will and an Act of Parliament, the Crown devolv'd upon his eldest Sister Mary; who was now in her Way to London, in Obedience to the Letter written to her to come and visit her Brother in his Sickness. She was come within half a Day's Journey of the Court, when she receiv'd private Advice from the Earl of Arundel that her Brother was dead, and what was done concerning the Lady Jane's Succession; and likewise that the King's Death was conceal'd, with a Design to ensnare her before she knew of it; and therefore he advis'd her to retire. At first she was at a great Loss, but recollecting that the Duke of Northumberland was much hated in Norfolk, for the great Slaughter he had made of Ket's People in the last Reign, she therefore chose to go that way to the Castle of Brimingham in Suffolk: Which Place being of Strength,

Strength, and not far from the Sea, if her Designs should miscarry, she might have an Opportunity from thence to fly over to the Emperor, who was then in Flanders.

But before she arriv'd there, she wrote on the ninth of July to the Council, and let them know She understood that her Brother was dead, by which she was to succeed to the Crown, but was surpriz'd she had no Account from them: She was sensible in what Consultations they were engag'd; but she was willing to pardon all that was transacted, to such as would return to their Duty, and proclaim her Title to the Crown. Upon this Letter, they found the King's Death could be no longer conceal'd; therefore the Dukes of Suffolk and Northumberland repair'd to Durham House, where the Lady Jane lodg'd, and acknowledg'd her for their Sovereign Queen. As she had a most tender Affection for the King, so his Death was a great Affliction to her; and the new Prospect of a Crown, rather increas'd than diminish'd her Sorrow. She was a Lady that seem'd born to the highest Fortunes; and being sixteen Years of Age, had all the Excellencies and Perfections both of Body and Mind. Her Tutor was Doctor Elmer, from whom she learn'd the Latin and Greek Tongues to a mighty Perfection: And delighting much in Study, she imbib'd the Precepts of true Morality so early, that as she was not tainted with the Levities, not to say Vices of those of her Age and Condition, so she attain'd to the Practice of the highest Notions of Philosophy. Roger Ascham, Tutor to the Princess Elizabeth, coming to wait on her at her Father's House in Leicestershire, found her reading Plato's Works in Greek, while the rest of the Family were hunting in the Park, he ask'd her, How she could be absent from such pleasant Diversions? She answer'd, The Pleasures of the Park were but Shadows to what she had been in reading Plato's Phedon; and added, That she esteem'd it one of the greatest Blessings God had given her, That she had sharp Parents and a gentle Schoolmaster, which made her delight so much in her Studies. She read the Scriptures much, and had attain'd great Knowledge in Divinity; and yet with all these Advantages of Birth and Parts, she was so humble, so gentle, and pious, that she charin'd all Persons that knew her, and none more than the late King, who was about the same Age, and with all his Abilities was judg'd inferior to her in Learning. In those sudden Turns of her Condition, as she was not exalted at the View of a Throne; so she was as little dejected, when her Palace was made her Prison. The only Passion she shew'd was that of the noblest Kind, in the Concern she express'd for her Father and Husband, who fell with her, and seemingly on her Account, tho' really Northumberland's Ambition, and her Father's Weakness ruin'd her. When the Crown was first offer'd by them, she reject'd it, declaring, She knew, that of Right it belong'd to the late King's Sisters, and so she could not with a good Conscience assume it. But it was told her, That both the Judges and Privy-Counsellors had declar'd, that it fell to her according to Law; which being join'd with the Importunities of her Husband, who had more of his Father's Temper, than of her Philosophy, caus'd her at last to submit.

Upon this, Orders were given for proclaiming her Queen the next Day; and the Arch-Bishop of Canterbury, with twenty more of the Nobility and Privy-Council, set their Hands to a Letter written to the Princess Mary, letting her know, That Queen Jane was now their Sovereign, according to the ancient Laws of the Land, and the late King's Letters Patents; and that the Marriage between her Father and Mother was declar'd null by the Laws of God and Man: Therefore they requir'd her to recede from her Pretensions, and submit to the present Establishment; promising, That if she shew'd her self obedient, they would be all ready to do her any Service that was consistent with their Duties. On the following Day they proclaim'd Queen Jane; in which Proclamation they set forth, 'That the late King had by Patent excluded both his Sisters, who had been illegitimated by Sentences pass'd in the Ecclesiastical

Courts,

‘ Courts, and confirm’d in Parliament; and at best they were only his Sisters
 ‘ by the half Blood, and so not inheritable by the Laws of England. There ‘ was also cause to fear, that they might marry Strangers, and change the Laws, ‘ and subject the Nation to the Tyranny of the Sec of Rome. Next to them
 ‘ the Crown fell to the Dutches of Suffolk; and it was provided, that if the ‘ should have no Sons, when the King dy’d, the Crown should devolve on her ‘ Daughter, who was born and marry’d in the Kingdom: Upon which they ‘ asserted her Right, as she promis’d to maintain the true Religion, and the ‘ Laws of the Land. When this was proclaim’d, great Multitudes were ga-ther’d to hear it; but there were very few that shouted with the Acclamations ordinary on this Occasion. And whereas a Vintner’s Boy express’d some Scorn, when he heard the Proclamation, he was the next Day set in a Pillory, and had his Ears nail’d to it; while a Herald in his Coat read the Nature of his Offence to the People, who were call’d together by the Sound of Trumpets.

Various Cen-
 sures upon it.

Upon this Proclamation the People were in great Distractions, and variety of Censures and Opinions pass’d upon it. Those who look’d upon the King of England’s Power to proceed immediately from God, said it must descend only by Inheritance; and since the King’s Sisters were under Sentences of Illegitima-tion, it ought to descend to the young Queen of Scotland, who was the next Heir. Others said, that tho’ a Prince were nam’d immediately by God, yet upon great Reasons he might alter the Succession from its usual Course, as David prefer’d Solomon to Adonijah: But it was said this did not belong to the Kings of England, whose Rights and Prerogatives did not arise from any Divine Designation, but from a long Possession and the Laws of the Land; therefore as the King could by Law limit the Prerogative, so he could likewise limit the Succession of the Crown; which had been the Opinion of Sir Thomas More. Others alledg’d Charles Brandon’s Issue by the French Queen to be illegitimate, upon a Supposition of a prior Marriage with one Mortimer.
 Others demanded, if the Right of Blood could not be cut off, why was the Scotch Queen excluded? Then as to half Blood, it was said to be only a Rule in Law for private Families, which did not extend to the Crown. The Power of limiting the Succession by Patent or Testament was said to be only a Personal Trust in King Henry VIII. and that it did not descend to his Heirs, so that King Edward’s Patents were thought to be of no Force. Then the Severity against the Vintner’s Boy in the beginning of a dubious Title, was thought a great Error in Policy; it being a well grounded Maxim, That all Governments ought to begin with Acts of Clemency, and to affect the Love rather than the Fear of the People. And Northumberland’s Proceeding against the late Protector, by a foul Conspiracy, and the Suspicions he lay under of being the Author of the late King’s untimely Death, begot a violent Aversion in the People to him; which much dispos’d them to set up the Princess Mary.

Many repair’d to the Princess Mary in Suffolk.

Queen Jane was proclaim’d in many Towns near London, yet the People were generally running to the Princess Mary, who now at Framingham Castle declar’d her self Queen of England. Many from Norfolk repair’d to her, and a greater Body of Suffolk Gentlemen and others gather’d about her, who were all for the Reformation. They urg’d her to declare whether she would alter the Religion establish’d by the late King’s Reign; to whom she gave full and solemn Assurances, That she would make no Innovation or Change, but would be satisfy’d with the private Exercise of her own Religion. Upon which they were possess’d with such a firm Belief of her Sincerity, that they resolv’d to hazard their Lives and Estates in the Cause of one, who had given them such faithful Promises. The Earls of Bath and Suffex rais’d Forces, and join’d with her; as likewise did the Sons of the Lord Wharton and Mordant, with many others. When the Council heard of this, they sent the Earl of Huntington’s Brother to raise Men in Buckinghamshire, and then to join the Forces that should be sent from London to New-Market. The Duke of Northumberland

land, as the most valiant and safe Commander, was order'd to be General of the Army; but he was much confounded and distracted in his Thoughts. He found it of equal Importance to preserve London and the Privy-Counsellors in a steady Fidelity, as to conduct the Army with Exactness; and a Miscarriage of either of these was sure to be fatal to him. So that he could scarcely resolve in what Manner to proceed; he wanted a Man of Firmness and Spirit to leave behind him; and yet it was absolutely necessary at once to dissipate the Forces that were daily increasing about Queen Mary. Queen Jane and the Council were by his Means remov'd to the Tower, not only for State, according to the Custom of former Princes, but also for Security; for here the Council were under Command, and in effect Prisoners. He could do no more, but lay a strict Charge on the Council, to adhere firmly to Queen Jane's Interests; and so he march'd out of London on the fourteenth Day of July with six thousand Foot, and two thousand Horse. But as he rod through the Streets, tho there were great Crouds of Spectators, no one cry'd out to wish him Success; which gave a melancholy Indication how ill they were affected to him.

Northumberland march'd against her.

In the mean Time the Council us'd all Methods for their own Security, and gave the Emperor Notice of the Lady Jane's Succession, and complain'd of the Disturbance that was rais'd by the other Competitor, and that his Ambassador had too officiously intermeddled in their Affairs; but the Emperor would not so much as receive their Letters. Bishop Ridley was appointed to preach upon Queen Jane's Title, and to animate the People against Queen Mary; which he too rashly obey'd. At the same Time Northumberland being at Cambridge, where he was both Chancellor and Steward, caus'd the Vice-Chancellor to preach to the same Purpose; but he kept to such general Terms, that no great Offence was given. By this Time Queen Mary had caus'd her self to be proclaim'd at Norwich; and sent Letters all over England, requiring the Peers, and others of Quality, to come to her Assistance. Some Ships had been sent to lye on that Coast for intercepting her, if she should fly away; but those who commanded them were so manag'd, that instead of acting against her, they declar'd for her. Sir Edward Hastings having rais'd four thousand Men in Buckinghamshire, instead of joining the Duke of Northumberland, went over with them into her Service; and her Forces daily increasing, she was proclaim'd Queen in several Counties. All which made the Privy-Council now to see their Danger, and to contrive how to free themselves: The Earl of Arundel hated the Duke of Northumberland; the Marquess of Winchester was desirous in shifting Sides for his Advantage; the Earl of Pembroke's Son had marry'd Queen Jane's Sister, which made him think it necessary to provide for his own Safety by a speedy Turn; and to these many others were join'd. They now pretended that it was necessary to give an Audience to the foreign Ambassadors, who would not receive it in the Tower; and the Earl of Pembroke's House was fix'd upon, he being least suspected. They also reported it was necessary to treat with the Lord Mayor and Aldermen, for sending more Forces to the Duke of Northumberland, concerning which he had very earnestly writ to them. But as soon as they were got out, the Earl of Arundel press'd them to declare for Queen Mary; laying open all the Cruelties of Northumberland, under whose Tyranny they must resolve to be enslav'd, if they did not now shake it off. Upon this they sent for the Lord Mayor and Aldermen, and easily perswaded them to concur with them; and so they went immediately to Cheapside, and proclaim'd Queen Mary on the nineteenth Day of July; and from thence they repair'd to St. Paul's, where Te Deum was sung. They sent next to the Tower, requiring the Duke of Suffolk to quit the Government of that Place, and the Lady Jane to lay down the Title of Queen; to which she submitted with as much Greatness of Mind, as her Father did with Abjection of Spirit. They also sent Orders to Northumberland to dismiss his Forces, and to obey Queen Mary; and the Earl of Arundel and the Lord Pages

Her Party increased.

The End of Queen Jane's Reign. were sent to carry this joyful News to her, who still continu'd at Framingham Castle. And thus ended the Reign of Queen Jane, which continu'd no longer than nine Days. She in no manner consented either to the Receiving, or the Possessing of her imaginary Kingdoms; but having always fear'd there stood a Scaffold secretly behind the Throne, she was as well prepar'd to act her Part upon one, as she did upon the other.

Northumberland and others imprisoned. When the Duke of Northumberland heard of this Turn of Affairs, he resolv'd to swim with the Stream, and without staying for Orders, he discharg'd his Forces, and went to the Market-Place at Cambridge, and proclaim'd the Queen, throwing his own Hat up for Joy, and crying God save Queen Mary! But this would not secure him; for the next Morning the Earl of Arundel came from the Queen to arrest him; and when he was brought to him, he sunk at once, and fell prostrate at his Feet to beg his Favour, as it is usual with a Mind swell'd with Ambition, which out of measure turns insolent or abject, with the various Changes of Fortune. He, and three of his Sons, and Sir Thomas Palmer, who was his wicked Instrument against the Duke of Somerset, were all sent Prisoners to the Tower. And now all the People went to implore the Queen's Favour, and Bishop Ridley among the rest; but he was sent to the Tower; for she was both offended with him for his Sermon, and resolv'd to restore Bonner again to the See of London. Some of the Judges, and several Noblemen were also sent thither, among the rest the Duke of Suffolk. But three Days after the last was set at Liberty; for he being a weak Man, and not very dangerous to the State, was fix'd upon as the first Instance of the Queen's Clemency at her Accession to the Throne. As the Queen came towards London she was met on the Way by her Sister Elizabeth, with a thousand Horse, who came to shew their Zeal to maintain both their Titles, which in the late Contest had been so closely ally'd. She made her Entry into London with extraordinary Pomp and Solemnity; and coming to the Tower, she gave Liberty to several considerable Persons, as the old Duke of Norfolk, who had been almost seven Years Prisoner; Bishop Gardiner, who had been five Years there; the Dutchess of Somerset, who had been kept there near two Years; and the Lord Courtney, Son to the Marquess of Exeter, who had been detain'd fifteen Years, ever since his Father's Attainder. So now she was peaceably settled in the Throne, without any Effusion of Blood; having broke through a Confederacy against her, which seem'd to be so strong, that if the chief Head of it had not been universally odious to the Nation, it could not have been so easily dissipated.

Queen Mary enters London.

A. D. 1553. Reg. 1. Her former life and Behaviour. II. Queen Mary was thirty seven Years of Age when she came to the Crown; being a Lady of great Virtues, and strict in her Religion even to Superstition. Her Temper was generous, but much corrupted by Melancholy, which was partly natural to her, but much encreas'd by the cross Accidents of her Life, both before and after her Advancement; so that she became sower and splenatick, and had too much of the Spanish Moroseness. She adher'd so resolutely to her Mother's Interests, that it was believ'd her Father once design'd to have taken her Life: Upon which her Mother wrote a very devout Letter to her, charging her to trust in God, and keep her self pure, and to obey the King in all things, except in Matters of Religion; and sent her two Books in Latin for her Entertainment, St. Jerom's Epistles, and a Book of the Life of Christ. The King's Displeasure was then so great, that neither the Duke of Norfolk, nor Gardiner, durst venture to intercede for her: Crammer was the only Man that would hazard himself, and did it so effectually as intirely to prevail with the King. But after her Mother's Death, she hearken'd to other Councils; so that upon Anne Bolen's Fall she made a full Submission to him, as was formerly mention'd. She also in many Letters, which she wrote both to her Father and to Cromwell, solemnly protested great Sorrow for her former mer Obstinacy, and declar'd, That she put her Soul into his Hands, and that her Conscience should be always directed by him: And being ask'd what her Opinion was concerning Pilgrimages, Purgatory and Relicks, she answer'd, That she had no Opinion, but such as she receiv'd from the King, who had her whole Heart in his keeping; and might imprint upon it, in these and all other Matters, whatever his inestimable Virtue, exalted Wisdom, and excellent Learning should think convenient for her. So perfectly had she learn'd the Stile, that she knew was most acceptable to her Father. After that, she was in all Points obedient to him; and during her Brother's Reign, she only pleaded for that way of Worship, that was in use at her Father's Death.

But now being come to the Crown, notwithstanding her Promises to the Suffolk Gentlemen to stand by her Brother's Religion, neither that, nor her Father's could satisfy her; yet when she thought where to fix, she was distracted between two different Schemes that were presented to her. Gardiner, and all that had comply'd in the former Times, mov'd, That at first she should bring all Things back to the same State they had been fix'd, when her Father dy'd; and after that by easie and regular Steps she might again return to a full Obedience to the See of Rome. But she herself was more inclin'd to return immediately into the Bosom of the Romish Church; and she thought she could not any other way be legitimated, but in this she was in danger of proceeding too hastily. Gardiner finding that Political Maxims made no great Impression upon her, and that he was esteem'd by her as a subtle temporizing Man, address'd himself to the Emperor, who better understood Government and Mankind; and undertook, that if he would procure him to be Chancellor, he would so manage Affairs, that in a short Time he would effect all things to the Queen's Desire; and that there was no Danger but in her making too large Steps, and being so much govern'd by Italian Councils: For he understood that she had already sent for Cardinal Pool. The People had a strong Aversion to the Papal Authority, and the Nobility and Gentry were apprehensive of losing the Abby-Lands; therefore it was necessary gradually and slowly to remove those Prejudices. He also assur'd the Emperor, That he would zealously serve all his Interests, and shew'd him how necessary it was to stop the coming of Cardinal Pool, who stood attainted by Act of Parliament; and in this he was the more urgent, because he knew the Cardinal hated him. The Emperor upon this wrote so effectually to the Queen to depend upon Gardiner's Counsels, that on the thirteenth of August he was made Lord Chancellor, and the Conduct of Affairs put chiefly into his Hands. The old Duke of Norfolk was also much regarded by the Queen, who being now at liberty, alledg'd that he was never truly Attainted, and that it was no legal Act that had pass'd against him; by which Plea he recover'd his Estate, and all the Grants that had been made out of it, were declar'd void at Common Law.

He was made Lord High-Steward for the Trial of the Duke of Northumberland, with his Son the Earl of Warwick, and the Marquess of Northampton. All that they pleaded for themselves lay in two Points; the one was, Whether any thing acted by Order of Council, and the Authority of the Great Seal, could be Treason? The other was, Whether such as were as guilty as themselves, could sit and judge them? The Judges answer'd, That the Great Seal, or Privy-Council of one that was not lawful Queen, could give no Authority, nor Indemnity: And, That all Peers who were not convicted by Record, might legally judge them. These Points being determin'd against them, they pleaded Guilty, and submitted to the Queen's Mercy; so Sentence pass'd upon them: And the next Day Sir John Gates, Sir Thomas Palmer, and some others, were try'd and condemn'd: But of all these, it was resolv'd, that only Northumberland, Gates and Palmer should suffer. Bishop Heath was appointed to attend on Northumberland, and to prepare him for Death: He then profess'd He had always been of the old Religion in his Heart, and had comply'd ply'd against his Conscience; but whether it was true, or spoken in Hopes of Life, as it cannot be certainly known, so it shews he had but little Religion, either in his Life, or at his Death. But he was a Man of such a high Temper, that it was resolv'd to put him out of a Capacity of revenging himself upon his Enemies: So on the twenty second of August, he and the other two were beheaded. There past some Expostulations between him and Gates, each accusing the other as the Author of their Ruin; but they were seemingly reconcil'd, and profess'd they forgave one another. The Duke made a long Speech, confessing his former ill Life, and the Justice of the Sentence against him; 'He exhorted the People to stand to the Religion of their Ancestors, and to reject all Novel ies, and to drive the Preachers of them out of the Nation; and declar'd he had temporiz'd against his Conscience, and that he was always of the Religion of his Fore-Fathers. And thus dy'd the ambitious Duke of Northumberland; who was an extraordinary Man, 'till he was rais'd very high: But that transported him beyond Measure, and he was so strangely chang'd in the last Passages of his Life, that it increas'd the Jealousies of his having hasten'd King Edward's Death; and that the Horrors of that Guilt did so haunt him, that both the Judgment and Courage shown in the former Parts of his Life, seem'd now to have quite abandon'd him. However the Duke of Somerset's Blood lay heavy upon him; and it is observable, That as he suffer'd under the same Fate, and upon the very same Block, that the other did; so it was his Fortune to be laid under the same Stone, in the same Grave, where they now lye like good Friends, who living were irreconcilable Enemies.

King Edward's
Funeral.

As to King Edward's Death, there was no strict Enquiry made after it; and all the Honour done to his Memory, was to allow him Funeral Rites. On the eighth Day of August, he was bury'd at Westminster; and the Queen had a solemn Obsequy, and Masses for him in the Tower. Bishop Day was appointed to preach the Funeral Sermon; in which he prais'd the King, but severely exclaim'd against the Administration of Affairs under him. It had been resolv'd to bury him according to the old Forms; but Cranmer oppos'd that, and prevail'd that he should be bury'd according to the Form then establish'd by Law. He himself officiated, and ended the Solemnity with a Communion; all which he perform'd with a most lively Sorrow, as having both lov'd the King beyond Expression, and looking on his Funeral as the Burial of the Reformation, and as a great Step towards his own. This soon began to appear; for in a few Days after several Advances were made towards that Work. The Queen at first, to mollifie the Proceedings, declar'd in Council, on the twelfth Day of August, That tho' she was fix'd in her own Religion, yet she would not compel others to it; but would leave that to the Motions of God's Spirit, and the Labours of good Preachers. The Day following, Doctor Bonner went to St. Paul's, where the Sermon was preach'd by Bourn his Chaplain; who extremely extoll'd his Patron, and violently inveigh'd against the Sufferings he had sustain'd. Upon this a Tumult was rais'd by the People, who could not bear any Reflexions upon the pious King Edward: Some threw Stones at him, and one darted a Dagger at the Pulpit, with such Force, that it stuck fast in the Wood. Rogers and Bradford, two eminent Preachers, were present, and so much in credit with the People, that they easily quieted them, and convey'd Bourn safe to his House. This was a very desirable Accident to the Romanists; and gave them a Colour to prohibit Preaching, by a publick Inhibition in the Queen's Name. In which she declar'd, 'That her Religion was the same that it had been from her Infancy, but that she would compel none of her Subjects in Matters of Religion, till publick Order should be taken in it by common Consent. She requir'd her People to live peaceably, and not to use the Terms of Papist or Heretick, or other reproachful Speeches; and that none should preach without her special Licence: She also charg'd them not to punish any on the Account of the late Rebellion.

but as they should be authoriz'd by her. She would be sorry to be driven to execute the Severity of the Law; but was resolv'd not to suffer Rebellious Actions to go unpunish'd. This gave great Occasion for Censure: It shew'd what Religion she profess'd, which was worse than that of her Father: Her special Licence was an immediate Interdict upon all the Pulpits in England; and her threatening to proceed against such as were guilty of the late Revolt, struck a great Terror to the City of London; for the chief of the City were principally concern'd in it.

Now all Things began to be carry'd on with great Warmth and Violence; yet still the Suffolk Gentlemen imagin'd that their Services and the Queen's Promises gave them a Title to own their Religion more avowedly: But Orders were sent to the Bishop of Norwich to execute the Queen's Injunctions, and to see that none preach'd without a special Licence. Upon which some of those who had been most serviceable in her Necessities, came to put the Queen in mind of her positive Promise: But she sent them home with a severe Answer, That the Members ought not to rule the Head; but they were to learn to obey, and not to govern: And when one of them more confidently insisted upon her Promise, he was order'd to stand three Days in the Pillory, as having said Words tending to defame the Queen; which was a dismal Omen of a severe Government, when the claiming of Promises pass'd for a Crime. Bradford and Rogers were also secur'd, upon a Pretence that the Authority they shew'd in quieting the Tumult, was a Proof that they had first rais'd it. Gardiner, Bonner, Tonstal, Heath and Day were all restor'd to their Bishopricks, and the Sentences pass'd against them in the late Reign null'd. Gardiner had Authority given him to grant Priests Licences to preach in any Church, as he should appoint; by which the Reformed were not only silenc'd, but their Churches and Pulpits were thrown open to such as that unreasonable Man should send among them. This caus'd the Imprisonment of many, and particularly the two Bishops of Exeter and Glocester, Coverdale, and Hooper. Images began to be set up, and the old Rites were in many Places renew'd, all which was encourag'd by the Government, tho' directly against Law. Of this Judge Hales was sensible, who thought his Refusing to concur with the rest for excluding the Queen gave him no common Privilege; therefore when he went his Circuit, in his Charge at Kent he requir'd the Justices to see to the Execution of King Edward's Laws, that still continu'd in Force. But upon his Return he was for this committed to the Marshalsea, and remov'd from Prison to Prison, where the good old Man was so terrify'd with his Enemies Designs, that his Brain was turn'd; and he first made an Attempt upon his Life with a Pen-knife, and tho' he was afterwards set at Liberty, his Disorder was so great that he drowned himself. On the other side Judge Bromley, tho' he had made no Scruple in declaring for the Queen's Exclusion, yet since he profess'd himself a Papist, was made Lord Chief Justice: And Montague, who had proceeded in it with extream Aversion, yet because he was for the Reformation, was imprison'd, depriv'd of his Lands given him by the late King, and severely punish'd: Tho' he had this Merit to plead, that he had sent his Son and a Body of Men to declare for the Queen; and had this also to recommend him to her Pity, that he had a Family of six Sons, and eleven Daughters.

During these melancholy Prospects, Cranmer, who for a while had kept himself quiet, was advis'd by some Friends to fly beyond Sea; but he answer'd, That tho' he could not dissuade others from flying in such a threatening Storm, yet it was unbecoming a Man in his Station, who was so deeply concern'd in the Changes formerly made. Therefore he prepar'd a Paper, in which he declar'd himself, with Peter Martyr, and some others, ready to prove the Errors of the Mass, and to defend the whole Doctrine and Service publish'd by the late King, as most conformable to the Word of God, and the Practice of the ancient Church for many Ages. This being discover'd by an Accident, the Arch-

Arch-Bishop was cited to the Star-Chamber, to answer to it: He acknowledged it was his, and declar'd he design'd to have enlarg'd it, and affix'd it on St. Paul's and other Churches. He was at this Time dismiss'd; for Gardiner, who saw the Queen design'd to put Cardinal Pool in his See, now us'd all Endeavours to preserve him. Some discreetly mov'd that a small Pension might be assign'd him, and that he should be suffer'd to live privately: For the happy Sweetness of his Temper had procur'd such an universal Love from the People, that it was thought too bold a Step to proceed to Extremities with such a Man. Others said, he had been the chief Author of all the Heresie in the Nation, and that it was not decent for the Queen to shew any Favour to him, that had pronounc'd the Sentence of her Mother's Divorce. These last Counsels prevail'd most with the zealous Queen; and within a Week after, he and Bishop Latimer, and several other Preachers were committed to Prison. Peter Martyr, who had come over upon the publick Faith, had leave given him to depart the Nation; so had John a Lasco, and the German Congregation. Many of the English foreseeing the Storm, resolv'd to withdraw in Time; and when the Strangers were requir'd to be gone, they went under that Covert in great Numbers. But the Council understanding that about a thousand had so convey'd themselves away, gave Order that none should be suffer'd to go as Strangers, but those who had a Certificate from the Ambassador of the Princes to whom they belong'd. With those who fled beyond Sea, several eminent Preachers went; among whom were Cox, Sandys, Grindal and Horn, all highly advanc'd by Queen Elizabeth.

These Things began to alienate the People from the Government, therefore on the other Side, great Care was taken to mollifie and sweeten them. The Queen bestow'd the chief Offices of her Household on those who had assisted her in her Extremity; there being no Way more effectual to ingage all to adhere to the Crown, than the grateful Acknowledgment of past Services. An unusual Honour was done to Ratcliff Earl of Suffex, who had a particular Licence granted him under the Great-Seal to cover his Head in the Queen's Presence. These Things being settled, she proceeded to her Coronation; and on the last Day of September she rode in her open Chariot through London towards Westminster, attended with a glorious Cavalcade in this Order. First rode a great Number of Gentlemen and Knights, then Doctors, then Judges, then Bishops, then Lords, then the Council; after whom follow'd the knights of the Bath in their Robes, then the Bishop of Winchester Lord Chancellor, and the Marquess of Winchester Lord High-Treasurer: Next came the Duke of Norfolk, and after him the Earl of Oxford, who bore the Sword; then the Lord Mayor in Crimson Velvet, who bore the Scepter of Gold: Then came the Queen's Chariot, follow'd by another Chariot, in which sat her Sister Elizabeth with the Lady Anne of Cleve; who were likewise follow'd by a noble Train of Ladies and Gentlewomen on Horseback. In this Order they rode through the principal Streets to Westminster, where in many Places were magnificent Pageants and Shews, and many rich Presents were made to the Queen. The next Day she was publicly crown'd at Westminster, by Bishop Gardiner, who with ten other Bishops, all in their Mitres, Coapes and Crofiers, perform'd that Ceremony with great Pomp and Solemnity; and Bishop Day preach'd the Coronation Sermon. But Gardiner had prepar'd a Largess of an extraordinary Nature for the Queen to distribute that Day among the People; besides a general Pardon, he caus'd a Proclamation to be publish'd, setting forth, 'That the Queen did discharge her Subjects of the two Tenths, two Fifteenths, and a Subsidy that had been granted by the last Parliament: And she also declar'd that she would both pay her Father's and her Brother's Debts; and tho' her Treasure was much exhausted, yet she esteem'd the Love of her People her best Treasure, and forgave their Taxes, in lieu of which she de‘fir’d only the Hearts of her Subjects, and that they would serve God sincerely, and pray earnestly for her.

Not long after, on the tenth of October, a Parliament met according to Summons: In many Places of the Country Men had been chosen by Force and Threats; in other Places those imploy’d by the Court by Violence hinder’d the Free-holders from coming to chuse; in many Places false Returns were made; and some zealous for the Reformation were forcibly turn’d out of the House of Commons; all which was afterwards offer’d as a Ground upon which that Parliament, and all Acts made in it, might be annull’d. There only came two of the reform’d Bishops to the House of Lords, Taylor and Harley, the Bishops of Lincoln and Hereford; the two Arch-Bishops, and three Bishops were then in Prison, and the rest staid at home. When Mass began to be said, the two reform’d Bishops went out, as some report it, but were never suffer’d to return to their Places; others say, that refusing to join in that Worship, they were violently thrust out. In the House of Commons, some of the most Forward mov’d, that King Edward’s Laws might be review’d; but Things were not ripe enough for that Project. The Commons sent up a Bill of Tonnage and Poundage, which the Lords sent down amended in two Proviso’s; and the Commons did not then insist upon their Privilege, that the Lords could make no Alterations in a Money-Bill. The only publick Bill that was finish’d this Session, was a Repeal of all late Statutes, making any Crime Treason, that was not so by the twenty fifth of Edward the Third; or Felony, that was not so before King Henry the Eighth: Excepting from the Benefit of this Act all that were put in Prison before the End of September last; who were likewise excepted out of the general Pardon. The Marchioness of Exeter, and her Son the Earl of Devonshire, were restor’d to Blood by two private Acts; and then the Parliament was prorogu’d for three Days, that it might be said, the first Session under the Queen, was meerly for Acts of Grace and Mercy.

The first Parliament in this Reign.

At their next Meeting, a Bill pass’d through both Houses in four Days, repealing the Divorce of the Queen’s Mother; ‘In which they declar’d the Marriage to be lawful; and that malicious Persons had possess’d the King with Scruples concerning it; and had by Corruption procur’d the Seals of Foreign Universities condemning it: Upon which Cranmer had pronounc’d the Sentence of Divorce, which had been confirm’d in Parliament: They therefore looking upon the Miseries that had befallen the Nation, since that Time, as Judgments from God for that Sentence, did now condemn it, and repeal the Acts confirming it. By this Gardiner perform’d his Promise in procuring her to be declar’d Legitimate, without mentioning the Pope’s Authority: But in the drawing of it, he shew’d that he was past all Blushing, when he procur’d such a Repeal of a Sentence, which he had so fervilely promoted; and when he particularly knew the Falshood of this Pretence, that the Foreign Universities were corrupted; as also that he had encourag’d it long before Cranmer engag’d in it, and sat in Court with him when Sentence was pronounc’d. By this Act the Princess Elizabeth was in effect illegitimated a second Time, since the Ground on which her Mother’s Marriage subsisted, was the Divorce of the first: And it was upon this Pretence, or from old Resentments, or a new Rivalry, that the Queen, who had hitherto treated her as a Sister, began now to use her more severely. The next Bill was a Repeal of all the Laws, made in King Edward’s Reign, concerning Religion; ‘By which, all Matters of Religion were again brought back to the same State King Henry had left them; and this was to take Place about two Months after, ‘till when all were at liberty to use the old or new Service, as they pleas’d. Another Act pass’d against all that should disquiet any Preacher for his Sermons, or interrupt Divine Offices; ‘by which the Queen was empower’d to restore the Service in all Particulars, as it had been before her Father made the Breach with Rome. Another Law was made, That if any to the ‘ Number of Twelve should meet to alter any Thing in Religion, or for any ‘ Riot, or should by any publick Notice, such as Bells and Beacons, gather

‘ the People together, and should not disperse themselves, upon Proclamation, ‘ they and their Assistants were made guilty of Felony: And if any more than ‘ two met for those Ends, they should suffer a Year’s Imprisonment. By this all the Favour of the former Act of Repeal vanish’d, and prov’d no better than Delusion. The Marques of Northampton’s second Marriage was annul’d, as being founded upon false Surmises; and so was the Attainder of the Duke of Norfolk set aside by this Parliament. At the same time Arch-Bishop Cranmer, Guilford Dudley, and his Wife the Lady Jane, and two of his Brothers were try’d for Treason: They all confess’d the Indictments, only Cranmer appeal’d to the Judges, who knew with what Reluctancy he had consented to the Exclusion of the Queen, and that he refus’d it, ’till they, whose Profession it was to know the Law, had sign’d it. They were all attainted of Treason for levying War against the Queen, and their Attainders were confirm’d in this Parliament. Thus was Cranmer legally divested of his Arch-Bishoprick; but since he was put into it by the Pope’s Authority, it was resolv’d to degrade him by the Forms of the Canon Law; and the Queen was willing to pardon his Treason, that it might appear she did not act upon a Spirit of Revenge, but Zeal.
In Reality, she was often prevail’d upon to pardon Injuries against her self, but was ever inexorable in Matters of Religion.

secret Designs.*

About this Time two Things began to be discover’d, which put the Parliament and Nation in much Disorder: The one was the Queen’s secret Treaty with the Court of Rome, and the other her design’d Marriage with the Emperor’s Son Philip. As to the First, when she came to the Crown, the Pope’s Legate at Brussels sent over Commendone, afterwards a Cardinal, to try if he could speak privately with her, and to persuade her to reconcile her Kingdom to the Apostolick See. The Management of the Affair was left to his Discretion, for the Legate would not trust his important Secret to Gardiner, nor any of the other Bishops. Commendone came over in the Disguise of a Merchant, and by Accident met with one of the Queen’s Servants, who had liv’d some Years beyond Sea, and being known to him, by his Means he procur’d Access to the Queen. She assur’d him of her firm Resolution to return to the Obedience of that See, but charg’d him to proceed with great Niceness and Prudence; for if it were too early discover’d, it might disturb her Affairs, and obstruct the Design. By him she wrote both to the Pope, and to Cardinal Pool, and urg’d the sending over Pool with a Legantine Power: She also ask’d him, whether the Pope might not dispence with the Cardinal to marry, since he was only in Deacons Orders. This prov’d the Foundation of Commendone’s Advancement, and was a joyful Message to the Court of Rome; where was a publick Thanksgiving for three Days, and the Pope said Mass himself; and gave a Largess of Indulgences, in which he was the more liberal, because they were like to recover their former Reputation. Yet all that Commendone declar’d in the Consistory, was, That he understood from good Hands, that Queen Mary was dispos’d to a Re-union. Some of the stiffer Cardinals thought it below the Pope’s Dignity to send a Legate, ’till an Embassie came first from the Queen to desire that Favour; but the Secret being generally whisper’d among them, and the Success insur’d, Cardinal Pool was appointed to go Legate, with a plenary Authority. Gardiner was very apprehensive of this Man, and therefore advis’d the Emperor to stop him in his Journey; and to touch the Emperor in the tenderest Part, it is said that he let him know that the Queen had some Inclinations for the Cardinal. The Emperor had now propos’d a Match with her for his Son, tho’ he was nine Years younger than she; yet she being but thirty seven, there was Reason sufficient to hope for Children; and the uniting England to the Spanish Monarchy seem’d to be all that was wanting to the Ruin of the French Kingdom. The Queen found strong Inducements to determine her to this Proposition; for she found it would be difficult, if not impracticable, to make a full Establishment of her Religion without the Assistance of a Foreign Power.

The restoring of the Papal Power, and the Match with the Prince of Spain, were two Things of such uneasy Digestion, that it was not fit to adventure on both at once; therefore the Emperor urg'd the Queen to begin with her Marriage, and by that she would be enabled to carry on her other Designs. At length the Queen her self was persuaded to send to Pool, to advise him to stop his Journey for some Time; to whom she sent over the Acts of this Parliament, 'To let him know what Progress she was making, and to assure him she would use all convenient Expedition in the Re-union: But the Parliament had express'd so great an Aversion to the restoring the Pope's Power, and were so apprehensive of losing the Abby-Lands, that it would greatly prejudice her Affairs, if she came over before her Subjects Minds were better prepar'd. To shew her Confidence in him, she also desir'd him to send her a List of such as were most proper to be made Bishops, in Room of those remov'd. The Cardinal was very uneasy at his being stopp'd in his Journey, and wrote her a long Answer, 'In which he rejoic'd at the Acts that were pass'd, but observ'd great Defects in them: In that concerning her Mother's Marriage, there was no Mention made of the Pope's Bull of Dispensation, by which only it could be a lawful Marriage: The other for setting up the Worship, as it was in the End of her Father's Reign, was more exceptionable, for the Nation was then in a State of Schism, and so this had establish'd Schism by a Law. He declar'd that he had been very frankly dispatch'd by the Pope and the Consistory, with many favourable Instructions; but if these were so despis'd, and he still stopp'd, it might provoke his Holiness to recall his Power. He was sensible all this flow'd from the Emperor, who perhaps would advise her to follow such Political Maxims as had govern'd him; but his ill Success in the Business of the Interim, might well discourage others from following such Counsels: And he fear'd that carnal Policy might govern her so much, as she would fall from her Simplicity in Christ. He desir'd her to take Courage, and depend upon God; and advis'd her to go her self to the Parliament, having first prepar'd some to second her, and to declare, That she was touch'd in Conscience with a Sense of Sin of the Schism, and that therefore she desir'd the Act of Attainder that stood against Cardinal Pool might be repeal'd, and that he might be invited to come over, and reconcile them to the Apostolick See: And she might assure them, That all necessary Caution should be taken to prevent the Nation's being brought under a Thralldom to the Papacy. But the Queen was prepossess'd with Gardiner's Counsels, and esteem'd the Cardinal's Advice as more candid, than really prudent. Gardiner persuaded her that tho' he was a good and learned Man, yet he understood not the present Genius of the Nation; and Pool look'd upon Gardiner as a Man of no Conscience, and more conversant in Intrigues of State, than touch'd with any Sense of Religion: But the Emperor was convinc'd that Gardiner's Methods were more secure, therefore he preferr'd them to those of the other.

When the Treaty of the Queen's Marriage was publicly known, the House of Commons were much alarm'd at it; and they sent their Speaker and twenty of their Members, with an Address to her, not to marry a Stranger; in which they shew'd so much Heat and Resentment, that the Court judg'd it necessary to dissolve the Parliament. Upon this Gardiner let the Emperor know, That the Jealousies rais'd upon the Account of the Match were so strong, that except very extraordinary Conditions were offer'd, it would occasion a general Rebellion. He also wrote to him that large Sums must be sent over both to gratifie the Nobility, and enable them to carry the Elections in the next Parliament, against all Opposers. As for Conditions, the Emperor was resolv'd to grant any that should be demanded; for he concluded that if his Son were once marry'd marry'd to the Queen, it would be easie for him to goven the Councils as he pleas'd: And for Mony there was no less than four hundred thousand Pounds order'd to be divided in the Nation, at the Discretion of Gardiner, and the Emperor's Ambassadors, at several Times. This Mony was borrow'd by the Emperor from some of the free Towns of Germany; and when they were urging him for the Re-Payment of it about a Year after, he for his Excuse alledg'd the Charge he had been at for his Son's Marriage, but that he hop'd to be re-imburst from England, which was thus bought and sold by a designing Prelate, and a corrupted Parliament. Gardiner did also basely make use of his Power, as Chancellor, to oblige all People to comply with him; and in his Court of Chancery no Favour or common Justice was shewn to any Persons who were not of his Interest.

A. D. 1554. Reg. 1. In the Beginning of the following Year, a noble Embassie came over from the Emperor, to agree on the Conditions of Marriage between his Son and the Queen. In the managing of this Treaty, Gardiner had a principal Share; for he was the Oracle of the Council-Board, as having thirty Years Experience in Affairs, and a great Knowledge of the Courts of Christendom, and of the State of England. In drawing the Articles of the Marriage, he had a double Design; one was, to have them so fram'd, as they might easily pass in Parliament; and the other was, to exclude the Spaniards from having any Share in the Government of England, which he design'd to hold in his own Hands. Accordingly it was agreed 'That the Government, and Gift of Places, should be entirely in Queen Mary; and tho' Prince Philip was to be call'd King, nam'd in all Writs, and his Image put on the Coin and Seals, yet the Queen's Hand alone was to give Authority to every Thing, without his: No Spaniard was to be capable of any Office: No change was to be made in the Law, nor was the Queen to be requir'd to go out of England against her Will; nor might their Issue go out of England, but by the Consent of the Nobility. The Queen was to have a Jointure of forty thousand Pounds a Year out of Spain, and twenty thousand Pounds out of the Netherlands: If the Queen had a Son, it was to inherit Burgundy and the Netherlands as well as England; and if Philip's present Son dy'd, it was to inherit all the Spanish Dominions: If the Queen had only Daughters, they were to succeed to her Crown, and have such Portions from Spain, as was usually given to Kings Daughters. Prince Philip was to have no Share in the Government after her Death: And the Queen might still keep up the League with France, notwithstanding this Match. These were the Conditions concluded at present, and afterwards confirm'd in Parliament; by which it appears that the Spaniards were resolv'd to have the Marriage upon any Terms; not doubting, but if Prince Philip were once in England, he could easily enlarge his Authority at Pleasure.

Yet all these did not satisfie the Nation, which look'd upon them as so many Baits to ensnare them into Slavery. The Severities of the Spaniards Government and Inquisition in their own Provinces, and the monstrous Cruelties exercis'd in the West-Indies, were loud in every Man's Mouth; and it was said, That England must now preserve it self, or for ever be in Bondage. These Things had great Influence upon many; but the chief Conspirators were the Duke of Suffolk, Sir Thomas Wiat, and Sir Peter Carew: The first was to raise the Mid-land Counties, the second the County of Kent, and the third Cornwall; hoping by rising in such remote Places, they might engage the Commons, who were now as much disgusted with their Queen, as they were formerly fond of her. But before the Design was ripe, the Project in the West was discover'd, upon which Carew fled into France. Wiat gather'd some Men about him in Kent, and on the twenty fifth of January he made Proclamation at Maidstone, 'That he design'd nothing but to preserve the Nation from the Yoke of Strangers; and assur'd the People that all England would make an Insurrection upon the same Cause. The Sheriff of Kent requir'd him, under Pain of Treason, to disperse his Company, but he did not obey his Summons. One Knevet also rais'd a Body of Men about Tunbridge, and march'd towards him, but was intercepted and defeated by a Force commanded by the Duke of Norfolk, who was sent with two hundred Horse and six hundred Londoners to disperse this Insurrection: But some who came over from Wiat as Deserters, persuaded the Londoners that it was a common Cause, in which they were engag'd to maintain the Liberty of the Nation; upon which they all went over to Wiat, crying out, We are all English Men! This oblig'd the Duke of Norfolk to retire back to London; and Wiat, who had kept himself under the Defence of Rocheſter Bridge, advanc'd forwards, sending to the Duke of Suffolk to hasten his Designs. But that Duke, who was always of a mean Spirit, after a feeble Attempt to raise the Country, desisted and fled to a private House, where he was taken and brought Prisoner to the Tower.

Pain

Wiat's Party increasing, the Queen sent an Offer of Pardon to him and his Men; but that not being receiv'd, she sent some of her Council to treat with him, and he being greatly swell'd with his small Success, propos'd, 'That the Queen should come to the Tower of London, and put the Command of it into his Hands, 'till a new Council was establish'd about her. Upon these extravagant Proposals, there only pass'd high Words, without any Determination. Upon which the Queen attended with many Noblemen went to Guild-Hall, and before the Citizens gave an Account of her Message to Wiat, and his Answer: And as for her Marriage, she declar'd, She had done nothing without the Advice of her Nobles; That having liv'd so long a Virgin, she was willing to continue in the same Condition, if the States of the Realm thought it proper. Wiat was now four thousand strong, and march'd into Southwark, on the second of February, but could not force the Bridge of London: He was inform'd that the Citizens would all rise, if he should come to their Assistance; but he could not find Boats for his Passage over into Essex, therefore he was oblig'd to go to the Bridge of Kingston. On the fourth he came to Kingston, where the Queen had order'd the Bridge to be cut; but his Men repairing it, he cross'd the River that Night: And tho' he lost much Time in mending one of his Carriages that broke by the Way, he was at Hide-Park by nine a Clock next Morning, it being Ash-Wednesday. The Earl of Pembroke had gather'd a considerable Body of Men to have attack'd him, for his own Men were now in great Disorder; but they stood as Spectators, to let him throw himself into their Hands. He did not march by Holborn, as some advis'd, but came down to Charing-Cross; where the Lord Clinton fell in between the several Bodies of his Men, and so dispers'd them, that he had not five hundred left about him: But with those that remain'd he pass'd through the Strand and Fleet-street, to Ludgate, where he stopp'd, expecting to have the Gates open'd to him. Upon his Return towards Temple-Bar, he found himself surrounded by the Earl of Pembroke's Horse; and Clarenceaux, King at Arms, press'd Wiat to yield himself, and not by drawing the Blood of so many valiant Men, forfeit all Hopes of the Queen's Mercy. His Men seem'd to be resolute, but he in Despair yielded, and was carry'd to the Queen; who all this while shew'd great Courage, and would not go to the Tower, as many advis'd her, but went with her Women and Priests to her Devotions. Thus ended this Rebellion, which being raw and ill-form'd was as fortunate for the Ends of the Court, as if Gardner had projected it; for in a weak Government, an ill digested Insurrection raises the Power of the Prince, and adds as much Spirit to his Friends as it depresses the Faction against him; and gives a Handle to some Things for which otherwise they could neither find Colour nor Instruments.

One Effect of this was, the severe Proceedings against the Lady Jane, and her Husband the Lord Guilford, who were both order'd to prepare for Death. The admirable Lady was not much disorder'd at the fatal Message; for she knew, upon the first Jealousie she must be the Sacrifice, therefore had now liv'd liv'd six Months in the continual Meditations of Death. Doctor Fecknam, afterwards Abbot of Westminster, was sent to her from the Queen, who had a long Conversation with her. But she answer'd him with that Calmness of Mind, and Clearness of Reason, that it was amazing to find so young a Person, of her Sex and Quality, look on approaching Death with so little Disorder, and talk so sensibly and judiciously of the highest Points of Religion. Fecknam left her without any Hopes of prevailing; but procur'd the Continuance of her Life for three Days longer, and waited on her upon the Scaffold. She wrote to her Father to moderate his Grief for her Death, which must needs have been great since his Actions occasion'd it; declaring, 'It was a mighty Matter of Joy to her, that she was near the End of her Miseries, and the Enjoyment of eternal Glory. There was one Harding, who had been her Father's Chaplain, and a zealous Preacher in the Reign of King Edward, and before his Death had animated the People to prepare against Persecution; yet now had fallen away himself. To whom she wrote a Letter in an extraordinary Strain, full of zealous Expostulations, and severe Threatnings, for his Apostacy; but it had no just Effect upon him. The Night before her Execution, she sent her Greek Testament she always us'd to her Sister, as the richest Present in the World; with a Letter in the same Language, in which, in the most pious and pathetic Expressions she display'd the mighty Value of the Book, and the glorious Advantages she might obtain by it. She had also compos'd a very devout Prayer for her Retirements: And these were the last Exercises of this wondrous young Lady.

Her Husband's Execution.

The dismal Morning being come, and all People melted into the tenderest Sentiments of Pity, her Husband was first led out to a Scaffold on Tower-Hill, where he suffer'd with a most Christian Meekness. He had obtain'd leave to see his beloved Spouse, and to take his last Farewel; but she declin'd that Ceremony, as a Circumstance that would more increase their Disorder, than their Consolation; declaring, That she hop'd they would shortly meet, and be united in a happier State. Yet she had such a Presence of Mind, as to look on him through the Window, when he pass'd to the Scaffold; and with an Heroick unmov'd Countenance saw his headless Body afterwards brought back to be interr'd in the Chappel of the Tower. There was no doubt but the Death of this innocent Lady would excite the highest Degrees of Compassion and Regret; therefore, since the World could not bear so moving a Sight, a Scaffold was erected within the Verge of the Tower, where she might satisfy the Severity of the Law, without any Danger to the State. As she was brought out, the Lieutenant of the Tower desir'd her to favour him with some Memorial of hers; upon which she ask'd for her Table-Book, and wrote three short Sentences in Greek, in Latin, and in English by which she asserted her Innocency, declaring, That if her Fault deserv'd Punishment, her Youth, at least, and her Ignorance, were excusable; and that God and Posterity would shew her Favour. At last the beauteous Victim having saluted the Croud as she pass'd along, and with a charming Air of Modesty desir'd their Prayers, she mounted that Throne, where she was to receive a Crown of inestimable Value. Here she kindly embrac'd Doctor Fecknam, saying, God will abundantly requite you, good Sir, for your Humanity to me, tho' it gave me more uneasiness than all the Torments of my approaching Death. Then turning to the Spectators, she confess'd, That she had sinned in assuming the Title of Queen, and that her Consent to it was unlawful, but still it was neither procur'd, nor desir'd by her. At which she wrung her Hands in Token of her Innocency. Then she declar'd, She was a true Christian, and hop'd for Salvation only by the Mercy of God in the Blood of Christ: Acknowledging, That she had too much neglected the Word of God, and too much lov'd her self and the World, for which she was justly punish'd from Heaven; but she bless'd God, who by this had led her to Repentance. Having said this, she commended her self to the Divine Mercy; then caus'd her self to be disrob'd by some of her Ladies, who with weeping Eyes and bleeding Hearts perform'd that Office, which was no more unwelcome to her than a Preparation to Sleep. Being ready for the Block, with the same unconcern'd Countenance, as she had acted the rest of her Tragedy, she loudly repeated the fifty first Psalm; then crying, Lord, into thy Hands I commend my Spirit, she submitted her Neck to the Executioner; while all the People about her were cover'd with Floods of Tears.

And her own.

Thus dy'd the incomparable Lady Jane Gray, on the twelfth Day of February, being about sixteen Years of Age; whose Death was as much lamented, as her Life had been admir'd. It had a most violent Operation on Judge Morgan, who had pronounc'd the Sentence; for soon after he fell mad, and in all his Ravings, still call'd to take away the Lady Jane from him. Indeed the Odium of her Death was generally cast on her Father, rather than the Queen, who seem'd to be driven to it, rather from Considerations of State, than any Resentments of her own. Her Father was soon after try'd by his Peers, condemn'd, and executed; and was the less pity'd, because by his Means his Daughter was brought to her untimely End. Wiat was brought to his Trial, who begg'd his Life in the most abject manner; but he was condemn'd and executed. A Slander was cast upon the Earl of Devonshire and the Princess Elizabeth, as if they had promoted the design'd Insurrection in the West; for Wiat, in Hopes of Life, had accus'd them, but he did them Justice at his Death; yet still they were both put in Prison about it. Fifty eight were executed in several Places, and six hundred of the Rabble were appointed to come before the Queen with Halters about their Necks, and beg their Lives, which she granted them. And thus was the Storm dissipated; only the Effusion of Blood after it was thought too liberal, and this Excess of Punishment was generally cast on Gardiner, who by this means became hateful to the Nation, which has been always much mov'd at Acts of Severity.

Her Father's Execution.

The Princess Elizabeth imprisoned.

III. Queen Mary being by the Death of one, and the Imprisonment of another, freed from all Fears of Rivalry as to the Crown, now proceeded after her own Way without Reserve. She gave a special Commission to Bonner, Gardiner, Tonstall, Day and Kitchin, to proceed against the Arch-Bishop of York, and the Bishops of St. David's, Chester and Bristol, and to deprive them of their Bishopricks, for having contracted Marriage. She also authoriz'd them to summon the Bishops of Lincoln, Glocester and Hereford, who held their Bishopricks only during their good Behaviour, and to declare their Bishopricks void. And thus were seven of the Reformed Bishops depriv'd at once, without any Form of Process, by an Act of meer arbitrary Government. Bishop Goodrick dy'd this Year: Scory Bishop of Chichester renounc'd his Wife and did Penance, but soon after fled beyond Sea; and Barlow resign'd his Bishoprick of Bath and Wells, and also fled beyond Sea. By all these Deprivations and Resignations, there were sixteen new Bishops created, in whom the Queen confided, which made no small Change in the Face of the English Church. Now the old Service was set up in all Places; in which Bonner us'd such Precipitation, that before the Royal Assent was given to the Bill for it, he began the old Services and Processions, which were perform'd after an extraordinary Manner. Great Numbers of the Clergy were summarily depriv'd for being marry'd; and of the sixteen thousand Clergymen then in the Nation, there were about twelve thousand, according to Parker, turn'd out upon this Account: Most of them were judg'd upon common Fame, without any Process but a Citation; and many of them then in Prison, were punish'd for Non-Appearance. Many Books were written, numerous Reflections pass'd, and great Disturbances were occasion'd. And at this Time a notorious Impostor was discover'd in London; one seem'd to speak out of a Wall in a strange Tone: Which caus'd great Numbers to flock about the House, where they heard several things utter'd relating to Religion and the State. It was found to be one Elizabeth Crofts, who by a Whistle spoke through a Hole in the Wall; for which she was oblig'd to do publick Penance in St. Paul's.

The second Parliament in this Reign.

On the second Day of April a new Parliament met, which was the second ^{Parliament} in this Reign; but the most considerable Members were before corrupted by Gardiner, who gave them Pensions, some two hundred, and others a hundred Pound a Year for their Voices. The first Act that pass'd was Declaratory, 'That all the Prerogatives and Limitations, which by Law belong'd to the Kings of England, were the same, whether the Crown fell into the Hands of a Male or Female. The real Meaning of this was little known; some fear'd there was a pernicious Design in it, and that it being declar'd that she had all the Authority of any of her Progenitors, it might be inferr'd that she by this could pretend to a Right of Conquest, and like William the Conqueror, seize on the Estates of the English. But it was so conceiv'd, that the Queen was put under the same Limitations, as well as acknowledg'd to have the same Prerogatives, with her Predecessors. The Secret of this Act was afterwards discover'd: A projecting Man, who had serv'd Cromwell, and had been deeply engag'd in the Lady Jane's Affair, and the late Insurrection, by making a timely Application to the Emperor's Ambassador, obtain'd his Pardon; and for Amends he offer'd a Project to the Ambassador, that the Queen should declare, that she succeeded to the Crown by the Common-Law, but was not bound by the Statute-Law, which only oblig'd Kings and not Queens, by which she might pretend to be a Conqueror, and rule at Pleasure; and by that might restore both Religion and the Abby-Lands, without any Restraint. This was brought to the Queen by the Ambassador, who begg'd of her to keep it very secret. She dislik'd the Paper, yet she sent for Gardiner, and charg'd him to give her his Opinion of it sincerely, as he would answer to God for it at the great Day. He read it carefully, and told her, It was a most pernicious Contrivance, and begg'd of her not to hearken to such Plat-Forms, which might be brought her by base Sycophants: Upon that she burnt the Paper, and order'd the Ambassador to bring her no more of such Projects. This gave Gardiner sensible Apprehensions of the Mischiefs that Spanish Counsels might bring upon the Nation, and therefore he procur'd the fore-mention'd Act to be made, by which the Queen was as much bound by the Statute-Law as her Predecessors.

*The Articles of the Queen's
riage confirm'd.*

He also procur'd an Act to be pass'd, ratifying the Articles of the Marriage of the Queen, with very strong Clauses, for keeping the Government intirely in the Queen's Hands; so that Prince Philip might not take it upon him, as Henry VII. had done, when he marry'd the Heir of the House of York: For as that King set up a Title in his own Name, and kept the Government in his own Hands; so the Spaniards began now to derive a Descent from John of Gaunt, Father to Henry IV. which caus'd Gardiner to be the more cautious in this Matter. And it must be acknowledg'd, that the preserving of the Nation out of the Hands of the Spaniards, was almost only owing to his Care and Wisdom. In this Parliament several other Bills were prepar'd against the Lollards, and for the six Articles, but none of them pass'd; nor nothing material was enacted besides a Confirmation of former Attainders, and the Restoration of the Bishoprick of Durham: So the Parliament was dissolv'd on the twenty fifth Day of May.

The Parliament dissolv'd.

A publick Disputation at Oxford.

During this Parliament, the Convocation sat; and that they might remove the Objections that some made, that the chief of the Reformers were kept in Prison, while the Cause was debating in the last Meeting, they sent a Committee of their ablest Men to Oxford, to dispute with Cranmer, Ridley and Latimer, who were also sent thither. When Cranmer was brought before them, they exhorted him to return to the Unity of the Church, and fell into a long Dispute; in which Weston the Prolocutor often call'd him an Unlearned and Impudent Man: But he carry'd himself with that Gravity and Mildness, that it drew Tears from the Eyes of many. Yet the whole Action was carry'd with such indecent Hissing and Insulting, and ended with such Shouts of Triumph against Cranmer, that it was visible there was nothing intended, but to abuse the Ignorant People; and make them imagine he was utterly defeated. Ridley was brought out the next Day, who began with deep Protestations of his Sincerity, and that nothing but the Force of Truth had caus'd him to change those Opinions in which he had been first educated. Yet the Dispute was carry'd on with the same Insultings, that had been us'd the Day before; and in Conclusion the Prolocutor bid the Assembly cry out with him, Truth has the Victory! Latimer was brought out the third Day, who told them he was fourscore Years of Age, and had his Memory impair'd; and tho' he could not dispute with the Accuracy of some Men, yet his Faith was firmly founded on the Word of God. They seem'd more to laugh than to answer him; and during the whole Debates, the Noise and Disorder was such, that it look'd more like a Country Game, than a Dispute among Divines. At length the Committee of Convocation condemn'd them all, as obstinate Hereticks, and declar'd them to be no Members of the Church: They appeal'd from their Sentence to the Judgment of God, and express'd mighty Joy at the Hopes they had of glorifying God by Dying in his Cause. Cranmer sent a Petition to the Council, complaining of the Disorder of these Disputes, which were so manag'd, that the World might be abus'd with the Name of a Disputation: But this was not deliver'd, for the Design was to make the Nation believe, That the Champions of the Reformation were publicly baffled. It was also resolv'd to carry some of the Prisoners to Cambridge, and in the same Manner to erect new Trophies in that University, as they had done at Oxford. Upon which, three of the imprison'd Bishops, and seven Divines, sign'd a Paper, by which they declar'd, 'They would ingage in no Dispute, but in Writing; unless it were in the Presence of the Queen, or the Council, or before either of the Houses of Parliament. For it was visible, the Design of Disputing was not to find out the Truth; nor could they expect any fair Dealing, where their Enemies were to be their Judges, who would not suffer them to speak their Minds freely; and after so long an Imprisonment their Books and Papers being detain'd from them, they could not be furnish'd to answer many Things objected against them. Then they added a short Account of their Persuasions in the chief Points of Controversie, which they would be ready to defend on fair and equal Terms; and concluded with a Charge to all the People, 'Not to rebel against the Queen, but to obey all her Commands, that were not contrary to the Law of God.

Not long after, on the twentieth of July, Prince Philip with a numerous Fleet arriv'd at Southampton; and at his first Landing, he drew his Sword, and carry'd it for some Time naked in his Hand; which was interpreted as an Omen, that he design'd to rule by his Sword, but his Friends said, it signify'd, That he would draw his Sword for the Defence of the Nation. The Mayor of Southampton brought him the Keys of the Town, which he took from him, and return'd them, without the least Indication of his being pleas'd with this Respect shewn only to their Sovereign Prince; which being contrary to the Genius of the English Nation, which is always oblig'd at the gracious Smiles of their Kings, was thought a Sign of vast Pride and Moroseness. The Queen met him with a noble Train at Winchester, where Bishop Gardiner marry'd them with great Solemnity on the twenty fifth of July; he being then in the twenty seventh, and the Queen in the thirty eighth Year of her Age. Here the Emperor by his Ambassador resign'd to him his Titular Kingdom of Jerusalem, and his more valuable one of Naples: So that they were proclaim'd with a pompous Enumeration of all their Titles; at which Time they shew'd themselves publicly with two Swords born before them, in regard of their distinct Capacities. From Winchester they remov'd to Basing, and so to Wind- for, where on the fifth of August, he was solemnly install'd Knight of the Gar-ter. On the twelfth of the same Month, he made a magnificent Entry through the principal Streets of London, with all the Poms usual at a Coronation. The Triumphs of which Entertainment had continu'd longer, if the Court had not put on Mourning for the old Duke of Norfolk, who dy'd at Framingham Castle in September, to the great Sorrow of the Queen, who intirely lov'd him:

The Duke of

zabeth.

King Philip's fullen Gravity was very unacceptable to the English; who ever lov'd a Medium between the Stiffness of the Spaniard, and the Gaity of the French; but if they were not pleas'd with his Temper, they were extreamly in love with his Bounty and Wealth: For he brought over a vast Treasure with him, twenty Carts loaden with Bullion, and ninty nine Horses and two Carts loaden with coin'd Gold and Silver; the greatest Part of which was distributed among those who had sold their Country and Religion. At his Arrival at London, he procur'd the Pardon of many Prisoners, and among others, of Holgate Arch-Bishop of York; but his most popular Act was his Interposing for the Preservation of the Princess Elizabeth, and the Earl of Devonshire. Gardiner was much fix'd against them, and thought the Work but half finish'd, while the Princess liv'd: Wiat had accus'd them both, in hopes of saving his own Life; but when that did not preserve him, he publicly vindicated them on the Scaffold. The Earl of Devonshire, to be freed from all Jealousie, went beyond Sea, and dy'd a Year after in Italy, as some say, of Poison, being the eleventh and last Earl of that noble Family. King Philip at first took care to preserve the Princess, upon a generous Account, pitying her Innocence, and hoping by such a publick Act of Favour, to recommend himself to the Nation; but afterwards Interest fortify'd those good and wise Inclinations; for when he had lost Hopes of Issue from the Queen, he consider'd that the Queen of Scotland, soon after marry'd to the Dauphine, was next in Succession to Elizabeth; so that if she were removed, the Crown of England might become an Accession to that of France. Therefore he took particular Care to preserve her, and probably with Hopes to have prevail'd so far upon her, by these good Offices, that if her Sister should die without Children, she might be induc'd to marry him. But this was the only Act that was really grateful and acceptable to the Nation; for he affected such an extravagant State, and was so fullen and silent, that it was not easie for any to come within the Court, and there was no Access to him without demanding it with almost as much Formality as Ambassadors us'd to Foreign Princes: And indeed his Carriage was such, that the Acting him and his Spaniards was one of the great Diversions of Queen Elizabeth's Court. This and other Matters caus'd a general Discontent to spread through most Places of the Kingdom; only Gardiner was well satisfy'd, since the Conduct of Affairs was put so intirely into his Hands. Many malicious Reports were spread of the Queen, particularly in Norfolk; where it was reported that she was with Child before the King came over; which sensibly touch'd the Queen, but after strict Examinations, the Rumour vanish'd into Air.

The third Parliament in this Reign.

On the eleventh Day of November, the Queen's third Parliament met; and in the Writ of Summons, the Queen's Title of Supream Head of the Church was omitted; tho' hitherto she had not only us'd the Name, but exercis'd the Power to the highest Degree. Cardinal Pool was now permitted to come so near as Flanders; and the Temper of the Parliament being soon found favourable to the Work he was projecting, the Queen sent two Lords, Paget and Hastings, to conduct him into England. At the opening of the Parliament, both King and Queen rod in State to Westminster, each having a Sword of State, and a Cap of Maintenance carry'd before them. The first Bill that pass'd, was a Repeal of Pool's Attainder, which was read by the Commons three Times in one Day; and the Bill was perfected, without making a Session by

by a short Prorogation. He came over, and enter'd privately into London; for the Pope's Authority not being yet acknowledg'd, he could not be receiv'd as Legate. His Instructions were full and ample, besides the Authority commonly lodg'd with Legates; which consists in a Power to overthrow and dispense with almost all the Rules and Canons of the Church. He made his first Speech to the King and Queen, and then to the Parliament, in the Name of the common Pastor, lovingly inviting them to return to the Sheepfold of the Church. As he was delivering his plausible Speech, the Queen felt an unusual Emotion of Joy within her, which she judg'd to be a Child quickning in her Womb; which Belief being heighten'd by the flattering Court Ladies, the Council order'd Bishop Bonner to sing Te Deum at St. Paul's, which was succeeded with all the usual Marks of Exultation. Both Houses agreed upon an Address to the King and Queen, 'That they would intercede with the Legate, to reconcile them to the See of Rome; offering to repeal all the Laws they had made against the Pope's Authority, in Token of their Repentance. Upon this the Cardinal came to the Parliament; where in a long Speech he first thanked them for repealing his At-tainder, 'in Recompence of which, he came now to reconcile them to the Bo-dy of the Church: Then he insisted upon the Conversion of the Britains and Saxons to the Faith, on the Obedience they had paid to the Apostolick See, and the numerous Favours granted to the Crown by the same See, of which none was more Eminent than the Title of Defender of the Faith. The Ruin of the Greek Church, the Distractions of Germany, and the Confusions they had suffer'd, since their Departure from the Unity of the Church, might con-vince them of the Necessity of intirely preserving that Bond. In conclusion, he gave them and the whole Nation a Plenary Absolution, which all present receiv'd upon their Knees; and the rest of the Day was spent in singing Te De-um, and the Night in Bonfires.

ament reconciles the Nation to the See of Rome,

Shortly after the famous Act pass'd, repealing all Laws made against the Pope's Authority, only it met with a small Impediment, by Reason of a Pro-viso, which the House of Lords inserted for some Lands, which the Lord Wentworth had of the See of London. This was so much oppos'd by the Com-mons, that after the Bill had been offer'd to the Royal Assent, it was boldly cut out of the Parchment by Gardiner, who said, Now I truly do the Office of a CHANCELLOR; alluding to the Word Cancelling, from whence he would have the Word CHANCELLOR deriv'd. 'The Bill enumerated and repeal'd all Acts made since the twentieth of Henry VIII. but all Foundations of Bishopricks and Cathedrals, all Marriages, tho' contrary to the Laws of the Church, all In-stitutions, all Judicial Processes, and the Settlements made, either of Church or Abby-Lands, were confirm'd. The Convocation had join'd their Intercession with the Cardinal, that he would confirm the Right of the present Possessors of those Lands: Upon which he did confirm them, but with a heavy Charge, requiring those who had any of the Churches Goods, to remember the Judgments of God upon such Detainers; and that at least, they would take Care that such as serv'd the Cures should be sufficiently maintain'd: All which was put into the Act, and confirm'd by it; and it was declar'd that all Suits concerning those Lands were to be try'd in the Civil Courts; and that it should be a Premunire, if any disturb'd the Possessors, by the Pretence of Ecclesiastical Power. It was also declar'd, That the Title of Supream Head of the Church, did never of Right belong to the Crown, and enacted that it should be left out of all Writs for the future. All Exemptions granted to Monasteries, and now continu'd in Lay-Hands, were taken away; and all Churches were made subject to Episcopal Jurisdiction, excepting only the Privileges of the Universities, Westminster, Windfor and the Tower of London. The Statute of Mortmain was repeal'd for twenty Years to come; and all Things were brought back to the State in which they were, in the twentieth Year of Henry VIII. The lower House of Convocation gave Occasion to many Clauses in this Act, relating to the Restoration of Tithes, pealing all the burning of Heretical Books, to Pluralities and Non-Residence, to Simonical Pactions, the Payments of First-Fruits and Tenths, and the Limitation of Premunires. By another Bill all former Acts against Lollards were reviv'd. The Commons offer'd another Bill for voiding of all Leafes made by marry'd Priests, but it was laid aside by the Lords; and thus were the Pensioners and aspiring Men in the House of Commons, either labouring to redeem former Faults, or hoping to merit great Rewards by the Forwardness of their Zeal. By another Bill several Things were made Treason; and it was declar'd, 'That if the Queen dy'd before the King, and left any Children, the King should have the Government in his Hands, 'till they were of Age; and during that Time, the Conspiracy his Death was made Treason, but none were to be try'd for Words, 'but within six Months after they were spoken. Another Act pass'd, declaring it Treason, for any to pray for the Queen's Death, unless they repented of it, and then they were to suffer Corporal Punishment at the Judges Discretion. A severe Act was also pass'd against all that spread lying Reports of the King, the Queen, the Peers, Judges, or great Officers: Some were to lose their Hands, others their Ears, and the rest were to be fin'd according to the Degree of their Offence.

Other Acts.

The Parliament dissolv'd.

All the Bills being finish'd, this remarkable Parliament was dissolv'd upon the sixteenth Day of January, to the great Satisfaction of Bishop Gardiner, who had now perform'd all he had undertaken to the Queen or Emperor; and his Reputation was much rais'd for bringing about so vast a Change in so small a Time, and with so little Opposition. Ambassadors were sent to Rome to give Notice of the happy Restoration of England to that See; and a solemn Procession was appointed of many Bishops and Priests, where Bonner carry'd the Host to thank God for reconciling the Nation to St. Peter's Chair: And this having been done upon St. Andrew's Day, that was appointed to be an Anniversary, and was call'd, The Feast of the Reconciliation.

A Persecution begun.

IV. The Queen and her Favourites, having now obtain'd their main Cause, they took it into Consideration in what Methods they ought to proceed against the Hereticks. Pool was an Enemy to severe Proceedings, he thought that a Churchman ought to have the Tenderness of a Father, and the Care of a Shepherd, whose Duty it is to reduce and not devour the stray Sheep: He had observ'd that Cruelty rather inflam'd than cur'd that Distemper; therefore he thought the better Way was to begin with an effectual Reformation of the Manners of the Clergy. Gardiner on the other side, being of an abject and cruel Temper himself, thought that the strict Execution of the Laws against Lollards would be most serviceable to the Church; tho' he confess'd that a Reformation of the Clergy was a good Thing, but then he thought the present Times would not bear it. The Queen was for joining both these Councils together, and design'd to proceed at the same Time, both against scandalous Churchmen, and Hereticks: So that in a short Time the Persecution began, in the latter End of the Month of January. Rogers, a learned Man, who had been Prebendary of St. Paul's, was the first Victim, who would not fly from Persecution, tho' he was strongly induc'd by a Wife and Family of ten Children. Both he and Bishop Hooper were brought before Gardiner, Bonner, Tonsall, and three other Bishops. They demanded of them whether they would submit to the Church or not? but they answer'd, That they look'd upon the Church of Rome, as Antichristian. Upon which Gardiner charg'd them with reproaching the Queen; but Rogers declar'd, That he honour'd the Queen, and expected no Ill at her Hands, but as she was excited by them. This caus'd Gardiner and the other Bishops to declare, That they were so far from exciting the Queen in this Matter; that she had commanded them to act as they did; and this was confirm'd by two Privy-Counsellors then present. In Conclusion, after a little Time allow'd them, they declar'd them obstinate Hereticks, and so degraded them from their their Functions. Rogers was not permitted to see his Wife nor his Children; yet so little did his terrible Sentence of Burning fright him, that the Morning of his Execution, he was found in a quiet and calm Sleep. He was carry'd from Newgate to Smithfield, on the fourth of February, where a Pardon was offer'd him at the Stake, if he would recant; but he refus'd it upon those Terms, and answer'd, He would not exchange a short Fire for everlasting Burnings, declaring, That he resign'd up his Life with Joy, as a Testimony of the Doctrine he had preach'd. As for Hooper, he was sent to Glocester, his former Bishoprick, at which he greatly rejoic'd, for he hop'd by his Death to confirm many in that Place. He discours'd with several whom he had formerly known, and some of them melted into Tears, which much affected the Bishop, who said, All he had suffer'd in his Imprisonment had not mov'd him so much. On the ninth of February he was brought to the Stake, where a Pardon was also offer'd him, but to no Effect. While he was burning a great Wind blew and hinder'd the Flame from rising so high as to choak him, or destroy his Vitals; so that he was near three Quarters of an Hour in exquisite Torment: But he still continu'd calling on God, and at last cry'd out, Lord Jesus receive my Spirit. Sanders, Minister of Coventry, and Taylor Minister of Hadley in Suffolk, were at the same Time condemn'd, and sent to be burnt at the Places where they had serv'd: The former was first committed for Preaching without a Licence, after the Queen's Prohibition; and the latter for opposing some Priests, who violently broke into the Church, and said Mass in it.

Gardiner was now in hopes that these four Executions being made in several Parts of England, would have struck such a general Terror into the whole Party, that there would have been little Occasion for further Severities: But when he saw six more apprehended on the same Account, and that the Spirits of those call'd Hereticks, were now rather inflam'd than depress'd, he resolv'd to concern himself no farther in those Trials; and turn'd over that Judicious Task to Bonner, whose Temper was so cruel and brutal, that he chearfully undertook it, tho' the Nation stood amaz'd at these Proceedings. He had for some Months kept one Tomkins a Weaver in his House, who was found to doubt of the Real Presence; for which he us'd several Cruelties to him, as the tearing out the Hair of his Beard, and the holding a Candle to his Hand, 'till the Veins and Sinews bust asunder: And these not prevailing to make a Change, he was at last burnt in Smithfield. One Hunter, an Apprentice, not above nineteen Years of Age, was condemn'd and burnt on the same Account; whom Bonner was so much concern'd to preserve, that he offer'd him forty Pounds to change his Faith; so mercenary did he imagine were the Consciences of some Men. Two Gentlemen, Causton, and Higbed, one Laurence a Priest, and two meaner Persons, were burnt near their own Houses in Essex. The Method in these and in all other Proceedings, during the rest of this Reign, was summary, and ex officio: Upon Complaint made, Persons were imprison'd, and Articles were offer'd to them, which they were requir'd to answer; and if their Answers were judg'd Heretical, they were burnt without any further Objections, or Proofs against them. Ferrar, who had been Bishop of St. David's, was treated in the same Manner, by his Successor Morgan; and tho' he appeal'd to Cardinal Pool, it had no other Effect, but stopping his Execution three Weeks. Rawlins White, a poor Fisherman, was condemn'd by the Bishop of Landaffe, and afterwards burnt. Marth, a Priest, was burnt at Chester; and to the ordinary Cruelty of Burning, they added a new Invention of pouring melted Pitch on his Head. One Flower, a rash and inconsiderate Man, wounded a Priest, while he was officiating at Westminster; for which he was condemn'd as a Heretick, and burnt: But the Fact was disapprov'd by all the Reformed, and he became a sincere Penitent for it, before he dy'd. After this, for the Space of a few Weeks, there was a Stop put to these Severities, which gave the most terrible Apprehensions to the Nation.

The

The Queen
restores the Church-Lands.

The Queen, to testify her real Zeal, about this Time sent for her Treasurer, and some other Officers of her Revenue, and told them, That she thought her self bound in Conscience to restore all the Lands of the Church, that were then in her Hands: And if it should be objected, that the Crown was poor, and that she could not maintain her Dignity without them, she declar'd, That she valu'd the Salvation of her Soul more than ten Kingdoms, and thank'd God that her Husband was of the same Mind. She thought they were unlawfully acquir'd, and that they could not be held without Sin, therefore she resolv'd they should be dispos'd as Cardinal Pool should think fit. To this she was much excited by a Bull of Excommunication against such as detain'd Church-Lands, issu'd out by Pope Julius this Year. That Pope dy'd shortly after, and was succeeded by Marcellus; who turn'd his Thoughts wholly to the Reformation of Abuses, of which he was so sensible, that he once cry'd out, That he did not see how any could be sav'd who sat in that Chair! Which had such Effects upon him, that he dy'd within twenty two Days after his Election. Upon his Death, the Queen endeavour'd for the Promotion of Cardinal Pool, but without his Knowledge or Approbation: But at Rome they were so apprehensive of another reforming Pope, that they hasten'd their Election, and set up Caraffa, call'd Paul the Fourth, who was the most ambitious and insolent Pope, that had reign'd for many Years. Upon the Day of his Election, the English Ambassadors enter'd Rome in great State with a Train of a hundred and forty Horse of their own Attendance; but the Pope would not admit them to an Audience, 'till they had accepted of a Grant of the Title of the Kingdom of Ireland from himself; to which they fervilely submitted. Their publick Audience was given with great Solemnity, in which the Pope declar'd, That in Token of his pardoning the Nation, he had added to the Crown the Title of the Kingdom of Ireland, by that Supream Power which God had given him to destroy, or erect Kingdoms at his Pleasure. But in private Discourses, he so much complain'd of the unpardonable Sin of Detaining the Abby-Lands, and was so positive in the Restitution of them, that it extremely mortify'd the Lord Mountacute, who was one of the Ambassadors, and whose Estate chiefly consisted in those Lands.

The Queen's Delivery in vain expected.

In England the Court was now in mighty Expectations of the Queen's Delivery; and in May, the Envoys were nam'd that were to carry the good News to the neighbouring Courts. In the Beginning of June she was believ'd to be in Labour, and the Report flew all over London that she had brought forth a Son. The Priests had settled all their Hopes on that, so that Te Deum was sung in all Parts; and one more officious than the rest, made a Sermon about it, and describ'd all the Lineaments of their young Prince. But they soon found they were abus'd; and that it was either an Abortion, or a Timpany, or some other Distemper; or, as some have been ready to judge, a notorious Imposture, but defeated by the Vigilance of King Philip. However it was, from this Time all Hopes of Issue ceas'd, which much encreas'd the Sourness and Severity of her Temper; and King Philip, being so much younger than her, out of Aversion or Repentment, never esteem'd her, but in a few Months left her and the Nation. He found it was impossible to get England into his Possession without Children, therefore he gave over all Designs about it; and having liv'd with her about fifteen Months, he thought it necessary to take more Care of his Hereditary, than his Matrimonial Crown, and for the future consider'd England rather as a sure Ally, than an additional Power. Not long after his Great Father, the Emperor Charles the Fifth, resign'd all his Dominions to him; which Resignation drew the wondring Eyes of all Europe upon it. This mighty Prince had enjoy'd his Hereditary Dominions forty Years, and the Empire thirty six: He had indur'd vast Fatigues, by the numerous Journeys he had made; nine into Germany, six into Spain, seven into Italy, four through France: He was ten Times in the Netherlands, made two Expeditions into Africa

Africa, was twice in England, and had cross'd the Sea eleven Times. He had unusual Success in his Wars; he had taken a Pope, a King of France, and some German Princes, Prisoners; and had a prodigious Accession of Wealth and Empire from the West-Indies. But now being much afflicted with the Gout, his Fortune chang'd, and several Designs blasted, he declar'd, That there ought to be an Interval between the Affairs of the World, and the Hour of Death; he resign'd all his Dominions with a Greatness of Mind, much superior to his Conquests. He liv'd a retir'd religious Life, with a hundred thousand Crowns Pension; and at the end of two Years dy'd, having given the World a great Instance of a Mind surfeited with Human Glory, that sought for Quiet in a private Cell, which in vain it had search'd after in Camps and Palaces.

In England Orders were sent to the Justices to look narrowly to the Preachers of Heresie, and to have secret Spies in every Parish, for giving them Information of all Peoples Behaviour. This was thought to rise from Spanish Counsels, which became very odious to the People, who grew so averse to these cruel Proceedings, that Bonner himself finding their Temper, slack'd his Hand, and burnt none for five Weeks. Upon which the Queen wrote to him, and requir'd him to perform the Office of a good Pastor, and either to reclaim the Hereticks, or proceed against them according to Law. This Admonition prov'd very agreeable to his cruel Disposition; and immediately new Fires were kindled. Cardmaker, once a Prebendary of Bath, and Warne a Tradesman, were burnt in Smithfield. Seven were burnt in several Parts of Essex, who were condemn'd by Bonner, and sent down to suffer near the Places of their Abode. The Council wrote to the chief Men of the County, to gather many together, and assist at those dismal Spectacles; and when they heard that some had come of their own accord to the Burnings at Colchester, they desir'd the Lord Rich to give their Thanks to those Persons for their Zeal; so industriously did they study to cherish a Spirit of Cruelty among the People. Bradford, who had generously sav'd Bourne the Preacher at St. Paul's, was notwithstanding condemn'd; and after many Methods us'd by the chief of the Popish Party to make him recant, he suffer'd at Smithfield with great Joy and a noble Constancy, together with a young Apprentice, whom he much encourag'd in his Sufferings. Thorn-ton, Harpfield and others, rais'd a Persecution at Canterbury, tho' Cardinal Pool was averse to such Proceedings; but he durst not now discover so much, for the Pope had an inveterate Hatred to him, and was resolv'd to recal him upon the first Occasion, and for that End he enter'd into a Correspondence with Gardiner, who now hop'd to have been made a Cardinal, and Arch-Bishop of Canterbury: And upon those Hopes, he still preserv'd Cranmer; for tho' he now stood condemn'd for Heresie, yet the See was not accounted void, till he was formally degraded. Some declar'd it was most proper to begin with him, who had been the chief Promoter of Heresie in England: But Gardiner said, it was better to try if it were possible to shake him, and it would be a mighty Blow to the whole Party, if he could be prevail'd on to forsake it; whereas if he suffer'd Burning with the same Resolution that others express'd, it would much raise the Spirits of his Followers. The See of Canterbury was now only sequester'd in Pool's Hands, and he fearing to fall under the Pope's Rage, was forc'd to suffer the cruel Prebendaries of that Church to act as they pleas'd: So they burnt two Priests, and two Lay-men at Canterbury, and sent a Man and a Woman to be burnt in other Places in Kent. Two that belong'd to the Dioceses of Winchester and Chichester were condemn'd by Bonner, and were burnt near the Places of their Abode. These suffer'd in July. In August seven were burnt in several Places; six more were burnt in one Fire at Canterbury, and four were burnt elsewhere. In September five were burnt at Canterbury, and seven in other Places. In October, two were burnt at Ely, by Shaxton's Means, who now compleated his Apostacy by his Cruelty.

Thus

The Sufferings of Bishop Ridley and Latimer at Oxford.

Thus did the Persecution rage in several Places, to the great Terror and Detestation of the People; but the most memorable Sufferers this Year were the two famous Bishops Ridley and Latimer. Three Bishops, Lincoln, Glocester and Bristol were sent to Oxford with a Commission from Cardinal Pool to proceed against them. Ridley said, he paid great Respect to Pool, for his Royal Extract and his Abilities, but as he was the Pope's Legate, he would show no Reverence to him, nor be uncover'd before any that acted by his Authority. After a long Discourse, and several Arguments, and a Night's Consideration granted them, they were condemn'd as obstinate Hereticks, and deliver'd to the secular Arm, and the Writs were sent down for their Burning. The Night before the Execution, Ridley was very joyful, and invited the Mayor and his Wife to be at his Wedding next Day: At which, when the Mayor's Wife melted into Tears, he said, He perceiv'd she did not love him, but told her, Tho' his Breakfast would be sharp, he was sure his Supper would be sweet; and was glad to hear that his Sister would come and see him die; and continu'd in such Composure of Mind, that they were all amaz'd at it. As they were led out to Execution, they earnestly cast their Eyes up to Cranmer's Window in the Prison, hoping to have seen him; but he was then engag'd with some Friars: Yet he look'd after them with the utmost Tenderneſs, and kneeling down pray'd earnestly, That God would now strengthen their Faith and Patience in their last painful Passage. When they came to the Stake before Baliol College, they imbrac'd each other with great Affection, and Ridley said, Be of good Courage, Brother, for God will assuage the Flame, or enable us to abide it. Smith preach'd the Sermon, and compar'd their Dying in this Manner, to that of Judas, who hang'd himself. Ridley desir'd leave to answer some Points in his Sermon; but it was told him, That he was not to be suffer'd to speak, except he design'd to recant: So he turn'd himself to God, when he saw Men so unreasonable to him. He sent a Petition to the Queen in Behalf of the Tenants of the Bishoprick of London, from whom he had taken Fines, for which they had renew'd their Leases; and pray'd that either their Leases might be confirm'd, or their Fines restor'd out of those Goods which had been seiz'd when he was first imprison'd. Then they both pray'd, and fitted themselves for the Stake; Latimer crying to Ridley, Be of good Comfort, we shall this Day light such a Candle in England, as by God's Grace shall never be extinguish'd. Being thus prepar'd, and Gun-powder hang'd about their Bodies, the Wood was fired, which soon put Latimer out of his Pain; but Ridley had a more lingring Torment: For they threw on so much Wood, that it was long before the Flame broke through it, and his Legs were almost consum'd, before his Vitals were affected. Thus triumphantly did these two excellent Bishops end their Days and their Ministry: Ridley was esteem'd one of the Ablest of all that promoted the Reformation, both for Piety, Learning and Solidity of Judgment: The other, who was eighty Years of Age, was regarded as a truly Primitive Bishop, who seem'd to have more of the Simplicity of the first Ages, than the Politeneſs or Learning of the latter Times.

*Bishop Gardiner's

It was particularly observ'd that Gardiner was very impatient to have these Bishops burnt, and he staid long for Dinner that Day, 'till he understood that the Fire was actually kindled. When the Messengers arriv'd at four in the Afternoon, he went cheerfully to dine: But at Dinner he was struck with a remarkable Illneſs, which turn'd to a terrible Suppression of Urine, and held him many Days 'till he dy'd on the twelfth of November. He went twice to the Parliament, which was open'd the twenty first of October, but after that was confin'd to his House: He express'd great Sorrow and Remorse for his former Life, and often cry'd out, I have err'd like St. Peter, but not repented as he did! Thus dy'd this remarkable Man, who was believ'd to be of noble Extraction, tho' basely born; for his true Father was suppos'd to be Richard Woodvill, Brother to Edward the Fourth's Queen, who was Grand-Mother to Henry the Eighth. He was a Man well skill'd in the Canon and Civil Laws, and moderately in Divinity; he had a good Stile in Latin, and understood Greek well; but his great Strength lay in a profound Dissimulation, a Quickness of Apprehension, a nice Prospect of Affairs, an artificial Concealment of his Mind, and a subtle Way of Insinuating himself into the Credit and Affections of other Persons. He had certainly brought about great Designs; and now when a Cardinal's Hat was just falling upon his Head, Heaven stopp'd him in his Carreer, and all his Ambitious Projects fell with him. Only the Consequences of his Cruelty did not cease; for three Persons were burnt in one Fire at Canterbury in November; and the famous Philpot was burnt in Smithfield in December. In all, there were sixty seven burnt this Year, of whom four were Bishops, and thirteen Priests.

A new Parliament was now assembled, by which it appear'd Mens Minds were much alienated from the Clergy, and also from the Queen, whose Desire was to restore them to great Wealth and Power. It was propos'd to give the Queen a Subsidy, and two Fifteenths: Which was the first Aid that the Queen had ask'd, tho' she was now in the third Year of her Reign; and what was desir'd, was no more than she might have exacted at her first coming to the Crown. Therefore since she had forgiven so much at her Coronation, it seem'd unreasonable to deny it at this Time; yet still great Oppositions were made against it: Many said the Queen was impoverishing the Crown, and giving away the Abby-Lands, and therefore she ought to be supply'd from the Clergy, and not press upon the Laity: But it was answer'd, That the Convocation had given her six Shillings in the Pound, but that would not answer her present Necessities, upon which the Debate became violent; but to prevent further Heats, the Queen sent a Message declaring she would accept the Subsidy without the Fifteenths, and upon that it was granted. The Queen sent for the Speaker of the House of Commons, and told him She could not with a good Conscience exact the Tenths and First-Fruits of the Clergy, since they were given to her Father to support his unlawful Dignity of being the Supream Head of the Church: She also thought, That all Tithes and Impropriations were the Patrimony of the Church, and therefore was resolv'd to resign such of them as were in her own Hands. The former Part, as to Tenths and First-Fruits, The Queen gives up the Tenths and First Fruits. easily pass'd in the House, but great Opposition was made to the latter Part of her Motion; for it was thought to be a Step towards taking all Impropriations out of the Hands of the Laity; yet upon a Division of the House, it was carry'd by sixty seven Voices. A Bill was brought in against the Dutcheffs of Suffolk, and several Reformers, who had gone beyond Sea to enjoy their Consciences, requiring them to return under severe Penalties: The Lords pass'd it, but the Commons threw it out; for they now began to repent of the severe Laws they had formerly made, and were resolv'd to add no more. They also rejected another Bill, for incapacitating some to be Justices of the Peace, who were blam'd for their Remissness in prosecuting Hereticks. An Act was brought in for debarring one Bennet Smith, who hired some Assassins to commit a most execrable Murder, from the Benefit of the Clergy, which by Common Law would have sav'd him. In this Parliament there was such a Heat in the House of Commons, that Sir Anthony Kingston, an active Member, boldly took the Keys of the House from the Serjeant; but when the Parliament was dissolv'd, on the ninth of September, he was for that sent to the Tower, but soon after releas'd. The Parliament dissolv'd. The next Year he and six others were accus'd of a Design to rob the Exchequer; for which they were all hang'd besides himself, who dy'd before his Trial. In the Convocation, Cardinal Pool made some laudable Attempts to reform the ill Lives and Practices of the Clergy, in which he was oppos'd by Pope Paul, who endeavour'd to have set up an Inquisition in England; and the Cardinal has been much commended for refusing at this Time all Incouragement in England to the new Order of Jesuits, who were making great Pretensions to gain Possession of the Abby-Lands.

Cranmer's Sufferings.

In the Beginning of the following Year, the great Victim Cranmer was offer'd up to the Zeal and Rage of the Romish Party. Towards the effecting of this, in September last, Brooks Bishop of Glocester came down to Oxford, with Authority from Cardinal Pool, to judge him; with Brooks two Delegates, Martin and Scory, were sent to assist him in the King and Queen's Name. When he was brought before them in St. Mary's Church, he pay'd the Respect that was due to those who sat in the King and Queen's Name, but would shew none to Brooks, Since he sat there by an Authority deriv'd from the Pope, which he would never acknowledge. After that he learnedly discours'd against the Power and Usurpations of the See of Rome. Brooks and the two Delegates objected many Things against him, as to his former Actions; to all which he gave distinct and modest Answers. After much Discourse had pass'd on both Sides, Brooks requir'd him to appear before the Pope within eighty Days, and answer to such Things as should be objected against him. He said, He would go most willingly, with the King and Queen's Consent, which he could not possibly do, if he was still detain'd Prisoner. But the Pope not expecting his coming, in less than twenty Days, by Letters to the King and Queen, commanded that he should receive Condemnation, and be deliver'd to the Secular Arm. Therefore in February, this Year, new Powers were granted by the Pope to Bonner and Thirleby, who were sent to Oxford publicly to degrade him from all Things relating to his Function. In Derision he was cloth'd with all the Pontifical Robes made of Canvas; which were taken from him, according to the Ceremonies of Degradation, in which Bonner proceeded with all the Insolence and Scorn that could arise from a Mind fill'd with Revenge; but Thirleby perform'd his Part in the Ceremony, with great Expressions of Sorrow, and many Tears. In all this Cranmer seem'd very little concern'd: He declar'd, It was a gross Piece of Injustice to condemn him for not going to Rome, when he was shut up in Prison; but he was not sorry to be thus cut off, with all this Pageantry, from any Relation to that Church: He deny'd the Pope had any Authority over him, so appeal'd from this Sentence to a free General Council.

He is degraded.

But now numerous Engines were employ'd, to persuade him to recant: Both English and Spanish Divines had many Conferences with him; he was remov'd from Prison to the Dean's Lodgings at Christ-Church; he was put in hopes of Life, of Preferments and all other Favours; and all the Arguments that could be invented were us'd to procure him to sign a Paper they had prepar'd for him. In Conclusion, as St. Peter himself had with Curses deny'd his Master, so he who resisted almost three Years, was at last overcome; and human Infirmary, the Fears of Death, and Hopes given him, prevail'd with him to sign a Recantation of all former Opinions, concluding it with a Protestation, That he had done it freely, only for the Discharge of his Conscience. This was the most unfortunate Blemish of his whole Life, which was immediately Printed, to the wonderful Surprize and Dejection of all his Party. But this did not satisfy the furious Queen, who was resolv'd still to make him a Sacrifice to all her Resentments: She said, That his Repentance was good for his Soul; but since he had been the chief Diffacer of Heresie over the Nation, it was necessary to make him a publick Example. Therefore a Writ was sent down to burn him; and after some Stop had been made in the Execution of it, new Orders came out for doing it suddenly. This was kept from Cranmer's Knowledge; for they design'd to have carry'd him to the Stake without giving him any Notice, and so hop'd to make him die in a despairing Condition. Yet having some Suspicion of their Design, he wrote a long Paper, containing a Confession of his Faith, such as had been dictated purely by his Conscience, and not his Fears.

He recants.

The twenty first of March being fix'd for his Execution, he was brought to St. Mary's Church, and set in a conspicuous Seat erected for that Purpose; where Cole Provost of Eaton, preach'd the Sermon, 'In which he exhorted him to persist in the Faith, of which he had lately publish'd a Confession, and even to Death it self, which was the Will of the Magistrate to inflict on him this Day; since the Divine Vengeance for the Execution of More and Fisher, under King Henry, could not otherwise be expiated. And since his Conversion was the immediate Hand of Heaven, nothing could be more acceptable to God and all good Men, than a publick Declaration of the Reality of it. It is no wonder that he was thrown into the utmost Consternation at such an unexpected Denunciation: But recollecting himself, and rousing his former Courage, he boldly stood up, and made an excellent Speech to the People, 'In which having premis'd many Things concerning Reformation of Life and Morals, he exactly declar'd the principal Heads of his Faith and Doctrine, affirming, 'That the Kingdom of Anti-Christ was contain'd and establish'd in the Power of the Pope; and finally representing how hainously he had offended God by renouncing the Truth, he declar'd this surprizing Resolution, That the same Right Hand that had so impiously err'd in subscribing his Recantation, should be the first Sufferer in the Flames. This caus'd a vast Confusion in the Assembly; and some calling to him to dissemble no more, he cry'd out, That he ever lov'd Simplicity, and excepting that Instance, he never dissimled in his Life. Upon which, without suffering him to proceed, with great Clamours and Revilings, they immediately hurry'd him to the Place of Execution, which was the same where Ridley and Latimer had suffer'd. Here he stood, the most melancholy and piercing Spectacle in the World; the Primate of all England, lately flourishing in the highest Honours and Authority with Princes, venerable for his Person and Age, his Piety and Learning, and innumerable Excellencies of Mind, now by the Malice of the Romanists, dress'd in a ridiculous old Habit, baited with Scurrility and opprobrious Jest, and drag'd to a most inhuman and tormenting Death. When the Fire was kindled, he stretch'd out his Right Hand into the Flame, and with an amazing Steadiness held it 'till it was consum'd; sometimes saying That unworthy Hand! and often crying, Lord Jesus receive my Spirit, 'till he quite expir'd in the Torment. 'Tho' his Body was consum'd to Ashes, his Heart was found intire and untouch'd; which remarkable Accident was much observ'd, and if it had happen'd to one of the contrary Party, it would have caus'd his Canonization.

He recovers again.

He is burnt at Oxford.

Thus dy'd the famous Thomas Cranmer, in the sixty seventh Year of his Age, and the twenty third of his Primacy: A Person rais'd up by God for mighty Services, and truly fitted for them by his Primitive Humility, his indefatigable Industry, and his inviolable Friendship. His last Fall was nobly expiated by a patient Martyrdom; and those who compar'd ancient and modern Times, did not only liken him to Chrysostom, Ambrose and Austin, the Glories of the Church in the fourth and fifth Centuries, but to the more immediate Followers of the Apostles, Ignatius, Polycarp, and Cyprian. No Man had pass'd through more numerous Difficulties for above twenty Years than himself, which has given Occasion to many to charge him with too much Obsequiousness and Compliance, in which perhaps he cannot be strictly vindicated, no more than his burning of Joan of Kent and Van Parre for Heretical Opinions, for which some think his own Death was a Judgment upon him. But this must be confess'd for him, and the other chief Reformers, that they were really Men, and had Mixtures of Fear and Human Infirmities with their other excellent Qualities: And indeed Cranmer was in all other Points such an extraordinary Person, that perhaps it was fit there should be some Ingredients in his Temper, to lessen the Veneration, which his uncommon Worth might have rais'd too high, if it had not been for those Feeblenesses, which upon some Occasions appear'd in him. On the Day after Cranmer's Execution, Cardinal Pool was consecrated Arch-Bishop of Canterbury; which gave Occasion to many to apply the Words of Elijah to him, Thou hast kill'd, and taken Possession. Great Numbers burnt this Year.

This Year prov'd as black and dismal as the last by the Numbers that were sacrific'd in Flames to the Romish Cruelty. In January, five Men and two Women were burnt at one Stake in Smithfield; and one Man and four Women were burnt at Canterbury. In March two Women were burnt at Ipswich, and three Men at Salisbury. In April six Essex Men were burnt in Smithfield; a Man and a Woman were burnt at Rocheſter, and another at Canterbury; and six who were sent from Colcheſter, were condemn'd by Bonner, without giving them more than the Afternoon to conſider of a Recantation: For he was now ſo harden'd in his Cruelty, that he grew weary of keeping his Priſoners, and uſing of Perſuaſions; ſo he ſent them back to Colcheſter, where they were burnt. He alſo condemn'd both a blind Man and an aged Cripple, and they were both burnt in the ſame Fire at Stratford. In May, three Women were burnt in Smithfield; and ſoon after two more at Gloceſter, one of them being blind. Three were burnt at Beccles in Suffolk; five were burnt at Lewes, and one at Leiceſter. But in June, Bonner gave the moſt ſignal Inſtance of his Cruelty that England had yet ſeen; for eleven Men and two Women were burnt in the ſame Fire at Stratford: The Horror of which Action ſeem'd to have ſome Operation on him, for he burnt none 'till April in the next Year. In June three were burnt at St. Edmund's Bury, and three afterwards at Newbury. This Cruelty was not confin'd to England, but it extended as far as the adjacent Iſlands: For in Guernſey, a Mother and her two Daughters were burnt at the ſame Stake: One of them was a marry'd Woman and big with Child; the Violence of the Fire burſting her Belly, the Child fell out into the Flame, which was ſnatch'd out by one more merciful than the reſt; but the other barbarous Spectators threw it back into the Fire. Two were after this burnt at Greenſtead, and a blind Woman at Darby; four were burnt at Briſtoll, and as many at Mayfield in Suffex, and one at Nottingham. So that eighty five were martyr'd this Year, without any Regard had to Age or Sex, to young or old, to Lame or Blind; which rais'd ſuch an extream Averſion in the Nation to that Religion, that it is no Wonder, if the Apprehenſions of ſo dreadful a Yoke, broke out into moſt violent and convulſive Symptoms. Yet by theſe Means the Reformation was ſo far from being extinguiſh'd, that it daily ſpread more and more, and mightily quicken'd the Zeal of thoſe who profeſs'd it. They had frequent Meetings, and ſeveral Teachers that instructed them; and their Friends that went beyond Sea, and ſettled in Strasburg, Frankfort, Emden, and ſome other Places in Germany, took care to ſend over many uſeful Books for their Comfort and Inſtruction.

New Proceſſes for Perſecuti-ons.

Nor was the Rage and Fury of theſe Times exercis'd only on the Living; for the Bones of Martin Bucer and Paul Phagiſius, who had been long bury'd, were dug up, formally arraign'd for Herſie, and with much ſavage Ceremony publickly burnt in the Market-Place at Cambridge. Peter Martyr's Wife, who dy'd at Oxford, was likewiſe rak'd out of her Grave, and ignominiouſly bury'd in a Dunghil. But the Juſtices of Peace were generally ſo ſlack in their Proſecution of Hereticks, that it ſeem'd neceſſary to find out other Inſtruments; ſo the dreadful Courts of Inquiſition were deſign'd to be ſet up in England. As a Step towards it, a Commiſſion was given to Bonner and twenty more, moſt of them Laymen, to ſearch all over England for Perſons ſuſpected of Herſie, and to proceed againſt them by Pretentments or any other politick Ways. Many other Commiſſions, ſubaltern to theirs, were iſſu'd out for ſeveral Counties and Dioceſes; which was look'd upon as ſuch an Advance towards an Inquiſition, that all concluded it would ſhortly follow. Burnings were carry'd on furiously in some Places, but coldly in most Parts, for the Detestation of such Cruelties became almost universal. However, without naming Particulars, seventy nine were burnt this Year, in several Parts of the Nation, besides Imprisonments and other Punishments and Severeties. But all this Cruelty did not satisfy the Popish Clergy, they complain'd that the Magistrates were remiss; and negligently perform'd their Duties; upon which sharp Letters were written to several Towns, from the Council-Board; and zealous Men were recommended to be chosen Mayors, in many Corporations. Arch-Bishop Pool was for milder Methods, and was ready to accept of any Acknowledgment from the prosecuted Persons, by which he might on the one Hand preserve their Lives, and yet not be expos'd to the Rage of the Pope, as a Favourer of Hereticks on the other.

Many more Burnings.

In this Year a horrible Murder of one Argol and his Son was committed by the Lord Stourton, and some of his Servants; who when they had butcher'd them after a most barbarous Manner, bury'd them fifteen Foot deep in the Ground. The Lord Stourton was a zealous Papist, and protested against all the Acts that had pass'd in King Edward's Reign; yet the Queen not only refus'd to pardon him, but would not so much as change the infamous Death of Hanging into a Beheading. She was resolv'd to shew no Favour, but only allow'd this Distinction, that the Lord might be hang'd in a silken Rope, while his Servants had common Halters. This was highly extoll'd as a worthy Instance of the Queen's Impartial Justice; and it was said, 'That since she left her Friends to the Law, her Enemies had no Reason to complain of the Execution of it upon them.'

V. As this Reign had been furious and calamitous at home, so at length it began to show it self feeble and dishonourable abroad; all which had its first Rise from the vast Pride and Insolence of the Pope, who the last Year broke the Truce between France and Spain. He was highly offended at the House of Austria, and principally at Ferdinand's assuming the Title of Emperor, without his particular Consent: He was wont to say, That all Kingdoms were subject to him: That he would suffer no Prince to be too familiar with him; and that he would set the World on Fire, rather than submit to act below his Dignity. It was believ'd that he design'd to advance one of his Nephews to the Crown of Naples, in order to which he had sent another into France, to absolve the King from the Truce which he had sworn, promising to create what Cardinals that King should nominate, if he would make War upon Spain; tho' to the Queen of England's Ambassadors, and all others at Rome, he declar'd, That he would mediate a Peace between the Crowns, for a Truce did not sufficiently secure the Quiet of Europe. The French King was too easily persuaded by the Intigation of the Pope, and the House of Guise, to break his Faith, and begin the War. The Pope began it in Italy, and made some Levies among the Grisons, that were Hereticks; but he said, He esteem'd them as Angels, and was confident that God would convert them. It gave great Scandal to the World to see the Pope himself exciting so perfidious a Breach of Truce; and no less Wonder, to see a great Monarch of fifty six Years of Age retire to a Monastery, whilst the same Year a Man bred a Monk, and fourscore Years old, set Europe in a Flame. King Philip had a great Desire to engage England in this War; and the Queen had Reason to complain of the kind Reception given to many that fled from England into France, and it was believ'd that the French secretly supply'd and encourag'd them to embroil her Affairs. One Stafford had this Year gather'd many of them together, and landing in Yorkshire, he surpriz'd the Castle of Scarborough, and publish'd a Manifesto against the Queen, declaring, 'That by bringing in Strangers to govern the Nation, she had forfeited her Right to the Crown: But few came in to him; so that he and his Accomplishes were compell'd to surrender, and four of them were hang'd. England joins against France.

The Battel of St. Quintin.

Time Doctor Wotton, the English Ambassador in France, discover'd that the Constable had a Design to take Calais: For he had sent his own Nephew to him, whom he secretly instructed, and who pretended he was sent from a great Party in that Town, who were resolv'd to deliver it up; at which the Constable was transported, and enter'd into a long Discourse with him of the Methods of taking it. Yet all this made no just Impressions upon the Queen: All her Council, chiefly the Clergy, were against her engaging; for they saw the War abroad would oblig'd them to slacken their Severities at home. Upon which King Philip, after he had been absent about two Years, found it necessary to come over in Person, and persua'de her to it. Having stay'd about six Weeks he prevail'd with her; and after a Proclamation of War, she sent over eight thousand Men to his Assistance, who joining the Spaniards, compos'd an Army of fifty thousand, which immediately fate down before St. Quintin, in Picardy. The Constable of France advanc'd with a great Force to raise the Siege; but when the two Armies were in view, the French by a Mistake in the Word of Command, fell into Disorder; upon which the Spaniards charg'd them with such Advantage and Success, that the whole Army was defeated. Two thousand five hundred were kill'd on the Spot, and many were taken Prisoners, among whom was the Constable himself; and the Spaniards only lost fifty Men. Had King Philip follow'd his Blow, and march'd directly to Paris, he had found all France in a great Consternation; but he fate still before St. Quintin, which held out 'till the Terror of this Defeat was almost over. The Constable here lost his Reputation, as well as his Liberty; and all esteem'd it as a Judgment from Heaven upon the French King, for the plain Breach of his Faith.

The Pope inrag'd.

Upon this the French Troops were call'd out of Italy, which immediately expos'd the Pope to the Spaniards, and threw him into extravagant Fits of Rage and Passion; and particularly he exclaim'd against Pool, for suffering the Queen to join with the Enemies of the Apostolick See: And having made a general Decree, recalling all his Legates and Nuntio's in the Spanish Dominions, among the rest he recall'd Pool's Legantine Power; which neither the Intercessions of the Queen's Ambassadors, nor the other Cardinals, could prevail with him to alter. He further requir'd Pool to come to Rome, and answer to some Complaints made against him, for the Favour he shew'd to Heretics; and he also made the Queen's Confessor, Friar Peyto, a Cardinal, and declar'd him his Legate for England, and wrote to the Queen to receive him in that Capacity. But the Queen order'd the Bulls and Briefs that were sent over, to be laid up without opening them, according to the Method formerly practis'd, when unacceptable Bulls were brought to Court; and she sent a Message to Peyto not to come into England, otherwise she would sue him, and all that acknowledg'd him, in a Premunire. Cardinal Pool laid aside the Ensigns of a Legate, and sent over Ormaneto with so submissive a Message, that the Pope was much mollify'd; and Peyto dying, and a Treaty of Peace between King Philip and the Pope following, this Storm went over, and publick and solemn Rejoicings were made in England.

But the Effects of it did not yet cease; for the War being proclaim'd between England and France, the French sent to the Scotch Queen-Regent to ingage Scotland in the War with England: All that favour'd the Reformation were for the War; but the Clergy so oppos'd it, that the Majority of the Convention declar'd on the same Side. The Queen-Regent upon this thought to draw them unexpectedly into the War, and sent D' Oisell to besiege Warke Castle in England; but the Scotch Lords highly exclaim'd against it, and requir'd him to desist, otherwise they would declare him an Enemy to the Nation: So that after some slight Skirmishes on the Borders, the Contest was ended on both Sides. Upon this the Queen-Regent wrote to France, urging the Conclusion of the Marriage between the Dauphine and the Queen of Scotland; and a Message was sent from the Court, desiring the Scots to send over Commissioners to treat about about the Articles of the Marriage, and some of every State were dispatch'd for settling that Affair. There was at this Time a great want of Money in the Exchequer of England; and the Coldness and Uneasiness of the last Parliament made the Council unwilling to call a new one. It was try'd what Sums could be rais'd by Loans, upon Privy-Seals, and the like Methods; but these so little answer'd Expectations, that at length a new Parliament was summon'd to meet in January next. Yet in the mean Space, the Council continually receiv'd Advices of the ill Condition of the Garrisons of Calais, and the neighbouring Places, and that the French had an absolute Design upon them: But either they believ'd there was no Danger during the Winter, or that the want of Money was so great, that no reasonable Care was taken for their Security.

low Condition.*

This sufficiently appear'd in the Beginning of the next Year, which was too much noted for the Loss of all the English Dominions in France. For the Duke of Guise, being desirous of doing some great Action, while the Constable was a Prisoner, suddenly fate down before Calais, on the first of January. The Lord Wentworth had then the Command of it; but the Garrison consisted only of five hundred Men, and there were not above two hundred of the Townsmen that could be serviceable in a Siege: And tho' King Philip had offer'd to put Men into it, yet the English were so infatuated with Jealousies, that they left it in so naked a Condition, that the Governor could perform little to preserve it. So that the two Forts about it, of which one call'd Newnambridge commanded the Avenues by Land, and the other call'd the Risbank commanded the Harbour, were taken with small Opposition; for the Lord Wentworth could not spare Men enough to defend them. After this the French drew the Water out of the Ditches, and having prepar'd Inventions to pass without sticking in the Mire, they made the Assault, and carry'd the Castle by Storm, which was thought impregnable. After such Success, the Town could make no considerable Resistance, so it was unfortunately surrender'd, and the Governour with fifty Officers made Prisoners of War. Thus in a Week's Time, and in the Winter, was this strong and important Place lost by the English, which had been gloriously obtain'd by King Edward III. and held by the English above two hundred and ten Years, to the great Curb of France, being accounted the Key of that Nation. From this Place the Duke of Guise march'd to besiege Guisnes, which had a better Garrison of eleven hundred Men, but they were much dishearten'd by the Loss of Calais: They retir'd into the Castle, and abandon'd the Town to the French; but yet they once beat them out of it. The French, after a long Battery, gave the Assault, and forc'd them to Capitulate; and the Soldiers, as at Calais, had liberty to march away, but the Officers were made Prisoners of War. The Garrison in Hammes, that lay in a Marsh thought inaccessible, seeing themselves cut off from the Sea, abandon'd the Place before the French summon'd them. And thus were the English dishonourably driven out of the Continent of France, without retaining one Foot of Land; which Mezeray says was the Fruit of that Alliance their Queen had made with Spain; upon which the Pope pleasantly said, That the Loss of Calais was the Dower of that Princess.

Calais.*

Guisnes.

and Hammes.

The mighty Discontents that this Loss gave the English, were such, that the Queen could never hope to surmount them; and it sunk so deeply into her Mind, that it did not a little hasten her Death. Both Sides took Occasion to draw Arguments from this great Misfortune: The Reformers said, It was a Judgment upon the Nation, for the Contempt of the true Religion, and the late Cruelties practis'd against it: The Papists said, That the Hereticks had found such Shelter and Connivance there, that it was no wonder the Place was lost. King Philip offer'd his Assistance to go and retake the Place, before the Fortifications were repair'd, if the English would send over a Force answerable to such an Undertaking: But they, upon an Estimate made of the Expence of this, and of a War for the ensuing Year, found it would amount tents in En-

amount to above half a Million of Money ; and as the Treasury was exhausted, and could not furnish such a Sum, so they had no Reason to expect a liberal Supply from a provok'd People. The Bishops fear'd that the Continuance of War would render it necessary to proceed more gently against Heretics, and thought it better to be quiet with the Loss of Calais than run that Hazard : They seem'd confident that within a Year, they should be able to purge the Kingdom from all Heresie ; and therefore mov'd that Preparations might be made for a War to begin the Year after this.

The fifth Parliament in this Reign.

A new Parliament was open'd on the twentieth of January ; for which the Abbot of Westminster, and the Prior of St. John of Jerusalem had their Writs, and sat in it. The Lords desir'd a Conference with the Commons, concerning the Safety of the Nation, which was found so weak, that a Subsidy, a Tenth, and a Fifteenth were given by the Laity ; and the Clergy gave eight Shillings in the Pound, to be paid in four Years. The Abbot of Westminster mov'd, that the Privileges of Sanctuary might be again restor'd to his House ; but that was soon laid aside. The Procurers of wilful Murder were now deny'd the Benefit of the Clergy ; but great Opposition was made to that Act in the House of Lords. A Bill was also brought in, confirming all the Letters Patents, which the Queen had granted, or might grant for the future. This related to the Foundations of Religious Houses, which the Queen had already made ; for besides the Abby of Westminster, she had founded a House for the Franciscans at Greenwich, two for the Franciscans and Dominicans in London, one for the Carthusians at Skeen, and a Nunnery at Sion. One Coxley oppos'd this Act, and insinuated, That the Confirmation of all Grants might give the Queen a Colour to dispose of the Crown from the right Inheritors. At which the House express'd great Dislike, and show'd That they would not have it so much as imagin'd, that the Princess Elizabeth should ever be excluded. He had a publick Reprimand, for speaking so much to the Queen's Dishonour : So the Parliament in March was prorogu'd to November next.

The sufferings of the Princess Elizabeth.

Shortly after a Proposition of Marriage was privately made by the King of Sweden to the Princess Elizabeth ; but she declar'd, she could not suffer a change in her Condition, so the Motion became ineffectual. It seems her Aversion to a marry'd State was very great, otherwise her present Condition was neither so easie, nor so secure, but that she had Reason to desire to be out of her Keeper's Power ; and to apprehend that her Danger increas'd, as the Queen's Health was impair'd : For many of the Bishops, fearing she would overthrow that Building, which they had cemented with so much Blood, were now offering cruel Counsels against her. To mention some of the Sufferings of this admirable Lady ; she had been first sent for upon the Breaking out of Wiat's Rebellion ; and th' she then lay sick in Bed, she was forc'd to go to Court. There she was at first confin'd to her Lodgings, and was afterwards carry'd to the Tower, and ignominiously led into it by the Traitor's-Gate, where she was strictly guarded : Her Servants were all put from her, and none had Access to her, but such as were Spies upon her : Nor was she suffer'd to walk on the Leads, or have the ordinary Comforts of Air ; and a Boy of four Years old was severely threaten'd, for his carrying Flowers to her. Some were put to the Rack to extort Confessions from them ; but none accus'd her but Wiat, and he retracted all he had said upon the Scaffold. When it appear'd that nothing could be prov'd against her, she was sent down to Woodstock ; where she was kept under severe Guards, and very roughly treated by Sir Henry Benefield, whom she usually call'd Her Jaylor. But King Philip so far mollify'd the Queen by degrees, that he prevail'd with her to bring her to Court, and to admit her into her Presence. Gardiner and many others dealt very subtilly with her, to confess her Offences, and ask the Queen's Pardon ; but she always stood firmly to her Innocence, as well as her Religion, declaring, She had not offended the Queen, so much as in Thought. When she was brought before the Queen

Queen late at Night, she with Tears upon her Knees renew'd the same Protestations to her, and begg'd That she would entertain a good Opinion of her. The Queen, tho' she urg'd her much to acknowledge some Guilt, yet seem'd satisfy'd with what she said, and parted with her in good Terms; of which King Philip had some Apprehensions, for he had convey'd himself into a secret Corner of the Room, to prevent a further Breach, in case the Queen should be too much incens'd. Shortly after, her Guards were discharg'd, and she suffer'd to retire into the Country; but she had always so many Spies about her, that to avoid all Suspicion, she concern'd her self in no sort of Business, but gave her self wholly to Study; in which she arriv'd to a mighty Perfection. And thus she pass'd the greatest Part of this Reign, under continual Apprehensions of Death; which perhaps was a necessary Preparation for that exalted State to which she was soon advanc'd, and which she held in the longest Course of Prosperity and Glory, that ever was attain'd by any of her Sex.

Still the Popish Bishops continu'd their Cruelties; and Cuthbert Simpson, More Burnings and other Cruelties. one in Deacon's Orders, having been taken at the Meeting at Islington, was rack'd with the extreamest Severity, to make him confess all the Friends he had in London: But nothing was discover'd from him; so in March he and two others were burnt in Smithfield. Several Books being printed beyond Sea, and secretly convey'd into England, a Proclamation of a very strange Nature was set out, 'That if any receiv'd any of these Books, and did not immediately burn them, without either reading them, or shewing them to any other Person, they were to be presently executed by Martial Law. Several others were burnt this Year, to the Number of thirty nine; and all that were burnt during the whole Reign, according to Fox, were two hundred and eighty four, tho' Grindall, who liv'd in that Time, writes, That in two Years Time eight hundred suffer'd at the Stake. Many more were thrown into Prison, where sixty of them dy'd miserably; others, after much cruel Usage by Whips and Tortures from Bonner's own Hands, were prevail'd on to abjure; but carry'd in their Minds a mortal Aversion to that Cruelty which had tempted them to such Apostacy.

As to the War with France, this Year the Lord Clinton was sent with a Fleet of a hundred and twenty Sail, and seven thousand Land-men, who landed near Brest, with a Design to have seiz'd on that Port, but was repell'd with the Loss of six hundred Men; so that after an inglorious and expensive Expedition, he return'd to England. The English had lost their Hearts and Bravery, and began to believe that Heaven was against them; and extraordinary Many Calamities in England Accidents increas'd these direful Apprehensions: A vast Storm of Thunder caus'd an unusual Terror in Nottinghamshire; the River Trent swell'd prodigiously, and with a violent Wind did great Damage: Hail-stones of uncommon Bigness fell in other Places; and which was more terrible, a contagious intermitting Feaver, not unlike the Plague, so rag'd through the Nation, that three Parts of four were infected with it, and in many Counties there were not Men sufficient to reap the Harvest. All these melancholy Symptoms concurr'd to increase the People's Aversion to the Government, which soon dispos'd the Queen to hearken to Overtures of Peace. This was projected between the Bishop of Arras, and the Cardinal of Lorraine, who were the chief Favourites of the two Kings of France and Spain: The Cardinal of Lorraine was most earnest in it, because the Constable who was the Head of the Faction against the House of Guise, was suspected to favour the Reformation, and his three Nephews, the Coligny's, were known to incline to it. The King of France was the more inclinable to a Treaty, because he had receiv'd a second Blow this Year. The Marthal de Thermes being surrounded by the Count of Egmont near Graveling, where the French Army being engag'd by the Count, The Battel of Graveling. and gall'd by the English Ordnance from their Ships lying near the Land, was defeated; five thousand kill'd, and the Marthal and other chief Officers taken taken Prisoners. The French King thought the Expulsion of the English out of France a Compensation both for that, and his Loss at St. Quentin; so that both Princes reckoning their own Advantages, they were dispos'd to a Treaty, which was open'd at Cambray, but not finish'd in this Reign. Bishop Godwin observes that all Persons concern'd in this unjust War, and Breach of Faith, were punish'd by Heaven; and particularly Queen Mary, by the Loss of Calais, and the other Places, at a Time when nothing but contrary Winds hinder'd her Fleet from affording them Relief.

The Dauphine marry'd to the Queen of Scotland.

After a Determination of many Years continuance, in this April the Dauphine was marry'd to the Queen of Scotland; which Marriage was adorn'd by an Epithalamium wrote by Buchanan, esteem'd one of the most perfect Pieces of Latin Poetry. The Deputies sent from Scotland were desir'd to offer the Dauphine the Crown of Scotland, in the Right of his Wife; but they declar'd, That exceeded the Bounds of their Commission, so they only promis'd to represent the Matter to the States of Scotland; but could not conceal the Aversion they had to the Proposal. Shortly after four of the seven that were sent over dy'd, and the fifth narrowly escap'd; it being generally suspected that they were poison'd. When the rest return'd to Scotland, an Assembly of the States was call'd, in which it was agreed to allow the Dauphine the Title of King, but with this Proviso, 'That he should have no Power' over them, and that it was only a bare Title which they offer'd him. This was appointed to be carry'd to him by the Earl of Argile, and the Prior of St. Andrew's, who had been the most warm Agents for the French Interest, in Hopes of the Queen-Regent's Protection, against the Rage of the Bishops, in Matters of Religion.

The Parli-
ment meets.

In England, a new Session of Parliament met on the fifth of November; and the Queen being ill, sent for the Speaker of the House of Commons, and laid before him the feeble Condition of the Nation, and the Necessity of putting it in a Posture of Defence: But the Commons were so disgusted at the general Conduct of Affairs, that they could come to no Resolution: Therefore on the fourteenth of that Month, twelve of the chief Lords of both Estates, came down to the House of Commons, and desir'd them to grant a Subsidy to defend the Nation, both against the French and Scots; but still the Commons came to no Resolution, 'till the Queen's Death three Days after put an End to the

The Queen's
last Sickness,

Parliament. Her former false Conception, her Husband's Neglect her Despair of Issue, and her melancholy Apprehensions, which receiv'd a Surcharge from the Loss of Calais, brought her into an ill Habit of Body, which turn'd to an incurable Dropsie. When some of her Visitants endeavour'd to divert her sorrowful Thoughts, she told them, They were Strangers to her Distemper, but if they would dissect her after her Death, they would find Calais next her Heart. She endeavour'd to have set aside her Sister Elizabeth, and brought in the Queen of Scotland to the Crown; but she was hinder'd from proceeding in it as a Matter impracticable. Thus on the seventeenth Day of November she ended her unfortunate Life, in the forty third Year of her Age, after a short and miserable Reign of five Years, four Months, and eleven Days. At the same Time, as if one Star had rul'd both their Nativities, her Cardinal T'ool was also expiring in the fifty ninth Year of his Age, being a Person of Learning, Humility, Prudence and Temper; who had certainly the best Notions of any of his Party then in England, so that if his Projects had been follow'd, Popery would probably have been fix'd in the Nation. But God design'd another Establishment; and the Queen, whose Temper and Principles were fierce and severe, preferr'd the bloody Counsels of Gardiner and Bonner to those wiser and more rational Methods he often propos'd. And tho' his Zeal for the Church of Rome still continu'd, yet his Eyes were open'd in many Things: His being Legate at Trent, and his Retirement at Viterbo, had both enlighten'd and compos'd his Mind; which being join'd to his Probity and sweet Disposition, produc'd extraordinary Effects in him.

and Death.

As

As to the Character of the Queen, we need not say much after her History; Her Character. only as to her Person, as she was not very amiable, so she was without any Deformity; nor did she want Parts or Understanding, but had the Advantages of Learning, and a good Understanding in the Latin Tongue. She was a Woman of a strict and severe Life, who allow'd her self few of the Diversions belonging to Courts; was constant at her Devotions, and violently addicted to the Interests and Humours of the Romish Priests. She had great Resentments of her Usage in her Father's and Brother's Reign, which easily induc'd her to take her Revenge, tho' she colour'd it with her Zeal against Heresie. She much endeavour'd to expiate and restore the Sacrileges of the two last Reigns; besides which laudable Intention, a froward sort of Virtue, and a melancholy Piety, are the best Things that can be said of her. Her former Dissimulations, her publick Breach of Faith to the Suffolk Gentlemen and others, and her barbarous Cruelties to those call'd Hereticks, are inexcusable Blemishes in her Character; and God thought fit to punish her with a barren Womb, and an untimely Death, and the World with a blasted Name, which has made an indelible Impression of Horror upon the Nation. To conclude, her Death was as little lamented, as of any that had worn the Crown, excepting by the Popish Clergy; and had it not been for the two worthy Foundations of Trinity and St. John's Colleges in Oxford, there had been scarce any Thing in this Reign to have made it memorable, besides the Calamities and Misfortunes of it.

S E C T. II.

The Reign of Queen ELIZABETH.

Containing 44 Years, 4 Months, and 6 Days.

I. THE short and furious Storm that had rag'd within the Nation, being happily dispell'd by the Decease of Queen Mary, a glorious Sun-shine suddenly succeeded; which did not only illuminate the English Hemisphere, but gradually display'd its reviving Beams both to neighbouring and remote Regions. All which proceeded from the renown'd Princess Elizabeth, who without Opposition mounted the Throne of England by the Providence of Heaven, by Virtue of her Birth-Right, and the Act of Succession made in the thirty fifth Year of King Henry the Eighth. Queen Mary's Death was conceal'd for a few Hours, 'till about nine in the Morning, the Lord Chancellor Heath with a melancholy Countenance imparted the News to the House of Lords; which, as it struck the Bishops with no small Fear, so those Counsellors who had been severe to her Sister, were very apprehensive of the Treatment they might receive. Yet they all agreed to proclaim her Queen; and by the Zeal shewn for her Accession to the Crown, design'd to ballance the Errors to which they had been formerly driven, more in Compliance to the Sovereign's Resentments, than any real Prejudice to her Person. They immediately sent for the House of Commons, to whom the Lord Chancellor signify'd the Queen's Decease; which, he said, would have been a much more sensible Affliction, if they had not such a Successor, who was the next and undisputed Heir to the Crown, ELIZABETH, of whose Right and Title none could make any Question; therefore the Lords were unanimously resolv'd to proclaim her Queen. This was immediately resounded and eccho'd with innumerable repeated Acclamations, God save Queen Elizabeth! Long and happily may she Reign! They first proclaim'd her at Westminster, and then in London, Elizabeth proclaimed Queen.

Queen Mary's Death declar'd.Elizabeth proclaimed Queen.

London, in Conjunction with the Lord Mayor and Aldermen; which was accompany'd with such unusual Transports of Joy, as gave the melancholy Priests just Cause to fear a new Revolution in Religious Affairs; and tho' the Queen's Death most sensibly afflicted them, yet the Joy in this Change was so great and universal, that a sad Look was thought Criminal, and the Priests were forc'd to vent their Grievs in private Corners, and the most secret Recesses.

Her Person and Character.

This admirable Princess was now twenty five Years of Age, excelling in all the Perfections of her Sex, whether of Body or Mind. Her Person was graceful, her Mien noble, her Shape fine, and her Stature and Gait, both agreeable and majestick. Her Face had not all the Regularities of a finish'd Beauty; yet her Complexion was perfectly fair, her Eyes lively and sparkling, and her whole Countenance carry'd something so bright and dazling, as cover'd all smaller Defects. In every Thing she said or did, there was an Air of Majesty, that naturally struck more Awe than Love; but still at her Pleasure she could assume such powerful Charms, as few were able to resist; and there was such a happy mixture of Greatness and Sweetness, that all Persons admir'd her. Her Mind was heroical and magnanimous, her Understanding was pregnant and penetrating, enlarg'd and polish'd by all the Advantages of a most refin'd Education. She wrote Letters in English and Italian, when she was not full four Years of Age; and before she was seventeen she became perfect in the Greek, Latin, French and Italian Tongues, and not unacquainted with the rest of the European Languages. From whence she proceeded by her indefatigable Industry to an extraordinary Knowledge in Philosophy, Rhetorick, History and Divinity; not forgetting Poetry, Musick, and other Ornaments of Conversation. Of all that she read or learn'd, she made the best and truest Use; and being of a quick Apprehension, and a strong Memory, she drew from the Annals of all Nations, the Actions of the greatest Men, with all their Fights and Conquests. She would frequently set before her the Monuments of her Predecessors, the illustrious Triumphs and Victories obtain'd by the English at Cressy, Poitiers, Agincourt and Vernevil; and was wont to say, These Victories were more owing to the Assistance of Heaven, than the Arms of Men. Being thus nobly accomplish'd, train'd up to the most exalted Piety, and taught by her late Afflictions the profoundest Humility, she became truly worthy of the English Crown; which she receiv'd at a Time when the Nation was most low and afflicted, doubly imbroil'd with the French and Scotch War, overcharg'd with the Debts of Henry the Eighth, and Edward the Sixth, the Treasury exhausted, the English Dominions in France lost, the People distracted with different Opinions in Religion, and she her self destitute of all potent Friends, and foreign Alliance.

The present State of the Nation.

She was at Hatfield when she receiv'd the News of her Sister's Death, and that she her self was proclaim'd Queen; upon which, 'tis said she fell down upon her Knees, and after a short Silence broke out in the Words of the Psalmist, 'It is the Lord's Doing, and wonderful in our Eyes!' Which Words in Latin she afterwards took for her Motto in some of her Gold Coins. She soon remov'd from thence to London; and on the nineteenth of November she was met at High-Gate by all the Bishops; whom she receiv'd with great Sweetness, excepting Bonner, who being polluted with so much Blood, she thought that common Civility to him would give some Countenance to his Crimes. She was receiv'd into the City with such numerous Throngs as was almost incredible, and surrounded with the loudest Acclamations of over-flowing Joy. When she arriv'd at the Tower, upon her first Entrance she devoutly kneel'd down and offer'd up her Thanks to God, Who had thus bounteously chang'd her former Prison into a present Palace. She soon clear'd all Men's Apprehensions as to those Hardships she had formerly sustain'd, and shew'd that she had absolutely forgot from whom she had receiv'd them; not excepting Benefield himself, who had been the chief Instrument of her Sufferings. She gave immediate Notice

The Queen enters London.

Notice of her Sister's Death, and her own Succession, to all Foreign Princes; and wrote particular Acknowledgments to King Philip, for the kind Offices he had done. Among the rest she wrote to Sir Edward Karn, who was her Sister's Ambassador at Rome: But the haughty Pope in his usual Stile told him, That England was a Fee of the Papacy, and that it was a high Presumption in her, to assume the Crown without his Consent, especially since she was Illegitimate: But if she would renounce her Pretensions, and refer her self wholly to him, she might expect all the Favour that could consist with the Dignity of the Apostolick See. The Queen hearing this, with no small Resentment, recall'd Karn's Power; but he being a zealous Papist, continu'd still at Rome. King Philip sent her a kinder Message, and propos'd a Marriage with her; undertaking to procure a Dispensation from Rome. But the Queen, as she continu'd her whole Life averse to that State, so she knew how unacceptable a Foreigner, especially a Spaniard, would be to her People; and she had made it the steady Maxim of her Reign, from which she never would deviate, 'To rule in their Affections, as well as over their Persons. Neither could she hearken to the Pope's Dispensation: For if two Sisters might marry the same Person, then two Brothers might likewise marry the same Woman; which would overthrow all the Arguments for her Father's Divorce with Queen Catharine. upon which depended the Validity of her Mother's Marriage, and her own Legitimation. Yet tho' she firmly resolv'd not to marry King Philip, she thought, that during the Treaty of Cambray, it was not fit to put him out of all Hopes: Upon which he sent to Rome for a Dispensation; but the French sent to oppose it, and set up a Pretension for the young Queen of Scotland, as the righteous Heir to the Crown of England.

She writes to Foreign Princes.

King Philip proposes a Marriage with her in vain.

The wise Queen continu'd to imploy most of her Sister's Privy-Counsellors, as the Lord Chancellor Heath, the Marquess of Winchester, and others, who had before so often turn'd in Matters of Religion, that it was very probable they would be complying at this Time. But still to ballance these she added several others of the Reformed Religion; the most celebrated of whom were Sir William Cecil, and Sir Nicholas Bacon, both of extraordinary Abilities. She order'd all who were imprison'd upon the Account of Religion to be set at Liberty: Upon which one who us'd to take an innocent Liberty with her, said, The four Evangelists still continu'd Prisoners, and that the People much long'd to see them freed: To which she as pleasantly answer'd, She would talk with them her self, and know how they stood affected. Some propos'd the annulling of all Queen Mary's Parliaments, because Force was us'd in the Election of the First, and the Writs for another were not legal, because the Title of Supream Head was omitted in the Summons; but this was thought too bold an Attempt and Precedent to annul Parliaments upon Errors in Writs, or particular Disorders. The Queen desir'd that all the Changes to be made, might be so carefully manag'd as to breed as little Division among her People, as was possible; and she was not pleas'd with the Title of Supream Head, as importing too sublime an Authority. She lov'd Magnificence in Religion, as she affected it in all other Affairs; which made her inclinable to preserve some former Ornaments, and even Images in Churches; and that the Popish Party might have the less Cause of Offence, she design'd to have the Manner of Christ's Presence in the Sacrament defin'd in general Terms, that it might comprehend all Sides. A Scheme was form'd of the Method, in which it was most advisable for the Queen to proceed, and put into Cecil's Hands. By this, 'It was judg'd necessary to do nothing 'till a Parliament was call'd: The Queen had reason to expect all the Disturbance the Pope could give her, who would certainly excite the French and Scots, and perhaps the Irish, against her. The Clergy, and those imploy'd in the late Reign, would oppose it, and use all Methods to inflame the Nation; and the greatest Part of the People lov'd the Pomp of the old Ceremonies. It was therefore propos'd, That the Queen on any Terms should ‘ should make Peace with France, and incourage the Party in Scotland, that de‘ fir’d a Reformation. The Clergy were generally hated for their Cruelty, and ‘ it would be easie to bring them within the Statute of Premunire: Care was ‘ also to be taken to expose the former Counsellors for their ill Conduct in the ‘ last Reign, and by that Means to diminish their Reputation. It was likewise ‘ propos’d to examine well the Commissions for the Peace and Militia, and to ‘ inspect the Universities; and some Learned Men were to be order’d, to confi‘ der what Alterations were fit to be made, and by what Steps they should ‘ proceed.

By this Time the Exiles that had fled beyond Sea, return’d home; and these with some other zealous Persons began in many Places to break down Images, and set up King Edward's Service again. Upon this the Queen order’d, That the Litany, and other Parts of the Service should be perform’d in English, and that no Elevation should be us’d in the Mass; but requir’d her Subjects by Proclamation, to avoid all Innovations, and use no other Forms, but what she retain’d in her Chappel, ‘till it should be otherwise appointed in Parliament. On the fifth of December she order’d her Sister’s Obsequies to be celebrated with great Magnificence at Westminster: White Bishop of Winchester, who preach’d the Sermon, not only extoll’d her Government, but severely reflected upon the present State of Affairs; for which he was for some Time confin’d to his House. And many Sees being vacant, one of the first Things that came under Consultation, was the finding proper Men to supply them. Doctor Parker was selected, as the fittest for the Metropolitan See of Canterbury: He had been Chaplain to Queen Anne Bolen, and had been imploy’d in instructing the Queen in the chief Points of Religion, when she was young: He was well known to Sir Nicholas Bacon; and both he and Cecil gave so high a Character of him, that it meeting with the Queen’s particular Esteem, it was resolv’d to advance him. But as soon as he knew it; he us’d all possible Arguments against it both from the Weakness of his Body, and his Unworthiness of so high a Charge. He desir’d rather to be put into some small Benefice of twenty Nobles a Year, so far was he from aspiring to Wealth or Honour; and as Cranmer before him, he continu’d for many Months so averse to it, that it was hard to overcome him. And it was thought no small Honour to the Reformation, that the two chief Instruments that promoted it, Cranmer and Parker, gave such Evidences of a Primitive Spirit, in being so unwillingly advanc’d.

New Promotions.

*Sir Nicholas Bacon made

In the Beginning of the new Year, the Queen thought fit to make some new Promotions: Particularly Sir William Parre was created Marquess of Northampton; Edward Scymour was made Vicount Beauchamp, and Earl of Hartford; the Lord Thomas Howard was made Vicount of Bindon; Sir Oliver Saint John, Lord Saint John of Bletso; and Sir Henry Carew, Lord Carew of Hunsden. They were all averse to the Popish Religion; and as the Queen was not prodigal in any Thing, so she was most sparing in Distributions of Honour, by which she advanc’d it to the highest Esteem with all Men. The Seals were taken from Arch-Bishop Heath, who could not join in the Queen’s Designs, and given to Sir Nicholas Bacon, who was declar’d Lord-Keeper, and had all the Dignity and Authority of the Chancellor’s Office, without the Title; which, was perhaps an Effect of his great Modesty, that adorn’d his other great and noble Qualities. As he was eminent in himself, so he was happy in being Father to the great Sir Francis Bacon, one of the chief Glories in the English Nation.

These Acts of Grace and Favour being thus dispatch’d, on the twelfth Day of January the Queen went to the Tower, in order to make a triumphant Passage through London to her Palace at Westminster, before the Solemnity of her Coronation. As she mounted her Royal Chariot at the Tower, with the profoundest Marks of Devotion, she bless’d the all-powerful God, Who had sav’d her, like the Prophet Daniel, out of the Mouths of the Lions, and preserv’d serv'd her to see that joyful Day. As she pass'd through the City in great Splendor, she was all the Way entertain'd with the most joyful Acclamations that could proceed from dilated Spirits; which she continually return'd with the most charming Smiles, and often saying God bless you, my People! which was always accompany'd with such a modest Affability, and obliging Gracefulness, that it drew Tears of Joy from the Eyes of many, and infinite Prayers and Thanksgivings from the Hearts of all. But nothing more endear'd her to the Spectators than her Behaviour as she pass'd under one of the Triumphal Arches; where a rich Bible was let down to her, as from Heaven, by a Child representing Truth: She with great Reverence kiss'd both her Hands, and receiving it with another Kiss, laid it next her Heart; professing, She was better pleas'd with that single Gift, than all the magnificent Presents she had that Day receiv'd from the City. On the next Morning, with the like Splendor and Magnificence, she was attended to the Abby-Church at Westminster, where she was solemnly crown'd, according to the Order of the Roman Pontifical, by Oglethorp Bishop of Carlisle; with so much Satisfaction to the People, that afterwards, without any Command, and by an universal Consent, they every Year celebrated her Coronation-Day with a Religious Joy. Yet none of the Bishops, besides Carlisle, would join in the Solemnity; for they saw the Alterations she was daily making; and tho' many of them had often chang'd, yet they resolv'd now to keep firmer to what they had lately profess'd, and for which they had shed so much Blood. Yet no Objection could be made to her Piety and Devotion, which was constant and remarkable both in private and publick, and she most attentively heard all Sermons preach'd before her: But still she preferr'd the publick Prayers, and often us'd the Saying she had read of her Predecessor Henry the Third, That she had rather converse with God in Prayer, than hear others speak eloquently of him.

Her Coronation.

Abroad, the Treaty of Cambray was still negotiated by the English, Spanish and French Commissioners; in which the greatest Obstacle was the Restitution of Calais; and King Philip for a long time insist'd so positively on that Article, that he refus'd to make Peace upon any other Terms. England had lost it by a War, in which they engag'd on his Account, so that in Honour he was oblig'd to see it restor'd; but when the Hopes of marrying the Queen vanish'd, and he found she was making Changes in Religion, he became more regardless of her Interests, and told the English Commissioners, that unless they would enter into a League for continuing the War six Years longer, he must submit to the necessity of his own Affairs, and conclude a Peace. Upon which the Queen hearken'd to Propositions sent from France; but much complain'd of the Queen of Scotland's assuming the Title and Arms of England: It was answer'd, That since she had born the Title and Arms of France, she had no Reason to contend upon that Account. She saw she could not now make War with France alone, and knew that Philip had made a separate Peace; and she had no Desire to begin her Reign with a War, that would probably be unsuccessful, and certainly so burdensome to her Subjects Purse, as might indanger the Loss of their Affections. And certainly in respect of her Sex, and want of Treasure, Peace at this Time was more eligible than the justest War, to her, who was wont to say, It was more glorious to establish a Peace with Wisdom, than to finish a War with the most gallant Armies. The Loss of Calais was no Reproach to her, but fell wholly on her Sister's Memory; therefore she resolv'd to make a Peace with France, upon the best Terms that could be obtain'd. So at length it was agreed, 'That the French should hold Calais eight Years, at which Time it should either be restor'd, or five hundred thousand Pounds paid in lieu of it to the Queen of England: Yet if, during that Space, she made War, either in France or Scotland, she was to forfeit her Right to that Town: Aymouth in Scotland was to be demolish'd, and all Differences on the Borders there, were to be determin'd by some deputed on both Sides.

The Treaty of Cambray.

A Peace made with France and Scotland.

This

This being adjusted, a general Peace between the Crowns of England, France, Spain and Scotland was concluded; to the Dissatisfaction of many of the English, who made great Complaints against particular Persons in the last Reign.

The wise Queen having happily for her own Designs made Peace both with France and Scotland, was now more at Liberty to settle her Affairs at home.

The first Parliament in this Reign.

She had call'd a Parliament, which was open'd on the twenty fifth Day of January; at which the Lord Bacon made a long Speech, both concerning Matters of Religion and the State of the Nation, 'He desir'd they would examine 'the former Religion without Heat or partial Affection; that all Reproaches 'might be forborn, and Extreame avoided; and that Particulars might be so 'establish'd, as all might agree in an Uniformity in Divine Worship. He laid 'open the Errors of the former Reign, and aggravated the Loss of Calais; but 'still shew'd that it could not be easily recover'd. He made a noble Encomium 'upon the Queen, but when he shew'd under what Necessities she lay, he declar'd, She would desire no Supply, but what they should freely and chearfully offer. After some Debates about the Title of Supream Head, that was wanting in the Queen's Writs, and came to no Effect; the first Bill that was brought to try the Temper of the Parliament, was for the Restitution of the Tenths and First-Fruits to the Crown; against which all the Bishops protested. But that was all the Opposition that was made to it; 'By which, not only that Tax 'and Imposition was again laid on the Clergy, but also all the Impropriated 'Benefices, which Mary had surrender'd, were restor'd to the Crown. After this the Commons made a modest and handsome Address to the Queen, 'Desiring her to chuse such a Husband, as might make both her self and the Nation happy. She receiv'd the Proposal kindly, 'Since they had neither limited her to Time, nor Nation; but declar'd, That as hitherto she had liv'd 'with great Satisfaction in a single State, and had refus'd the Propositions that 'had been made to her, both in her Brother's and Sister's Reign, so she had no 'Inclination to change her Course of Life: If ever she did, she would take care, 'that it should be to the Good and Satisfaction of her People. She thought 'she was marry'd to the Nation at her Coronation, by the Ring she then receiv'd, and look'd upon her People as her dear Children; and she would be 'highly satisfy'd, if her Tombstone might tell Posterity, HERE LYES A QUEEN WHO REIGN'D SO LONG, AND LIV'D AND DY'D A VIRGIN. This Matter was soon dropt, and an acceptable Bill for the Recognition of her Title to the Crown was brought in: It was not thought necessary to repeal the Sentence of her Mother's Divorce, for it was declar'd, That the Crown purg'd all Defects; and it was thought needless to look back into a Matter, which could not be done without casting some Reproach on her Father: So it was in general Words Enacted, 'That they did assuredly believe and declare, That by the Laws of God and the Realm, she was their lawful Queen, and was rightly and lineally descended to the Throne. This was thought a wiser Way, than if they had examin'd the Sentence of Divorce that pass'd upon the Confession of a Pre-contract; which must have reviv'd the Remembrance of Things that ought to be forgotten; which was also thought the true Reason why in all her Reign no Apology was printed for her Mother. Other Bills were brought in, and one pass'd, 'That reviv'd all Acts made against the Pope's Power, in King Henry's Reign, and repeal'd those made by Queen Mary:

Her Supremacy asserted.

'They enacted an Oath for acknowledging the Queen Supream Governor in all Causes, and over all Persons; and the Refuters of it were to be turn'd out 'of all Offices either Ecclesiastical or Civil, and to be under a Disability during Life: If any should advance the Authority of a Foreign Power, the first Offence was Fine or Imprisonment, the second a Premunire, and the third Treason: The Queen was also impower'd to give Commissions, for Judging 'and Reforming Ecclesiastical Matters, under certain Limitations. From this last was the Court, call'd the High Commission Court, founded; which in reality

ality was nothing, but the distributing that Authority into many Hands, which was in one Person in King Henry's Reign.

During these Parliamentary Proceedings, great Complaints were made of Seditious Sermons, preach'd by the Popish Clergy; upon which the Queen follow'd her Sister's Precedent, and forbad all Preaching without a Royal Licence obtain'd: She likewise sent an Order to the Convocation, requiring that Body to make no Canons, under the Pains of a Premunire. Yet the lower House insisting still upon several Points, a publick and solemn Conference was appointed by the Queen, to be held between the Romish Bishops and the Protestant Divines. This was first propos'd to Arch-Bishop Heath, who was still a Privy-Counsellor; and after some Consultation with his Brethren, he accepted of it. Nine of each Side were appointed formally to dispute upon these three Points; Worship in an unknown Tongue; the Power that every particular Church had to alter Rites and Ceremonies; and concerning the Propitiatory Sacrifice of the Mass: All which were to be given in Writing. The last Day of March was the first Day of the Conference, which was held in Westminster-Abby, in the Presence of the Privy-Council, and both Houses of Parliament, and vast Numbers of People who were gather'd together at so unusual a Sight. The Applauses of the Assembly were so much on the Protestants Side, that after the first Day, the other Party obstinately refus'd to proceed according to the Form first agreed; and the Bishops of Winchester and Lincoln said, 'The Faith of the Church ought not to be examin'd, but in a Synod of Divines; That it gave too great Incouragement to Hereticks to dispute with them; and that the Queen and Council ought to be Excommunicated, for suffering them to argue against the Catholick Faith before an unlearned Multitude. Upon this they were sent to the Tower, and the Lord-Keeper dismiss'd the Assembly with this Sentence to all the Bishops, Since you are not willing that we should hear you, you shall very shortly hear from us.

A publick Conference about Religion.

This being over, the Parliament was now in a better Disposition to pass the Bill for the Uniformity of the Service of the Church: The Book of Common-Prayer was now revis'd, and the most considerable Alteration, that the express Declaration made against the corporal Presence, in the second Book set out by King Edward, was now left out; that none might be driven out of the Communion of the Church upon that Account; therefore the Matter was left undetermin'd, as a speculative Point, in which the People were at their Liberty. The Book of Ordination was not specially mention'd in the Act, which occasion'd Bonner afterwards to question the Legality of Ordinations made by it; but it had been made a Part of the Common-Prayer-Book in the fifth Year of King Edward, and the whole Book, then set out, was now confirm'd: So that by a special Act made some Years after this, it was declar'd, 'That that Office was understood to be a Part of it. Great Oppositions, and many Speeches were made in the House of Lords against this famous Act of Uniformity; but at length it pass'd with the Dissent and Protestations of eight Spiritual and nine Temporal Lords, and has continu'd in Force to this Day. Another Act pass'd with greater and juster Opposition, 'That the Queen might reserve 'some Lands belonging to Bishopricks to her self, as they became void, giving 'in lieu of them Impropriated Tithes to the Value of them: This was most oppos'd in the House of Commons, who reasonably apprehended, 'That under this Pretence, new Spoils might be made of Church-Lands; so that upon a Division of the House, ninety were against it, but a hundred and thirty three being for it, it pass'd. Another Act pass'd with the like Opposition, 'By 'which all Religious Houses founded by Queen Mary, were suppress'd, and united to the Crown. A private Act pass'd, declaring the Deprivation of the Popish Bishops in King Edward's Reign valid in Law, and all the Leases made by their Successors legal. At last a Subsidy, two Tenths and two Fifteens were given, with the Tonnage and Poundage for the Queen's Life, and to the Parliament was dissolv'd on the eighth of May.

The Number of the Churchmen that were turn'd out.

Shortly after, in order to put the Laws in Execution, a general Visitation was appointed, and a High Commission Court set up; by which Means the establish'd Liturgy in the vulgar Tongue, was soon brought into all Churches; Images were remov'd without Tumult, and the Oath of Supremacy offer'd to the Popish Bishops, and all other Ecclesiastical Persons, which had been taken by most of them in the Reign of King Henry the eighth. As many as refus'd the Oath, were according to Law, turn'd out of all their Preferments; and of the nine thousand four hundred Benefices, then nam'd in England, fourteen Bishops, six Abbots, twelve Deans, twelve Arch-Deacons, fifteen Heads of Colleges, fifty Prebendaries, and eighty Rectors, was the whole Number of those that were depriv'd. But it was strongly believ'd, that the greatest Part comply'd against their Consciences, and would have been ready for another Turr, if the Queen had dy'd, while that Race of Incumbants liv'd, and the next Successor had been of another Religion. All the Bishops were at first under Confinement, but they were soon after set at Liberty; only Bonner, White and Watson, were detain'd Prisoners. Many grievous Complaints were brought against Bonner, for the illegal Cruelties he had exercis'd, and the Tortures he had put to his Prisoners; but the Queen resolv'd not to stain the Beginning of her Reign with Blood; and the Reformed Divines were not for revenging themselves, but for leaving all to the Justice of Heaven. Heath liv'd privately at his own House, where he was sometimes visited by the Queen: Pates, Scot and Goldwell, had leave to go beyond Sea. A few Gentlemen, and all the Nuns went likewise out of England; and so mild and gentle was the Queen, that she deny'd that Liberty to none that asked it.

Doctor Parker made Arch-Bishop of Canterbury.

The Queen proceeded next to fill up the vacant Bishopricks, and began with Canterbury; in which Affair Doctor Parker stood out for many Months, and he would not undertake so high a Charge, 'till his Friends had us'd all sorts of Arguments both Threatning and Persuasive, to induce him to comply. Upon the sending of the Conge d'eslire, he was elected by the Chapter of Canterbury; and shortly after the Queen issu'd out a Warrant for his Consecration, and after that a second, directed to Kitchin Bishop of Landaffe, the only complying Bishop in Possession, and to Barlow, Scory, and Coverdale, three Bishops depriv'd in the last Reign, and to Bale Bishop of Ossory, and two suffragan Bishops besides. Accordingly, on the seventeenth Day of December, by four of these, he was consecrated in the Chappel at Lambeth, according to the Book of Ordination, set out under King Edward, only the Ceremony of the Pastoral Staff was omitted; All which is apparent, not only from the Testimony of the Earl of Nottingham who saw it, but from the Records of the Crown, the Registers of the Sec of Canterbury, and the original Instrument describing all the Particulars of his Consecration, still preserv'd in Corpus Christi College in Cambridge. And this incontestably confutes the scandalous Fable of the Nag's-Head Ordination, and all other improbable Stories, afterwards invented by the Enemies of the establish'd Church of England. After this Arch-Bishop Parker proceeded regularly to consecrate many other Bishops; as Grindall, for the See of London; Cox, for Ely; Horn, for Winchester; Merrick, for Bangor; Young, for St. David's; Bullingham, for Lincoln; the famous Jewell, for Salisbury; Davis, for St. Asaph; Guest, for Rochester; Berkeley, for Bath and Wells; Bentham, for Coventry and Litchfield; Alley, for Exeter; and Parre, for Peterborough. Barlow and Scory, formerly depriv'd, were put into the Sees of Chichester and Hereford: And the Sees of York and Durham were kept vacant a Year, upon some Hopes that Heath and Tonstall should have conform'd; but after that, Young was translated from St. David's to York, and Pilkington advanc'd to Durham. Thus did this excellent Queen not only restore Peace to the Nation, but in the Compass of a Year recover the Reformation of Religion; while all Christendom stood amaz'd to see it effected with so little Commotion. And all Things were carry'd with such a general Temper and Moderation, that for ten Years there was no Disturbances about Religion, nor any severe Punishment of Roman Catholicks. By means of this Change and Establishment, as the Politicians observ'd, England became the most free of all Kingdoms in Christendom, and the Scepter deliver'd from the foreign Servitude of Rome; the Nation grew more wealthy than in former Ages, when infinite Sums were annually exported to Rome for First-Fruits, Indulgences, Pardons, Appeals, Dispensations, Palls, and other things, to the strange Impoverishment of the Republick. And thus having recover'd the almost Shipwrack'd Vessel to a safe Port, the Queen was able by the Blessing of God both to settle her Religion, and to lay the Foundations of a lasting Peace at home and abroad.

The Happiness of England.

II. While England was thus settled, and happy at home, Scotland was distracted, and began to suffer great Convulsions; all arising from the Factions within its own Bowels, and the Severity and Provocations of the Queen-Dowager, who was Regent of the Kingdom, and wholly in the Interest of France. The real Queen of Scotland, now seventeen Years of Age, was still in France, and this Year her Husband the Dauphine succeeded to the Crown, under the Name of Francis the Second. He being govern'd by the Counsel of the Guises, who bore the chief Sway in France, join'd with the Queen-Regent in all her violent Proceedings in Scotland. Vast Disturbances were rais'd, and innumerable Outrages committed in all Parts, upon the Account of Religion and Reformation: And at length the People made such a general Insurrection, that the Queen-Regent was compell'd to retire to Dunbar Castle. She was once willing to refer the whole Matter to a Parliament; but two thousand Men coming over from France, and Assurances being sent her of a greater Force to follow, she assum'd new Courage, went and fortify'd Leith, and broke her Agreement with the People, which she had more than once done before, upon a Pretence, That Princes were not strictly to be charg'd with their Promises, especially when made to Hereticks. Upon which the Lords alledg'd, 'That in their Queen's Minority, the Government was chiefly in the States, and that the Regent was only the chief Administrator, and accountable to them: Therefore they resolv'd to depose her from her Regency. They objected many Male-Administrations, as her Beginning a War in the Kingdom, and bringing in Foreigners to subdue it, her embasing the Coin, Governing without the Consent of the Nobility, and breaking her Faith and Promises to them; upon which they declar'd, That she was fallen from her Regency, and suspended her Power till the next Parliament. The Lords, now call'd The Lords of the Congregation, retir'd from Edenburgh to Sterlin; upon which the French came to Edenburgh, and set up the Mass in the Churches which had been laid aside; and soon after a new Supply came from France, commanded by the Marquis of Elbeuse, one of the Queen-Regent's Brothers, so that now there were four thousand French in Scotland. By means of this Foreign Force, the whole Nation came to be united against the Queen-Regent, and to look on her as a common Enemy.

The Troubles of Scotland.

The Queen-Regent depos'd

The Scots, who had been hitherto animated, and secretly supply'd with Money and Ammunition from England, were now forc'd more openly to beg the Queen's Assistance, which occasion'd several Debates in the Council, and many things were alledg'd to induce the Queen to join in this Affair. Particularly she had been highly provok'd by the young Queen of Scotland, who together with her Husband the French King had assum'd and usurp'd the Arms of England; which laid the Foundations of such a Jealousie as nothing but Death could extinguish. Besides it was thought highly impolitick to suffer the French to remain in Scotland, whose Designs were known to be deep and subtle, and their Ambition boundless: Infomuch that it was become a Proverb in these Days, 'That France could neither be poor nor peaceable for three Years together: And Queen Elizabeth frequently us'd that Saying of Valentinian, 'Chuse the French for your Friends, but not for your Neighbours. It was therefore finally resolv'd, That it was just, honest and necessary, immediately to drive the French out of Scotland.

A. D. 1560. Reg. 2. The Duke of Norfolk was sent to Berwick for this Purpose, and to treat with the Lords of the Congregation, now headed by the Duke of Chattelherault. On the twenty seventh of February, they agreed upon these Conditions, 'That the Scots should be perpetual Allies to the Queen of England; and 'that after the French were driven out of Scotland, they should continue their 'Obedience to their own natural Queen. Upon which two thousand Horse, and six thousand Foot, under the Lord Gray, were sent to assist the Scots, who after some Offers to the French, invested Leith. During that Siege, there were considerable Losses on both Sides, but those on the English Side were more easily supply'd from the neighbouring Parts, than the other. And this so affected the French, that they offer'd to restore Calais to the Queen of England, if she would withdraw her Forces from Scotland: She gave them a quick Answer, 'That she did not value that Fish-Town, so much as she did the Quiet and Security of all Britain. But she offer'd to mediate a Peace between them and the Scots; but before that could be effected, the Queen-Regent dy'd, having first ask'd Pardon of several of the Scotch Lords for the Injuries she had done them. However, not long after, a Peace was concluded between England, France and Scotland: 'An Oblivion was granted for all that was past; 'the French and English were to be sent out of Scotland; the Queen of Scotland was to quit the Arms of England and Ireland: During the Queen's Absence, the Kingdom was to be govern'd by a Council of Twelve, all Natives; 'of whom the Queen was to nominate Seven, and the States Five: All other 'Matters were referr'd to a Parliament. Thus both English and French remov'd out of Scotland, and a Parliament met in August; in which all those Acts that favour'd the old Way of Worship were repeal'd; and the Lands and Revenues of the Church were spoil'd after an unheard of Manner. However these Articles were rejected with Scorn by the King of France, so that the Scots began to apprehend a new War; but shortly after, the Death of that King, after a Reign of seventeen Months, deliver'd them from all their Fears: And the Scotch Queen, having no longer the Support of so great a Crown, was afterwards oblig'd to return home, and govern in such a Manner, as that Nation thought fit to allow. Thus did the Queen of England separate Scotland from its ancient Dependance on France, and so united it to her own Interests, that she was not only secure on that Side of her Dominions, but rais'd so great an Interest in Scotland, that Affairs there were generally govern'd according to the Directions she sent. This Peace was accounted advantageous for all Britain, the ancient Liberty of Scotland retain'd, and the Dignity of England preserv'd, which from that Time fear'd nothing from Scotland: So that the English joyfully acknowledg'd their Queen to be the Founder of their Security, and the Scotch Protestants the Defender of their Liberty.

The Queen's
Influence over Scotland.

The many Matches offer'd to her.

She, like a true Mother of her Country, was all the while so intent upon the publick Welfare, that she left no Room in her Thoughts for the Addresses of the most potent Princes. For besides those of King Philip, formerly mention'd, the Emperor Ferdinand recommended his younger Son Charles, Duke of Austria, to her for a Husband. And when this succeeded not, John Duke of Finland, second Son to Gustavus King of Swedeland, was sent by his Father to solicit for his eldest Brother Ericus; who was honourably receiv'd, but the Match rejected. Then Adolphus Duke of Holstein, Uncle to Frederick King

King of Denmark, came into England, with great Hopes of Success; but the Queen bestow'd upon him the Honour of the Garter, and an annual Pension, but not her own Person. Likewise James Earl of Arran was recommended to her by the Protestants of Scotland; but neither the Man nor the Motion prov'd acceptable. Of inferior Fortunes, there were some at home that pleas'd themselves with the Hopes of obtaining her: First, Sir William Pickering, a Gentleman of a noble Family, but most commended for his polite Studies, and sweet Demeanor: Then Henry Earl of Arundel, exceeding rich, but now in his declining Age: Then Robert Dudley, youngest Son to the Earl of Northumberland, of excellent Features, and in the Flower of his Age, afterwards one of her chief Favourites. Neither these, nor any other could ever prevail upon this Maiden Queen; tho' she was daily tempted to change her Resolution by all the alluring Pleasures of a Court, which shew'd it self in Interludes, Banquets and Balls, and surrounded with all things that might provoke the most cool and languishing Desires. Her Juvenile Age, and the Intemperance which ever attends a publick Court, gave occasion to some injurious Reports; but she easily wash'd off that slanderous Infamy, one of the most raging Crimes of of this Age, by the incredible Continnence and Chastity of her whole Life, all natural Inclinations being over-rul'd by her Modesty and Prudence. Her Maids of Honour always took a wonderful Pleasure in her Manners, her Discourses and Conversation, and wholly apply'd themselves to imitate her, borrowing from her the most illustrious Examples of Modesty and Chastity. But all in vain.

As this Queen was courted in Marriage by many temporal Princes, so she was courted in a different Manner by Pope Pius the Fourth, who being sensible of the Errors of his arrogant Predecessor, declar'd He would humble himself even to Heresie it self, in regard that whatsoever was done to gain Souls to Christ, did become that See. Accordingly he wrote a most loving Letter to her, kindly exhorting her to return to the Unity of the Catholick Church: And it is said, he made her great Offers, if she would hearken to his Counsel; particularly, That he would recall the Sentence pronounc'd against her Mother's Marriage, confirm the Book of Common-Prayer in English, and permit her People to use the Sacrament in both Kinds. But the Queen, according to her fix'd Motto, Semper Eadem, persisted constant in her Resolution, to maintain that Religion, which in her Conscience she was perswaded to be most agreeable to the Word of God, and most consonant to the Primitive Church. Likewise in the following Year, when the Pope sent the Abbot Martiningo as far as Flanders, the Queen sent her Commands to him not to cross the Sea but at his Peril: And tho' the Emperor and the King of Spain did earnestly intreat that he might be heard, yet she stood her Ground, and reply'd, That she could not treat with the Bishop of Rome, whose Authority was totally excluded out of England by Act of Parliament. This Answer she return'd to give them some Satisfaction, but to the Pope's Nuncio, she only gave a direct Denial: For she well perceiv'd this Remedy did not tend to the healing of the Wounds of the Church, but to the making them incurable; and the Event justify'd her Conduct. The Pope's Endeavours to gain her to his Interest.

The Queen being now more secure, that the Church might continue uncorrupted, she set forth two remarkable Proclamations: By one she commanded the Anabaptists, and such Heterodox People, who had flock'd from Foreign Countries to the Sea-Coasts of England, to depart the Realm within twenty Days, upon Pain of Imprisonment and Loss of Goods. By the other she restrain'd a Sacrilegious Kind of People, who under Colour of abolishing Superstition, began to pull down ancient Monuments, to deface the Epitaphs and Escutcheons of the noblest Families, and other venerable Remains of Antiquity, and to take the Bells and Lead from the Churches. She also converted the famous Abby of Westminster into a Collegiate-Church; instituting a Dean, twelve Prebendaries, a School-master, an Usher, forty Scholars, with several Officers, Her Care of the Church.

Officers, to the great Advantage of Religion and Learning. And then to the great Advancement of her Glory, she began gradually to call in the Brass Monny, and restore the Coin to its current and sterling Purity, and to repair the Honour of the Kingdom, by preventing the Frauds of those who adulterated the Coin both at Home and Abroad. All which she happily perform'd within a few Months without Commotion; First, by prohibiting the Melting down any Monny, whether Brass or Sterling; then by reducing Base Monny to its just Value; and lastly by purchasing all that was bad with her own Monny, provided it was brought into the Mint at a fix'd Time. So that to Queen Elizabeth is to be ascrib'd the Happiness of having better and purer Monny in England than had been us'd for two hundred Years before; a great and memorable Act which neither King Edward could, nor Queen Mary durst undertake.

These things happily accomplish'd, the Queen sent the Earl of Bedford into France, to condole the Death of King Francis, and congratulate his Successor Charles the Ninth, who was then but eleven Years of Age. The Earl, together with Throgmorton the Queen's Agent, often solicited the Widow Queen of Scotland to confirm the Treaty of Edinburgh: But her Answer was always the same, That she neither could, nor would do it without the Advice of the Nobility of Scotland. Upon which Queen Elizabeth, suspecting that this Answer was only to amuse her, while some dangerous Design was practising against her, sent Sir Thomas Randolph into Scotland, to persuade the Lords of that Country to enter into a League of mutual Amity with her, and other Protestant Princes; and likewise to use all just Methods to hinder their Queen from contracting a second Marriage with a Foreign Prince; for which many convincing Reasons were alledg'd. In the mean Time the Queen of Scotland, designing to return into her own Country, sent D'Oisely, a French Lord, to desire Queen Elizabeth, That with a safe Conduct she might pass by Sea into Scotland, and D'Oisely pass through England. But the incens'd Queen, in the Presence of a great Multitude, deny'd both the one and the other, unless she would confirm the Treaty of Edinburgh, declaring, If she perform'd that, she should find all the Kindness of a Queen, a Kinswoman, and a Neighbour, whether she went by Sea or Land. The Queen of Scotland was sensibly affected with this Answer, and vehemently expostulated the Matter with Throgmorton, as tho' she condescended too much in desiring the Favour, which she rather esteem'd as a Piece of Justice. And now resolving to run all Hazards, she set Sail from Calais, and by the Benefit of a Fog, pass'd by the English Fleet, which was thought to have stood ready to intercept her, and safely arriv'd in Scotland; where contrary to Expectation, she us'd all possible Clemency to her Subjects, made no Changes in Religion tho' tumultuously set up, but began to govern the Kingdom by wise and excellent Laws. Soon after she sent Letters to Queen Elizabeth, offering all Observance and Readiness to enter into a League with her, provided she might by Parliament be declar'd Heir apparent to the Crown of England, in Case she dy'd without Issue. This was a great Surprise to Queen Elizabeth, who expected nothing less than the Confirmation of the Treaty; so that the Substance of her Answer was, That for her Amity she wish'd her well, but as to her Proposal, she was not yet weary of her Life. Yet to show her Respect she entertain'd her Uncles, the Dukes D'Aumarl, and D'Elbeuse, and the other French Lords that brought her home, and return'd through England, with great Splendor and Magnificence. These two Queens had indeed both great Spirits, and Wisdom, but

the Queens.*

there arose such unhappy Jealousies of State between them, that it kept them further asunder in Love than in Blood, and was the Cause of many unkind Passages between them: In all which, tho' the Queen of Scotland was almost equal to the Queen of England in the Abilities of her Mind, yet in the Favours of Fortune she was much her inferior.

And

And now the wise and provident Princess, tho' she found her Treasure exhausted, to secure her self and People, began to furnish her Armory with all necessary Provisions for War, expending great Sums for Arms in Germany, and casting great Numbers of Iron and Brass Pieces of Cannon; which last was happily favour'd by a Discovery of a plentiful Mine of Brass at Keswick in Cumberland, sufficient to supply England and Foreign Nations. She likewise caus'd the first making of Gun-powder in England, that she might not be oblig'd to beg or purchase it of her Neighbours. She increas'd also the Garrison of Berwick, advanc'd their Pay, and fortify'd the Town with several new Works, which were finish'd in a short Time. She sent discreet and worthy Men to rebuild the strong Castles within twenty Miles of the Borders of Scotland, and erected another upon the Banks of Medway, for the advantage of her Fleet; which she so well furnish'd and improv'd, as did not only exceed what had been seen by Britain, but Strangers worthily stil'd her, The Restorer of the Naval Glory, and the Queen of the North-Sea. The wealthier Inhabitants of the Sea-Coasts did likewise follow the Queen's Example, in building Ships of War with all imaginable Chearfulness, insomuch that the Queen's Fleet, in Conjunction with her Subject's Shipping, was able to furnish twenty thousand fighting Men for Sea Service. Moreover the Noblemen and Commons were in all Places as industrious in providing themselves Arms; so that every Nobleman's House was a compleat Armory. Frequent Musters were observ'd, and the young Men were train'd up to the Arts of War, and exercis'd in Mock-Campaigns: And the Country People, when Licence was granted for the Transportation of Corn, began to follow their Husbandry with a double Diligence, and great Advantage. For the good of the publick, she increas'd the Salary of the Judges, and first allow'd them Provision for their respective Circuits: And tho' in many Cases she was a little sparing, yet she was never to learn where, when and how far to extend her Bounty; being really an equal Friend to Thrift, and Benefactor to Merit. In the midst of these Cares and Concerns, the tall and beautiful Spire of St. Paul's Cathedral, five hundred and twenty Foot in Height, was burnt down by Lightning from Heaven, as it was then believ'd; for which Reason it was for near seventy Years reckoned among the ordinary Epoches, or Accounts of Time, in the common Almanacks; 'till an old Plumber at his Death confess'd that it happen'd through his Negligence, in leaving a Pan of Coals in the Steeple when he went to Dinner.

While England was happy under the Government of a Masculine Queen, France became miserable under that of a Minor King. Violent Dissentions were rais'd among the Peers, who were soon form'd into two Factions, both using the glorious Pretext of Religion: Of the one, the Duke of Guise, a Papist, was Head, of the other the Prince of Conde, a Protestant; and the Protestors of his Religion were most grievously afflicted, which by Degrees caus'd a War to break out, that was carry'd on for thirty Years together. Queen Elizabeth soon began to apprehend that England might feel the Heat of the neighbouring Flames: For she understood that the Guises, to allure the King of Navarre, had made a private Offer to him of that Kingdom, and the Queen of Scotland for his Wife, together with the Kingdom of England in Dowry; and all this by the Wealth of Spain, and the Authority of the Pope, who should dissolve the Marriage of Navarre with his Wife, as being an Heretick, and depose the Queen of England for the same Reason. Upon which she sent over Sir Henry Sidney, a Person of approv'd Abilities, to sound the Bottom of this Affair, and to persuade the Heads of each Party to an Accommodation. But Matters were gone too far to admit of any Remedy of that Kind; whereupon he return'd out of France, and was immediately sent to the Queen of Scotland, to defer the Interview which she had desir'd with the Queen in England, 'till the following Year, or 'till the Wars in France were ended. All this was agreed; and Queen Elizabeth, after mature Deliberation, took into her Protection the French King's Subjects

Subjects in Normandy, and made a Compact with the Prince of Conde, Rohan, Coligny and others, 'That she would pay them a hundred thousand Angels, 'and send them six thousand Men, of which one half should defend Dieppe and ' Roan; and that they should deliver into her Hands Haure-de-Grace, which ' should be held by three thousand English Soldiers, in the French King's Name, 'till Calais should be restor'd. On the same Day that this Compact was made, she by a publick Writing declar'd the Reasons of her Proceedings; and in the Month of September, one Part of the English Army, under Sir Adrian Poy- nings, arriv'd at Haure-de-Grace or Newhaven, to the great Joy of the Inha- bitants, and the other Part at Dieppe. After the Arrival of the Earl of War- wick, General of the whole Army, they made some little Excursions into the neighbouring Parts of the Country; to prevent which the Rhinegrave came and encamp'd near them. Nevertheless several slight Skirmishes pass'd between the French and the English; and the Mariners of the Fleet in the mean Time scour'd the Seas, and almost every Day brought in rich Prizes.

At home, several great Persons were this Year call'd in Question: Margaret Countess of Lenox, Niece to King Henry the Eighth, and her Husband the Earl of Lenox, for keeping secret Correspondence with the Queen of Scotland, were deliver'd Prisoners to Sir Richard Sackville, Master of the Rolls, and detain'd for some Time. Also Arthur Pool and his Brother, Great Grand-Children to George Duke of Clarence, Brother to King Edward the Fourth, Anthony Fortescue, who had marry'd their Sister, and others, were arraign'd, for Conspiring to withdraw themselves to the Duke of Guise in France; and from thence to return with an Army into Wales, to proclaim the Scotch Queen Sovereign of England, and Arthur Pool Duke of Clarence. All which they confess'd at the Bar, and were thereupon condemn'd to die; but their Lives were generously spar'd by the Queen, in regard they were of the Royal Blood. But the Lady Catharine Gray, Sister to Queen Jane, met with less kind Usage in the case of a smaller Fault: She having formerly been marry'd to the Earl of Pembroke's eldest Son, and soon after legally divorc'd from him, afterwards she was found with Child by Edward Seymour, Earl of Hartford, who being at that Time in France, was immediately order'd to return: And being examin'd before the Arch-Bishop of Canterbury, and affirming that they were lawfully marry'd, but not being able within a limited Time to produce Witnesses of their Marriage, they were both committed to the Tower, where the Lady was deliver'd of a Son. Afterwards, by Connivance or Corruption of their Keepers, being sometimes permitted to come together, she was again with Child by him; which so provok'd the Queen, that Sir Edward Warner, Lieutenant of the Tower, was turn'd out of his Place, and the Earl was fin'd five thousand Pounds in the Star-Chamber, and kept in Prison nine Years after: Tho' in pleading of his Cause, one John Hales argu'd, They were lawful Man and Wife, by Virtue of their own bare Consent, without any Ecclesiastical Ceremony. The unhappy Lady, afterwards with Grief falling into a mortal Sicknes, humbly desir'd the Queen's Pardon, for having marry'd without her Knowledge, and recommending her Children to her Clemency, dy'd in the Tower.

Reg. 5.

The second Parliament in this Reign.

The Practices of the Papists, and the Dangers threatening both the Queen and Kingdom, occasion'd her to call a new Parliament, which met on the twelfth of January, and particularly pass'd an Act for the Preservation of the Queen's Majesty and the Realm, and for avoiding the future Inconveniences and Dishonours, arising from the usurp'd Authority of the Bishop of Rome: In which it was made High-Treason for any to assert Thrice by Writing, ' Word or Deed, the Authority of any foreign Prince, Prelate or State, in Spi- ' ritual Matters, in England, or any other of the Queen's Dominion; or re- ' fuse the Oath of Supremacy to the Queen in Matters Spiritual, or over Ec- ' clesiastical Persons, after it had been twice tender'd; yet so as that they should ' not beheaded at York. And now as these two great Men were fatally taken off by violent Means, so three others this Year were remov'd by a natural Death. First, William Powlet, the old Marquess of Winchester, Lord High-Treasurer of England; who notwithstanding his continual Adherence to the Popish Religion, was by the wise Queen continu'd in his Place to the last, being then ninety seven Years of Age, and having seen a hundred and three Persons of the Issue of his own Body. Next dy'd Edward Earl of Darby, with whom the Glory of the English Hospitality seem'd to fall asleep, as Camden observes. Lastly Sir William Peter, a great Benefactor to Exeter College in Oxford, who from an honest Parentage rais'd himself to be Privy-Counsellor and Secretary to four crown'd Heads, Henry the eighth, Edward the Sixth, Queen Mary, and Queen Elizabeth. The Lord Treasurer's Place was fill'd up by Sir William Cecil, whom the Queen the last Year had created Lord Burleigh; with Commendations answerable to his extraordinary Worth and Abilities.

The Earl of Northumberland beheaded.

A few Days after the Death of the Duke of Norfolk, the Lord De la Ware, Sir Ralph Sadler, Doctor Wilson, and Thomas Bromley, were sent to the Queen of Scotland to expostulate with her as to her Proceedings; 'That she 'had usurp'd the Title and Arms of the Kingdom of England, and had refus'd 'to renounce the same, contrary to the Treaty of Edinburgh: That she had 'endeavour'd the Marriage with the Duke of Norfolk, without acquainting his 'Sovereign, and had us'd all forcible Means to free him out of Prison: That 'she had rais'd the Rebellion in the North, and reliev'd the Rebels both in 'Scotland and the Netherlands; and had implor'd Aids from the Pope, the 'King of Spain, and others: That she had conspir'd with certain English Men 'to free her out of Prison, and proclaim her Queen of England: Lastly, That 'she had procur'd the Pope's Bull against Queen Elizabeth, and suffer'd her self 'publickly to be stil'd Queen of England in Foreign Countries. All which Accusations she either absolutely deny'd, or plausibly extenuated; and tho' she declar'd her self to be a free Queen, and not subject to any Creature upon Earth, yet she was content, and requested that she might make her Personal Answer in the next Parliament.

Expostulations with the Queen of the Scots.

About the same Time Charles the French King, in all Appearance, fixing his Thoughts upon the Netherland War, concluded a Peace, and enter'd into a League with Queen Elizabeth; which was to remain firm, not only during their own two Lives, but also between their Successors, if the said Successor should signifie to the Survivor within a Year, that he accepted it, otherwise to be at Liberty. It was likewise agreed what Aid by Sea and Land, they should each of them afford to the other upon Occasion. And for the Ratification of this League, the Earl of Lincoln Admiral of England was sent into France, accompany'd with the Lords Dacres, Rich, Talbot, Sands, and others. The French King likewise sent the Duke of Montmorency and Paul Foix into England, with a splendid Retinue; that the Queen in the Presence of them, and the ordinary Ambassador, might swear to the League, which she did at Westminster, on the seventeenth of May; the Day after which she honour'd Montmorency with the Order of the Garter. This Duke, while he stay'd in England, interceded in his Master's Name, That all Favour, not really dangerous, might be shewn to the Queen of Scotland; and then again reviv'd and promoted the Queen's Marriage with the Duke of Anjou: But finding great Obstacles, by Reason of the Diversity of Religion, he without further Expectation return'd into France, where his Master began to grow cold and remis as to the Scotch Queen, because she inclin'd more to the Spaniard than to him. Shortly after the Queen-Mother of France commanded the French Ambassador in England to propose a Marriage between Queen Elizabeth, and her youngest Son Francis Duke of Alençon, which he did at Kenelworth: But the Queen modestly excus'd her self, upon the Difference of Religion and Inequality of Age, he being but seventeen, and she thirty eight; yet she promis'd to consider of it, so that Alençon prosecuted his Suit with Vigour by the Mediation of Flerie. But at the same Time greater Preparations were made for a Marriage between Henry King of Navarre, and the Lady Margaret the French King's Sister; to which great Solemnity, with profound Dissimulation, the Queen of Navarre and the Heads of all the Protestants were allur'd, with Promises that there should be a Renovation of Love, and a perpetual Peace establish'd. The Earl of Leicester likewise and the Lord Burleigh were invited out of England, and the Sons of the Elector Palatine out of Germany, under the Colour of Respect and Honour; but in Reality, that they and the rest might be insnar'd, and that the Protestant Religion at one Blow might be exterminated, or receive a mortal Wound. For upon the Celebration of the Marriage, there immediately follow'd the infamous and execrable Massacre of Paris, and the terrible Slaughter of the Protestants throughout all the Cities of France. But to put a Colour of Equity upon the Fact, Edicts and Proclamations were set forth, importing, That the Protestants had conspir'd against the King, and all the Royal Family; and in Memory of it Medals were struck, as of an Action fortunate and honourable. But the King of France, notwithstanding all his Shews of Piety, did not escape the Divine Vengeance; for before two Years were expir'd he was seiz'd with unnatural Distempers, and strange Irruptions of Blood, and afterwards with long and grievous Torments ended his Life.

The Queen's Care of the Publick.

The Queen, who had enjoy'd a perfect Health, fell sick of the Small-Pox at Hampton-Court, but fully recover'd before her Illness was known abroad, and immediately proceeded to the Care of the Government; commanded Portsmouth to be new and strongly fortify'd, increas'd the Number of the Ships; made Musters of the Train-Bands in every County, and caus'd the Youth to be taught the Exercise of Arms, and all this in a time of profound Peace. And having formerly borrow'd Money of her Subjects, she now repaid it with such Thanks, as won her no less Love, than if she had given it; and at this Time she gain'd further Love by issuing out two Proclamations; by one of which she commanded the Nobility to observe the Laws against keeping many Retainers; by the other, she restrain'd Informers, who under Colour of discovering Crown Lands conceal'd by private Persons, sacrilegiously seiz'd upon the Lands of Churches and Alms-Houses, piously endow'd by the Queen's Ancestors. What still added to her Honour and Esteem was the performing two Acts of Justice much desir'd; by one she satisfy'd the Merchants out of the detain'd Goods belonging to the Dutch, restor'd the rest to the Duke of Alva, and made a full Agreement with the Merchants of Genoa, for the Money formerly intercepted: By the other she discharg'd England of the Debts which her Father and Brother had contracted with Foreigners, which were much increas'd by annual Interest, and likewise caus'd the Charters of London, which had been so often renew'd, to be now restor'd, to the great Joy and Satisfaction of the Citizens. In Ireland were some Commotions, occasion'd by the too rigorous Conduct of Sir Edward Fitton Governor of Cownaught, for which the Queen remov'd him from that Post, and made him Treasurer of Ireland. In Leinster also the O-Moors, a seditious kind of People, made an Insurrection; but being proclaim'd Traitors, they return'd to their Duties at the Persuasion of the Earl of Kildare.

A. D. VII. While England was generally at Peace within it self, and free from Foreign Disturbances, the Netherlands felt all the Troubles of intestine Convulsions, and the Miseries of Tyrannical Proceedings. The King of Spain, by his Ambassador, had complain'd to Queen Elizabeth, that the Netherlands Rebels were harbour'd and entertain'd in England, contrary to the Articles of the League: Whereupon the Queen issu'd out a severe Proclamation, commanding all the Dutch, suspected of Rebellion, immediately to leave the Nation; which yet turn'd little to the Advantage of the Duke of Alva or the King of Spain.

Spain. For upon this, Count Vander-Mark, and other Dutch going out of England, soon surpriz'd the Brill, and then Flushing; and drawing other Towns to revolt, in a short Time they in a manner excluded the Duke of Alva from the Sea; which was judg'd a great Error in that active Governor. Shortly after many Military Men in England, having no Imployment at home, went over to the Netherlands, some to the Duke of Alva, but the far greater Number to the Prince of Orange, who headed the contrary Party, who in Time caus'd himself to be declar'd Stadtholder to the King of Spain. The first who went over was Thomas Morgan, who carry'd three hundred English to Flushing; and then by his Procurement follow'd nine Companies more under the Conduct of Humphry Gilbert; and afterwards it became the Nursery of all the English Soldiers. After these Misfortunes, the Duke of Alva, contrary to his Inclinations, began to show more Kindness towards the English, so that in the Month of January this Year, the Trade which had been forbidden in the Year 1568, was now allow'd again between the Dutch and the English for two Years. But all that this Duke could do, did not hinder him from being recall'd from his Government; and Zuniga, a Man of a more peaceable Disposition, was sent in his Room. Thus were the Foundations of the Liberties of the United Provinces in the Netherlands, laid in the Blood of its Inhabitants; and at first as zealously promoted by the Popish Subjects, to preserve their Civil Privileges, as by the Protestants to secure their Lives and Fortunes from the Fury of the Spaniards.

Many English go thither.

The Duke of Alva remov'd.

In France, the last Year, in November, a Daughter was born to the French King, to whom he requested Queen Elizabeth to be God-Mother; who accordingly sent the Earl of Worcester into France with a Font of Massie Gold, to stand as her Deputy at the Solemnity. Upon this, and the Queen's Promises to observe the League strictly, the French King and the Queen-Mother began more tenderly to affect her, and the Duke of Alençon writ several Love-Letters to her, while the French King and his Mother passionately interceded for the Marriage. At this Time the Queen, upon many Considerations, began to think it proper for her to marry; but the Courtiers, for their own Interest, us'd as many to dissuade her from it. At length the Queen-Mother of France became extreamly importunate, That her Son Alençon might have leave to come and visit her; and the being weary'd with continual Letters and Messages, gave her Consent; but with this Precaution, That he should not take it for any Dishonour to him, if he return'd without obtaining his Suit. But as soon as she understood that his Brother Henry was elected King of Poland, and that the King of France was dangerously sick, she gave Intimation to Alençon, That he should not too much hasten his Passage into England; but should first procure a Peace in France, and declare by some memorable Action his Affection towards the Protestants, by which he might become a more welcome Guest in England. Upon this, a Peace was concluded in France, and in some Places the Protestants were allow'd to exercise their Religion: And then again the French King and the Queen-Mother us'd all their Endeavours to promote the Marriage; and withal, they requested of Queen Elizabeth, that if the Duke of Anjou took his Voyage into Poland by Sea, he might have publick Security to sail through the British Ocean. To this last Request, she not only consented with all Readiness, but also offer'd him a particular Fleet to conduct him. In the mean Time, Alençon fell sick of the Measles, which his Mother signify'd to Queen Elizabeth by Count Gondy, with an Excuse for his not coming to England as he had determin'd. The Count found the Queen at Canterbury, who receiv'd him with great Honour; and Archbishop Parker gave as noble an Entertainment to them both, as had been given to the Emperor Charles the Fifth, and King Henry the Eighth, at the same Palace in the Year 1519.

The Duke of Alençon prosecutes his Suit.

In Scotland, since the Death of the Earl of Marre, there had been no Regent; but now chiefly by the Procurement of Queen Elizabeth, the Earl of Morton

The Affairs of Scotland.

Morton was made Regent; who by the Authority of a Parliamentary Assembly, Enacted many profitable Laws, for the Defence of Religion against Papists and Hereticks, in the Name of the King: But the Protection and Keeping of the King's Person, was confirm'd to the young Earl of Marre, as a Right belonging to that Family; yet upon these Conditions, That no Papists nor Factious Persons should be admitted to his Presence. In the mean Time the French King sent his Ambassador to corrupt the Earls of Atholl and Huntley, with large Promises, to oppose the Regent; while Queen Elizabeth as much labour'd to defend him, and insisted upon the Popish Cruelties in the late Massacre of Paris. But tho' by the Management of Killigrew, she had drawn Duke Hamilton, the Earl of Huntley, and the most Eminent of their Party to acknowledge the Regent upon indifferent Conditions; yet the Lord Grange, Governor of Edinburgh Castle, the Lord Humes, Bishop Lidington and others, would by no means admit of the Regent's Government, but by Lidington's Advice, held out that Castle in the Name of the Queen of Scotland, relying upon the Strength of the Place, and the Promises of the French and Spaniards. When no Persuasions could prevail upon these Men, Queen Elizabeth suffer'd her self to be intreated by the Regent, to send Forces, Guns and Ammunition, for attacking the Castle, upon Condition that ten Hostages should be sent into England, to be Security for returning all the Men and Ammunition, not lost by the common Hazard of War. The Conditions being settled, William Drury, Marshal of the Garrison at Berwick, with some great Ordnance, and fifteen hundred Soldiers, and several brave Volunteers, enter'd into Scotland, and invested the Castle, which after thirty three days Siege was deliver'd up to the Regent for the King's Use, with all the Persons that were in it. The Lord Grange and his Brother, with one or two more, were hang'd; tho' extraordinary Offers were made to save the Life of the first: The Lord Humes and the rest were spar'd, through the gracious Intercession of Queen Elizabeth; Lidington was sent to Leith, where he dy'd, not without Suspicion of Poison; a Man of an excellent Wit, and great Understanding, but too variable in his Temper. And now from this Time Scotland began to breath, after long Civil Wars; and the Commanders, as well as Soldiers of both Parties, betook themselves to Sweden, France and the Netherlands, where they reap'd more Laurels than they did in their own Country. As for the famous Bishop of Ross, he was set at Liberty, but commanded immediately to depart out of England; and being beyond Sea, he still continu'd to sollicite the Cause of his Mistress, the Queen of Scotland, with most of the Potentates of Christendom; from whom he met with many Promises, but no effectual Performances.

They are settled by Queen Elizabeth's Power.

In Ireland, many particular Insurrections were made this Year by the O-Conors, and the O-Moors, but more especially by Mac Phelim and his Adherents, who burnt Carickfergus, and committed many Outrages. Against these the valiant Walter Earl of Essex offer'd his Service to the Queen; and with great Expence to himself, went over with several brave Adventurers. But meeting with many unexpected Difficulties, for which the Earl of Leicester has been much condemn'd, after the wasting of a Year's Time and much Treasure, with no answerable Success, he obtain'd leave to return home to England. Here all Things were still in a quiet Condition, only the Queen and the Ecclesiastical State were much tormented with the new Sect call'd Puritans, who under a Pretence of greater Purity in Doctrine and Discipline, endeavour'd to eradicate Things that were well establish'd, to make way for their own Novelties; therefore the Queen, to prevent a Schism in the Church, commanded the Law concerning Uniformity of Publick Prayers, to be in all Places put into Execution. It was thought the more necessary to restrain all new Opinions and Notions, by reason of one Peter Burchet of the Middle-Temple, who taught that it was lawful to kill any that oppos'd the Truth of the Gospel; and and so strictly pursu'd that Principle by his Practice, that it brought upon him the Guilt of Murder, for which he suffer'd Death, according to Law.

The Duke of Alençon, the most importunate of all the Queen's Suitors, by Letters and Maveifeir the French Ambassador, now reviv'd his Amours, and begg'd leave he might come into England and prosecute them in Person; and the Queen having an Esteem for him, and at present some Inclinations to marry, she granted him a safe Conduct, with Demonstrations of great Respect for his Person. But before her Answer came to him, it was suspected by the Queen Mother, That he and the King of Navarre would remove her from the Government, and therefore they had Keepers set over them, and were committed to Custody: For the Guises had suggested that Alençon held intimate Correspondence with Admiral Coligny, the Head of the Protestants in France. But Thomas Wilkes, Dale's Secretary, came privately to them both, and comforted them in the Queen of England's Name, promising she would omit no Opportunity to relieve them: For which the subtle Queen Mother made such Complaints to Queen Elizabeth, that Wilkes was compell'd to go into France and beg Pardon for his Fault; tho' twenty five Years after, he receiv'd the Honour of Knighthood from Navarre, when he was King of France. Queen Elizabeth sent Thomas Randolph into France to the Queen-Mother, that if it were possible he might gain Reconciliation for Alençon her Son, and for the King of Navarre: But before he landed in France, King Charles dy'd in great Torment, as was hinted before; whose Funeral Obsequies were tolempnly perform'd in St. Paul's Cathedral in London. Now Henry the Third succeeding to the Crown of France, Queen Elizabeth sent the Lord North to congratulate his Return out of Poland to his own Inheritance, and desir'd him to restore Alençon into Favour, but the Ambassador effected nothing material; for France, push'd on by its own fatal Destiny, ran desperately into a Civil War. Nevertheless, the new King and his Mother sent Le Garde into England, again to promote the Marriage with the Queen, and to divert the young Duke from War and Faction at home.

In these Times, Camden observes, That an extraordinary Excess in Apparel had spread it self over all England, and the Habit of the Country, by a peculiar Vice incident to an imitating Nation, grew into such Disesteem, that Men by their New-fashion'd Garments, and gaudy Attire, discover'd the Deformity and Weakness of their Minds, while they shin'd in their Silks laced or imbroider'd with Silver and Gold. The Queen observing, that to maintain this Excess, large Sums were yearly exported to buy Silks and other Foreign Ornaments, to the impoverishing of the Republick; and that many of the Nobility that might be serviceable to the State, and others of noble Extract, not only wasted their Estates, but also ran so much into Debt, as to be tempted to raise Commotions in the Nation; she therefore commanded them by Proclamation, That all Persons should within fourteen Days conform themselves in Apparel to a certain prescrib'd Fashion, lest they incurr'd the Severity of the Laws made under Henry the Eighth and Queen Mary: And she began the Example her self in her own Court. But still through the Untowardness of the Times, both the Proclamation and the Laws by several steps gave way to the Pride of the People; which also began to be attended with luxurious Banquets, and Prodigality in Buildings. For at this Time more large and magnificent Buildings were erected, than in any other Age before, to the great Ornament of the Kingdom, but as our Author says, to as great Decay of the glorious Hospitality of the Nation.

Excess in Apparel restrain'd.

The Consideration of some of these Matters was one Occasion of the Meeting of a new Session of Parliament, upon the eighth Day of February; which was the very same Parliament that last broke up in the Year 1572, and is not mention'd by Camden, and the common Historians, either for the Shortness of the Sessions, or the small Importance of the Acts. Here one Subsidy, two Fif-

House of Commons again desir'd, That her Majesty would make the Nation happy in her Marriage. To which she answer'd by the Mouth of the Lord-Keeper Bacon, That tho' in her own private Thoughts she was no ways dispos'd towards Matrimony, yet for their Sakes, she would surmount her Aversion; when all things should concur agreeable to the Majesty of her Person, the Dignity of the State, and the Advantage of Religion. This Speech was the last made by this great Man in Parliament, in which, in the Presence of both Houses, he among other Things declar'd, That her Majesty's Affections were so great to her People, that if the Virtues of all the Princes in Europe were united in her Person, she would gladly employ them to their Good; and she wish'd that the Benefits they receiv'd from her were Treble in Number, and Quadruple in Greatness and Goodness. Then as to the Aids they had granted, She esteem'd their Readiness to give, and the Heartiness of their Love, more than ten Subsidies; and she was ready to return all back to them, with the same Alacrity it was granted, if the Necessities of the Realm, and their Security would permit it. After this Speech, this Parliament was Prorogu'd on the fifteenth Day of March from Time to Time, during five Years, 'till the Year 1580.

The Earl of Essex in Ireland.

Notwithstanding the Queen of Scotland was still a Prisoner, all was calm and quiet in England for this Year; only a Difference arose between Sir John Forster Governor of Berwick, and John Carmichill Warden of Liddesdale in Scotland. In composing of which, the Regent himself having displeas'd the Queen of England, was oblig'd to come unarm'd before the Earl of Huntington the English Commissioner at Bordenrod; and thus the Matter was compos'd, and the Regent ever continu'd constant in observing the Queen's Pleasure, and to his great Commendation restrain'd the Free-Booters of the Borders, to the Peace and Prosperity of both Kingdoms. In Ireland, the Earl of Essex having resign'd up his Command in Ulster to the Lord Deputy, as unable to prosecute his Designs with the small Number allow'd him, he was commanded to re-assume it; but he had scarce march'd against Turlogh, but he receiv'd other Orders to finish the War, and make as honourable a Peace as he could. Which being soon effected, he march'd against the Hebredian Scots, who had seiz'd upon Clandeboy, and drove them into the retiring Places; and by the skilful Conduct of Norris attempted the Isle of Rathlin, put four hundred of the Inhabitants to the Sword, forc'd the Castle, and garrison'd it with English. But in the midst of his Victories and Successes, he was again, contrary to Expectation, commanded to resign his Authority; only as an ordinary Captain he had the Command of three hundred Men given him, and by the wicked Contrivances of the Earl of Leicester was ever cross'd in his good and honourable Designs.

The Affairs of the Netherlands.

In the Netherlands the Troubles and Commotions were greater; where Zúñiga, Successor to the Duke of Alva, was wholly resolv'd to recover the Command of the Seas, which Alva had neglected: But not being sufficiently provided with a Navy, he sent Boischoit into England, that with the Queen's leave he might take up Ships and Seamen to act against the Hollanders and Zealanders; but this she would not grant. Next he desir'd, That the Queen would not take it amiss, if the English Exiles in the Netherlands serv'd the King of Spain by Sea against the Hollanders; and that they might have free Access to the Ports of England, to buy Provisions for ready Mony. This being also refus'd, he then requested, That the Dutch, who were Rebels to the King of Spain, might be driven out of England; but neither would she consent to this, as being an Action void of Humanity, and contrary to the Laws of Hospitality. Yet because she would not be thought to violate the old Burgundian Alliance she commanded by Proclamation, That such Dutch Ships as were in the English Ports should be stopp'd, and those Dutch who had taken up Arms against the King of Spain should be hinder'd from entering the Ports of England, in which was nam'd the Prince of Orange, and fifty others of his Party. All this she did did with the more Readiness, because Zuniga, at Intercession of the English Ambassador, had remov'd the Earl of Westmorland, and other English Fugitives out of the Spanish Dominions, and had also dissolv'd the English Seminary at Doway; tho' instead of that, the Guises, through the Procurement of Pope Gregory the Thirteenth, establish'd another at Rheims.

And now the Politick Prince of Orange finding his Forces but small, and having little Hopes of Assistance from England, enter'd into a grand Consultation with the Confederate States, to whose Protection they could most securely betake themselves: They knew the Princes of Germany were not all of one Opinion, parted from their Mony with Difficulty, and could not unanimously concur with them in their Religion; therefore they were not Persons proper for their Purpose. Next they saw the French were involv'd in a Civil War, and had sufficient Employment at home; besides the Remembrance of the old Resentments and Fews between them and the Dutch; therefore neither were they thought proper for this critical Juncture. There remain'd then only the English, if they might be obtain'd, as best for their Designs, of the same profess'd Religion, and of a Language not much different, strong in Shipping, and rich in Merchandize. After a full Consultation, they sent over an honourable Embassie of several Persons, with Doctor Melsen; who in an eloquent Oration offer'd the Countries of Holland and Zealand to be possess'd or protected by the Queen, as being descended from the Princes of Holland, by Philippa, Wife to the great Edward the Third, Daughter of William of Bavaria, Count of Hannault and Holland; by whose other Sister, the Hereditary Right of those Provinces came to the King of Spain. To this Offer the Queen took time to reply, and after mature Consideration, her Answer was, That she was not yet satisfy'd how she might with her Honour and a safe Conscience take those Provinces into her Protection, much less into her Possession; but promis'd to deal earnestly with the Spaniard to procure them a happy Peace. Shortly after Zuniga the Governor of the Netherlands dy'd; upon which the States of Brabant and Flanders, and the other Provinces, assum'd the ancient Administration and Authority in the Republick; which the King of Spain was compell'd to confirm to them, 'till such time as Don John of Austria was come among them, whom he design'd for their Governor. In the mean time Queen Elizabeth, in behalf of the King of Spain, sent William Davison as Ambassador to those Provinces, to exhort them to a peaceable and quiet Condition; which prov'd of no great Effect, by reason of the continual Outrages of the Spanish Soldiers.

The Confederate States chuse Queen Elizabeth for their Protector.

These daily increas'd, and the Inhabitants were roughly treated and harrafs'd with all manner of Injuries; Antwerp, the most beautiful and famous Place of Trade in all Europe, was miserably pillag'd, and the House of the English Merchants rifled; insomuch that the States were driven to take up Arms, and Emisaries were sent to all neighbouring Princes. To Queen Elizabeth was sent Monsieur D'Aubigny, both to represent the just Reasons they had for taking up Arms, and likewise to borrow a large Sum of Mony, to enable them to resist the Spaniard; but she being certainly inform'd, That they had first su'd to the French King for Aid, deny'd the Request, yet promis'd earnestly to intercede with the King of Spain for a Peace. And to that Purpose she sent Sir John Smith, who was Cousin-German to King Edward the Sixth, a Man of Spanish Behaviour, and well known to that King, who honourably receiv'd him at his Court; where this Ambassador with such Discretion retorted the detracling Speeches of the Arch-Bishop of Toledo and the Spanish Inquisitors, who would not admit the Queen's Title of Defender of the Faith, that he obtain'd Thanks from the King of Spain himself, who desir'd him not to mention the Matter to his Queen, and gave strict Command that the Title should be admitted. At this time Don John of Austria, natural Son to the Emperor Charles the Fifth,

Fifth, came into the Netherlands with Supream Power; to whom Queen Elizabeth sent Edward Horsey, Governor of the Isle of Wight, to congratulate his Arrival, and offer him Assistance in case the Confederate States call'd the French into the Netherlands. Yet at the same time, as a compleat Politician, upon the great Importunity of these States, she sent them twenty thousand Pounds Sterling, upon Condition they should neither change their Prince nor Religion, receive no French into their Country, nor yet refuse a Peace, if Don John should condescend to reasonable Conditions: But if he embrac'd a Peace, then the Mony should be paid to the Spanish Soldiers, who were ready to Mutiny for want of Pay. So careful was this great Queen to retain these wavering Provinces in their Fidelity and Obedience to the King of Spain.

England was at this time in a pleasant Calm and Quiet, and the Trade between the English and Portuguese was enlarg'd; and at this time some Studious Heads, excited with a laudable Desire to discover the more remote Regions of the World, undertook a Voyage to try if they could find any Sea upon the North Parts of America, leading to the wealthy Coast of Cathay, by which might be join'd in one Commerce the Riches of both the East and West Parts of the Globe. In this Voyage was imploy'd Martin Forbisher, who set Sail from Harwich the eighteenth Day of June; and the ninth of August, enter'd into that Northern Bay or Sea, but could pass no further by reason of the Snow and Ice. The like Expedition was undertaken two Years after, but with no better Success. In this Year 1576, dy'd Maximilian the Emperor, a Prince who had merited much from Queen Elizabeth and the English; and there-upon the famous Sir Philip Sidney was sent to his Son Rodolphus King of the Romans to condole his Father's Death, and congratulate his Accession to the Empire; as also to do the like to the Elector Palatine, Frederick the Third, with his surviving Son.

The Death of
the Earl of Essex.

As Germany had a great Loss from the Death of these Princes, so England and Ireland, in Proportion, had no less from that of Walter Earl of Essex; who by the Envy of wicked Leicester was recall'd from Ireland, and by his Fears sent back again with the empty Title of Earl Marshal of Ireland; where with Grief, a bloody Flux, and probably with something worse, he ended his Days in great Torments. In the midst of his Pains, by a kind of a prophetic Spirit, he desir'd his Friends about him, to admonish his Son, who was then scarce ten Years of Age, To have always in his Thoughts the thirty sixth Year of his Age, as the utmost Boundary of his Life, which neither he nor his Father could pass, and to which his Son could never arrive, as will be shew'd in its proper Place. He likewise said to young Homines his Page, We have been both poison'd, you have only lost your Hair, but I must lose my Life. This was believ'd to have been effected by one Crompton, by the Procurement of Leicester; which Suspicion was much increas'd by that Earl's Behaviour immediately after his Death, who having by large Promises and Mony put away Douglass Sheffield, by whom he had a Son, openly marry'd Essex's Widow. For tho' it was reported that he had already marry'd her in private, yet Sir Francis Knolles her Father, who was well acquainted with Leicester's ravishing Amours, would not believe him in earnest unless he himself was present at the Marriage, and had it testify'd by a publick Notary. At this time also dy'd Sir Anthony Cook, a learned Man, who had been School-Master to King Edward the Sixth, who had given such a learned Education to his five Daughters, above their Sex, that he marry'd them all to Men of great Note and Honour: The first to the great Lord Burleigh, the second to the Lord-Keeper Bacon, the third to Sir Thomas Hobby who dy'd Ambassador in France, the fourth to Sir Ralph Roulet, and the fifth to Sir Henry Killigrew.

Hitherto the Papists in England had met with nothing but fair and calm Weather, and by a tender Connivance enjoy'd their own Way of Worship in their Houses in a manner without Punishment; and tho' they were prohibited by by the Laws of the Land, yet the merciful Queen thought that Violence was not to be offer'd to their Consciences. But after the Thunders of the Vatican were levell'd against the Queen, this fair Season turn'd gradually into Clouds and Tempests, and caus'd a strict Law in 1571 against any who should bring any Bulls from Rome, or any Marks of Papal Obedience, or should reconcile any Person to the Church of Rome. Yet there was no Man in six Years time proceeded against upon that Law, tho' some were apprehended who had broken it: But this Year, Cuthbert Main, a Priest, was the first who felt the Severity of it; who being an obstinate Maintainer of the Pope's Authority against his Prince, was put to Death at Launston in Cornwall; and one Tragion a Gentleman, who had harbour'd him, was condemn'd to lose his Estate, and to perpetual Imprisonment.

Laws first put in Execution against Papists.

The Queen was every Day more necessitated to be strict and vigilant, in relation to those of the Romish Religion, by reason of their many Plots and Conspiracies, not only at home, but also in Scotland and the Netherlands. In which last Country, Don John, the Governor, tho' he pretended nothing but Peace and Gratitude to Queen Elizabeth, yet through a restless and treacherous Disposition, he secretly treated with the Pope to deprive her of her Kingdom, and himself to marry the Queen of Scotland, and to invade England both from Ireland and Scotland; of all which Designs the Prince of Orange gave her the first Intelligence. Upon which, finding the Spaniard's deep Disimulation, the great Hardships of the Confederate States, and the Dangers threatening the Protestant Religion, she enter'd into a League with the said States, for mutual Defence both at Sea and Land, upon certain fix'd Conditions; by which she was to assist them with one thousand Horse and five thousand Foot, whose English Commander should be admitted into the Council of the Estates. But because she would not be slander'd with assisting Rebels against their Prince, she sent Thomas Wilkes to the King of Spain with these Informations: ' That she had always endeavour'd to preserve the Netherlands

Don John's Designs against Queen Elizabeth.

The Queen enters into a League with the Confederate States.

' in Obedience to the King of Spain; and had us'd both Persuasions and Threatnings to the Prince of Orange to accept of a Peace: But withal, if the King of Spain expected to have his Subjects obedient to him, she requested him to ' do Justice to his afflicted People, and restore their Privileges; and likewise to ' remove Don John from his Government, who was not only her mortal Enemy, but labour'd by all Methods to reduce the Netherlands to an intire Servitude. If this were granted by the King of Spain, she then faithfully promised, That if the States perform'd not their Allegiance to him, as they had oblig'd themselves by Ingagements to her, she would utterly abandon them, and use all her Forces to compel them. While Wilkes remonstrated these Matters in Spain, Don John on the other Side sent his Ambassador to Queen Elizabeth, highly accusing the States for their unreasonable Disobedience, and making a large Apology, and an Enumeration of the Reasons why he had again taken up Arms. Thus Queen Elizabeth sat as an Heroical Princess and Arbitrer between the Spaniards, French, and Confederate States: Which was very agreeable to what an Author who wrote in those Times observ'd, That France and Spain were the Ballances in the Scale of Europe, and England the Beam to turn them either Way; for they still prevail'd, to whom she adher'd.

Her Declaration.

Great Numbers went out of England into the Netherlands about this time, particularly John North, Eldest Son to the Lord North, John Norris, second Son to the Lord Norris, Henry Cavendish, and Thomas Morgan, Colonels, with many Volunteers, to learn Military Experience. There came also Casamire the Elector Palatine's Son, with an Army of German Horse and Foot, at the Queen of England's Charge. Upon their Arrival Don John, assisted by the Prince of Parma, and other chief Spanish Commanders, being assur'd of Victory, set furiously upon them, before they expected him, yet after a long Fight was forc'd to retreat: Then wheeling about, and endeavouring

ing to break through certain Hedges and Coverts, where the English and Scotch Volunteers had plac'd themselves, he was again repuls'd; for the English and Scotch were so violently hot in the Conflict, that throwing away their Garments, they fought bravely in their Shirts fasten'd about their Thighs. Norris the English General, fighting valiantly, had three Horses slain under him, and gain'd great Reputation; as also did Stuart a Scotchman, Pingham Lieutenant to Cavendish, and William Markham. To comfort the afflicted Provinces, Ambassadors were sent from the Emperor, and the French King, and lastly from the Queen of England, with Commissions to procure Conditions of Peace; but they return'd without effecting any thing, by reason that Don John refus'd to admit the Protestant Religion, and the Prince of Orange refus'd to return into Holland. About this time Egremond Ratcliff, Son to the Earl of Suffex, who had been a violent Man in the Rebellion in the North, and now serv'd under the Spaniard, was accus'd by the English Fugitives, that he was secretly sent to assassinate Don John; but whether it was true or false, he was thereupon apprehended and put to Death. The Spaniards affirm'd that at his Execution he confess'd, That he was freed out of London Tower, and mov'd by Walsingham's large Promises to commit this Fact; but the English that were present deny'd that he confess'd any such thing, tho' the English Rebels us'd all means to extort this Confession from him. Shortly after Don John himself dy'd, as some say of Grief, for being neglected by the King of Spain his Brother; a Man of an insatiable Ambition, who first aim'd at the Kingdom of Tunis, and then that of England, and who without the Privity of the Kings of France or Spain, had made a League with the Guises, for the Defence of both Crowns.

The Death of Don John.

The Earl of Morton re-mov'd from his Regency in Scotland.

In the mean time new Alterations began to be made in the Kingdom of Scotland, where the Earl of Morton still govern'd as Regent; who tho' he was a Man of great Wisdom and Valour, was now so overcome with Avarice, that he became universally hated. Whereupon, with the joint Consent of the Nobility, the Administration of the Government was transferr'd to the King, tho' he was yet but twelve Years of Age; and twelve of the principal Lords were appointed to attend in Council, three of them by Course for three Months; among whom the Earl of Morton was one, that he might not seem to be totally laid aside. The young, but understanding King, having assum'd the Administration to himself, immediately sent the Earl of Dumferlin to Queen Elizabeth, acknowledging her great Favours to him, and desir'd to have the Treaty of Edinburgh confirm'd; and withal, That his ancient Patrimony in England, descending from his Grandfather and Grand-mother, the Earl and Countess of Lenox, might be deliver'd to him, as nearest Heir. The Queen readily promis'd to grant the former Demands, but a little hesitated on the latter; for she would not grant, That Arbella, Daughter of Charles the King of Scotland's Uncle, and born in England, was next Heir to the Lands in England; nor would she allow the Ambassadors Proof out of History, that the Kings of the Scots, born in Scotland, did anciently hold the Earldom of Huntington by Right of Inheritance. Yet she commanded a Sequestration to be made of the Revenues of those Lands by Burghly Master of the Wards; and signify'd to the Ambassador, That the King should satisfy his Grand-mother's Creditors out of the Lands of the Earl of Lenox in Scotland. For she took it unkindly that the King had recall'd the Infeoffment of the Earldom of Lenox made to his Uncle and his Heirs, and to the Prejudice of the Lady Arbella; tho' it was a Privilege of the Kings of Scotland to revoke prejudicial Donations made in their Minority. The Earl of Morton in the mean time, not enduring the Disgrace of being remov'd from his Regency, regarded not the Form of Government lately made, but drew the Administration of all Affairs to his own Person, and kept the King in his own Power at the Castle of Sterling, admitting none to his Presence, but whom he pleas'd. The Lords being exasperated at this Presumption, made the Earl of

of Atholl their Commander, and in the King's Name levy'd a powerful Army, and prepar'd to ingage the Earl of Morton: But by the Intercession of Bave, the English Ambassador, they were restrain'd from Blood-shed; and Morton, as weary of Employment, withdrew himself to his own House, but the Earl of Atholl soon after dy'd not without Suspicion of Poison.

While all Things seem'd safe and secure in England, the King of Spain and Pope Gregory the Thirteenth held secret Consultations, to invade at once both England and Ireland, and to work the absolute Ruin of their most formidable Enemy Queen Elizabeth. Religion was the main Pretext, yet the Pope's chief Design was to gain the Kingdom of Ireland for his Son James Boncompagni, whom he had made Marquess of Vincola; and the King of Spain's Intention was secretly to relieve the Irish Rebels, as Queen Elizabeth had assisted the Dutch; while Amity in Expressions was all the Time maintain'd on both Sides. These two well knowing, that the greatest Strength of England consisted in the Royal Navy, and Merchant Ships, projected, that the Italian and Low-Country Merchants should hire what Vessels they could for long Voyages; while they were absent the Queen's Navy might be surpriz'd by a Superior Fleet; and at the same Time Thomas Stukeley, an English Fugitive, should join himself to the Irish Rebels with new Forces. For he by his large and specious Promises to the Pope, of procuring the Kingdom of Ireland for his natural Son, had so insinuated himself with the ambitious old Man, that he adorn'd him with the glorious Titles of Marquess, Earl, Viscount and Baron, of the principal Places of that Kingdom; and made him Commander over eight hundred Italian Soldiers, to be employ'd in the Irish War. With these Forces Stukely set sail from Civita Vecchia, and at length arriv'd at Portugal; where he and his Forces were by the Divine Providence diverted another Way. For Don Sebastian King of Portugal, the chief Commander in the design'd Expedition against England, being first to dispatch a War in Africa, in favour of Mahomet the Son of Abdalla King of Fez, perswaded Stukely to accompany him first with his Italian Forces, into Africa, after which they would both join against Ireland. To this Motion Stukely soon consented, and therein met with his Destiny; for in that memorable Battel where three Kings were slain, both he and Sebastian lost their Lives. Had not Sebastian's Fate diverted the Spaniard's Mind from the Invasion of England, to the Hopes of gaining the Kingdom of Portugal, a violent Storm of War had fallen upon England. But upon Notice of this great Change, the English Fleet which waited for Stukely upon the Coasts of Ireland was call'd home; and Sir Henry Sidney, who had been Lord Deputy about eleven Years, resign'd his Place to Sir William Drury, President of Munster; leaving a Reputation behind him answerable to the Greatness of his Wisdom and Valour.

In the following Year John Casimire, Son to Frederick the Elector Palatine, came into England to excuse himself about some Miscarriages in the Netherlands, for which the French were chiefly blamable. He was most honourably receiv'd, and conducted with great Pomp into London, with lighted Torches by the Lord Mayor and Aldermen, and to the Court by the chief of the Nobility; where he was entertain'd with Tiltings, Tournaments and magnificent Banquets, and honour'd with the Order of St. George, the Queen her self putting on the Garter about his Leg: And after the settling of an annual Pension on him, and many Presents made to him, he return'd into the Netherlands, where Alexander Farnese, Prince of Parma, was now made Governor. Not long after Queen Elizabeth supply'd the States with large Sums of Money; for which William Davison, the Queen's Agent, brought into England the ancient Jewels and rich Plate of the House of Burgundy, mortgag'd by Matthias of Austria, and the Confederate States.

In the midst of these Times of Action, still the Duke of Alençon, lately made Duke of Anjou, pursu'd his Amours with Queen Elizabeth. For the Prosecution of which, the last Year two several Ambassadors were sent into England, and after that a third call'd Simier, a compleat Courtier, and exquisitely vers'd in all the Arts of Love, who came accompany'd with a great Number of the French Nobility; whom the Queen entertain'd in such an obliging Manner, that Leicester began to rage, as if his Hopes were now quite blasted. And about this Time, when Ashley a Lady of the Bed-Chamber, covertly commended that Earl to her for a Husband, she with Resentment reply'd, Do you think me so unlike my self, and so regardless of my Royal Dignity, as to prefer the Servant I made my self, before the greatest Princes of Christendom? Simier never ceas'd by all insinuating and amorous Inventions to perswade the Queen to marry the Duke of Anjou; in which he gain'd so much Ground, That Leicester reported he wrought by the Power of Love-Potions, and other Infernal Arts. And Simier on the other Side us'd his utmost Endeavours to remove Leicester from the Queen's Favour, and first discover'd to her his Marriage with the Earl of Essex's Widow: Which so provok'd the Queen, that she confin'd Leicester to the Castle at Greenwich, and design'd to have sent him to the Tower, had not the generous Earl of Suffex, tho' his greatest Adversary, dissuaded her, declaring, That none ought to be molested for contracting a lawful Marriage. Nevertheless Leicester was so incens'd at his Confinement, that he turn'd all his Thoughts upon Revenge; and some say he hir'd one Teuder of the Queen's Guards to assassinate the French Ambassador. It is certain that the Queen by Proclamation commanded, That no Person should offer any Affront to the Ambassador, or any of his Attendants. About which Time it happen'd, That while the Queen for her Pleasure was rowing in her Barge upon the Thames, in the Company of Simier, the Earl of Lincoln, and her Vice-Chamberlain Hatton, a young Man out of a Boat discharg'd a Gun, and shot one of the Queen's Bargemen through both his Arms. At which the Queen, who sat near him, generously threw him her Scarfe for his Wounds, without any fear of her own Person; and when the offending Party was brought to his Trial, and so to the Gallows, upon his Protestation that he had no malicious Intent, she freely pardon'd him. Some would have perswaded her, that it was design'd against her Majesty or the French Ambassador; but she was so far from suspecting her Subjects, that she often said, She would not believe any Thing against them, which a Mother would not believe against her Children. A few Days after, the Duke of Anjou himself came into England Incognito, and unexpectedly address'd himself to the Queen at Greenwich, where they had some secret Discourses together; and then without being known but to a very few, he return'd into France. After a Month or two the Queen commanded all her great Men, Burleigh Lord Treasurer, Suffex, Leicester, Hatton, and Walsingham to consider and draw up all the several Mischiefs and Advantages that would accrue from this Marriage; which being nicely enumerated and examin'd, the Balance was so even, that nothing was determin'd by them.

As in England there began to be several Fears from this French Man, so there were in Scotland at the same Time from another call'd Esme Stuart, Lord D'Aubigny, who now came into Scotland to visit the young King his Cousin. He was the Son of John Stuart, Brother to Matthew Earl of Lenox the King's Grand-father, and had Denomination from Aubigny in France, which Title Charles the Seventh King of France had anciently conferr'd upon John Stuart of the Family of Lenox, who being General of the Scotch Army in France, vanquish'd the English in one Battel, and was slain by them in another; and from that Time the Title belong'd to the younger Brothers of that House. This Esme Stuart was imbrac'd by King James with great Affection, made Lord Chamberlain of Scotland, Governor of Dunbriton Castle, and created first Earl and then Duke of Lenox. The Fears from this considerable Man arose from his being devoted to the Guises, and the Popish Religion; and what still increas'd them was his applying himself to the Earl of Morton's Enemies, and his contriving to call home Thomas Carr Lord of Fernisbush, who of all Men was most in the Interest of the Scotch Queen. In the same Year a Grant was procur'd from the Turkish Emperor, That the English Merchants might exercise a free Trade in all Places of his Dominions, as well as other neighbouring Nations: Upon which was erected the remarkable Company of Turkey Merchants; managing a most gainful Trade to Constantinople, Smyrna, Egypt, Aleppo, Cyprus, and other Parts, for Spices, Cottons, Raw-Silks, Tapestries, Indico, Currants, and other Commodities. About the same Time dy'd the Lord-Keeper, the famous Sir Nicholas Bacon; a Man of singular Wisdom, admirable Eloquence and Memory, and a great Support in the Queen's Privy-Council: In whose Place succeeded Sir Thomas Bromley, the Queen's Solicitor, with the Title of Lord-Chancellor of England. Bacon's Death was follow'd by that of Sir Thomas Gresham, Citizen of London and the Queen's Merchant; who for an Ornament to his Country, and for the Benefit of Merchants, built a noble Walking-Place in London, which the Queen nam'd The Royal Exchange; and gave a large House he had in the City to the Professors of several Sorts of Learning, since call'd Gresham-College.

Sir Nicholas Bacon dies: Bromley succeeds him.

VIII. There was now a general Calm throughout the Queen's Dominions, only some Disturbances were rais'd in Ireland by Fitz-Morris, and by the Landing of some Spanish and Italian Soldiers, all which were soon suppress'd. But about this Time there arose other Kinds of Disquiets in the Nation from the restless Endeavours of many of the Romish Party, and from the Management and Contrivances of Foreign Seminaries, which had been formerly erected to propagate their Religion in England. In these Seminaries, among other Disputations, it was concluded, 'That the Pope had such a Plenitude of Power, by Divine Right, over the whole Christian World, both in Ecclesiastical and Secular Matters, that by Vertue thereof it was lawful for him to Excommunicate Kings, absolve their Subjects from their Oaths of Allegiance, and deprive them of their Kingdoms. From these Seminaries this Year there came two Emissaries into England, Robert Parsons, and Edmund Campian, both Englishmen and Jesuits. Parsons was a Somersetshire Man, of a furious and violent Temper, and of an ungentle Behaviour; Campian was a Londoner, well bred, and of a sweet and elegant Tongue; and both of them had been bred up in the University of Oxford, and had profess'd the Protestant Religion. These Men, upon their coming over into England, appear'd sometimes in a Military Habit, sometimes in the Dress of Gentlemen, at other Times in the Habits of the Clergy, and sometimes like Apparators, and frequented the Country Houses, and Seats of the Popish Nobility and Gentry. Parsons was so warm with several of them for the direct deposing the Queen, that some of them were strongly inclin'd to deliver him into the Hands of the Magistrates. But Campian, more moderate, made it his chief Business to convert the People by his Writings, which were solidly answer'd by Doctor Whitaker. However these two Emissaries caus'd no small Disturbances; nor were there others wanting of the same Party, who publish'd in Print, That the Pope and King of Spain had resolv'd to conquer the Kingdom of England; and this to inspire their own Faction with Courage, and to terrifie others from their Allegiance to their Prince and Country. The Queen being thus attack'd both by the Arms and Artifices of the Pope and Spaniard, publish'd a sharp Proclamation in which she caution'd these Kind of Men To behave themselves prudently and modestly, and not to irritate her Justice any farther against them; for she was now resolv'd not to be cruel to her self and good Subjects any longer, by sparing such Miscreants, as they had shown themselves.

Dangers from Seminaries.

and from Popish Emissaries.

Towards the suppressing of these Emissaries, a new Session of Parliament met on the sixteenth Day of January; which was the same Parliament that first met in the Year 1572, and a second Time in the Year 1575, and is not mention'd tion'd in the right Year by Camden and the Common Historians. In this Parliament an Act was made for the retaining the Queen's Subjects to their Obedience, chiefly against those of the Romish Religion; in which it was again made Treason for any to reconcile themselves or others to the Church of Rome, and all Absenters from the Church of England were condemn'd to pay twenty Pounds a Month. It was likewise unanimously resolv'd to grant the Queen one Subsidy, two Fifteenths, and one Tenth of all the Revenues of the Kingdom. After which, the Parliament was prorogu'd on the eighteenth Day of March, from Time to Time, 'till it was finally dissolv'd in the Year 1583, after it had continu'd in Being, by fourscore several Prorogations, near twelve Years.

Captain
ages.

In this Year 1580, was the Return of the famous Captain Francis Drake, who after a three Years celebrated Voyage round the Terrestrial Globe, and many wonderful Adventures and Discoveries, arriv'd at Plymouth, where he first took Shipping, with vast Quantities of Gold and Silver, taken from the Spaniards, in several Parts of America. The Queen receiv'd him very graciously, and secur'd the Treasure he brought by Way of Sequestration, that it might be ready, if the Spaniard should demand it. His Ship was drawn up into a little Creek near Deptford upon the Thames, as a Monument of his fortunate sailing round the World; where with great Ceremony he entertain'd the Queen, who conferr'd upon him the Honour of Knighthood. But Mendoza, the King of Spain's Ambassador in England, soon shew'd his Resentments, and vehemently demanded Restitution of the Goods, and further complain'd, That the English had sail'd upon the Indian Ocean. To whom it was answer'd, ' That the Goods were already sequester'd, and ready to make the ' King of Spain Satisfaction, notwithstanding the Queen had expended more ' Mony against the Rebels encourag'd by him in England and Ireland, than ' what Captain Drake had brought home: And as for his Sailing on the Indian Ocean, That was as lawful for the Queen's Subjects as his own, since ' the Sea and Air were common to all Men. Notwithstanding all which, a great Sum of Mony was repaid to Pedro Sebura, the King of Spain's Agent in this Business, which was not restor'd to the legal Owners, but employ'd against the Queen's Interest in the Netherland Wars, as was discover'd afterwards, when it was too late to remedy the Mischief.

About these Times new Commotions arose in Ireland from the Family of the O-Conors; but this Conspiracy was timely suppress'd by the great Care of Arthur Lord Grey, Deputy of the Kingdom, who by terrifying others, brought Turlogh Lenigh to Terms of Peace, who had rais'd Disturbances in Ulster, and reduc'd the O-Brians, and the O-Moors to Submission. About the same Time, great Feuds also arose among the Scotch Nobility; one Party having terrible Jealousies of Lenox Lord D'Aubigny, lest he should abuse the extraordinary Favours of the young King, by inducing him to marry into France, and bring back the Popish Religion into Scotland. Lenox by his Letters purg'd himself to Queen Elizabeth, and openly profess'd himself of the Protestant Religion; yet still many Endeavours were us'd to remove him from the King's Person; but they were so far from taking Effect, that on the contrary the Earl of Morton, the last Regent and Head of the contrary Party, was shortly after accus'd by the Earl of Arran of being accessory to the Murder of the Lord Darnly the King's Father, and thrown into Prison. Notwithstanding all the Means the Queen could use to save him, not long after he was publicly beheaded at Edinburgh; becoming a memorable Instance of the Mutability of Fortune, who from the Height of Grandeur, came to this fatal End: A Man who tho' he had many noble Qualities, yet by his ambitious Practices, had occasion'd many violent Convulsions, and the Loss of much Blood in his own Country.

In the Netherlands, about this Time, the Count Rhineberg proceeded victoriously for the King of Spain, and invested Steenwick in Friezland; against whom whom the States sent the English General Norris, who worsted Rhineberg's Party, and rais'd the Siege: But afterwards ingaging with Verdago the Spaniard at Northone, even when the Victory was almost gain'd, the Fortune of the Battel turn'd, Norris was defeated and wounded, and a great Number of his Men slain; among whom were Cotton, Fitz-Williams, and Bishop, all valiant Commanders. Here Camden assures us, That in these Dutch Wars, the English, who were the soberest of all the Northern Nations, first learnt to be Drunkards, and brought the scandalous Vice so far to over-spread the Kingdom, that in the next Reign Laws were first made to restrain the Mischief. But while the King of Spain and the States contended about a few Towns in the Netherlands, the former seiz'd upon the whole Kingdom of Portugal, upon the Death of King Henry, as being Son to his eldest Sister. In seventy Days the Duke of Alva gain'd Possession of that rich Kingdom, and put Don Antonio to Flight, whom the People had elected for their King. The Queen of France, who pretended a Title to that Kingdom, now enviously beholding the King of Spain's Dominions thus enlarg'd, by a new Accession of Portugal, and several Parts of the East Indies, advis'd Queen Elizabeth, among other Princes, to consider of a timely Restraint of that King's excessive Greatness and Power. Whereupon the Queen receiv'd Don Antonio, and generously reliev'd him, as a Kinsman descended of the Royal Blood of England, and of the House of Lancaster.

And withal the Queen of France, and the King her Son, for a Foundation of a stricter Amity with Queen Elizabeth, urg'd more earnestly than ever for the Marriage with the Duke of Anjou. In order to which a glorious Embassie was dispatch'd of several of the greatest Men in France; who were receiv'd after an extraordinary Manner, and magnificently treated in a spacious Edifice purposely erected in Westminster, richly and royally furnish'd; and then entertain'd with Tilts and Tournaments perform'd at a vast Expence by the Earl of Arundel, the Lord Windsor, Sir Philip Sidney, and Sir Fulk Grevil, who challeng'd all Comers; not to mention many other Courtly Sports, and splendid Diversions. The English Commissioners for this Affair were the Lord Treasurer Burleigh, the Earls of Lincoln, Suffex, Bedford and Leicester, Sir Christopher Hatton, and Secretary Walsingham: By whom Articles of Marriage were at length concluded; 'First that the Duke of Anjou and the Queen of England, 'within six Weeks after the Ratification of the Articles, should contract a Marriage; 'and the rest were most of them such as were formerly agreed in the Marriage 'between King Philip and Queen Mary, consisting chiefly in conferring Honour upon the the Duke, but Power upon the Queen. It was also agreed, 'That all Particulars should be ratify'd within two Months, by the faithful Promise and Oath of the French King, for him and his Heirs; and a Reservation 'was also added apart, That Queen Elizabeth is not bound to perfect the 'Marriage 'till she and the Duke have given each other Satisfaction in some 'Particulars, and have certify'd the French King of the same within six Weeks. Before the six Weeks were expir'd, John Somers, Clark of the Council, was sent into France, to require the French King's Confirmation: The King would not hear him, but press'd to have the Marriage accomplish'd, as it was contracted. Somers on the other side, shew'd by the Articles, That a League Offensive and Defensive must first be concluded; which being disclaim'd by the French King, Walsingham was immediately sent to compose this Difference, who jointly with the Lord Cobham, Ambassador in ordinary, and Somers, alledg'd these Particulars to the French King: 'That Queen Elizabeth consented to marry for 'no other Reason, but for the Satisfaction of her People; and since many Impediments were come in the Way since the first Treaty, as the Civil Wars in France, and the Duke's Ingagement in a War with Spain, which now made 'the wisest of her Subjects averse to the Marriage; it had caus'd her to deferr the 'Accomplishment of it, tho' her Affection was still constant towards the Duke. For this Cause the Queen would have no further Treaty to be held, 'till the Duke of Anjou be freed from the Spanish War, and a League of mutual Offence and Defence be concluded. The Match be-liev'd to be concluded.

Not long after the Duke of Anjou himself came into England, having successfully rais'd the Siege of Cambray; and was receiv'd with as much Honour and Affection as he could expect, and nothing omitted, by which he might judge himself truly welcome. Infomuch that in November, as soon as with great Pomp she had celebrated her Coronation-Day, she was so far carry'd by the Force of modest Love, that in the midst of Amorous Conversation, she drew her Ring from her Finger, and put it upon his, upon certain Conditions between themselves. All that were near unanimously concluded the Marriage in effect compleated, which variously affected the Minds of the Courtiers; some were transported with Joy, some seiz'd with Admiration, and others were dejected with Grief. Leicester, Hatton and Walsingham violently exclaim'd, as if the Queen, the Kingdom and Religion were all at once ruin'd. The Ladies and Maids of Honour, most intimate with her Majesty, were fill'd with Sighs, and cover'd with Tears; and they so terrify'd and discourag'd her that she could enjoy no Rest that Night. The next Day she sent for the Duke of Anjou, and causing all Company to depart, she held a long Discourse with him in private. At length he withdrew himself to his Chamber, where in a Rage throwing the Ring from him, and taking it again, he with some severe Scoffs exclaim'd against the Levity of Women, and the Inconstancy of Islanders. The Queen was perplex'd with a thousand Thoughts and Difficulties, arising from the Consequences both of the Marriage, and the French King's Alliance; and was much incens'd at a severe Book publish'd, Entituled, The Gulph wherein England will be swallow'd by the French Marriage. Upon which John Stubbs of Lincolns-Inn, the Author, William Page the Disperser, and Singleton the Printer of this Book, were apprehended; and Sentence pass'd against them, That their Right Hands should be cut off, by vertue of a Law made in the Reign of Queen Mary, against the Authors and Dispersers of seditious Writings. Hereupon Stubbs and Page were brought to a Scaffold, erected in the Market-Place at Westminster; where with a terrible Formality they lost their Right Hands, but the Printer was pardon'd. When Stubbs Right Hand was cut off, he immediately uncover'd his Head with the other, and cry'd out God save the Queen! to the great Amazement of all the Spectators.

Severities a-
and Page.

The Execution of Campian
and others.

Next, the Queen, to remove the Fears of many, That Religion would be alter'd, and Popery tolerated, by the importunate Suit of her Council, permitted that Edmund Campian formerly mention'd, with two or three more Priests, should be arraign'd at the Bar; where being Indicted upon the Statute of the twenty fifth of King Edward the Third, for plotting the Ruin of the Queen and Kingdom, for adhering to the Pope the Queen's Enemy, and coming into England to raise Forces against the State, they were condemn'd of High-Treason; and obstinately persisting to defend the Pope's Authority against the Queen, were Executed. For Campian, being demanded after Condemnation, First, whether Queen Elizabeth was a lawful Queen, refus'd to answer; but when ask'd, Whether he would join with the Queen or the Pope, if he should send Forces against her, he openly profess'd, and testify'd under his Hand, That he would join with the Pope. Such were the present Times, that the merciful Queen, who always declar'd, That Mens Consciences ought not to be forc'd, often complain'd she was driven by Necessity to pursue such Methods, unless she would see the Ruin of her self and Subjects, upon some Mens Pretence of Conscience and the Catholick Religion. Suspitions were also daily increas'd by the great Numbers of Priests, who were industriously insinuating and suggesting, 'That Priests Excommunicated by the Pope were to be depos'd, and such as profess'd not the Romish Religion had forfeited their Regal Authority; That the Bishop of Rome had supream Authority, and absolute Power over the World, even in Temporal Matters; with other like Principles, inconsistent with the very Being of any independent Kingdom.

The Duke of Anjou, after three Months continuance in England, began his Journey towards the Netherlands in February, accompany'd by the Queen herself as far as Canterbury; who commanded the Earl of Leicester, the Lords Howard, Hunsden, Willoughby, Windsor and Sheffield, Sir Philip Sidney, Sir Thomas Russel, and some other eminent Knights, to wait upon him as far as Antwerp. And here ended the famous Courtship between this Foreign Prince and the English Queen, after it had continu'd with several Intermiſſions about ten Years. Being arriv'd at Antwerp he was made Duke of Brabant, Limburg, Lorrain, &c. for the States had long before thrown off the King of Spain's Government, and quitted the People from the Oaths of Allegiance, that it might be in their own Power to chuse any other Prince. Here the Duke gave free leave to exercise the Romish Religion, to as many as would swear Fealty to him, and abjure the King of Spain's Authority; but after all his Endeavours, having expended a mighty Mass of Mony, which he receiv'd from England, and observing that only bare and empty Titles were conferr'd upon him, while the States retain'd all the Authority in their own Hands, he rashly enterpriz'd an Assault upon Antwerp and some other Places, and shortly after departed, with almost as little Success in War, as he had in Courtship.

Alenſon leaves England.

He is unsuccessful.

And now the Queen, to strengthen her self abroad against the Spaniard, receiv'd into the Order of the Garter Frederick King of Denmark; and to invest him with it she sent over the famous Peregrine Bertie, whom she had lately made Lord Willoughby of Eresby in Lincolnshire. In Scotland, to prevent the Duke of Guise's Designs in that Kingdom, who was thought to use the Favourite Duke of Lenox's Assistance to turn the King of Scotland's Affections from the English; William Reuthen, whom the King had lately made Earl of Gowry, with others, endeavour'd by all Methods to remove Lenox and the Earl of Arran from the King. Accordingly, while Lenox was persuaded to go to Edinburgh from Perth, where at that Time the King resided, and Arran was absent upon a Journey, the Earls Gowry, Marre, Lindsey, and others, taking this Opportunity, invited the King to the Castle of Reuthen, and there detain'd him against his Will, and so terrify'd him that he durst not stir abroad. They remov'd all his faithful Servants from him, threw Arran into Prison, enforc'd the King to call home the Earl of Angus, and to send away Lenox into France, who being a Man of a soft and gentle Disposition, readily consented to this Hardship for the King's Safety. But not satisfy'd with all this, they further compell'd the timorous King to approve of this Confinement in his Letters to Queen Elizabeth, and to declare an Assembly of the Estates summon'd by them to be just and legal. Yet they could by no Method induce Buchanan to approve of this Fact, who now with great Sorrow repented of many of his former Actions, and shortly after dy'd; having been one of the chief Masters to the young King, of great Abilities, a polite Pen, and an admirable Latinist and Poet.

The King of Scotland confin'd.

In the mean Time the most unfortunate Queen of Scotland daily bewail'd her own hard Fate, and the Distress of her Son King James; and now languishing with the Calamities of a long and hopeless Imprisonment, she writ a solemn pathetick Letter to the Queen of England, in which she largely enumerated the various Miseries of her Life, and among other things declar'd, That she had harder Treatment than the vilest Malefactors and Prisoners, who were allow'd their Defence, and had their Accusers Face to Face. Therefore she conjur'd her by the Cross and Passion of Christ our Redeemer, that after so long languishing in Prison, her Liberty might be restor'd upon reasonable Conditions, that she might refresh her decay'd Body, now suffering under much Weakness, and several Distempers, and wanting common Necessaries and Attendants. length she concludes in this manner, Recall your self to your innate Tenderneſs and Lenity, oblige your ſelf to your ſelf, and as you are a Princeſs, ſoften your Spirit, and lay aſide all Diſpleaſure towards me a Princeſs ſo nearly related to you in Blood, and ſo affectionate to you; that theſe Matters being compos'd between us, I may quietly depart this Life, and the Groans and Sighs of my afflicted Soul may not aſcend up to God. Queen Elizabeth was ſtrangely affected with this Letter, and ſent to her Robert Beal Clark of the Council, to expoſtulate with her concerning her querulous Letters, and jointly with the Earl of Shrewsbury to treat of the ſetting her at Liberty, and to aſſociate her with her Son in the Government of Scotland. And indeed ſerious Conſultations were held at the Council-Table about this Matter, where moſt were of Opinion, That upon certain Conditions ſhe ſhould have her Liberty; but the Scotch of the Engliſh Party ſo violently oppos'd it, that nothing was effected.

The King of Scotland gains his Liberty.

Shortly after, King James ſent Colonel William Stuart and John Colvill to Queen Elizabeth, offering all manner of Reſpect and Obſervance, and begging her Advice for appeaſing the Commotions in Scotland, and alſo for his contracting of Marriage. At which time News was brought, that the Duke of Lenox dy'd at Paris, and to the laſt Moment of his Life, had made ſolemn Profeſſion of the Proteſtant Religion; by which he confuted thoſe who had maliciously traduc'd him for a Papiſt. After whoſe Death, when thoſe who ſurpriz'd the King were elevated with their own Projects, and concluded him ſecure; he, tho' ſcarce eighteen Years of Age, found Means to convey himſelf ſuddenly with a few Followers to the Caſtle of St. Andrews, to whom the Nobility immediately repair'd, with an armed Force, apprehending ſome Danger to his Perſon. Afterwards in civil Terms he advis'd ſome of his Surprizers to retire from the Court, for avoiding of Tumults, and promis'd them their Pardons, upon a full Submission. But only Gowry ask'd Pardon, and ſubmitted, but with this Diſtinction, That he had not offended in Matter, but only in Form; and then the King ſent for the Earl of Arran to the Court, and reſpected him as his beſt Friend, and imploy'd him to compoſe the Differences among the Nobility, and to purge the Kingdom and his own Court from all Civil Diſſenſions.

Walsingham ſent from Queen Elizabeth to give him Advice.

During this laudable Care of the State, Sir Francis Walsingham came from the Queen of England, to adviſe him not to be miſs-led by evil Counſellors to the great Danger of both Kingdoms; and he found the King attended with the Flower of his Nobility, and a more promiſing Appearance of things in Scotland than he expected. At his Audience, he reminded the young King of what Queen Elizabeth, out of Iſocrates, in private Letters had formerly admoniſh'd him; That a Prince ought to be ſuch a Lover of Truth, that more Credit may be given to his Word, than to another's Oath; and in many Words advis'd him now in his Youth to be cautious of evil Counſellors, and to continue always like himſelf. The King readily answer'd, That he was an abſolute Prince, and would not have others to appoint him Counſellors, of whom he did not approve; but however he had long ſince devoted the firſt-Fruits of his Amity to the Queen of England his dear Siſter, and did willingly now make Offer of the ſame. Walsingham next deſir'd him, 'Not to impute the late Com-motions in Scotland to Queen Elizabeth's Actions; ſhowing how beneficial to him, and to both Kingdoms, Amity had formerly been, and would ſtill remain, if not neglected; and that the ſame might be more effectually confirmed, if the Feuds between the Nobility were laid aſleep by an Act of Oblivion in Parliament, and the Peers now remov'd from Court again recalled. Religion inſpected, and a firm League concluded between both Kingdoms. The King made Answer, That he gladly would embrace Amity with England, and that he would conſtantly defend the Religion already eſtabliſh'd. Afterwards the King lovingly diſmiſs'd this great Man, tho' he accounted him no true Friend to him, or his unfortunate Mother; and carefully viewing his Affairs, with with an Understanding above his Years, propos'd and profer'd Reconciliation to those who had surpriz'd and detain'd him, if within a limited Time they ask'd Pardon; in which they were so far from complying, that they enter'd into new Consultations how to intercept him again. Upon which they were commanded within a set Time to leave the Kingdom; whereupon Marre, Glames, Paslet, and some others, betook themselves to Ireland; Boyle, Zester, Weems and Lochlevin, into the Netherlands, and Dunferme- lin into France: The Earl of Angus was confin'd to his own Country; and only Gowry, forming new Contrivances, after the limited Time, staid behind to his own Ruin.

Several of the Nobility leave Scotland.

About this time there happen'd a Contest, and thereupon a War, between the Emperor of Muscovy and the King of Sweden, who apprehending himself unable to encounter the powerful Emperor, sent a Royal Embassie to Queen Elizabeth, begging her to intercede for him to the Emperor. The Queen immediately undertook the Work, and by her Ambassador brought the Muscovite to a Peace upon honourable Conditions. But this Emperor dying shortly after, and his Successor Theodorus granting a free Trade to Merchants of all Nations into his Country, the Queen importun'd him to admit of none but English, and requir'd him to confirm the Privileges which his Father had granted them. To which by way of Answer, he order'd a Free Trade for all the English Subjects, saying, It was not fit that a small Company should hold a Monopoly, and all others be excluded: But as for the Customs, he promis'd to take less by one Moity of that Company than of any other, because they first open'd the Way for Trading into his Country.

The Queen treats with the Muscovite.

This Year prov'd mortal to several great Men; for first dy'd Thomas Ratcliff, Earl of Suffex, a Man of a noble Spirit, and great Fidelity to his Country: Next dy'd Henry Wriothesly Earl of Southampton, one extreamly devoted to the Romish Religion, and a great Favourer of the Queen of Scotland, which caus'd both Queen Elizabeth's Displeasure, and his own Imprisonment. There dy'd also Sir Humphry Gilbert, who was cast away at Sea, in his Return from the North Parts of America, whither he lately sail'd with five Ships, in hopes of planting a Colony in that Part of the World. Lastly there dy'd Edmund Grindall, who had been near eight Years Arch-Bishop of Canterbury, a grave and pious Prelate, who stood highly in the Queen's Favour, till he was wrought out by the Artifices of Leicester, who hated him for disallowing a Marriage between Julio an Italian Physician and another Man's Wife, which he had vehemently promoted. He was succeeded by Doctor John Whitgift Bishop of Worcester, a very pious and learned Man, who finding that the Puritans had made a great Division in the Church, and that the Papists highly insulted upon that Occasion, and by that means drew many to their Party, this good Prelate to remove these Differences, and restore the Unity of the Church, propos'd three Articles to be subscrib'd by the Ministers. 'First, That the Queen had Supream Power over all Persons born in her Dominions, and that no Foreign Prince or Prelate hath, or ought to have, any Power Civil or Ecclesiastical within her Dominions. Secondly, That the Book of Common-Prayer, and that of Ordination, contain'd nothing contrary to the Word of God; and that all should use that, and no other Form, either of Prayer or Administration of the Sacraments. Thirdly, That they approv'd the Articles of the Synod at London, publish'd in the Year 1562, and believ'd the same to be consonant to God's Word. It is almost incredible to believe what Controversies and Disputes, what Hatred and opprobrious Speeches he sustain'd from some Factionous Ministers, and what Troubles and Injuries he suffer'd from some Noblemen, who by promoting undeserving Persons caus'd Distractions in the Church, or by thirsting after its Revenues, sought to divide and destroy it. Nevertheless by his Constancy, Courage and Patience, he overcame all Difficulties, culties, and at length restor'd the Church to Peace and Uniformity. At the same time, certain Popish Books written against the Queen, and Princes Excommunicate, withdrew divers from their Allegiance, and so intoxicated one Somervill a Gentleman, that he went privately to the Court, and breathing out nothing but Destruction to the Protestants, set upon one or two with his drawn Sword, intending, as he confess'd, to have murder'd the Queen. Hereupon, he with Edward Arden his Father-in-Law, Arden's Wife, their Daughter, Somervill's Wife, and Hall a Priest, were brought to the Bar, and all condemn'd; Somervill as Principal, the rest as Accessary. Three Days after Somervill was found strangled in the Prison; Arden was executed and quarter'd, and the Women and Priest spar'd. The miserable End of this Gentleman, who was drawn in by the Artifice of the Priest, and cast by his Evidence, was generally imputed to the Malice of Leicester; because he had often taken the Liberty to call him Adulterer, and other ill Names he had too much deserv'd.

Sander's
Death.

In Ireland, the famous Rebel Girald Fitz-Girald, the eleventh Earl of Desmond of this Family, having by long absconding escap'd the English, was now by a common Soldier found in a poor Cottage and slain; and his Head was sent into England, and fixt upon London Bridge. He possess'd large Territories, and had of his own Name and Race above five hundred Gentlemen at his Command; who almost all lost their Lives within three Years Space, after they had been excited to Rebellion by certain Romish Priests, Of whom the chief was Nicholas Sanders an Englishman, one of the greatest Defamers of the Reformation and the present Queen, who at the same time dy'd of Famine, after a miserable and unheard of Manner; being found with a Scrip fill'd with certain Orations and Letters written to encourage the Rebels with Promises of large Rewards from the Pope and King of Spain. Upon the Rebels ill Success, the Viscount Baltinglas fled into Spain, where he miserably pin'd away with Grief. He out of Zeal to the Romish Religion had lately taken up Arms with the Rebels; and writing a short Letter to his Neighbour the loyal Earl of Ormond, who deriv'd his Descent from a Sister of the famous Thomas Becket, he us'd these Words to persuade him, Had not blessed Thomas of Canterbury dy'd for the Church of Rome, thou hadst never been Earl of Ormond: For King Henry the Second, to expiate the Murder of Thomas Becket, had given large Possessions to his Ancestors in Ormond.

Affairs in Scot-
land.

In the Beginning of the following Spring, several of the Scots, together with Earl Gowry, again plotted to seize the King, pretending only a Care for Religion, and to remove evil Counsellors from his Person; but the King having Intelligence of their Designs, us'd Means by Colonel Stuart, to have Gowry apprehended and imprison'd. Whereupon Marre, Glames, Angus, and other of the Confederates, late return'd into Scotland, fled into England, and begg'd of the Queen to commiserate their Condition, who had incurr'd the King's Displeasure, only for serving her and the Kingdom of England. On the other side King James accus'd them to the Queen of hainous Crimes, and requir'd to have them deliver'd into his Hands as Rebels; while some about him advis'd him to deal favourably with such great Men, alledging, That Terror and Violence were weak and unsuccessful Supports of Power. But Secretary Walsingham, who really favour'd these Men, sent Letters with a Command, That they should be safely admitted into Lindisferne, or the Holy Island; where Hunsdon being Governor, and intirely in the Interest of the King of Scotland, resist'd Walsingham's Command, alledging that he could not satisfy the Secretary in this Point, unless he had the express Commands of the Queen her self. Hereupon there arose a Dispute, whether a Secretary of State might not transact Business of State, without special Commission from his Prince. It is uncertain how the Case was determin'd, but we certainly find that these Men never came there, tho' they had some Favour shown them in England. In the mean time Earl Gowry was try'd by his Peers at Sterling, where being accus'd of many

Acts of Treason, tho' he gave plausible Answers to every Particular, yet he was found guilty; condemn'd, and beheaded. He was heard to make the common Regret which many great Men have done on the like Misfortunes, That if he had serv'd God as faithfully as he had done the King, he had not come to that End.

IX. The unfortunate Queen of Scotland had now languish'd under a tedious Imprisonment of about sixteen Years, without so much as once seeing that Queen from whom she had implor'd Protection; all which Miseries were but the Fore-runners of a more dismal Tragedy, which at this time began terribly to threaten her. For new Projects were now form'd against Queen Elizabeth in favour of this distress'd Princess, which only serv'd to fix and hasten her Ruin; in which Francis Throgmorton, eldest Son to a Justice of Peace in Cheshire, became first suspected, by reason of some intercepted Letters directed to her from him. Upon his Apprehension, the Lord Paget, and Charles Arundel a Courtier, privately fled into France, grievously complaining against Leicester and Walsingham, for alienating the Queen from them, and using such profound Artifices, as scarce any Man was able to live in Safety. The Earls of Northumberland, and Arundel were confin'd to their Houses, and the Countess of Arundel committed to Sir Thomas Shirby's Custody; William Howard the Earl's Brother, and Henry Howard their Uncle, were examin'd about Letters from the Queen of Scotland, and many Stratagems were carry'd on, dangerous to some particular Persons, but thought necessary for the Security of the Queen. And certainly now the Malice of the Papists broke out more violently against her Majesty than ever before; for in printed Books they excited the Queen's own Servants to attempt the like upon her, that Judith did upon Holofernes. The Author of these Books could not be found; but the Suspicion lay chiefly upon one Gregory Martin, formerly of Oxford; and Carter a Bookfeller, who printed them, was executed. And whereas the Papists maliciously traduc'd the Queen for Cruelty, she, desirous always to leave a glorious Name behind her, highly blam'd the Commissioners against the Papists, as using Severities injurious to her Honour. Insomuch that they were forc'd to purge themselves in a printed Declaration, protesting, 'That they question'd no Man barely for his Religion, but only for dangerous Attempts against the Queen and State; and that Campion himself was never so rack'd, but that he was immediately able to walk, and subscribe his Confession. But all this did not give the Queen Satisfaction, but she commanded the Commissioners to forbear Tortures, and the Judges other Punishments; and not long after, when no less than seventy Priests were taken, and some of them condemn'd, and the rest in the same Danger, she caus'd them all to be shipp'd off, and sent out of England.

At this time Mendoza, the turbulent Spanish Ambassador, was commanded to leave the Nation, for joining with Throgmorton in his Treason against the Queen: Whereupon Sir William Wade was sent to the King of Spain to satisfy him how ill Mendoza had discharg'd the Office of an Ambassador in England. The King being disgusted, refus'd him his Presence, but in a slighting manner turn'd him over to his Council; upon which Wade with a just Indignation boldly affirm'd, That it was a declar'd Custom among Princes, tho' in the Height of War, to give Audience to all Ambassadors, and return'd into England without being heard. The principal Matters charg'd upon Mendoza were learnt from Throgmorton's Confession; for when he was in Danger of being apprehended, he sent to Mendoza a Box of Writings; and when his Chests were search'd, there were found two Catalogues, in one the Names of the Ports of England, and in the other the Names of the Nobility and Gentry of England that favour'd the Romish Religion. These being produc'd in the Presence of Throgmorton, he declar'd they were Counterfeits, and stood firmly upon the very Rack; but being brought a second Time to the Rack, he then then confess'd all: 'That Morgan, by Letters out of France, had given him Information that the Catholick Princes had determin'd to invade England, and with the Assistance of the Duke of Guise, to free the Queen of Scotland; and that nothing was now wanting but Money and Aids in England: For the procuring of which, Charles Paget, under the feign'd Name of Mope, was sent into Sussex, where the Duke of Guise design'd to land; and that he had imparted all this Matter to Mendoza, and intimated the Names of the Ports, and the Noblemen that should assist. But being arraign'd at the Guild-Hall, he deny'd all this again, declaring, He only made that Confession to prevent being rack'd a second Time. Yet being condemn'd to die, he flying to the Queen's Mercy, made almost the same Confession a second Time; and then being brought to the Gallows, he again went about to deny all that he had said. So false is a Man's Mind to it self, while it is divided between Hopes and Terrors, and lyes under the Burden of some hainous Guilt.

His Execution.

New Proposals by the Queen of the Scots.

The Matter did not end here; for Sir William Wade being return'd from Spain, was now imploy'd to the Queen of Scotland concerning the Treaty begun two Years before: To whom the distress'd Queen sincerely profess'd, 'That she had devoted her Service and her self to the Queen of England; and made solemn Promise, that if the former Treaty might proceed, she would mediate with the King her Son to receive the Earl of Angus, and the other Scotch Lords into Favour, and would command the Bishop of Ross and Glasco, her Agents in France, to have no further Concern with the English Fugitives. These Things were gladly heard by Queen Elizabeth, who thereupon sent Beal to the Queen of Scotland, who jointly with the Earl of Shrewsbury should signifie to her, 'That if she continu'd in the same Thoughts she had deliver'd to Wade, Sir Walter Mildmay should come immediately to her, and treat concerning her Liberty: But withal, she commanded Mildmay and Beal carefully to sound her, to discover all the Practices that were carrying on by the Duke of Guise. To what she had spoken to Sir William Wade, the Scotch Queen gave a very cautious Answer; but to that concerning the Duke of Guise, she plainly confess'd; 'That being sickly her self, and weak of Body, she had committed her self, and her Son to the Protection of the Duke of Guise, her dear Cousin, of whose Designs she knew nothing; nor if she did, would she disclose them, unless she might be sure of her own Liberty. Lastly she requested, That being a free and absolute Prince, she might not be worse treated, than Queen Elizabeth her self was when she was a Subject, and detain'd in Prison by her Sister. These Particulars had a Hearing, but not the expected Effect, and the rather because of a strange Accident: For Creighton a Scotch Jesuit, being, as he was sailing from the Netherlands, taken by Dutch Pirates, had certain Papers which he tore and threw Over-Board, which by the Wind were blown back into the Vessel, and brought to Sir William Wade, who patching them together with much Labour and Art, discover'd by them some new Designs of the Pope, the King of Spain and the Guises, concerning the Invasion of England. Whereupon, and upon divers other Rumors, the better to provide for the Security of the Queen, a great Number of her Subjects, of all Ranks and Conditions, having the Earl of Leicester at the Head of them, mutually bound themselves to each other by their Oaths and Subscriptions, to persecute all such to Death, who should attempt any thing against the Queen: Which League of theirs they call'd The Association.

They are ineffectual.

An Association.

The Queen of the Scots submits.

This was a new Blow to the Queen of Scotland, who immediately apprehended that this Association aim'd at her Destruction; therefore by her Secretary Narve, she propos'd to the Queen and Council; 'That if she might have her Liberty granted, and be assur'd of the Queen's Love, she would comply in all Things, and enter into a strict League and Amity with her; and passing by all Matters of Displeasure, esteem and honour her above all the Princes of the Christian World: And, saving the ancient League between France and Scotland,

‘ Scotland, she herself would be comprehended in the Association, and a League ‘ Defensive, against all who should endeavour to injure the Queen. Queen Elizabeth was highly pleas’d with this Submission, and in all Probability did fully design to give her her Liberty; but was prevented by the Clamors of some in England, and a far greater Number in Scotland, who exclaim’d, That Queen Elizabeth could be no longer in Safety, if Queen Mary was at Liberty: That both Kingdoms were intirely ruin’d, if she was allow’d any Share in the Government of Scotland; and that the Reform’d Religion lay a bleeding, if Papists were admitted within the Court Walls. Nor was this all; for the Scotch But all in vain Ministers in their Pulpits, loaded their Queen with all manner of Calumnies, and most rudely slander’d the King himself, and his Council. And being cited to appear before him, they refus’d, declaring, That the Pulpits were exempt from all Regal Authority, and that Ecclesiastical Persons were not to be censur’d by the Prince, but by their own Consistory. Which was directly contrary to the Laws made this Year in the Scotch Parliament, ‘ By which the ‘ King’s Authority over all Persons, whether Ecclesiastical or Secular, was ‘ confirm’d; That the King and Council were Supream Judges in all Causes,
 ‘ and whoever refus’d to be try’d by them, should be guilty of High-Treason:
 ‘ All Presbyterian and Lay Conventicles were forbidden, Parity of Clergy re‘ mov’d, and the Authority of Bishops restor’d, whose Function the Presbyte-‘ ries had condemn’d as Wicked and Antichristian: And lastly all Scurrilous ‘ Libels against the King or his Mother were prohibited, of which some were ‘ nam’d in the Act.

At this time, upon the various Suggestions of her Adversaries, the Scotch The Queen of the Scots re-mov’d.
 Queen was taken from the Earl of Shrewsbury, who had faithfully kept her for fifteen Years, and committed to the Custody of Sir Amias Powlet, and Sir Drue Drury; and that purposely, as some were perswaded, to drive her into Snares and desperate Attempts. This gave her new Terrors, and now she became more importunate with the Pope and King of Spain, to hasten their Designs, whatever Mischiefs befel her; which were like to be great indeed, if what some say be true, that Leicester sent some Assassins to murder her, but Drury detesting the Villany, would not grant them Access. And now intirely to alienate Queen Elizabeth from her, it was strongly insus’d into her, ‘ That Allen for the Catholics of the Clergy, Inglefield for the Laity, and New Fears concerning her.
 ‘ the Bishop of Ross for the Queen of Scotland, with the Approbation of the ‘ Pope and King of Spain, had mutually conspir’d to depose her, and to bar the ‘ King of Scotland from his Hereditary Right to England, and to marry the ‘ Queen of the Scots to an English Nobleman of the Romish Religion, whom ‘ the English Catholics should chuse King of England, and the Pope confirm ‘ the Election. All this was believ’d upon the Credit of Hart a Priest; but who was the English Nobleman, Walsingham inquir’d with all imaginable Diligence, but could never discover it. But the Suspicion fell upon Henry Howard, the Duke of Norfolk’s Brother who was unmarried, and in great Esteem among the Romanists.

In this Year the Traiterous Earl of Westmorland ended his Life obscurely in a miserable Exile, being the last of his Family, which had formerly been fruitful in Nobility. In England dy’d Edmund Plowden, the famous common Lawyer: In France, dy’d the Duke of Anjou, of a Sickness contracted by Grief and Uneasiness; and in Holland dy’d William Prince of Orange, being treacherously shot with three Bullets by Balthazar a Burgundian.

bloody Law; and his Reasons being demanded, he stoutly refus'd, unless requir'd by the Lords of the Council. Upon which he was committed to the Gate-House; but upon his Submission he was again receiv'd into the House. Shortly after, he was accus'd by Edward Nevil, for holding secret Consultations about destroying the Queen; which at first he confidently deny'd, but being confronted by Nevil, and sent to the Tower, he voluntarily confess'd That the reading of Allen's Book against the Justice of Britain, in which he taught Princes Excommunicate for Heresie might be depriv'd of Life, had put him upon the Attempt: And tho' he had often Opportunities to effect it, yet the bright Majesty of the Queen's Presence quite aw'd and disarm'd him. He likewise in his Letters to the Queen, the Lord Burleigh and the Earl of Leicester, acknowledg'd his Crime, and crav'd Mercy. A few Days after he was call'd to the Bar at Westminster-Hall, where he confess'd himself guilty, and receiv'd Sentence of Condemnation; upon which Sentence he cry'd out, My Blood be amongst you, and in a Fury cited the Queen to the Judgment-Seat of Heaven. Five Days after he was plac'd upon a Hurdle, and drawn through the City to Westminster, where at the Gallows he made a vain boasting of his Fidelity to the Queen, but not so much as in one Word commended himself to God; and in the great Palace-Yard at Westminster was executed as a Traitor.

The Association
confirm'd.

In this Parliament great Attempts were made by some to restrain the Episcopal Jurisdiction, and diminish Ecclesiastical Power; but the Queen utterly rejected such Projects, as tending to the weakning of the establish'd Church, and the Supream Authority granted her in Ecclesiastical Matters. The Association formerly mention'd was universally approv'd, and Enacted in this Form; 'That twenty four, or more of the Queen's Privy-Council, and Peers of the Realm, should be selected and authoriz'd under the great Seal of England, 'To make Enquiry of all such Persons as shall attempt to invade the Kingdom, or raise Rebellion, or shall attempt any Evil against the Queen's Person, 'for whomsoever, and by whomsoever that lays Claim to the Crown of England; 'and that Person for whom, or by whom they shall attempt any such Thing, 'shall be altogether incapable of the Crown, prosecuted to Death, &c. For the Security of the Queen's Majesty, new Laws were also made against Jesuits and Popish Priests, who should ground any Designs upon the Bull of Pope Pius Quintus: In which some Cases were made Treason, others Felony, and others a Premunire. Many other Laws being pass'd, and Aids granted, the Queen with an obliging Speech, in which she vindicated the Clergy of the Church of England, prorogu'd the Parliament upon the twenty ninth of March, and dissolv'd it the following Year.

Arundel sent to the Tower.

The Laws against the Roman Catholicks prov'd a great Mortification to their Party, and had such Effect upon Philip Earl of Arundel, the Duke of Norfolk's eldest Son, whom the Queen had restor'd to Blood, that he resolv'd to travel into Foreign Countries: For having been once or twice cited before the Lords of the Council, and confin'd to his House, after six Months Liberty, he wrote a Letter to the Queen, 'Recounting the fatal Misfortunes of his 'Great-Grand-Father, Grand-Father, and Father, and declaring, That for the 'Service of God, and his Soul's Health, he design'd to leave his Country, but 'not his Loyal Affections towards her Majesty. But as he was taking shipping, by the Treachery of his own Servants he was discover'd, apprehended, and committed to the Tower. In which fatal Place lay the Earl of Northumberland, Brother to him who suffer'd at Tork, a Man of great Vivacity and Bravery, who was made a Prisoner for his secret Contrivances with Throgmorton, the Lord Paget and the Guises, for invading England, and freeing the Queen of Scotland. Not long after, in the Month of June, he was found dead in his Bed, shot into the Body with three Bullets, in his right Breast, and the Door secur'd on his Side. The Coroner's Inquest declar'd, he had murder'd himself, and three Days after, the Lords meeting in the Star-Chamber, not fall under an Attainder, nor forfeit their Goods and Chattels; nor that this Oath should be exacted of any, but such who were, had been, or should be in Holy Orders, or did then bear, had born, or should bear some Ecclesiastical Office; or that after Warning given, should refuse to observe the Rites and Ceremonies of the Church of England; or should dishonour the same in Publick, or should celebrate Mass, &c. as may be seen in the Statute it self. In this Parliament several other good Laws were made, for the Relief of the Poor, the ordering of the Navy, the Support and Improvement of Tillage, besides others for the punishing of Vagabonds, Forgers of Evidences, Conjurers and Fortune-Tellers, and such as should be guilty of Sodomy or Perjury; and one was made particularly for translating the Bible into the Welsh Tongue. The Parliament moreover, as a Congratulation upon the happy Turn of Affairs, granted the Queen a Subsidy, besides two Fifteenths and Tenths, in Consideration that she had reformed the Faith, restor'd Peace to her Kingdoms, rescu'd England and Scotland from the common Enemy, refin'd the Coin, rebuilt the Navy, provided Ammunition for Sea and Land, and likewise the great Care she express'd towards France for the Security of its young King, the Safety of England, and the Regaining of Calais. So upon the tenth of April, the Parliament was prorogu'd to October, and then from Time to Time, for about three years.

The Convocation was no less busily imploy'd about the Good of the Church and Publick: The Prelates had observ'd some Deviation from the Doctrine in King Edward's Reign, and some other Irrugularities as to Discipline; which they were willing to impute to the Want of some known Rule, by which they were to regulate their Judgments, and conform their Actions. Therefore it was thought expedient, that the Book of Articles agreed in Convocation Anno 1552, should be revis'd, and accommodated to the Use of the Church; all which was perform'd with the greatest and wisest Consideration. These Articles were now reduc'd to the Number of thirty nine, and publish'd both in English and Latin, and are in full Force to this very Day. Thus was the Church of England fix'd and establish'd upon a lasting Foundation, and the Reformation in a great Measure compleated; which was a noble Work, that with several Intermissions, had been carry'd on for above thirty Years, before it could be perfected.

III. Affairs were happily settled at home, but abroad they had a various Aspect, and such cross and different Designs appear'd among the great Men in France, as requir'd a nice Politician to understand their Aims. The Wars and Disturbances in that Country, caus'd the French Hostages, detain'd in England for the Payment of five hundred thousand Crowns, if Calais were not restor'd, to prepare secretly to escape out of the Nation; but being ready to take shipping, they were discover'd, and brought back again. The Prince of Conde in his expeditious Journey to the English Auxiliaries in Normandy, was intercepted and taken Prisoner in the memorable Battel of Dreux, by the Duke of Guise: Which had been a great Disappointment to the English, but the Duke of Colen join'd with him, besieg'd Caen in Normandy and took it, together with Bayeux, Falaise and St. Lo. In the mean Time the Prince of Conde, drawn on with Hopes of marrying the Queen of Scotland, and to have the chief Government in France, during the King's Minority, concluded a Peace with the King and the Guises; so that now all France, both Protestants and Papists, requir'd to have Haure-de Grace deliver'd up. But the Earl of Warwick, perceiving the Unsteadiness of the French Protestants, first to desire his Presence, and now upon so slight an Occasion to require his Absence; he suddenly turn'd all the Inhabitants of both Persuasions out of the Town, and siez'd on their Ships: On the other Side the French were ready to attack the Town, alledging, 'That they sought not now for Religion, but their Country; and it was necessary that both Parties should join their Forces, since they had already concluded a Peace between themselves. And hereupon the Duke of Montmorency sent a Trumpet to the Earl of Warwick, commanding him to surrender the Town; and upon Answer, That he would do nothing without his Queen's Leave, he invested the Place, and carry'd on a furious Siege. This being known to Queen Elizabeth, she sent Orders to the Earl of Warwick to surrender upon honourable Conditions; which was accordingly perform'd in a short Time, after the English had held the Place about eleven Months: And then return'd into England, without any Dishonour in yielding up a Town, which the Pestilence made him no less unwilling than unable to hold. But what was more unfortunate than the Loss of that Place, he brought the Plague with him into England, which rag'd throughout the Nation, and above twenty thousand dy'd in London. The Recovery of this Town not only caus'd the French to triumph, but hereupon the Chancellor of France openly pronounc'd, that by this War the English had lost all their Right to Calais, and were no more to require it, since it was one of the Conditions, that neither of the Nations should make War upon the other: A Point much insisted upon afterwards.

The Queen of Scots Designs as to Marriage.

The Duke of Guise, Uncle to the Queen of Scotland, was slain in the Heat of the War, upon which her Dowry-Mony was stopp'd, Duke Hamilton turn'd out of his Office, and the Scots excluded from being of the Life-Guard to the French King; all which that Queen highly resented. The Cardinal of Lorraine, another of her Uncles, being apprehensive that this might provoke her to desert the French, and court an English Interest, he once mov'd a Marriage with Charles of Austria, and offer'd the County of Tyrol in Jointure. She civilly imparted the Affair to Queen Elizabeth, who unwilling she should marry any Foreign Prince, perswaded her to take a Husband out of England, and particularly recommended to her the Lord Robert Dudley; promising, If she consented, she should by Act of Parliament be declar'd, her Sister, her Daughter, and her Successor, if she dy'd without Issue. But when her Uncles and the Queen's Mother were inform'd of this Motion, they look'd upon it with much Disdain, and promis'd her, That if she refus'd the Match, and adher'd to the French Interest, all her Dowry should be paid, and the Scots restor'd to their former Privileges in France. They further suggested to her, That Queen Elizabeth could never be in earnest, when she made this Proposal, as expecting to have Dudley her self, and desiring that the other should never marry. The Queen of Scotland came to no Resolution in this Matter, but refer'd her self to a Conference; having her Thoughts extreamly employ'd about her Affairs at home, which now were in great Confusion and Disorder. As for the King of Spain, he had indeed a Leiger Ambassador here in England, but rather by way of Compliment, and to watch Advantages, than for any real Affection; which he began to withdraw from the English, as suspecting them to design a Trade in the West-Indies.

The Death of several great Persons.

This being the sixth of this Queen's Reign, prov'd a fatal Year for the Death of many great Persons. First for that of William Lord Gray, of Wilton, Governor of Berwick, a Man famous for his great Services in War, and his Encouraging the Reformation. William Lord Paget, a Man as highly useful in Matters of Peace, who by his great Merits had advanc'd himself to many great Places; and tho' he was zealous in the Roman Religion, yet he was held in great Estimation by the Queen to the last part of his Life. Next dy'd Henry Mannors Earl of Rutland, descended by his Mother from King Edward the Fourth. And lastly Frances Dutchess of Suffolk, Daughter to Charles Brandon and King Henry's Sister Mary; after she had seen her eldest Daughter Jane proclaim'd Queen, and beheaded with her Husband, her second Daughter Cecilline, divorc'd from her Husband, and confin'd to the Tower; her third Daughter Mary thrown away upon an unequal Match; and her self, forgetting

getting her noble Descent, marry'd to Adrian Stokes, a mean Gentleman, which tho' it prov'd to her Dishonour, she did it for her Security.

In the following Year great Complaints were rais'd, that the English Merchants were injuriously treated both in Spain and the Netherlands, upon Pretence of civil Differences, but chiefly out of Hatred to the Protestant Religion. Upon which the English remov'd their Mart or Staple of English Cloaths and Commodities to Emden in Freezland. At this Time Camden assures us, that the Commerce between England and the Netherlands amounted to above twelve Millions of Ducats, and the English Cloaths alone to five. Therefore Goisman the Spanish Agent, finding the great Damages that the Netherlands sustain'd by these Differences, us'd all Methods to compose them; and upon that Affair the Viscount Montague, Nicholas Wotton, and Walter Haddon Master of the Requests, were sent to Bruges in Flanders; who after many Interruptions, brought the Affair at last to a tollerable Agreement.

But a greater Affair still was transacted this Year: For when the Heat of the War between England and France was rather imperfectly smother'd, than intirely extinguish'd, Queen Elizabeth, having been ungratefully treated by the French Protestants, resolv'd no longer to hazard her own Safety to secure other Mens, and began to entertain cool and serious Thoughts as to a Peace. This was negotiated by Sir Thomas Smith, a Person of great Sense and Conduct; and Throgmorton, who was a kind of a Prisoner at large in France, was join'd with him in the same Commission. France submitted the Matter to the Management of the Bishop of Orleans and the chief Secretary; who in April concluded a Peace at Troyes in Champain: The Substance of which was ' That there should be a free Trade on both Sides; and no Rebels to be shelter'd, ' nor no Letters of Reprisal to be granted: That the Reservation of all Rights, ' Titles, Claims and Demands, shall remain on both Sides safe and intire. That ' a certain Sum of Mony shall be paid to the Queen of England, at appointed ' Times: That the Hostages, for the Restoration of Calais, should be return'd ' from England, upon the Payment of six hundred and twenty thousand Crowns; ' and Throgmorton should be at full Liberty. This Peace was ratify'd by Oath, both from the Crowns of England and France; and the French shew'd many signal Instances of their Joy and Satisfaction; and not long after the French King was invested with the noble Order of the Garter from England, with all the usual Ceremonies and Solemnities.

France.1564.

IV. A general Peace being thus establish'd, the Queen was at leisure to take some particular View of her Kingdom, and accordingly went in Progress to enjoy the Pleasures of the Country, and visited the University of Cambridge. There she was receiv'd with the highest Marks of Honour, and entertain'd with Tragedies, Commedies and Scolaistical Disputations. She view'd every College, and in a Latin Oration of her own, acknowledg'd their Civilities, commended their Plenty and Variety of good Learning, and recommended the Study of it to their first and greatest Care, with a Promise that she would be always ready to promote and encourage them. At this Time, as Doctor Heylin informs us, were unhappily sown the Seeds of those Divisions, which have ever since distracted the Church of England. For it happen'd that Mr. Preston of King's-College, and Mr. Cartwright of Trinity-College, were appointed for two in the Divinity Disputation; in which the first, by reason of his graceful Person and Demeanour, was both lik'd and rewarded by the Queen, while the other receiv'd neither Reward nor Commendation: Which, according to this Author, so incens'd this proud and opiniated Man, that he retir'd to Geneva, where being thoroughly inform'd of the Doctrine and Discipline of that Establishment, he return'd home with a Design to repair his Credit, or to gain himself a Name, by raising such Flames in the Church, as could not be extinguish'd but by the immediate Hand of Heaven.

England.

The Character of the Earl of Leicester.

At the Queen's Return, she began farther to advance her mighty Favourite Robert Dudley, the Master of her Horse; who now was made Baron Denbigh, and had receiv'd all the Possessions belonging to the Honour; and to recommend him to the Favour of the Queen of Scotland, he was the next Day made Earl of Leicester, which Honour was conferr'd upon him with the greatest State and Solemnity that ever was known. This prodigious Man was now in the Verdure and most flow'ring Spring of his Youth, of a graceful Behaviour, a stately Carriage, a beautiful Face, a modest and grave Look, and in outward shew of a pleasant and easie Disposition; and being endow'd with all those flattering Accomplishments the City and Court could produce, he had insinuated himself into the Favour and Familiarity of the Queen, by his specious shews of Loyalty, Industry and Vigilance in her Service, and long manag'd the greatest Station in the Court, and was reputed the prime Minister of State. His Brother Ambrose, who was made Earl of Warwick, was Heir to the Estate, but he to the Abilities of his Family; for he had all the Arts and Policies of his Father: He was the most reserv'd Man of that Age, who saw all, and was invisible himself; carying a Depth not to be fathom'd but by the Searcher of Hearts. He became afterwards fullen to his Superiors, haughty to his Equals, insolent to his Inferiors, ungrateful to his Friends, and pernicious to his Enemies; and in a Word, insupportable to all but the Queen. He put himself forwards, and assum'd the distant Employments of Peace and War; was continually working to find the Studies, Abilities, Forces and Dispositions of other Men; and so great was his Application and Parts, that he rarely miscarry'd in his Enquiries. He by his Interest advanc'd his Dependants, Kindred and Relations, to all Honours and Employments; and when he found the Opportunity, he as craftily sold his Mistress's Favours, and the Employments he had taken from others. He had by his subtle Projects and Counsels ingross'd all the Rewards of Virtue, Riches, Honours, Attendants, and the first Place of Minister of State; and he manag'd them, and liv'd without any Religion towards God, or Fidelity to Men, making it his great Design to cover all Things with Luxury, Cruelties and Rapines. For a considerable Time few were call'd to the Council-Table, or admitted to Titles of Honour, but by his Commendation and Procurement; so that he seem'd not so much to be the Queen's particular Favourite, as her Partner in the Sovereign Power, and was accordingly courted and revered by the rest of the Nobility. If we may believe some Mens Characters of him, he had all the Tyranny, Insolence and most aspiring Ambition of the worst of Favourites, and all the Luxury, Treachery, and most abominable Villanies of the worst of Men; and Queen Elizabeth, with all her Virtues and Excellencies, was scarce able to secure her self from being made infamous and unfortunate by the monstrous Wickedness of this Earl.

Having his Honours heap'd upon him, in order to gain the Favour of the Queen of Scotland, he immediately accus'd the Lord Keeper Bacon to the Queen, as having interpos'd in the Succession of Scotland, and being privy to a Book in which Hales endeavour'd to derive the Title of the Crown of England to the House of Suffolk, in case the Queen dy'd without Issue. Hereupon Hales was committed to the Tower; but Bacon, tho' he deny'd it, was with much Difficulty restor'd to Favour by the Means of Cecil, who in this Point kept his Judgment first lock'd within his Breast, and so always resolv'd to do, Unless

The Queen of Scots designs to marry the Lord Darnly. the Queen her self commanded him to deliver it. These Transactions were not hid from the Queen of Scotland, who to prevent any English Designs, sent for Matthew Stuart Earl of Lenox, who had marry'd Margaret Douglas, Niece to King Henry the Eighth by his Eldest Sister, and had been kept as an Exile in England for twenty Years. That Queen invited him into Scotland, under Pretence of restoring him to his ancient Patrimony; but in Reality to confer with him about a Marriage with his Son the Lord Darnly; for he being reputed Heir to the Crown of England, next to her self, she thought by matching with his Son, to strengthen her own Title; and to prevent the Hopes of others. Queen Elizabeth, upon earnest Sollicitation, gave the Earl leave to go; but soon after suspecting the Scotch Queen's Intentions, by way of Prevention, she sent Sir Thomas Randolph, to remonstrate to her, 'That if she proceeded in the Match, she would exceedingly injure her self; for it was so highly dislik'd by the English, that she was forc'd to prorogue her Parliament, to prevent something being enacted against her Right of Succession: But if she would marry the Earl of Leicester, she should then be declar'd next Heir to England in Parliament: Hereupon, in November, the Earl of Bedford and Sir Thomas Randolph for Queen Elizabeth, the Earls of Murray and Liddington for Queen Mary, at Berwick enter'd into a Treaty concerning the Marriage with the Earl of Leicester. The English Commissioners urg'd the great Benefits that this Match would bring to the Queen of Scotland, and her whole Kingdom: On the other side the Scotch alledg'd the great Disparagement it would be to their Queen, if after her Refusal of so many honourable Matches, she should condescend to so mean a Person as the Earl of Leicester. This Affair was long depending, partly because the English Commissioners were so instructed by Queen Elizabeth; and partly because the Scotch Commissioners had a Desire to hinder their Queen from all Matches; and partly because the Earl of Leicester, having still Hopes of obtaining Queen Elizabeth, by secret Letters warn'd the Earl of Bedford, not too much to urge the Marriage with the Queen of Scotland, but privately to favour the Lord Darnly.

Queen Elizabeth proposes the Earl of Leicester.

This Affair being thus protracted for a long Space, the Queen of Scotland, impatient of longer Delays, found Means to obtain Leave of Queen Elizabeth, that the Lord Darnly might go into Scotland, only for three Months, to be a Partner of his Father's Restoration. Accordingly in February he came to Edinburgh; and being a Gentleman of nineteen Years of Age, of a beautiful and noble Presence, and of a fine and sweet Disposition, the Queen immediately fell in Love with him: Yet modestly dissembling her Thoughts, she first sent to procure a Dispensation from Rome, because of their nearness in Consanguinity. And now her Inclination being grown so apparent, that she could no longer conceal it, she sent Liddington to Queen Elizabeth to desire her Consent. But she, by the sly Suggestions of the Earl of Murray, being induc'd to believe, that the Scotch Queen design'd by this Marriage both to gain the Crown of England, and to introduce Popery, enter'd into Consultation with her Privy-Council, how to hinder the Match. Here it was concluded, that the most effectual Means were: First to have a sufficient Number of Soldiers for Terror's sake about the Borders of Scotland: Next to imprison the Countess of Lenox, Mother to the Lord Darnly, and to recall the Earl and his Son from Scotland, upon Pain of the Loss of all their Possessions in England: Then that those Scots who were known to be averse to the Marriage, should be reliev'd and assisted: And lastly, that Catharine Gray, with the Earl of Hartford, should be receiv'd into some Favour, as being the only Persons whom the Queen of Scotland esteem'd as her Co-Rivals in the Succession. Hereupon Sir Nicholas Throgmorton was sent to the Queen of Scotland to advise her in the Queen's Name not to proceed in the Marriage, and to shew her the numerous Inconveniences that would arise from it. But she answer'd, That the Matter was too far gone to be recall'd, and that the Queen of England had no cause to be displeas'd, since she had now follow'd her former Advice, Not to match with a Foreigner but an Englishman born.

Reg. 7.

The Queen of Scots falls in love with the Lord Darnly.

Queen Elizabeth endeavours to hinder the Marriage.

Queen Elizabeth being inform'd of this Answer, immediately call'd home the Earl of Lenox, and the Lord Darnly his Son, commanding them upon their Allegiance to return: The Father modestly excus'd himself by Letters; and the Son humbly begg'd of her not to be a Hindrance to his Preferment, which he vow'd to employ in her Majesty's Service, to the utmost of his Power. And now to make him a more proper Match, the Scotch Queen first honour'd him with with Knighthood; then with the Dignities of the Lord Armanack, Earl of Rosse, and Duke of Rothsay; which Dukedom by Birth belongs to the eldest Sons of the Kings of Scotland. After this, before he had been five Months in Scotland, she marry'd him; and with the Consent of many of the Peers, declar'd him King. Never did a Marriage prove more calamitous to the Parties themselves, more dishonourable to the Nation, or finally more scandalous to both Religions; and fortunate in nothing but the Birth of James the Sixth, who became the first Governor of both Kingdoms. Upon this the Earl of Murray and his Party were extreemly inrag'd, and began to move turbulent Questions, 'As whether it was lawful to admit a Popish King? Whether the Queen of Scotland could chuse a Husband at her own Pleasure? And whether the Peers of the Kingdom might not of their own Authority impose one upon her? But however they took up Arms, and had disturb'd the Nuptials, but that the Queen levy'd an Army to oppose them; with which she pursu'd them so closely, that they were forc'd to fly into England for Protection; where Queen Elizabeth made no scruple to receive them, since the Scotch Queen had before receiv'd Taxley, Standon and Walsh, who were fled out of England. The politick Queen of England, tho' expressing an open Displeasure, was not much troubled at the Marriage; partly because of the mild Disposition of the Lord Darnly, and the small Access of Strength it brought to the Queen of Scotland; but chiefly because she saw that great Troubles would arise in Scotland about it, which would certainly promote the Quiet of England, which, as the true Mother of her Country, was the principal Thing she endeavour'd.

New Proposals of Marriage to Queen Elizabeth.

Upon this Marriage, those for the Protestant Interest in England, thought nothing could more effectually promote that End, than if Queen Elizabeth would be pleas'd to marry her self, and so defeat all the Queen of Scotland's Hopes as to the Succession. And very seasonably for that Purpose, the Emperor Maximilian did now renew his former Suit for his Brother Charles of Austria, by his Ambassador Adam Smircorite. The Proposal was much oppos'd by the proud Earl of Leicester, and as much promoted by the brave Earl of Sussex, who was almost the only Man who durst withstand him: Which occasion'd so great a Contest between them, that the Court became divided into Parties and Factions; and the Earls, whenever they went abroad, carry'd vast Retinues of armed Servants. But after a few Days the Queen interpos'd and reconcil'd them, or rather occasion'd them to smother their Resentments. As for the Feuds of the Nobility, and that vulgar Motto, Divide & Impera, now us'd as a mock Phrase, the good Queen utterly condemn'd; as being of Opinion, that the Force of Authority lay most in the ready Inclinations of such as were to obey. Every thing she said or did was worthy of her self; and her Praises resounding in all Kingdoms of the North and West, did now invite Cecily, Sister to the King of Sweden, and Wife to the Marquess of Baden, to undertake a tedious Journey both by Sea and Land, from the furthest Parts of the North, to see the Splendor of her Court, and observe the Wisdom of her Government. While she was at the English Court she was deliver'd of a Son, to whom, in Requital of her Kindness, the Queen was God-Mother, and gave him the Name of Edward Fortunatus, besides an annual Pension to her and her Husband. At this Time also, for the great Fame of her Wisdom, Donald Mac-Carty, a great Potentate of Ireland, came and deliver'd into her Hands his ample Territories; and then receiv'd them again to hold them to him and his Heirs, and for want of such to revert to the Queen. She likewise in Requital invest'd him with the Honour of Earl of Glencarn, and his Son with the Baron of Valence; and besides many Presents given him, she paid the Charges of his Journey.

A. D. 1561. Reg. 8. To add to the Reputation of this mighty Queen, in the Beginning of the following Year Charles King of France sent his Ambassador Ramboulet into England, with the Robes and Ornaments of the Order of St. Michael, to be-flow

flow on which two of her Nobility she pleas'd. She made choice of the Duke of Norfolk, and the Earl of Leicester, the one for his Nobility, and the other out of Amity; and accordingly they were invested with that Honour which had never been conferr'd upon any English Man, but Henry the Eighth, Edward the Sixth, and Charles Brandon Duke of Suffolk, tho' afterwards prostituted with too little Distinction. After this the Queen took her Progress into the Country for her Recreation; and to shew her self no less favourable to the Muses at Oxford, than she had been at Cambridge, she made a Visit to that University; where she receiv'd a magnificent Entertainment, and staid seven Days. She was extreamly delighted with the Pleasantness of the Place, the Beauty of the Colleges, and the Wit and Learning of the Students, who diverted her in the Days with curious Disputations, and at Nights with Tragedies and Comedies: For which she with great Sweetness return'd them her Thanks in a Latin Oration, and took of them and the Place a most gracious Farewel.

The Order of St. Michael sent over to her.

She makes a Visit to Oxford.

Besides the Diversions of this Year, the Queen was entertain'd with something of another Nature, which gave her a Mixture of Disquiet and Curiosity; which was the News of the Scotch Queen's Delivery of a Son, upon the nineteenth Day of June, brought her by Sir James Melvil. With all her Spirit and Greatness she secretly envy'd her Rival the Honour of being a Mother before her; and could not conceal her Uneasiness from some of her Ladies, saying, The Queen of Scotland has brought forth a Prince, but I am a barren Tree. Yet she dispatch'd away Sir Henry Killebrew to congratulate her safe Delivery, and the Birth of an Heir: And being afterwards desir'd to be God-Mother to the Royal Infant, she readily sent over the Earl of Bedford, with a noble Present of a Golden Font; but expressly commanded, that neither he, nor any English Man in his Company, should give the Title of King to the Lord Darnly. On the fifteenth Day of December, the Baptism was solemniz'd with great Pomp and Ceremony, and the Prince was publicly proclaim'd by his Names and Titles, CHARLES JAMES, Prince and Steward of Scotland, Duke of Rothsay, Earl of Carrick, Lord of the Isles, and Baron of Renfrew.

The Birth of King James in Scotland.

But before this pass'd, the Parliament of England met, after it had been several Times prorogu'd from the Year 1563. They soon fell into a warm Debate upon the subject Matter of the Succession, and moving the Queen to marry; in which Points some proceeded so far as to accuse the Queen, as one disregarding Posterity; to defame Cecil with Libels and Reproaches, as a great Counsellor in this Matter, but above all to curse Dr. Huic, her Physician, who was thought to dissuade her from Marriage, on Pretence of some secret Impediment. At length in the House of Lords it was agreed, that the Lord-Keeper Bacon, should in all their Names humbly beseech the Queen to marry; and withal to declare a Successor to the Crown, in case she dy'd without Issue: For which he gave her many Reasons, 'Laying open the great Mischiefs that threaten'd the Kingdom, if she should die before a Successor was appointed.' But in the House of Commons, Bell and Mouson, two great Lawyers, and some others, proceeded to bolder Expressions, and a Disparagement of the Queen's Authority, declaring, 'That Princes were oblig'd to appoint a Successor; and in refusing to do it, the Queen would shew her self no better than a Parricide of her Country.' The Queen was contented to bear Words spoken in Parliament, which she would not have indur'd in another Place: But not willing to expostulate the matter with the whole Body, she commanded thirty of the Upper House, and as many of the Lower, should attend her; whom she qualify'd with the most obliging Expressions; and after a Reproof that carry'd a Sweetness mix'd with Majesty, she diverted them from their Resolutions, promising them not only the Care of a Prince, but the Tenderness of a Mother. And whereas the Parliament had offer'd extraordinary Subsidies, on Condition she would declare her Successor, she utterly refus'd those unusual Grants, accepted cepted of an ordinary Sum, and then remitted the fourth Part of what was granted, generously declaring, That Mony in her Subjects Purses, was as good as in her own Exchequer. And on the last Day of the Parliament, she made such an affectionate Speech to both Houses, as stifi'd all Commotions; which were so settled and compos'd by Time, that few but Malecontents and Seditious Persons appear'd sollicitous in the Business of a Successor.

*Episcopacy

ment dissolv'd.*

During this Parliament, besides other things for the publick Advantage, by Reason of the unjust Pretences of Bonner, and some others, it was unanimously declar'd, ' That the Election, Consecration, Confirmation and Instalment of ' Arch-Bishops and Bishops of England, were Lawful; and that the said Bi- ' shops were duly elected and consecrated according to the Laws and Statutes of ' the Land. And it was likewise enacted, that both they, and such as should ' be hereafter consecrated, were and should be esteem'd as rightly and duly con- ' secrated, notwithstanding any former Law or Canon to the contrary. And thus the Church of England, as it were, had its finishing Stroke; and had all the necessary Advantages of a Human, as well as a Heavenly Establishment. And now having finish'd all Business, the Parliament was dissolv'd on the second Day of January.

Great Troubles in Scotland, from the Earl of Murray.

V. The great Queen of England, and her Kingdom, were now in a happy and flourishing Condition; but the Scots and their Queen began at this Time to fall into infinite Troubles and Distractions; the Rise of which, among others, proceeded from the ambitious Earl of Murray. This Man was the natural Son of King James the Fifth, and so the base Brother of the Queen; made at first Prior of St. Andrews, but not pleas'd with that Religious Title, he rather affected some Temporal Honour. This being deny'd him when the Queen was in France, he in a sullen manner return'd into Scotland, where by the Advice of Knox, whom he esteem'd a great Patriarch, he so manag'd Affairs, that in an Assembly of the States, the Religion was alter'd, and the French banish'd out of Scotland. Yet as soon as the Queen was a Widow, he hasten'd into France, and so ingratiated himself with her, that she created him Earl of Murray, and promoted him to an honourable Marriage. Being thus exalted, he return'd into Scotland; where to sooth his ambitious Designs, he sow'd Seeds of Sedition, often complaining of the Miseries of a Female Government, and affirming, That Sovereignty was not to be confin'd to any Family or Kindred, but to Virtue alone, whether the Parties were Legitimate or not; by which he endeavour'd to make way for himself to the Kingdom. To this End he us'd all Methods to secure the Queen from marrying again; but that not succeeding, he was compell'd to fly into England; where notwithstanding, he still by his Agents found means to create Discord between her and her Husband. The Love that was so warm now daily diminish'd; and she that had so suddenly heap'd Honours upon him, was now as ready to withdraw them: For whereas in publick Acts, she was wont to place her Husband's Name first, now she caus'd it to be plac'd last, and in the Coining of Mony began to leave it quite out. This Unkindness between them was much fomented by one David Rizio, an Italian, whom the Queen had taken into her Service, first as a Musician, and afterwards as her Secretary for the French Tongue; and after that he became so much in Favour, that it reflected no small Dishonour upon the Queen, being often allow'd secret Conferences with her, when the King her Husband could not be admitted. The King himself, being much addicted to his Pleasures of Hunting and Hawking, did not so much resent this Indignity, as some Lords who were his Friends; who told him plainly, That it was not consistent with his Honour to suffer this insolent Man to live. Being fir'd with the Sense of Injury, at an appointed Time, the King with the Lord Ruthven and others with drawn Swords rush'd into the Queen's Apartment when she was at Supper; where finding Rizio at the same Table, he seiz'd upon him, while he hung about the Queen's Wastle for Protection, and dragg'd him into another Chamber, where with many Wounds he was murther'd; the Queen being at that Time big with Child, and near miscarrying with the Fright. This Fountain of Blood being open'd, a new Stream follow'd : For not many Months after, the King was first poison'd, and shortly after barbarously murther'd in his Bed at Midnight ; and to make the Surprize the greater, the House was blown up by Gun-powder, and his Body thrown out into an Orchard.

The Rumour of this Murther being spread abroad, common Fame immediately laid it upon Murray, lately recall'd home, and upon Morton and Bothwell ; and they on the other Side charg'd it upon the Queen : But we are not to give Credit to Buchanan's Account of it, who to ingratiate himself with the Earl of Murray, wrote most scandalously concerning the Queen ; of all which he earnestly repented and acknowledg'd before his Death. The King thus murther'd, and the Queen left alone to her self, she was soon advis'd to marry with some Person that might be able to assist her against all Opposers : James Hepburn, Earl of Bothwell, being then highly in her Favour, and eminent for his Courage and Valour ; and tho' he was one who committed the Murther, yet he was by Murray and his Confederates recommended to the Queen. To this Motion, as being destitute of Friends, and not knowing whom to trust in these dangerous Times, she at last consented ; but upon these Conditions, that above all Things, Respect should be had to her young Son ; and that Bothwell should first be legally acquitted both from the King's Murther, and from the Obligation of his former Marriage. Hereupon a Project was contriv'd, by which Bothwell was formally call'd to the Bar ; and Morton being his Advocate, and Lenox his chief Accuser not daring to appear, he was fully acquitted by Sentence of the Judges. Upon this he was created Duke of Orkney, and by the Consent of several of the Nobility, was precipitately marry'd to the Queen ; which Action increas'd the Suspicion of many, that the Queen was an Accessary in the Murther, the Belief of which was the only thing they intended by the Marriage. This Suspicion being blown up to the Heighth, Murray politickly retir'd to France ; and the same Persons who had acquitted Bothwell, and gave him their Consents to marry the Queen, immediately took up Arms against him. But still they gave him secret Notice to provide for himself ; both to prevent his Discovering the Plot, if once taken, and also to make use of his Flight, the more plausibly to charge the Queen with her Husband's Murther. After that they proceeded so far as to seize on her Person, and treated her after the most contemptuous Manner, and allowing her but ordinary Cloathing, they imprison'd her at Loch-Levin, and put her into the Custody of Murray's Mother ; who having been Mistress to James the Fifth, insulted over the captiv'd Queen's Misfortunes, and boasted that she was the lawful Wife of King James, and that her Son Murray was his Legitimate Issue. All these Miseries did King James bring upon his Kingdom, and unfortunate Daughter, by breaking the Precepts of Heaven with one Woman ; the common Effects of unlawful Love in Princes and great Men, and naturally more fatal than in inferior Persons.

When Queen Elizabeth had Notice of this unexpected Revolution, she sent Sir Nicholas Throgmorton into Scotland to expostulate with the Confederates, concerning this strange Usage of their Queen ; and to consult by what means she might recover her Liberty. Throgmorton found the Confederates more insolent than had been reported : Being divided in their Opinion concerning their Proceedings with the Queen, some advis'd to have her perpetually banish'd into England or France ; others, to have her examin'd before the Judges, committed to perpetual Custody, and her Son proclaim'd King : But some, more inhuman, would have her at once depriv'd of Regal Authority and Life ; and this was the Doctrine of Knox, and some other Ministers, in their Pulpits. Throgmorton on the other Side, ' Alledg'd many Passages out of the Scriptures concerning Obedience to the higher Powers; and maintain'd, that the Queen was subject to no Tribunal under Heaven; that there was no Office nor Jurisdiction in Scotland, but was deriv'd from her Authority, and revokable at her Pleasure. They again oppos'd, 'The peculiar Right of the Kingdom of Scotland; and that in extraordinary Emergencies, extraordinary Decrees must be made; borrowing the Arguments of Buchanan, who at that time wrote a Dialogue, in which he endeavour'd to prove, that the People have Power both to create and depose their King. After long Debates, all that Throgmorton could gain from them was a Writing without any Subscription, in which they protested, 'They had secur'd the Queen for no other Design, but to keep her from Bothwell, whom she lov'd so desperately, that to enjoy him, she regarded not all their Ruins; desiring him to rest satisfy'd with this Answer, 'till the rest of the Peers could meet. And notwithstanding all his Arguments, they brought the Queen to a more severe Restraint, tho' in the humblest Manner she besought them to deal more gently with her, and let her but once have a Sight of her Son; which would not be granted her. At length, when civil Persuasions would not prevail to make her freely resign her Kingdom, they openly threaten'd her to bring her to a publick Trial for Incontinence, Murder, and Tyranny; so that through Fear of Death, she was compell'd, unheard, to set her Hand to three Instruments: By the First of which, she resign'd the Crown to her Son, then scarce thirteen Months old: By the Second, she conferr'd the Regency upon Murray, during the Minority of her Son: In case he refus'd it, the Third conferr'd that Power upon the Duke of Chastel-Herault, with the Earls of Argyle, Lenox, Atholl, Morton, Glencarn and Marre. Next she represented to the Queen of England, that she resign'd upon Force, and by the Counsel of Throgmorton, who told her that such an extorted Resignation was void of it self.

Five Days after this Resignation, Charles James the Queen's young Son was anointed and crown'd King, by the Name of James the Sixth; and John Knox preach'd the Coronation Sermon: And the Hamiltons enter'd a Protestation, that it should not prejudice the Title of the Duke of Chastel-Herault to the Succession, in Opposition to the House of Lenox. But Queen Elizabeth forbid Throgmorton to be present at the Solemnity, lest she might be thought to give Countenance to this uncommon Proceeding by the Appearance of her Ambassador. Fifteen Days after, Murray himself return'd out of France into Scotland, and shortly repair'd to the Queen with some other of the Confederates, who charg'd her with many heavy Crimes, and urg'd her, as she tender'd her Life and Honour, to observe these Prescriptions: 'Not to disturb the Peace of the Kingdom, nor desire to be at Liberty: Not to excite the Queen of England, or the King of France to infest Scotland with any foreign or domestic War; nor to think any more of Bothwell's Love, or mediate any Revenge upon Bothwell's Adversaries. Murray being now proclaim'd Regent of Scotland, bound himself under his Hand and Seal to act nothing concerning War or Peace, the King's Person or his Marriage, or the Liberty of the Queen, without the Consent of the Confederates; and then gave Throgmorton Notice by Lydinton, not to make any further Intercession for the Queen's Liberty, for he and the rest were resolv'd to run the utmost Hazards rather than consent to it. Shortly after he executed John Hepburn, Daglas, and some other of Bothwell's Servants, for being concern'd in the Murder of the King. But they, contrary to Expectation, when ready to die, most solemnly protested, That Bothwell had told them, that Murray and Morton were the first Authors of the Murder. They freed the Queen from all Suspicion; as did Bothwell himself afterwards, who when Prisoner in Denmark, both living and dying, declar'd the Queen was Innocent. And fourteen Years after, Morton going to Execution, confess'd that Bothwell had urg'd him to consent to the Murder; but when he refus'd, unless he had the Queen's Hand for his Warrant, Bothwell well answer'd, That could not be, for the Fact was to be done without her Knowledge. But as to the unfortunate Queen, notwithstanding all the Solicitations of the Queen of England, and the King of France, they could not procure her Liberty.

As to the French Affairs, the eight Years limited for the Delivery of Calais to the English were now expired; and Sir Thomas Smith, and Sir William Winter were sent into France to demand it; but they so delay'd and protracted the Debate, that by Degrees it expired in Silence, by means of Civil Wars arising in France. And without doubt the French never design'd to restore it, for as soon as it was taken, they threw down the old Forts, and built others, let out the Houses and Lands for fifty Years, and gave some away for ever. While this was Negotiating in France, Count Stolberg came into England from the Emperor Maximilian, to treat of the former design'd Marriage with the Arch-Duke Charles; about which the Queen had lately sent the Earl of Suffex to the Emperor; in which Service that Earl us'd his utmost Endeavours, that the Queen might be marry'd to a Prince, and Leicester be disappointed of his Hopes. Nothing was more frequently said by Suffex than that a Foreign Prince was to be preferr'd before the noblest English Man, whether we respect Honour, Power or Riches. Infomuch that one of the other Party pleasantly reply'd, That where those three only were regarded in Marriage, the World and the Devil were the Match-makers. Suffex staid five Months in Austria, and was honourably entertain'd at the Emperor's Charge; but many Difficulties arising about Religion, Maintenance, Titles, and the Succession, time wore out those Proposals that had been seven Years making by honourable Mediators. The Arch-Duke not long after marry'd the Duke of Bavaria's Daughter; yet both he and the Emperor ever after continu'd a good Correspondence with the Queen. About the same time Ambassadors came from Muscovy with rich Furs of Sables, and the like, and made large Offers to the Queen which were accepted; from whence the Company of Russia Merchants had its first Establishment. With the Ambassadors, Anthony Jenkinson return'd into England, who in his Travels had made curious Observations of Muscovy or Russia, set out a Geographical Description of it, and was the first of the English that sail'd through the Caspian Sea. In the same Year, June the eighth, Sir Thomas Sackville was created Baron of Buckhurst.

Having before pass'd over the first Act of the Queen of the Scots Tragedy, we are now arriv'd at the second; having been eleven Months detain'd Prisoner, by the Assistance of George Douglass, to whose Brother she was committed, she made her Escape from Loch-Levin to Hamilton's Castle. Here upon the Testimonies of Robert Melvil, and others, in an Assembly of a great Part of the Nobility, a Declaratory Sentence was pronounc'd, 'That the Resignation extorted from the Queen, during Confinement, was absolutely void from the Beginning. Upon which Declaration great Multitudes repair'd to her, so that within two Days she had gotten an Army of six thousand Men; but when they ventur'd to join Battel with Murray, being raw and undisciplin'd, they were soon defeated. In this melancholy Condition, the Queen to save her self, travell'd three score Miles in one Day, and by Night arriv'd at the House of Maxwell Lord Heris; chusing rather to commit her self to the Mercy of the Sea, and the Protection of Queen Elizabeth, than to the Loyalty of her own Subjects. From hence she sent John Beton to the Queen of England, with a Diamond Ring, which she had formerly receiv'd from her, as a Pledge of mutual Amity; intimating that she would come into England, and implore her Protection, if her Subjects persisted in their Rebellious Hostilities. Queen Elizabeth promis'd her all the Love and Kindness of a Sister; but before the Messenger was return'd, contrary to the Advice of her Friends, she enter'd a small Bark, and with the Lord Heris and Flemming, and a few others, landed at Wirkinton in Cumberland, upon the seventeenth Day of May. From hence she immediately wrote Letters in French with her own Hand to the Queen, importing, 'That having providentially escap'd out of the Hands of her insolent and rebellious Subjects, she was now come into England, upon sure Confidence of her approv'd Clemency; and therefore humbly requested, That she might be forthwith conducted to her Presence.' Queen Elizabeth with Letters sent by Sir Francis Knolles, kindly promis'd her Protection according to the Equity of her Cause; but deny'd her Access, as being reputed guilty of many hainous Crimes, and gave command to have her brought to Carlisle, as a Place of greater Safety. The Scotch Queen receiving this Answer, and finding Access deny'd her, by another Letter requested, 'That she might have leave both to unfold the Injuries she had receiv'd, and to answer the Crimes objected, in her own Presence; humbly beseeching her, That either she might be admitted to have Conference and Assistance, or else have free Liberty to depart out of England, to gain Supplies else where, and not be detain'd Prisoner in Carlisle; since she came voluntarily into England, relying upon the Love she had so often profess'd.

*The Queen of
in England.*

Upon these Letters Queen Elizabeth exceedingly commiserated her unfortunate Condition, and could have yielded to admit her into her Presence, but that her Counsellors conceiv'd it to be a Matter for mature Consultation, how to act in such a nice Case. To detain her in England, had many Mischiefs attending it; to send her into France, as many; and to send her back into Scotland, many more. Therefore in Conclusion, the Majority were of Opinion to have her detain'd, as one taken by Right of War, and not to be dismiss'd, till she had made Satisfaction for assuming the Arms and Title of England, and for the Death of the Lord Darnly her Husband, who was born an English Subject. In the mean time Murray the Regent call'd a new Parliament in Scotland, in the King's Name, and proscribed some of the Queen's Adherents, and seiz'd on their Possessions. At which the Queen of England being highly displeas'd, sent him a sharp Message by Middlemore, 'That she could not permit the sacred Authority of Princes to be held in such Contempt, and submitted to the Will of factious and rebellious People; and tho' they had forgot the Duty of Subjects, and their Loyalty to their Queen, yet she could not be unmindful of any Office either of Piety or Kindness to her Sister and Neighbour; and therefore commanded him to appear before her, and give an Account of his Actions.

*Commissioners

Cause.*

Murray having no Means to maintain his Regency in Scotland, but what depended upon England, obey'd the Summons, and came to York, the Place appointed to determine this unusual Affair. He brought with him seven of his intimate Friends, as Deputies for the Infant King, James Earl of Morton, Adam Bishop of Orkney, Robert of Dunfermelin, Patrick Lord of Lindsey, James Mac-Gilly, Henry Balnaw, and George Buchanan, together with Lidington the Secretary. And the same Day came Thomas Howard Duke of Norfolk, Thomas Ratcliff Earl of Suffex, and Sir Ralph Sadler, a Privy-Counsellor, appointed Commissioners for Queen Elizabeth. For the Queen of Scotland there appear'd John Lesley Bishop of Ross, William Lord Levingston, Robert Lord Boyd, Gawin of Kilwinin, John Gordon, and James Cockburn. Being met on the seventh of October, Lidington first freely advis'd his Countrymen, 'Maturely to consider what Prejudice they would draw upon themselves, by publicly accusing their own Queen before the English, who were profess'd Enemies to their Nation. Wherefore he thought they ought to desist, unless the Queen of England would enter into a mutual and firm League, against all those, who under this Pretence, should endeavour to molest them. Upon his Speech the Deputies for the Queen of Scotland made Protestation, 'That tho' their Queen thought fit that the Causes between her and her disloyal Subjects should be debated before the English; yet being a free Princess, she did not thereby acknowledge her self subject to the Sovereign Command of any. On the contrary the English protested, 'That they did in no wise admit of that Protestation, in Prejudice to the Right, which the Kings of England have anciently challeng'd as Superior Lords of the Kingdom of Scotland.

The next Day the Scotch Queen's Deputies set forth at large, 'The injurious Proceedings of Murray, Morton, and others against the Queen, whom they had by the Fears of Death compell'd to resign her Kingdom; which therefore was of no Force. Murray and his Adherents made Answer, 'That they had done nothing but by the Consent of the Peers in Parliament; and that to prosecute Bothwell, the Author of the King's Murder, whom the Queen protested; and as for her Resignation, it was a voluntary Act of her own. All this the Queen of the Scots Deputies answer'd and confuted, particularly affirming, 'That of the hundred Earls, Bishops and Barons that had Voices in Parliament, not above four Earls, one Bishop, two Abbots, and six Barons, were present in that tumultuous Assembly: Wherefore they pray'd, That the Queen of England would consider of these Indignities, and take some course for a speedy Redress. After this some new Commissioners from Queen Elizabeth were added to the former, as Bacon, Arundell, Leicester, Clinton and Cecil; to some of whom the Scotch Queen took Exception, 'Unless the French and Spanish Ambassadors might be join'd with them, her self admitted to the Presence of the Queen and them, and Murray be oblig'd to appear before them, whom she was able to prove the chief Agent in the Murder of her Husband Darnly. This was accounted a just Demand by some of the English Commissioners; upon which Queen Elizabeth, with some Resentment said publickly, The Queen of Scotland would never want an Advocate while Norfolk was alive. After a long Agitation of this Affair, and nothing concluded, Murray, a little before his Return into Scotland, privately propounded the Marriage of the Scotch Queen with the Duke of Norfolk; which he with a modest Answer declin'd, as a thing full of Danger. But withal, Murray the more to alienate Queen Elizabeth's Mind, caus'd a Report, That the Scotch Queen had transferr'd her Right to the Crown of England to the Duke of Anjou, and that the Transaction was confirm'd at Rome: He also shew'd Letters which the Queen of the Scots had written to some intimate Friends, in which she accus'd the Queen of England for not treating her according to Promise, and boasted of Succours she expected from others. The last Clause somewhat disturb'd Queen Elizabeth, who could not conjecture from whence such Succours should come; since France with the Civil Wars, and the King of Spain in the Low-Countries had sufficient Employment at home. But at last the Secret broke out, that one Ridolph a Florentine, under the Habit of a Merchant in London, was suborn'd by Pope Pius the Fifth, to cause a secret Commotion of the Papists in England against the Queen, which he perform'd with extraordinary Privacy and Subtilty. Whereupon the Queen of Scotland was remov'd from Bolton Castle, where all the neighbouring People were Papists, to Tutbury, more towards the Heart of the Country, under the Custody of the Earl of Shrewsbury. As this was very hard upon Queen Mary, so it was not a little unfortunate to Elizabeth; who detested the Insolency of the Scotch Subjects for deposing their Queen, yet durst not permit one Act or Step towards her Restoration.

Murray proposes a Match between the Queen of Scots and the Duke of Norfolk.

And indeed the Queen began now to meet with some Perplexities, both in Church and State; and the Peace of the former was disturb'd by a twofold Enemy: Thomas Harding, Nicholas Sanders and other fugitive Romish Priests, took upon them by Authority from the See of Rome, to grant Absolution to the Queen's Enemies, and to corrupt her Subjects in Point of Religion and Allegiance. On the other side, Coleman, Button, Hallingham and Benson openly call'd in Question the Discipline of the Church of England, and endeavour'd to reform it after the Geneva Pattern; and this Sect did greatly increase crease in a short Time, by means of their resolute Temper; the Negligence of several Bishops, and the Favour of some Noblemen, who were thirsting after the Patrimony of the Church; and this Sect was soon known by the invidious Name of Puritans. In all these Troubles the good Queen took care as much as possible to preserve the Peace and Unity of the Church, as likewise to succour all distressed Protestants in foreign Parts. For about the same Time the Guises in France, and the cruel Duke of Alva in the Netherlands, began to endeavour the utter Extirpation of the Protestant Religion. In France, the Ministers of the Gospel were commanded to depart the Kingdom within a limited Time; when the Queen forgetting the unsteadiness of the Protestants at Haurede-Grace, once again took them into her Protection, generously supply'd them with two hundred thousand Crowns in Money, besides Ammunition in Abundance, and with great Humanity receiv'd such as fled into England; and the readier, because they made solemn Protestation, That they did not take up Arms against their Prince, but only stood upon their own Defence. In the Netherlands, the Duke of Alva breathing nothing but Slaughter and Blood, and sowing the Seeds of a long and dangerous War, great Numbers of the Inhabitants fled into England as into a Sanctuary. These were kindly receiv'd, and by the Queen's Permission, they seated themselves at Norwich, Colchester, Sandwich, Maidstone and Southampton, to the great Benefit and Advantage of the English Nation: For they were the first that brought into the Kingdom the Art of making those slight Stuffs, call'd Bays and Says, and other Linnen and Woollen Manufactures of the same kind.

Queen Elizabeth both assists the Protestants in France, and in the Netherlands.

About the same Time a mighty Mass of Money borrow'd from the Genoese, and other Italian Merchants, was sent out of Spain into the Netherlands, there to be employ'd in Bank; which being brought by Shipping, was pursu'd by the French, and forc'd to fly for Succour into the English Havens, whom the Queen commanded to be protected, as conceiving the Money to belong to the King of Spain. But at the same Time, Cardinal Odesse coming out of France into England, and giving Information to the Queen, That the Money did not belong to the King of Spain, but to certain Italian Merchants, from whom the Duke of Alva had taken it against their Will, with a Design to employ it to the Ruin of the Protestants; she resolv'd to borrow it of the Merchants, and give Security for it, as Princes usually do of Goods found in their Ports, and as the Spaniard himself had often done. The Detaining this Money gave Occasion to the Duke of Norfolk, and several of the prime Nobility, to shew their secret Hatred against Sir William Cecil; whom they envy'd for his great Favour with the Queen, and upon a Suspicion that he inclin'd to the House of Suffolk in the Matter of the Succession. Hereupon they secretly conspir'd to throw him into the Tower; and Throgmorton, his chief Emulator, suggested, That if he was once imprison'd, they might soon find means to crush him: But the Queen, well knowing the Worth of such a Minister, in due Time surpriz'd them, and by the Authority of her Royal Presence, aw'd them out of these little Contrivances. But this Money being detain'd caus'd a greater Disturbance from the Duke of Alva, who upon Notice of it, seiz'd upon all the Goods of the English in the Netherlands, and kept the Men Prisoners: The Queen resolutely did the like by the Low-Country Merchants, with much greater Advantage: Letters of Reprisal were granted on both sides; which occasion'd such a Contest between the Nations, that being nourish'd and increas'd by succeeding Differences, it produc'd the famous Spanish Invasion, that will be memorable to all future Ages.

Cecil in Danger.

The Beginnings of the Wars with Spain.

A. D. 1569. The Scotch Affairs began more and more to create Troubles to England; and the Earl of Murray being return'd into Scotland, rais'd new Disturbances in that Kingdom. He caus'd an Assembly to meet at Edinburgh, under Pretence of restoring the Queen to her Liberty; but as her Friends, Hamilton Duke of Chastel-Heraut, who had been appointed her Vicegerent, and the Lord

Further Troubles in Scotland.

Lord Heris, were coming thither, he intercepted them; and threw them into Prison; and immediately after, in open hostile Manner, he suppress'd all her chief Favourers. It is reasonably thought, that this prevailing Earl could have willingly consented to have the Queen freed from a Prison; but he knew that her Liberty could not be effected without his Servitude: And Queen Elizabeth probably would gladly have had her restor'd to her Kingdom; but she fear'd, That such a Restoration would endanger her Security, And thus while both regarded their own Interests in the first Place, and hers but in the second, she had the Fortune to be pity'd, but not the Happiness to be reliev'd: And all she was able to do, was only to tye her Bonds the stronger; which by sitting still might have loosen'd of themselves, but by moving would entangle her to her Ruin.

The Duke of Norfolk's Interest being involv'd in that of this unfortunate Queen, his fatal Destiny began at this Time to operate. It was now strongly reported that the Duke was to marry her in a short Time; and in Reality Motions had actually been made, but the Business was not so forward as it was generally believ'd. It was first propos'd to the Duke of Norfolk, by the Bishop of Ross, and afterwards, in Pretence at least, by Murray himself at Hampton-Court; but the Duke, before he would resolve in the Matter, consulted with several of the Nobility, and with Leicester himself, who all judg'd it proper for him to acquaint her Majesty with it first, and then leave the Matter to her Pleasure. Shortly after, Throgmorton meeting the Duke at Westminster, advis'd him to move the Earl of Leicester himself to embrace the Match, since he had formerly su'd for it; but if he declin'd it, then at least to take him along with him, for he believ'd that he alone would hardly be able to obtain the Queen's Consent. Two Days after, Leicester himself propos'd the Matter to the Duke, and then communicated the same to the Earls of Arundel and Pembroke, who together with Throgmorton, wrote Letters to the Scotch Queen, recommending the Duke of Norfolk to her for a Husband. The Duke likewise wrote himself to her, with a particular Tender of his great Love and Respect to her. Upon this Articles were drawn, written by Leicester's own Hand, and sent to the Scotch Queen; to which if she consented, they then promis'd to procure Queen Elizabeth's Approbation, that she should also be re-invested in her Kingdom, and the Succession be confirm'd to her. The Queen of Scotland readily accepted of the Terms, tho' her Husband Bothwell was alive, and a Prisoner in Denmark; and the Duke imparted the Matter to the Lord Lumley, and by Leicester's Consent, afterwards to Secretary Cecil.

The Report of this Marriage was soon brought to the Queen's Ears; which the Duke understanding, he earnestly sollicitated the Earl of Leicester to have the Matter immediately propos'd to her Majesty. Leicester treacherously made Delays, and pretended Causes to defer it; upon which Cecil fairly advis'd the Duke to go and acquaint the Queen with it himself; which Counsel Leicester oppos'd, promising to open it to the Queen, as she went in her Progress. But while he with fair Words still delay'd him, the Queen took the Duke to her Table at Farnham, and pleasantly advis'd him to Beware upon what Pillow he laid his Head. After this, Leicester fell into a real, or pretended, Sickneſs at Titchfield; and when the Queen in a Visit advis'd him to be of good Cheer, he with Sighs and Tears crav'd Pardon for his Crime, and disclos'd to her the whole Transaction, with all the Circumstances. Upon which the Queen call'd the Duke into the Gallery, and sharply reprimanded him for attempting such a Marriage, without her Knowledge; and commanded him upon his Allegiance to desist. The Duke made her a free and hearty Promise of Obedience; and added by Way of Slight to the Queen of Scotland That his Revenues in England were not much less than hers in Scotland; and when he was at his Tennis-Court in Norwich, he thought himself not inferior to some Kings. But notwithstanding, discovering the Queen's Anger by her Countenance, and finding finding Leicester in a manner alienated, and most of the Nobility cold and regardless of his Person; he became extremely dejected, and immediately prepar'd to leave the Court; designing to stay at Norwich, 'till by his Friends Intercession, and his own submissive Letters, the Queen's Heart might be mollify'd. At his Departure, the Queen with Indignation rejected the Scotch Ambassador, who su'd for the Enlargement of his Mistress, advising Her to rest satisfy'd, lest she saw some of her greatest Supporters shorter by the Head. The Court was apprehensive lest the Duke should raise a Rebellion; and if he did, it was thought the Queen of the Scots would suddenly be dispatch'd. But returning again shortly after, and being examin'd concerning the Marriage, and his secret Conferences with the Bishop of Ross, he confess'd most of the Objections, and was committed to the Tower. Two Days after the Bishop of Ross was likewise examin'd, and together with Ridolph the Florentine, was deliver'd to the Custody of Sir Francis Walsingham; and the Earl of Pembroke was confin'd to his House and examin'd; but his Confession was not committed to Writing, as being not able to write himself.

the North.

At this Time the Rumour of an Insurrection in the North grew very strong, by reason of some frequent Meetings between the Earls of Northumberland and Westmorland, and others; who being for this commanded upon their Allegiance instantly to repair to the Queen, made dilatory Pretences, waiting indeed for Supplies, both from the Scots and the Duke of Alva. Whilst the Earl of Northumberland continu'd in Suspence, he was purposely frighted by his Friends, who in a tempestuous Night cry'd out, That an armed Power was ready to seize him, which caus'd him to rise out of his Bed, and repair with all speed to Branspith, the Earl of Westmorland's House, where great Numbers acquainted with the Enterprize were assembled. Here they broke out into an open Rebellion, being the first that had disturb'd the publick Peace, after eleven Years Calm in this Reign. The chief Incendiary was Nicholas Morton a Romish Priest, sent by the Pope to pronounce Queen Elizabeth an Heretick, and one that had forfeited all Right of Sovereignty, and immediately they publish'd a Writing, in which they declar'd, 'They took up Arms only to restore the Religion of their Fore-fathers, remove evil Counsellors from the Queen, and relieve the Duke of Norfolk, and other Loyal Noblemen now under Disgrace; but to the Queen they profess'd themselves most dutiful Subjects. They also wrote Letters to the Papists throughout the Kingdom, requiring them to come to their Assistance; but they were so far from joining with them, that many sent both the Letters and Bearers of them to the Queen; every one freely offering his Purse and his Person against them, and particularly the Duke of Norfolk. So that from hence the Queen assuredly understood the great Affection of her Subjects towards her; and was not backward in acknowledging the Goodness of Heaven to her upon that Account.

The Rebels, to the Number of four thousand Foot and six thousand Horse, march'd directly to Durham, where they impiously tore and trampled upon all the English Bibles and Common-Prayer Books which they found in that Cathedral and other Churches: But when they understood that the Queen of Scotland, for whose Deliverance they took up Arms, was convey'd from Tutbury to Coventry; that the Earl of Suffex had rais'd a powerful Army against them; that Sir George Bowes had a select Party on their Rear, and that the Lord Scroop and the Earl of Cumberland had reinforc'd Carlisle, they return'd to Bernard Castle, besieg'd and took it by Composition. On the same day they were Proclaim'd Traitors; Suffex march'd against them with seven thousand Men, accompany'd with the Earl of Rutland, the Lord Hunsdon, the Lord Evers, and the Lord Willoughby of Parham. Being advanc'd as far as Aukland, the Rebels fled in great Fear to Hexham, and afterwards through By-ways to Naworth Castle; where hearing that the Earl of Warwick and Clinton, Lord Admiral, pursu'd them with twelve thousand Men, from the South

Parts

Parts of England, the two Earls with a small Company, and unknown to their Confederates, withdrew themselves into Scotland. Northumberland was deliver'd into the Hands of Murray; and Westmorland escap'd into the Netherlands, where he led a poor miserable Life, even to old Age, living upon a slender Pension from the Spaniards. The rest being dispers'd sav'd themselves, some by Flight, and some by hiding in secret Places. Threescore and six, for a Terror to others, were hang'd at Durham, and several at York and other Places. The two Earls of Northumberland and Westmorland, and about fifty more of the higher Birth were convicted of Treason, and prescrib'd; but the rest, who had no Estates, or had not fled the Land, were pardon'd. Thus happily ended this Rebellion; and Vitelli, Agent and Promoter from the Duke of Alva, before the Queen and Lords openly admir'd, but inwardly griev'd, that it was so suddenly and early extinguish'd, and that his coming into England was of no Effect.

The Rebels

selves.

Yet not long after, out of the Ashes of this Rebellion there broke out another Flame at Nurworth in Cumberland, kindled by Leonard Dacres, Son to the Lord Dacres of Gilliland, for the Deliverance of the Queen of Scotland. He was a Party with the Earls in their Rebellion; but they breaking out sooner than he expected, and he at that Time being at the Court, and there tend'ring his Service to go against them, to that purpose he was sent into his Country: But in his Journey, branding himself with Treachery and Disloyalty, he consulted with the Rebels, and encourag'd them to proceed; and by Virtue of a Letter of Credence from the Queen, he surpriz'd the Castle of Greystock, and other Houses of the Dacres, and gather'd together an Army of three thousand Men. He was attack'd by the Lord Hunsdon, whom he receiv'd with great Bravery; but being overcome, he fled into Scotland, from thence he cross'd the Sea into Flanders, and dy'd in a miserable Condition at Lovain; where he inherited his Father's Curses laid upon him on his Death-Bed for his Disobedience. The Lord Hunsdon having taken in the Castles, committed the Charge of them to the Duke of Norfolk's Men; and the Queen by publick Proclamation pardon'd the Multitude, whom their Leader had excited to Rebellion.

A second Rebellion.

It is quell'd.

Tho' the Queen's Affairs were thus embroil'd with one Rebellion after another, yet she was not at all regardless of the distressed Protestants in France: For still she excited the Protestant Princes to defend the common Cause, supply'd the Queen of Navarre with Money, and gave leave to Henry Champignon to lead into France a hundred English Gentlemen, all brave Volunteers; among whom was the famous Walter Rawleigh, a very young Man, who now began to launch into the World. The French King, to exhaust the Treasure of England, and turn the Stream into some other Channel, resolv'd to raise a new War in Scotland against Queen Elizabeth, and design'd to send Sebastian Montigues with an Army into that Country; but he being kill'd at the Siege of St. John de Angeli, that Design vanish'd into Air. Nor was Ireland in this Year free from Rebellions, for Edmond and John Butler, Brothers to the Earl of Ormond, being assisted by the Pope and the Spaniard, endeavour'd to re-establish the Popish Religion, and to dispossess Queen Elizabeth of the Kingdom of Ireland. To support this Rebellion, Juan Mendoza was sent privately out of Spain; and to put an End to it the Earl of Ormond went from England to that Kingdom, who being extreamly griev'd that any Plot should fall upon his noble Family, perswaded his Brothers to lay down their Arms, and submit to the Queen's Mercy, and at his Request their Pardons were granted, and the Rebellion soon ended.

Disturbances
in Ireland.

VI. The Rebellions in England and Ireland being happily extinguish'd, new Accidents arose from Scotland, where Murray the Regent earnestly endeavour'd to have the Queen of the Scots deliver'd into his Hands; and therefore to ingratiate himself with Queen Elizabeth by some meritorious Exploit, he march'd march'd into the Scotch Borders in quest of the English Rebels, of whom he took several. But when he thought himself most secure, riding through the Streets in Lithgow, he was shot into the Bowels by one Hamilton, in a private Revenge for Injuries done to him, who immediately escap'd into France to avoid the Punishment. Spotswood says his Death was greatly lamented by all good Men, having in a little above a Year quieted a broken and disorder'd State; and was so remarkable for Devotion and Piety, that ever after he was call'd by the Title of The good Regent. However, as his Ambition was too aspiring, so his Activity was too irregular to be vindicated; and Melvil was wont to tell him, He was like an unskilful Player in a Tennis-Court, ever running after the Ball; whereas an expert Artist would discern where it would light or rebound, and with small Labour let it fall into his Racket.

Endeavours to free the Queen of the Scots.

After Murray's Death, the Kingdom being without a Regent, there arose many violent Disorders; and Thomas Carre and Walter Scot, two principal Men in the Scotch Borders, and devoted to their Queen, made Inroads into England, wasting all Places with Fire and Sword; 'till by Forces sent out of England, under the Command of the Earl of Suffex, and the Lord Hunsdon, they were Defeated: In whose Pursuit, three hundred Villages were fir'd, and fifty Castles destroy'd. For these and other Services soon after, the Earl made several Knights, as Sir William Drury, Sir Thomas Mannors, Sir George Carie, and Sir Robert Constable; and now to prevent further Disorders, the Lords of Scotland being ready to meet about the Election of a new Regent, they desir'd Queen Elizabeth's Advice in the Matter: Her Answer was, That she would not intermeddle in the creating a Regent, lest she might seem to prejudice their Queen, whose Cause was not yet decided. But soon after they chose the Earl of Lenox, the King's Grandfather, to be Regent of Scotland, without any Opposition from Queen Elizabeth; who knew that out of natural Affection, he would be tender of his Grandson, and affectionate to the English for the Civilities he had receiv'd; and doubted not his being at her Devotion, since she had his Wife in her Power. In the mean time the contrary Party, Hamilton Duke of Castel-Herault, with the Earls of Huntley and Argyle, imploy'd the Lord Seton to the Duke of Alva in the Netherlands, to use all Arguments, 'That the ten thousand Ducats assign'd the Queen of the Scots might be paid, and that he would assist her for the Recovery of her Liberty; alledging how acceptable it would be to all Christian Princes, and to the whole Catholick Church. The Duke promis'd to give all necessary Assistance; the French King also solicited Queen Elizabeth to the same purpose; and the Spanish Ambassador, in his Master's Name, urg'd it with no less Vehemence. Queen Elizabeth, violently attack'd with all these Importunities, made Answer, That as she would omit nothing that might tend to the Reconciling of the Queen of Scotland and her Subjects; so she must take leave to provide for her own and her Peoples Security and Quiet, according as Nature, Reason, and her Princely Reputation and Honour requir'd.

Pope Pius's Bull against Queen Elizabeth.

When all other Means prov'd ineffectual, the Romish Party in a Rage had recourse to their last Effort, Pope Pius the Fifth; who having the last Year Excommunicated Queen Elizabeth, and excited her Subjects to a Rebellion, now caus'd his plenary Bull to be fix'd upon the Gates of the Bishop of London's Palace, under this Title: A Declaratory Sentence of our holy Lord Pope Pius Quintus, against Elizabeth, the pretended Queen of England, and the Hereticks her Adherents. In which also her Subjects are declar'd absolv'd from their Oath of Allegiance, and any other Duty they owe to her; and whoever shall henceforward obey her, are included in the same Anathema. In the Bull it self, which is long, the Pope declares himself to have a Power over all Nations and Kingdoms, to pluck up, destroy, scatter, consume, plant and build. And afterwards, pronounces Elizabeth to be a Heretick, as likewise all her Adherents, and Excommunicated from that Church, out of which there is no Salvation: 'And

‘ And further declares her to be depriv’d of all Titles, Dominions, Dignities
 ‘ and Privileges whatsoever; and commands all her Subjects that they presume ‘ not to obey her, or her Orders, Mandates and Laws, upon pain of the same ‘ Sentence.

The Romish Subjects of England, being thus debauch’d from their Allegiance, by the Pope’s Authority and Approbation, there soon follow’d several Se-ditions and Insurrections; and some of the Nobility and Gentry of that Persuasion, who had felt all the Happiness of the Government, in compliance with their Religion, began to be ill-affected towards their Sovereign. The first Insurrection, after this Bull appear’d in England, was among some of the Hut-Gentry of Norfolk, who resolving to set their Duke at Liberty, form’d a Plot, that when the People resorted to a Fair at Harlestone, they should gather the Multitude together by sound of Trumpet, under pretence of expelling the Foreigners out of England that had fled from the Duke of Alva. But their Designs were discover’d and prevented before they came to Maturity; and of the many that were condemn’d, only three were Executed, the principal of whom was John Throg- morton, who tho’ he stood mute at the Bar, confess’d at the Gallows that he had been the Author of the Sedition. Not long after John Felton, that had set up the Pope’s Bull upon the Bishop of London’s Palace, not attempting to fly, was taken, and being arraign’d, undauntedly confess’d the Fact, without acknowledging any Crime, and was hang’d near the Place of his Treason, where by his Suffering he obtain’d the Reputation of a Martyr: Tho’ the more moderate sort of Papists disallow’d of the Pope’s whole Proceedings, as Unjust and Illegal. The same Day that Felton was arraign’d, the Duke of Norfolk, upon his Confession of having acted imprudently, and ingaging under his Hand not to concern himself further in the Marriage, without the Queen’s Approbation, was discharg’d from Imprisonment. Cecil being his Friend earnestly mov’d him to marry some other Person with all speed, and so remove all future Suspicion; yet some again thought that this Inlargement of the Duke’s, was purposely to bring him into greater Dangers.

An Insurrection in Norfolk.

The Duke of Norfolk set at Liberty.

Many Conspiracies at the same Time were form’d to set the Queen of the Scots at Liberty; for the effecting of which, Thomas and Edward Stanley, younger Sons to the Earl of Darby, were chiefly concern’d; but the Matter being discover’d, they were soon suppress’d, and some suffer’d Death. And now the Scotch Lords of their Queen’s Party, continuing to protect the English Rebels, the Earl of Suffex once again, accompany’d with the Lord Scroop, enter’d Scotland, burnt the Villages all along the Valley of Anandale, and compell’d Duke Hamilton, and the Earls of Huntley and Argyle, under a Writing sign’d with their own Hands and Seals, to abandon the English Rebels. Suffex, upon his Return, Knighted seven Gentlemen for their Valour; and he himself, for his approv’d Wisdom and Virtue, was admitted of the Queen’s Privy-Council. And now the Queen being too often disturb’d by Conspiracies, sent Sir William Cecil and Sir Walter Mildmay to the Queen of Scotland, then at Chattefworth House in Darbyshire, to consult with her by what means to make up the Breach in Scot- land, to reinvest her in her former State, and to secure both her Son and the Queen of England. The Scotch Queen did nothing but deplore her wretched Condition, throwing her self wholly upon the Queen’s Clemency; and when the Commissioners made to her certain Propositions of Agreement: First, That the ‘ Treaty of Edinburgh should be confirm’d: Then, That she should renounce ‘ her Right and Title to England, during Queen Elizabeth’s Life, or any Chil‘ dren of her Body lawfully begotten: And, That she should send her Son ‘ for a Hostage into England, with six others, such as the Queen should ‘ nominate: Lastly, That the Castle of Humes and East-Castle, with some ‘ others, should be held by the English for three Years. To these Articles, the Queen of Scotland for the present made a prudent Reply; but referr’d a more compleat Answer to the Bishop of Ross, her Ambassador in England, and some other Commissioners ; who afterwards approv'd of some of the Propositions, but disallow'd of the rest : So that the Treaty drop'd, and the Matter rested in the former State.

But to no Effect.

The Anniversary of this Reign first celebrated.

The twelfth Year of this Reign being happily expired, in which some credulous Papists had expected, according to the Prediction of certain Fortune-Tellers, their Golden-Day as they term'd it, all good Men throughout England triumph'd with Thanksgivings, Sermons in Churches, repeated Prayers, publick Tournaments, and festival Joy ; and so solemniz'd the seventeenth Day of November, being the Anniversary of the Beginning of her Reign ; which Day, in Testimony of their great Affection to her, they never ceas'd to observe as long as she liv'd. And indeed the Love of the People was so just and general, notwithstanding some secret Enemies, that if this excellent Queen happen'd to be Sick, or a little disorder'd in her Health, her Courtiers would be so allarm'd at it, that they would scarcely stir from her to eat or drink, or take any Care of themselves : And all Degrees of People would fly in vast Numbers to the Churches, and with the most devout Prayers and Tears beg her Health and Continuance of her happy Government, 'till God had heard their Petitions, and restor'd her to her Health.

Reg. 13.

Still the Affairs of the Scots, and their Queen, was the great Concern of the Court of England; and this Year, in the Name of the King of Scotland, there came the Earl of Morton, the Abbot of Dunfermelin, and James Mac-Gilly ; whom Queen Elizabeth requir'd to shew more clearly, for what Causes they had depos'd their Queen. They exhibited a large Discourse, in which, with peculiar Freedom, they endeavour'd to prove, ' By the ancient Right of the Kingdom of Scotland, the People were superior to the King ; and urg'd Calvin's Authority, that Popular Magistrates were constituted for Moderation of the Licentiousness of Princes ; and that it was lawful for them, upon just Causes, both to imprison and to depose Kings. The Queen could not read this Writing without Indignation ; but gave this Answer to the Deputies, That she saw no just Cause for the severe Treatment of their Queen ; therefore she order'd them to consult immediately about Methods for healing the Dissensions in Scotland. Hereupon in the House of the Lord-Keeper Bacon, a Proposition was made to the Bishop of Ross, and the other Deputies for the Scotch Queen, That for the Security of the Kingdom, and the Queen of England, it was necessary, that before the Queen of Scotland should be set at Liberty, Duke Hamilton, the Earls of Huntley and Argyle, the Lords Humes, Heris, and another Baron should be deliver'd for Hostages, and the Castles of Dunbriton and Humes, yielded to the English for three Years. But they made Answer, That to yield up such Men, and such Fortifications as were demanded, was only to leave the miserable Queen destitute of faithful Friends, and naked of Places fit for Guard and Defence : Yet they offer'd to give two Earls and two Barons for Hostages, 'till two Years were expired. This not being accepted, they immediately concluded, and publicly said, That now they perceiv'd the English design'd to keep their Queen perpetual Prisoner, and to break off the Treaty ; since they insisted upon such Security as Scotland was not able to give. And now Queen Elizabeth perceiving that nothing could be effected for the Safety of her self, and the King and Queen of Scotland, unless both the Scotch Parties contented ; she held it proper that the Lords of Scotland should themselves appoint some select Persons to accommodate this nice Affair.

Proposals about the Queen of the Scots.

Troubles in Scotland.

While these Transactions pass'd in England, the Queen of the Scots Party were severely treated in Scotland, many executed and several slain, the strong Castle of Dunbriton taken, and J. Hamilton Arch-Bishop of St. Andrew's and Brother to the Duke of Castle-Herault, as an Accessary to the Lord Darnly's Murther, was hang'd without being arraign'd according to Law. In England the Queen of the Scots had all her Servants taken from her, except ten, and a Priest to say Mass ; with which Indignities that Queen was so exasperated, that

that she caus'd a large Writing of her Counsels, with certain Love-Letters to the Duke of Norfolk, to be carry'd to the Pope, and the King of Spain, by Ridolpho the Florentine. This being first brought to the Duke, was copy'd out by Higford his Gentleman of the Bed-Chamber; who being commanded to burn all that he had writ, secretly hid the Papers under a Mat in the Duke's Bed-Chamber. Ridolpho, to induce the Duke to be Head of the disaffected Party in England, aggravated the Injuries he had suffer'd; how contrary to Law he had been detain'd Prisoner, and now not summon'd to the Parliament: He exhibited to him a Catalogue of such of the Nobility, as had promis'd to assist him: He shew'd 'how the Pope, to promote the Catholick Religion, 'would himself bear all the Charge of the War, and had already deposited a 'hundred thousand Crowns, of which he himself had distributed twelve 'thousand among the English Fugitives: He promis'd also that the King of 'Spain would send four thousand Horse, and six thousand Foot to his Assistance. To these Reasons the Bishop of Ross added, 'That it was an easie Enterprize 'for him to surprize the Queen; and when he had her once in Possession, he 'might then with no Difficulty obtain both the Liberty of the Scotch Queen, 'and a Toleration of Religion. The former Reasons made some Impression upon the Duke; but this Point of surprizing the Queen, he abhor'd as an impious Fact, and to be rejected as pernicious and dangerous.

A Design against Queen Elizabeth.

In France, not long before this, the Marriage was solemniz'd between Charles the Ninth, King of France, and Elizabeth of Austria, Daughter to the Emperor Maximilian: In Congratulation of which, Queen Elizabeth sent over the Lord Buckhurst, who was receiv'd with great Magnificence, and perhaps the greater, in regard of a Motion now to be made. For the Lord Buckhurst having in his Retinue one Cavalcanti, a Nobleman of Florence, the Queen-Mother of France, as a Native of the same Place, had frequent Conferences with him, and often insisted upon the Happiness that would accrue to both Kingdoms, if a Match were made between the Queen of England, and her Son Henry Duke of Anjou; and at last desir'd him to recommend the Motion to Queen Elizabeth, both from her, and her Son the King of France, as highly desirable to both. The Lord Buckhurst return'd, being presented by the King of France with a Golden Chain weighing a thousand French Crowns; and Cavalcanti at his Return made the Motion to the Queen, who seem'd not unwilling to hearken to it; for by this Match might be added to the Kingdom of England the rich Dukedoms of Anjou, Bourbon and Auvergne, and in Possibility the Kingdom of France it self. Upon which a Treaty was negotiated, in which the French propos'd three Articles, 'One concerning the Coronation 'of the Duke; another, concerning the joint Administration of the Govern- 'ment; and a third, concerning a Toleration of his Religion. To which it was answer'd, 'That the two first Articles might in some Measure be com- 'pos'd; but the third was scarce practicable: For tho' a contrary Religion 'might be tolerated between Subjects of the same Kingdom, yet between a 'Husband and Wife it seem'd very incongruous and inconvenient. Yet the Matter at last was brought to this Conclusion, 'That if the Duke would afford 'the Queen his Presence at Divine Service, and not refuse to hear and learn 'the Doctrine of the Church of England, he should not be compell'd to use 'the English Rites, but at his Pleasure use the Roman, as far as was consistent 'with God's Word. But upon this Punctilio, they could not come to Agree- 'ment; and the Treaty, after it had continu'd almost a Year, intirely broke off. It was indeed generally believ'd, That the Match was never really design'd on either Side, but that both pretended it to promote their own Interests: For the Earl of Leicester, who knew more of the Queen's Thoughts than any Man, wrote at this time to Walsingham the Queen's Ambassador in France, That he found the Queen's Inclination so cold in the Matter, that tho' the Point of Religion were fully agreed; yet she would still find one Point or other to prevent the Marriage.

A Match pro-pos'd between the Queen and the Duke of Anjou.

The Treaty broke off.

But

A Match design'd between the Duke of Norfolk and the Queen of the Scots.

But the French King took not greater Pains for accomplishing this Marriage, than some English did to hasten a Marriage between the Queen of the Scots and the Duke of Norfolk, whom they had again drawn into the Snare; which came to be discover'd by a Packet of Letters, sent by Ridolpho to the Bishop of Ross, and by the Confession of Bayliff, who brought the said Letters. Upon which the Bishop of Ross was confin'd to the Isle of Ely; Sir Thomas Stanley, Sir Thomas Gerrard, and Rolton, were committed to the Tower; and Henry Howard, who had aspir'd to the Archbishoprick of York, was committed to the Custody of the Archbishop of Canterbury. At the same time the Queen of the Scots sent Mony to her Confederates in her own Kingdom; which was by Higford, the Duke's Gentleman, deliver'd to one Brown, as only so much Silver: But he finding by the Weight that it was Gold, he became suspicious; and thereupon went and deliver'd the Mony and Letters to the Lords of the Council. Upon this, Higford being examin'd, confess'd the whole Project, and withal gave Information of the secret Writing of the Queen of the Scots, which he had hid under the Mat, unknown to the Duke his Master. Two Days after, the Duke himself, being examin'd by the Council, and knowing nothing of what his Servants had confess'd, he deny'd every Particular; and thereupon was again sent to the Tower, to the great Concern and Affliction of the People. After him Banister, his Lawyer, the Earls of Arundel and Southampton, the Lords Lumley and Cobham, Henry Piercy, Lowder, Powell, Goodyer, and others, were committed to Prison; who, upon Hopes of Pardon, confess'd all they knew concerning this peculiar Affair. When these Things, and especially the private Writing, which the Duke thought had been burnt, were shew'd him, he in Confusion cry'd out, I am betray'd by my Confidants, being unwilling to be distrustful, tho' it is the very Essence of Wisdom. And then with the most humble Submission he beg'd the Lords to mediate for him to the Queen; towards whom, he protested he never had the least Thought of doing any Prejudice.

The Duke again sent to the Tower.

Debates about the Bishop of Ross.

The Bishop of Ross, by the Confession of all the Criminals, and the Duke himself, being charg'd as the chief Projector of the whole Conspiracy, it caus'd great Debates how to proceed against him, who was an Ambassador; but the learned Civilians, having upon some curious Queries determin'd that he had lost the Privilege of an Ambassador, he was brought before the Council, and told, That by his Actions he had forfeited his Character, and should be punish'd according to his Deserts. The Bishop answer'd, He was the Ambassador of an absolute, tho' unfortunate Queen, whose Privileges by the Law of Nations were not to be violated. Upon which Cecil in a grave Reply shew'd him, That the Privilege of an Ambassador could not protect a Person in Crimes against the publick Majesty of a Prince, and consequently he was liable to Punishment; or else every wicked Ambassador might plot against the Lives of crown'd Heads without Controul. He urg'd that the Privileges of Ambassadors had never been violated Via Juris, but Via Facti; and advis'd them not to use harder Measures to him, than had been us'd to the English Ambassadors, Throgmorton in France, Randolph and Tamworth in Scotland; who had there rais'd Rebellions, without any other Punishment, than to be oblig'd to depart at a limited Time. And when English Evidences were to be produc'd against him, he alledg'd, as a Custom obtaining the Force of a Law, That the Testimony of an Englishman against a Scot, or of a Scot against an Englishman, was not to be admitted. However, after some further Consultations, this Bishop was committed close Prisoner to the Tower. At this very time Matthew Stuart, Earl of Lenox, and Regent of Scotland, being surpriz'd by the Nobility of the adverse Party, was murder'd by Bell and Caulder, after he had carefully govern'd the Kingdom about fourteen Months; and was succeeded in the Regency by John Auerkin, Earl of Marre; who being a Man of a mild Disposition, and harra's'd between the different Counsels of his Friends, and the

He is committed to the Tower.

the Insults of his Enemies, he ended his Days with Sorrow, after he had govern'd about thirteen Months.

But long before this happen'd, a new Parliament was call'd, which met on the second Day of April; and her Majesty with great Splendor and Attendance, open'd it with these Words, which she pronounc'd with a Grace that charm'd the whole Assembly; My right loving Lords, and you my right faithful and obedient Subjects, We in the Name of God, for his Service, and for the Safety of this State, are now here assembled, to his Glory I hope, and pray that it may be to your Comfort, and the common Quiet of ours, yours, and all ours for ever. And then the Parliament proceeded to Variety of Business; and among other things it was Enacted, 'That if any one affirm'd, that any other hath a Right to the Crown, than the present Queen; or that the Laws and Statutes cannot limit and determine the Right of the Crown, and the Succession thereof, every such Person shall be guilty of High-Treason. By another Statute it was Enacted, 'That whoever should reconcile any Person to the Church of Rome, and those also who should be reconcil'd, should incur the Penalty of High-Treason. These severe Laws were judg'd necessary at this time to quel the turbulent Spirits of some restless Men. Therefore a Bill also was brought in against the Queen of the Scots, that if she again offended against the Laws of England, she should be judg'd as the Wife of an English Peer: But here the Queen interpos'd her Authority, and would not suffer such a peculiar Law to pass. After several other Acts had pass'd, the Parliament was dissolv'd on the twenty ninth Day of May. About which time a solemn Tournament was perform'd at Westminster; where the chief Challengers were Edward Earl of Oxford, Charles Howard, Sir Henry Lee, and Christopher Hatton Esq; who all perform'd valliantly, but the Earl of Oxford gain'd the greatest Honour. This was not long after succeeded by the Execution of Doctor John Story, who tho' he pretended to be a Foreigner, was convicted and suffer'd for High-Treason.

Acts pass'd.

But in the Beginning of the next Year, was try'd a more considerable Man, Thomas Duke of Norfolk; who became a new and sorrowful Spectacle in Westminster-Hall, such as had not been seen for eighteen Years. He was arraign'd before George Talbot, Earl of Shrewsbury, constituted Lord High-Steward upon that Occasion, and twenty five other Lords. The Substance of his Indictment was, 'That in the eleventh Year of this Reign he had traiterously consulted to depose the Queen, and to bring in Foreign Forces to invade the Kingdom: That he treated with the Queen of the Scots concerning Marriage, contrary to his Promise, and to the Hazard of the Realm: That he sent Money to the Earls of Northumberland and Westmorland, who had rais'd a Rebellion against the Queen: That he implor'd Aids from the Pope, the King of Spain, and the Duke of Alva, for the freeing the Queen of the Scots, and restoring the Popish Religion: And lastly, That he had sent Supplies to the Lord Heris, and other of the Queen's Enemies in Scotland. The Duke yielding to be try'd by his Peers, first Barham, Serjeant at Law, then Gerrard the Queen's Attorney, and lastly Bromeley her Solicitor, enforc'd the Crimes objected against him: To all which the Duke made handsom and colourable Answers; but most of them being mov'd by sufficient Testimony, he occasionally ask'd, Whether the Subjects of another Prince, in League with the Queen, were to be accounted Enemies? To which Cataline answer'd, They were; and that the Queen of England might make War with any Duke of France, and yet keep Peace with the French King. After a long Trial, the Lord High-Steward demanded of the Duke, if he had any thing more to alledge for himself; who answer'd, I rely upon the Equity of the Laws. After this the Lords withdrawing a while, brought him in guilty of High-Treason; and the Lord High-Steward with a Flood of Tears pronounc'd his Sentence in the usual Form. His Condemnation produc'd a new Conspiracy from Barney and Matther, ther, who joining with one Herle, resolv'd to kill certain of the Counsellors, and set the Duke at Liberty; but Herle discovering the Matter, the other two were both executed. As to the Duke, the greatest Favour he begg'd was, That her Majesty would be kind to his Children and Servants, and that his Debts might be paid.

The fourth Parliament in this Reign. This Plot, and several other Practices to deliver the Prisoner, occasion'd the Calling of a new Parliament; against which the Queen honour'd Walter D'Evereux, Viscount Hereford, with the Title of Earl of Essex, and Edward Lord Clinton, with that of Earl of Lincoln; and also summon'd four new Barons to this Parliament, John Powlet of Basing, Henry Compton, Henry Cheney, and Henry Norris. The Parliament met on the eighth Day of May, and within six Weeks Time broke up, without a Dissolution, or enacting very much besides the present Security of the Nation. The principal Law pass'd was, 'That whoever should endeavour to free any Person imprison'd by the Queen's Commandment, for Treason, or Suspicion of Treason, before his Indictment, should forfeit his Estate during Life, and be imprison'd during the Queen's Pleasure; if indicted, he should incur the Pains of Death; and if condemn'd, the Penalty of High-Treason. As the Severity of this Law was only necessary for the Times, so the Parliament thought fit to make it Temporary. But so many Designs of this Nature were set on foot, as hasten'd the unfortunate Duke's Execution; which however was deferr'd for about four Months. For before that Time, neither the Commons in Parliament, the Counsellors at Court, nor the Importunity of Preachers, by suggesting of the Greatness of the present Danger, could overcome the Queen's Clemency.

The Duke of Norfolk brought to the Scaffold

But on the second of June, the great Duke was brought to a Scaffold erected on Tower-Hill, accompany'd by Nowell Dean of St. Paul's; and after Silence obtain'd, he thus deliver'd himself to the Multitude, It is no new Thing for Men to suffer Death in this Place; tho' since the Beginning of our most excellent Queen's Reign, I am the First, and God grant I may be the Last: To which the People most affectionately cry'd Amen! He then acknowledg'd, 'That he was justly condemn'd by his Peers; and acknowledg'd he had treated with the Queen of the Scots in Matters of great Consequence, contrary to his Sovereign's Knowledge, and after Pardon obtain'd, and Promises given, he had repeated the same Crime; for which he was a humble Penitent. He clear'd himself of some Imputations, and declar'd, That he had not been addicted to Popery, since his first Notions of Religion; tho' he had some of that Profession among his Servants and Familiars: And if he had offended God, the Church, or the Protestants, he begg'd that all would forgive him. Then after the Recital of one or two Psalms, he cry'd out, Lord, into thy Hands I commend my Spirit! After which tenderly embracing Sir Henry Leigh, he whisper'd something to him and Dean Nowell, who turning to the People, said, The Duke desires you all to pray to God for his Mercy to him; and when one reach'd him a Handkerchief to cover his Eyes, he refus'd it, courageously saying, I fear not Death. So devoutly falling upon his Knees, and fixing his Mind upon Heaven, he laid his Head upon the Block, which at one Stroke was sever'd from his Body, and by the Executioner shown as a melancholy Sight to the weeping Spectators; whose Sorrows were augmented by the Consideration of his noble Presence and Greatness, his Affability and Munificence; and by the Remembrance that his Father, at the same Place met with the same Fate twenty five Years before, only for Quartering the Arms of Edward the Confessor with his own. But as the Crimes of his Father and Grandfather were greater, than those for which they suffer'd; it is no Wonder if Providence extended the Punishment further than their Persons.

He is beheaded.

Not long after, Thomas Piercy Earl of Northumberland, who had formerly rebell'd, and fled into Scotland, was for a Sum of Money deliver'd by the Earl of Morton to the Lord Hunsdon, Governor of Berwick; and after that was be-

This being settled at home, the Queen gave leave to Sir John Norris and Sir Francis Drake to undertake an Expedition into Spain at their own private Charges; who being allow'd some Ships of War, they took along with them Anthony the Bastard, who laid Claim to the Kingdom of Portugal, with eleven thousand Soldiers, and fourteen hundred Seamen. On the fifth Day of April they set Sail from Plimouth, and arriv'd at the Groyne in Galicia; where with singular Valour they first took the lower Town, and afterwards the higher: And from thence sailing towards Portugal, they met the brave Earl of Essex, who thirsting after Glory, had put to Sea without the Queen's Knowledge. After two Days they arriv'd at Penycha a Town of Portugal, which they took, and left the Castle to Don Antonio; and from thence they march'd by Land towards Lisbon, sixty Miles distant. The Foot Companies led by Norris, whom Drake promis'd to follow with the Fleet, being arriv'd at the West Suburbs of Lisbon, they found no People but a few poor disarm'd Portuguese, who cry'd out God save King Antonio! The Day following the Spaniards made a Sally, in which Encounter, Brett, Carsey and Carre, stout Commanders, and some common Soldiers were slain; yet the Earl of Essex bravely drove the Spaniards to the very Gates of the City. And now having tarry'd two Days, without being assisted by any Revolt in the Portuguese, according to Antonio's Assurance, and finding fresh Supplies come into the Town, their own Army sickly, Provisions and Powder failing, and what was most material, Drake not bringing up the great Ordnance; they departed from the Suburbs of Lisbon towards Cascaes, a little Town at the Mouth of the River Tago, which Town was in the mean Time taken by Drake, who excus'd his not coming to Lisbon, by Reason of the Flats he had to pass, and the Castle of St. Julian, fortify'd with fifty Pieces of great Cannon. Near this Place they found sixty Vessels belonging to the Hanse Towns of Germany, laden with Corn and all manner of Ammunition, which they took as lawful Prize towards their Charges; in regard the Queen had forbidden those Towns to carry Provisions or Ammunition to the Spaniard. From hence they set sail to Vigo, a Place famous for a glorious Expedition in this Age, which they fir'd; and having wasted all the Country, they return'd into England with a hundred and fifty Pieces of great Cannon, and a very rich Booty, of which some Part was divided among the Seamen. This private Expedition prov'd a great Mortification to the Spaniards, and rais'd the Reputation of the English Valour; but it cost the Lives of about six thousand Soldiers and Seamen, not from the Hands of the Enemy, but by their eating of strange Fruits, and from the Distempers of the Climate.

It now nearly concern'd the Good of England to look into the Affairs and State of France; for while these Things were transacted between Spain and England, the Popish Princes of France, under Pretext of defending the Catholick Religion, enter'd into a famous Combination, which they call'd The Holy League: The Design of which was, To root out all Protestants, and to divert the Right of Succession to the Crown of France; for which they bound themselves by Oath, to suffer none but a Catholick to be King of France; which was directly to exclude the King of Navarre and the Prince of Conde, if the present King dy'd without Issue. The Head of this remarkable League was the Duke of Guise, who having given some Defeats to the German Forces that came into France in Relief of the Protestants, was unmeasurably extoll'd by the Clergy and others; and arriv'd to such a Height of Reputation, that entering into Paris, he forc'd the King to leave the City, and oblig'd him in an Assembly at Blois to make him great Master of the French Cavalry, and to consent by Edict to exterminate the Protestants. So that the King dreading his Greatness, at length us'd such Means as he procur'd him to be assassinated in the very Court; and shortly after his Brother the Cardinal to be strangled. Upon which so vast a Confusion follow'd, that the People broke through all Obedimerous in his Progeny, that he could reckon more Children of both Sexes, than all the Earls in England: Also John Lord Sturton, Henry Lord Compton, and the Lord Paget and Brussels. The two first of these are worthily remember'd as the pious Founders of two Colleges, Sidney and Emanuel; in the University of Cambridge, call'd the two Protestant Foundations.

The wise Queen now spent much of her Time in fortifying of Places, in managing her Treasure to the best Advantage, and sending Relief to her distressed Neighbours; for which she expended large Sums both in France and the Netherlands. Infomuch that many admir'd how her Revenues could serve so many great Ends; since she was clear of all Debts, and was able to defend her self and her Allies without any Foreign Helps, which none of her neighbouring Kings could do. But in reality she was frugal with true Wisdom and Understanding; and never spar'd when there was a just Occasion, either for the Maintenance of her Royal State, the Defence of her Kingdom, or the Relief of her Neighbours. She took particular Care of her standing Revenues, in which Burleigh her Treasurer was an admirable Manager; yet this Year she exceeded him and the rest of her great Men; and at the Information of a subtle ordinary Man, call'd Caermarden, she rais'd Sir Thomas Smith, the Farmer of some Customs, from fourteen to forty two thousand Pounds, and then to fifty thousand Pounds a Year. And when Burleigh, Leicester and Walsingham first blam'd her Majesty for hark'ning to Caermarden, an inconsiderable Informer, she wisely answer'd, It was the Duty of a Prince to carry an equal Hand between the Highest and Lowest; That such 'as rashly accus'd Magistrates and Counsellors, without being able to prove their Charge, were to be punish'd; but those who accus'd them justly, were to be heard and encourag'd.

Her Glory was now spread abroad, and her Reputation extended to remote Countries; having this Year obtain'd of the Grand-Signior Rest and Quiet for the Vaivod of Moldavia, who had been miserably harra's'd by the Turks, and a Peace for the Polonians, who were threaten'd by them with a dangerous War; which was afterwards most gratefully acknowleg'd by them. In the mean Time to confirm Amity with the King of Scotland, she sent the new Earl of Worcester to congratulate his Marriage and safe Return out of Denmark, and to signifie to him, That he, together with the French King, were chosen into the Society of the Order of the Garter; and withal to urge him timely to suppress the Popish Faction, which grew strong in Scotland. King James receiv'd him very graciously, and to maintain the Amity with England, and declare his great Affection to the publick Peace, he sent Colonel Stuart into Germany, that Care might be taken with the King of Denmark and the Ambassadors of the Princes there met, for renewing the Peace between England, Spain and France. As to France, that Country was now violently torn by a Civil War, rais'd by the Leaguers, of which Queen Elizabeth could not be an unconcern'd Spectator, but perform'd all the Parts of a wise Prince and a pious Christian; tho' she was advis'd by many not to assist the new King of France. When some suggested to her, That while the Leaguers and the Spaniards were endeavouring to share France between them, and cantonize it into several Principalities, she might also seize upon the Maritime Countries of Picardy and Normandy, alledging what Charles of Burgundy was wont to say, That the Neighbouring Nations would be happy when France should be subject to twenty petty Kings; She heard it with Dislike, and rejected it with Indignation, saying, The last Day of the Kingdom of France, when ever it comes will certainly be the Eve of the Destruction of England.

In this Year dy'd several great Men, as Ambrose Dudley Earl of Warwick, George Talbot Earl of Shrewsbury, Sir Thomas Randolph, who had been employ'd in many Embassies, Sir James Crofts Comptrollor of the Queen's Household, and the Lord Wentworth, the last English Governor of Calais. But the most remarkable Man was Sir Francis Walsingham, principal Secretary of State, ence to Magistrates, and pillag'd the Palace Royal in Paris. The Confederates immediately made a new Seal, usurp'd the Regal Authority, seiz'd the strongest Places, intercepted the King's Revenues, call'd in Spanish Soldiers, and denounc'd War against their King. Insomuch that the King was compell'd to fly to the Protestants, whom he had also disoblig'd; upon which the Leaguers, by a detestable Villany, procur'd him to be murther'd by the Hands of James Clement a Monk. The King at his Death declar'd the King of Navarre his lawful Successor; but the Confederates were for excluding him as a Heretick, yet could not well agree upon another Person: Some would have the Duke of Lorrain, some the Duke of Savoy, others the Duke of Guise's Brother, and others the King of Spain; but the greatest Part gave their Votes for the Cardinal of Bourbon, who was one Degree nearer ally'd to the slain King, than his Nephew the King of Navarre. He therefore was proclaim'd King of France, by the Name of Charles the Tenth: But he being a Priest, the King of Navarre was proclaim'd King of France, by the Name of Henry the Fourth, and continu'd at Dieppe in Normandy, in no small Danger of his Adversaries.

The King of Navarre being thus rais'd in Dignity, but weak in Supports, implor'd Assistance of the generous Queen of England, and offer'd to enter into a League Offensive and Defensive. Upon which, out of Respect to a Protestant King, renown'd for his Martial Acts, the Queen immediately sent him twenty two thousand Pounds of English Mony in Gold, such a Sum of Gold Coin as he declar'd he had never seen at once; and withal supply'd him with four thousand Soldiers, under the Command of the Valiant Peregrine Lord Willoughby; appointing for Colonels, Sir Thomas Wilford Marthal of the Field, Sir John Boroughs, Sir William Drury, and Sir Thomas Baskeville, with a Month's Pay advanc'd. Hereupon the Confederates, whom the King beyond Expectation had just defeated at Argues, began to sink and give Way, and upon the Arrival of the English to vanish out of Sight. With this Addition of Forces, the new rais'd King march'd to Paris; and being ready to enter the City, he caus'd a Retreat to be sounded, being unwilling to have that Capital City plunder'd, which he hop'd would shortly be his own. After that by the good Service of the English, he recover'd Mans, Alençon, Falaise, Luxon, and Honfleur; and being fatigu'd with all the Inconveniences of a Winter Expedition, and five hundred Miles March, the English were dismiss'd, and sent home with grateful Acknowledgments.

The Success
of it.

As Queen Elizabeth desir'd to establish Navarre in the Kingdom of France, so she also desir'd to marry his Sister the Lady Catharine to the King of Scotland; but finding that that King had before plac'd his Affections upon Anne, the Daughter of Frederick King of Denmark, she desisted and approv'd of his Choice. Accordingly they were marry'd by Proxy in the Month of August; but the Lady failing for Scotland, by prodigious Storms was driven back to Norway, and so long detain'd, that the King, first advising with Queen Elizabeth, who sent him noble Presents towards the Celebration of the Marriage, he sail'd over into Norway in an extream cold Season, and there consummating the Marriage at twenty three Years of Age, he continu'd in those Parts till the following Year and Month of May. Many were of Opinion that these extraordinary Storms were rais'd by Magick and Witchcraft; which Belief was confirm'd by the Confession of some impious Persons, reputed Magicians, who declar'd they did it to hinder the Queen from Landing in Scotland, and that Bothwell had consulted with them about the King's Death. For which he was thrown into Prison, and escaping in a short Time, he occasion'd new Commotions in Scotland.

The Queen's
Policy.

In this Year dy'd several great Men, as Ambrose Dudley Earl of Warwick, George Talbot Earl of Shrewsbury, Sir Thomas Randolph, who had been imploy'd in many Embassies, Sir James Crofts Comptrollor of the Queen's Household, and the Lord Wentworth, the last English Governor of Calais. But the most remarkable Man was Sir Francis Walsingham, principal Secretary of State,

State, Chancellor of the Dutchy of Lancaster, and of the Order of the Garter; one of the most refin'd Politicians, and penetrating Statesmen, that ever that Age produc'd. He had an admirable Talent both in discovering and managing the secret Recesses of Human Nature; and had his Spies in most Courts in Christendom, and allow'd them a liberal Maintenance; for his great Maxim was, Knowledge is never too dear. Accordingly he spent his whole Time and Faculties in the Service of the Queen and Publick; so that the Queen was heard to say, That in Diligence and Sagacity he exceeded her Expectation. This great Man after all his mighty Services to the Publick, gave a remarkable Proof at his Death, how far he preferr'd that to his own Interest; for he dy'd so poor that his Friends were oblig'd to bury him privately in the Night, lest his Body should be arrested for Debt. He left only one Daughter, famous for having three Husbands of the greatest Note; first Sir Philip Sidney, secondly Robert Earl of Essex, and lastly the Earl of Clan-Richard, who was afterwards made Earl of St. Albans.

A. D. 1591. Reg. 33. 34. In the following Year the City of London was much disturb'd by the prodigious Behaviour of one Hacket, born at Oundle in Northamptonshire, a mean Person of no Learning, who suddenly took upon him a Shew of wonderful Sanctity, hearing Sermons, getting Scriptures by heart, and counterfeiting Revelations from God, and extraordinary Calls. By which Means he was highly extoll'd by certain zealous Ministers of the Geneva Discipline, especially by two call'd Coppinger and Arthington; and they accounted him as sent from Heaven, and a greater Prophet than Moses or John Baptist; and finally that he was Christ himself, come with a Fan in his Hand to judge the World. This they proclaim'd in Cheapside, making report that Hacket participated of Christ's glorify'd Body, by his special Spirit, and was now come to propagate the Gospel over Europe, and settle a true Discipline in the Church of England; and that they themselves were two Prophets, the one of Mercy, the other of Judgment, with many such incredible Blasphemies. Whereupon Hacket was apprehended and arraign'd, and at last hang'd, drawn and quarter'd, continuing at his very Death in his blasphemous Assertions, to the great Horror and Amazement of the Spectators. Coppinger a while after starv'd himself to Death in Prison; Arthington repented, and made his Recantation in a publick Writing. Besides these extravagant Managers, others also at this Time oppos'd the establish'd Government of the Church of England, exclaiming against the Function and Calling of Bishops; with whom join'd some common Lawyers, affirming that the Queen could not depute, nor these Men exercise such Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction. But the Queen conceiving that she was shot at through the Sides of the Prelates, suppress'd them as much as possible, and strictly maintain'd the former Establishment.

And now Enmity daily increasing between Spain and England, two Proclamations were set forth; one prohibiting upon pain of High-Treason, to carry Provisions or Ammunition into any of the King of Spain's Dominions: Another forbidding all Persons to entertain any in their Houses, 'till Enquiry be made what they were; lest they should entertain Popish Priests, who became very numerous in England, by reason the King of Spain had lately founded a Seminary at Valadolid for the English. About this Time, the Lord Thomas Howard, with six of the Queen's Ships, having waited at the Azores six whole Months, for the Arrival of the Spanish Fleet from America, was at last attack'd by Alphonso Bassano, with fifty three Ships, sent for the Convoy of the said Fleet; where Richard Greenville, Vice-Admiral, being in the Revenge, and separated from his Company, was so hemm'd in by the Spanish Ships, and so batter'd with large Shot, that most of his Men being slain, his Main-Mast cut off, himself much wounded in the Head, he commanded to sink the Ship, that it might not fall into the Spaniards Hands; but this being countermanded by most Votes, it was agreed to yield it to the Spaniards, upon Condition that the Men

Men should be set at Liberty. Greenvile himself was carry'd to the Spanish Admiral, where within two Days he dy'd, not without the Commendations of his Enemies. Thus the great Ship call'd the Revenge was yielded, but had so many Leaks in the Keel, that soon after it was cast away in a Storm: And the Loss of this one Ship was soon made good upon the Spaniards, by taking many of theirs.

But the Queen's greatest Care was now for the State of France, and particularly that Bretaign should not fall into the Spaniards Hands; wherefore by Edmund York she promis'd the French King to send him new Forces to preserve that Province, if he would name some Towns, as Places of Retreat and Safety. Hereupon he nam'd Cherbourg, Granvile or Brest, as most convenient; and it was agreed that three thousand English should be sent into Bretaign and Picardy: But in the mean Time Henry Palmer was sent to Sea with a Squadron, and seiz'd on thirteen Spanish Ships, as they were returning from New France. And now Sir Roger Williams, with a Company of six hundred Soldiers, pass'd over to Dieppe in Normandy; and shortly after Sir John Norris, with the rest of the Forces, hasten'd into Bretaign. Sir Roger Williams with his own six hundred Men, and the Assistance of Charter Governor of Dieppe, bravely defeated the Leaguers, who had block'd up the Passages; whose Valour was highly applauded by the French King in his Letters to Queen Elizabeth. Whereupon increasing in Courage, and neglecting his Charge at Dieppe, he accompany'd the King to the very Suburbs of Paris, where in Honour of his Nation, he sent a Challenge to the Spaniards, to ingage two hundred Pike-men and a hundred Musketeers of the English, against the same Number of Spaniards, in the open Field.

Shortly after the French King acquainted Queen Elizabeth, that he design'd to take in Roan or Havre-de-Grace, before the Prince of Parma should come into France, and thereupon requested her to send four thousand English into Normandy, which upon certain wise Conditions she granted; and sent them under the Command of the brave Earl of Essex, accompany'd by Thomas Leighton and Sir William Killebrew, as Counsellors and Assistants. When the Earl arriv'd in France, he found that the King was at Noyon, and in Normandy no Preparation made for the War, which much perplex'd him; but soon after Sir Roger Williams came to him from the King, requesting him to go to Noyon, there to consult about managing the War. The Earl made a tedious Journey to that Place, and at his Arrival the King inform'd him, That of Necessity he must go himself into Champaign; but promis'd to send Marshal Bi-ron, and the Duke of Montpensier immediately to him, to lay Siege to Roan. Hereupon the Earl return'd to his Camp, expecting their Arrival, but neither of them came, which made the Earl more uneasie than ever; so that being weary of an unactive Life, and inflam'd with Courage, he himself made an Approach to Roan, where his Brother Walter Devereux was unfortunately slain. Indeed the French King's Affairs were at this Time upon such uncertain Terms, that before he could act what he had resolv'd, something still interven'd that diverted him: For which by his Letters he excus'd himself to Queen Elizabeth; and by the Mediation of the Earl, and Mornay Lord de Plessie, who came into England, he obtain'd new Supplies, and then invested Roan. After a tedious Winter's Siege, the Earl of Essex challeng'd Monsieur Villars the Governor to a single Combate; but being refus'd, and finding himself ill supported, he return'd into England, being call'd home by the Queen, whose Favour, by his long Absence, began to be much in Danger. And now the French King, hearing that the Prince of Parma was coming into France, was once again compell'd to fly to the Queen of England for Succour, to whom upon certain Conditions she granted an Army of four thousand Men, and some great Guns, with which Sir John Norris was sent into France; which yet was not employ'd by the French King according to Agreement, to the great Displea-

The Prince of Parma's Death. fure of the Queen. The Prince of Parma's coming into France was prevented by his Death, after he had govern'd the Spanish Netherlands fourteen Years; a Prince of many excellent Qualifications, and whom Queen Elizabeth never mention'd but with Honour.

Perrot's Trial. To return to England; at this Time Sir John Perrot, who had been Deputy of Ireland, and done great Service in that Country, was yet by the Malice of his Adversaries, of whom Hatton was one, call'd in Question before some of the Lords and Judges: His Accusations were, First, That he had spoken opprobrious Words against the Queen, saying, She was Illegitimate and Cowardly: Secondly, That he had harbour'd notorious Traitors and Popish Priests: Thirdly, That he had held Correspondence with the Prince of Parma, and the Queen's Enemies. To the first of which he confess'd, That in his Passion he had spoken unadvisedly of the Queen, for which he was infinitely sorry; but deny'd all the rest; and all Men knew he was never Popishly affected. His Accusers were Philip Williams, some time his Secretary, O-Roghan an Irish marry'd Priest, whose Life he had sav'd, and one Walton, a Man of no Worth or Reputation. Yet his Crimes being urg'd against him by Popham and other Lawyers, 'till almost Midnight, he was at last condemn'd of High-Treason; and Sentence was after twenty Days pronounc'd at the Instance of his Adversaries. Upon which Day Burleigh is said to have wept for the Gentleman's hard Fortune, and sighing, said, The more unjust is Hatred, it is so much the more cruel. But Perrot dy'd a natural Death in the Tower, when he had some Hopes given him of his Life, the Queen's Displeasure being appeas'd. For at this Time she was often heard to commend that Rescript of some of the Roman Emperors; When any Man speaks Ill of the Emperor, if it proceeds from foolish Levity, it is to be condemn'd; if from Madness, to be pity'd; if from Injury and Malice, to be pardon'd. Thus did a deserving and noble Gentleman procure his own Ruin by the unbridled Lavishness of his Tongue; which commonly leaves a deep and dangerous Impression in the Minds of Princes.

Raleigh's Expedition. And now the wise Queen, considering that the King of Spain's chief Strength was in his Gold of America, sent out the valiant Sir Walter Raleigh with a Fleet of fifteen Ships of War to intercept the Spanish Flota; Sir Walter passing by a Promontory of Spain, receiv'd certain Intelligence, that the Spanish Flota was not to come out from America this Year. Whereupon he divided his Navy into four Parts; one of which he committed to Sir John Borloughs, and another to Sir Martin Forbisher. Having dispos'd themselves for other Opportunities, a mighty Spanish Carack came in View, call'd The Mother of God, which was a hundred and sixty five Foot in length from the Stem to the Stern, and seven Decks in Height, laden with rich Merchandize, and with six hundred Men on Board. This bulky Vessel they took, and in it to the Value of a hundred and fifty thousand Pounds Sterling, besides the great Quantities which the Commanders and Seamen imbezell'd. In that matter, no Orders from the Government nor Oaths could restrain them, boldly saying, They had rather trust their Souls to a merciful God by Perjury, than their Fortunes to the Hands of unmerciful Men.

The Queen goes to Oxford. This Year the Queen in her Summer Progress, pass'd through the University of Oxford, and stay'd there several Days; where she was agreeably entertain'd with eloquent Orations, Plays and learned Disputations, and with a splendid Treat by the Lord Buckhurst Chancellor of the University. At her Departure she courteously took her leave of them in a Latin Speech, professing, That she prefer'd the Cordial Respects of that learned Body to all their Entertainments, tho' they were highly pleasing to her; for which she return'd them all hearty Thanks, made a short Prayer, and left some good Advice with them. The Prayer was, That as she desir'd nothing more earnestly, than the Safety, Honour and Happiness of the whole Kingdom; so she pray'd that the University, one of the great Lights of it, might flourish, and daily rise to a greater Lustre. Her Advice

Advice was, That they would first serve God, not after the curious and novel Fashions of some, but according to the Laws of God and the Land; that they would not run before the Laws, but follow them; not dispute the Goodness, but observe the Authority of them, and obey their Superiors, and embrace each other in Brotherly Piety and Unanimity.

In the following Year, upon the nineteenth Day of February, a new Parliament met at Westminster, and enacted several Laws, for Restraining of Schismatics and Popish Recusants; concerning the Lands and Possessions of Monasteries invested in King Henry the Eighth; for relieving of distressed Soldiers and Seamen, and concerning divers other Matters. And when they had seriously consider'd how obstinately the Enemies were resolv'd upon the Destruction of England, by suppressing its Allies in France, Scotland and the Netherlands, and seizing the most convenient Places for the Invading the Kingdom, they thought it necessary to grant the Queen sufficient Supplies. Therefore, 'Acknowledging and extolling the great and Heroick Magnanimity of their Queen; a Woman, together with her provident Care, and singular Goodness towards her Subjects, who had in a War carry'd on with such happy Success against a rich and powerful Nation, expended more Money out of her own Treasury, than any of her Predecessors, not only in defending her own Kingdom, but also in justly relieving her Confederates; they with most thankful and ready Hearts granted two entire Subsidies from the Clergy, and three from the Laity, with six Fifteenths and Tenths. On the last Day of the Session, her Majesty after a most graceful and charming Manner, made an eloquent Speech to both Houses, in which she declar'd, That tho' this Kingdom had been blest with many noble and victorious Princes, to whom in Wisdom and Fortitude she would not compare her self; yet in Love, Care, Sincerity and Justice, she would compare her self to any that ever did or shall sit upon the Throne. Then to show that she wanted not Courage, having been inform'd, that upon the Spanish Invasion some upon the Sea-Coasts forsook their Towns, and left the Country naked, she swore by the living God, If she knew those Persons, or any that would do the same again, she would make them know and feel what it was to be fearful in so urgent a Cause. Then thanking them for their Bounty and Loyalty, and passing fourteen publick Bills, she dissolv'd the Parliament on the tenth Day of April.

The Queen was ever careful of the Happiness of her own Subjects at home, and her Reputation abroad; and at this Time, by reason of her Correspondence with the Turk, to preserve a free Trade in those Parts, it was maliciously reported by some, that she had excited the Turk to a War against the Christians. This caus'd her to write to the Emperor, shewing him the Falseness of this Report, in which she gave him full Satisfaction. But her greatest Concern at this Time was for the King of France, of whom she heard a Report, that he had already, or would certainly embrace the Romish Religion. Upon which discouraging News she immediately sent over Thomas Wilks into France, with Reasons to divert him from it, if it were not already too late. But before his Arrival, the King had actually and openly profess'd the Romish Religion in the Church of St. Denis in Paris; of which Change he declar'd the Causes and Reasons to him at large, and laid before him the Necessity of it, unless he would suffer himself to be entirely driven out of his Kingdom. In the mean Time Morlante inform'd the Queen of the same, and with the most specious Expressions offer'd her all Kindness in Behalf of his Master. She being extremely disquieted for one she had so great an Honour, snatch'd up her Pen, and wrote thus to him, Alas! what deep Sorrow, what vehement Grief, what Sighs have seiz'd my Heart, for the News that Morlante brought? Was it possible that any secular Consideration could move you to lay aside the Fear of God? Can any Happiness succeed such a Fact? Or could you think that he, who has hitherto with his Right Hand supported and preserv'd you, would now abandon you?

you ? It is a dangerous Expedient to do Evil that Good may come of it. In the mean Time I will pray for you, and beg of God, that the Hands of Esau may not lose you the Blessing of Jacob. To allay this Grief she us'd the Holy Scriptures, the Writings of the Fathers, and even the Books of Philosophers ; translating about that Time for an Amusement, Boetius de Consolatione Philosophiæ, into elegant English. As to the French King he acknowledg'd himself oblig'd to her both for the Safety of his Person and Royal Dignity, and promis'd to take the Protestants into his special Care and Protection.

A Plague.

Still the Queen took care of her People against the Spaniards, and strengthen'd the Isle of Silly with a new Fort, as also the Isles of Garnsey and Fer-sey, and other Places with great Charge, and much Willingness, tho' the Times were somewhat sad and discouraging. For all this Year London was grievously afflicted with the Pestilence ; of which almost eighteen thousand Persons dy'd : Bartholomew Fair was not kept, and Michaelmas-Term was held at St. Albans, twenty Miles from London. At which Town one Richard Hasket was condemn'd and executed for Treason ; who being privately sent by the English Fugitives, persuaded Ferdinand Earl of Derby to assume the Title to the Crown, deriving his Right and Claim from his Great-Grand-Mother Mary, Daughter to King Henry the seventh, and made him large Promises of Men and Money from the Spaniard ; likewise threatening the Earl with sudden and assur'd Destruction, if he did not join in the Proposal, and conceal it. But the Earl, fearing lest some Snare was laid for him, impeach'd Hasket ; who by his own voluntary Confession acknowledg'd his Crime at the Bar, detesting and cursing those who had given him the Counsel. However his Threatnings were too prophetically verify'd, for the Earl dy'd about four Months after, in a most deplorable Manner, with all the Infernal Appearances of Magick and Poison.

A new Design of the Papists.

The mutual Love and Amity between the Queen of England and King of Scotland, the immovable Constancy of the latter in Matters of Religion, which could not be overcome by all the Intreaties, Promises and Arts of the Papists, and the granting of Supream Authority to the King by the Estates of Scotland, did all so damp the Hopes of restoring the Popish Religion in Scotland and England, that some in England, who had formerly been great Asserters of King James's Title, began to think of substituting some English Papist into the Succession. When they could not agree upon a proper Person of their own Religion, they cast their Eyes upon the Earl of Effex, who always appear'd a very moderate Man : And him they pretended to have some Right to the Crown, by Descent from Thomas of Woodstock, Son to King Edward the Third. But the English Fugitives were all for the Infanta of Spain ; and desiring to set the King of Scotland and the Earl of Effex at Variance, they publish'd a Book, dedicated to Effex, under the Name of Doleman, but was written by Doleman's great Adversary Parsons the Jesuit, Cardinal Allen, and Francis Englefield. The Scope of which Book was, to exclude from the Succession all Persons, tho' never so near ally'd to the Crown, that were not Roman Catholics ; contending further for the Right of Isabella Infanta of Spain, as being descended from Constance, Daughter of William the Conqueror ; from Eleanor eldest Daughter to Henry the Second, marry'd to Alphonso the Ninth King of Castile ; and from Beatrix, Daughter to King Henry the Third : Titles obsolete, mistaken, and exceeding the Bounds of Heraldry to discuss. But while these Fugitives were finding an Heir in Spain, God sent a Son to King James in Scotland on the nineteenth of February ; who was christen'd by the Name of Henry, and Queen Elizabeth her self was his God-Mother, who sent over the Earl of Suffex for her Deputy.

As some study'd by their Pens to advance the Infanta of Spain to the Crown of England, so others of their Religion were making the same Use of their

Swords,

Swords, sending certain Assassins to murder Queen Elizabeth, while some Spaniards attempted to poison her. The Spaniards not daring to trust the English in a Matter of that Consequence, apply'd themselves to Roderick Lopez a Jew, and Physician to the Queen, with Stephen Ferreira, Emanuel Loxie, and other Portuguese, who were numerous in England, upon the Account of Don Antonio the exil'd King. These being discover'd by intercepted Letters of theirs, were arraign'd at Guild-Hall, and by their own Confessions convicted of Conspiring against the Life of the Queen; they were all condemn'd and executed at Tyburn; where Lopez profess'd he lov'd the Queen as well as he lov'd Jesus Christ, which coming from the Mouth of a Jew, mov'd the Laughter more than the Pity of the Spectators. The next Day after them was condemn'd Patrick Cullen, an Irish Fencing-Master, sent over by the English Fugitives to Assassinate the Queen, who was immediately executed, tho' he was ready to die of a languishing Sickness. Thus the English Fugitives, as well Priests as other villainous Persons, out of a pernicious Principle, That Princes Excommunicate are to be destroy'd, and the Spanish Ministers out of a virulent Hatred, did by all Means and Inventions set themselves to effect the Ruin of the Queen. But she continu'd undaunted, and with a masculine Courage, and provident Caution, contemn'd their treacherous Practices; often reflecting upon that Passage of the Royal Psalmist, Thou art my God, my Times are in thy Hands.

A Plot discover'd and punish'd.

About this Time, Sir John Norris having sustain'd a vigorous Conflict at Sea against the Spaniard, where the valiant Sir Martin Forbisher receiv'd his Death's Wound, was now call'd home, with a Design to send him into Ireland. Before which Time, Richard Hawkins Son to Sir John Hawkins the famous Sea-Captain, had been sent forth with three of the Queen's lesser Men of War, and two hundred Men in them; of which one of them at the Isle of St. Anne was fir'd by Chance; another of them, separated by Storms, return'd into England; himself in the third, pass'd the Straits of Magellan, being the sixth Person, according to the Spanish Account, that had perform'd that Voyage. And having sail'd into the vast Southern Ocean, he took five Spanish Ships laden with Merchandize, one of which he carry'd away, and the rest were suffer'd to ransom themselves for two thousand Ducats. But at last making toward Arica, he was attack'd by Bertrand di Castro, sent out by the Vice-Roy with eight Ships against him; and after three Days severe Battery, he yielded upon honourable Terms; yet nevertheless, he was sent into Spain, and kept Prisoner for several Years. But James Lancaster had better Success in another Part of America; for being sent out by some London Merchants with three Ships and a long Boat, he took thirty nine Spanish Ships. Then joining with Venour an Englishman, and others, at Fernambuc in Brasil, where the Riches of an East-Indian Carack were lately unloaden, he desperately ventur'd on Shoar, held the Place thirty Days, loaded fifteen Ships with the Treasure of the Carack, and with Sugar, Brasil-Wood, and other Merchandize, and then safely and victoriously return'd into England.

Several lesser Expeditions.

About this Time a constant Rumour was blown abroad from all Parts of Europe, that the Spaniards were again preparing an Expedition against England, with a far greater Fleet than that in Eighty Eight, and that it was ready to put to Sea: Whereupon Soldiers were levy'd with all Diligence, and plac'd on the Sea-Coasts; two Navies were made ready, one to wait for them in the English Channel, and the other to go for America under the Conduct of Drake and Hawkins. But this Rumour soon began to sink and vanish, and no greater Fleet appear'd than four Spanish Ships, who coming from the Coasts of France, and landing early in a Morning in Cornwall, fir'd a Church standing alone in the Fields, and three Villages of Fishermen, Moufe-hole, Neulin and Pensans, and then immediately retir'd, without taking or killing any one Person: And these were the first and last Spaniards that ever made any Hostile

Landing

Landing in England. So that the Queen had no further Fear from the Spaniard this Year, for all her Concern was from France, where Mischiefs daily increas'g, many perswaded that King to conclude a Peace with Spain, and the Queen her self began to be apprehensive of such a Design, especially having lately receiv'd Intelligence out of the Pope's Conclave, that he was receiv'd into the Bosom of the Church of Rome, with the Pope's particular Benediction, and upon Conditions prejudicial to the Protestants in general.

Raleigh's Expedition.

And therefore at this Time were promoted several Expeditions of the English against the Spaniard: The first was undertaken by Sir Walter Raleigh, now Captain of the Queen's Guards, who having seduc'd a Maid of Honour, whom he afterwards marry'd, had lost the Queen's Favour, and was kept in Prison for some Months: But being set at Liberty, tho' banish'd the Court, he undertook a Voyage to Guiana in the West-Indies. Setting Sail from Plimouth in February, he arriv'd at Trinidado, where he took St. Joseph's Town, but found no Mony in it. From hence with Boats, and a hundred Soldiers, he enter'd the vast River Orenoque, and rang'd up into Guiana four hundred Miles; but gain'd little more than Experience and new Discoveries. In his Return he fir'd Cumana, and some other Places, that refus'd to redeem themselves with Mony. In like manner, Amyas Preston and Somers, plunder'd several of the Spanish Towns in those Parts; and three Ships of the Earl of Cumberland set upon a vast Carack, which in the Battel took Fire and consum'd all the Goods and most of the Men. These and some other Exploits were perform'd by private Men: But the Queen being inform'd that great Quantities of Treasure for the King of Spain's Use were convey'd to Porto-Rico, in St. John's Island, sent out Hawkins, Drake and Baskervill, with Land-Forces; furnishing them with six Ships out of her own Navy, and twenty other Men of War. These set Sail from Plimouth the last of August, and twenty seven Days after arriv'd at Grand-Canary, which being strongly fortify'd they did not think fit to attack. A Month after they arriv'd at the Isle of St. Domingo; where five Spanish Ships being sent out to watch the English, fell in with one of the small English Ships, stray'd from the Company, and putting the Master and Seamen to the Torture, understood by them that the English Fleet was bound for Porto-Rico. Whereupon they us'd all possible Speed to give Notice to the Place, that they might put themselves in a Posture of Defence. And thereupon, as soon as the English had cast Anchor in the Road of Porto-Rico, the Spaniards thunder'd upon them from the Shoar with unexpected Success; and Sir Nicholas Clifford and Brute Brown dy'd of their Wounds. Hawkins himself, and also Drake, partly of Sickness, and partly out of Grief for their ill Success, dy'd shortly after. At the End of eight Months, the Fleet return'd home, after they had fir'd some few Towns and Ships, but receiv'd infinite Damage themselves; and lost two such Sea Captains, as were not left perhaps in England or all Europe. For the Spaniards having of late Years sustain'd great Damages from the French and English, had now better secur'd themselves with Fortifications not easily and suddenly taken.

The Death of Drake and Hawkins.

During these remote Transactions, the frugal Queen laid before the Confederate States of the Netherlands the immense Sums she had expended in relieving them ten Years successively; for which she expected some considerable Recompence. The States acknowledg'd all their Safety and Happiness to have risen from her, but alledg'd their great Expences in the Year Eighty Eight, and since by repelling the Spaniards in her Cause; but however to prevent any Misapprehensions, they were content to ease the Queen of her usual Charges in their Country, and to allow some reasonable Retribution; but yet for the present nothing material was concluded. Likewise at this Time the Hanse Towns in Germany made complaint to the Emperor, and the Princes of the Empire,

Empire, That the Immunities from Customs anciently granted them by the Kings of England, began to be antiquated, and that a Monopoly of English Merchants was erected in Germany: To which the Queen by Sir Christopher Perkins, first shewing the Cause of the Original Grant, and the Reason of Queen Mary's succeeding Prohibition, gave them so satisfactory an Answer, that those very Hanse-Towns that had complain'd, brought into England at this Time Quantities of Corn, it prevented a Mutiny which was like to have happen'd in London, through the Scarcity of that Commodity.

In this Year dy'd Philip Earl of Arundel, who was condemn'd in 1589, and pardon'd by the Queen, William Lord Vaulx a zealous Papist; Sir Thomas He- neage Vice-Chamberlain, and Chancellor of the Dutchy; Dr. William Whit-aker, Master of St. John's College in Cambridge, and the Queen's Professor of Divinity; and lastly Sir Roger Williams and Sir Thomas Morgan. So that this Year was noted for the Deaths of two great Lords, one exquisite Courtier, one profound Scholar, and two famous Soldiers. and of several great Men.

XIII. For seven Years together, after the famous Eighty Eight, the Spaniards had receiv'd and sustain'd mighty Damages from the English, in several Parts of the World; but those were generally in the Nature of private Expeditions: But this Year it was thought necessary by the Queen to make a more publick Attempt against that inveterate Enemy, which had been many Years plotting the Ruin of the Queen, often join'd with the Rebels in Ireland, and had lately become more formidable by taking of Calais from the French. Therefore to divert the King of Spain from farther Attempts, the Queen and Council judg'd it most proper to make an Invasion of his Dominions. Whereupon a noble Fleet of a hundred and fifty Sail was made ready, of which seventeen were Capital Ships, and twenty two Dutch Men of War. In these were above six thousand Soldiers under Pay, one thousand Volunteers of the Nobility and Gentry, and almost seven thousand Seamen, besides those of the Netherlands. Robert Earl of Essex, and Charles Howard Lord Admiral of England, who were at great Expences themselves, were made Commanders in chief with equal Authority, under the Title of Generals; yet so that the Admiral should be superior at Sea, and the Earl of Essex at Land. To these were join'd for a Council of War, the Lord Thomas Howard, Sir Walter Raleigh, Sir Francis Vere, Sir George Carew, and Sir Coniers Clifford. The whole Fleet was divided into four Squadrons; the Admiral commanded the First, the Earl of Essex the Second, the Lord Thomas Howard the Third, and Sir Walter Raleigh the Fourth. The Officers of the Army were Sir Francis Vere Lieutenant-General, Sir John Wingfield Quarter-Master-General, Sir George Carew Master of the Ordnance, and Sir Coniers Clifford Serjeant-Major. The Colonels were Robert Earl of Suffex, Sir Christopher Blunt, Sir Thomas Gerard, Sir Richard Wingfield; Sir Edward Wingfield was Commander of the Volunteers, and Anthony Ashley, Secretary to the Council of War, was to Register their Acts and Consultations. The Commissions being drawn, the Queen gave them excellent Instructions, displaying both her Piety and Policy, and withal deliver'd them a short Prayer of her own Composing, to be daily us'd in every Ship.

A grand Expedition against Spain under the Earl of Essex,
&c.

This powerful Fleet fet Sail from Plimouth at the beginning of June, with secret Orders not to be open'd 'till they had pass'd Cape St. Vincent, near which Place they met with an Irish Ship, the Master of which inform'd them, That at Cales they were under no Apprehensions; that there was only a small Garrison in the Place, and that in the Harbour were several Gallies, Gallies, Men of War, and many Merchants Ships laden for the Indies. On the twentieth Day of June, they cast Anchor on the West Side of the Island of Cales, and within two Days after they agreed to attack the Spanish Ships, at which the Earl of Essex, full of youthful Ardour, threw up his Hat for Joy. This Enterprize was allotted to the lesser Ships, because the Road was too shallow for the rest.

They attack
Cales.

The Gallies soon gave way, and creeping along the Shore, all but one or two secur'd themselves by Flight; but the Spanish Men of War that lay at the Point of Land call'd Puntal, turn'd their Broad-sides, and a furious Fight began, which lasted from Morning 'till Noon. The Bravery of Essex and the English soon prevail'd, and the Galleons being miserably torn and shatter'd, and many Men slain, the Spaniards resolv'd to fire all their Vessels, or run them on Ground. The Admiral of the Spaniards, a Ship of fifteen hundred Tun, was burnt by a Moor, and two other Ships near her took Fire, and perish'd together. A dismal Confusion arose, great Numbers of Seamen threw themselves over-board, some gain'd the Shore, some were taken, and some drown'd; others as they swam cry'd out for Quarter, whom out of Pity the English Admiral sav'd, and by his particular Care took and secur'd the two great Spanish Ships call'd the St. Matthew and the St. Andrew.

Essex enters the Town.

The Sea-Fight being ended, the valiant Essex landed eight hundred Men at the Puntal, a League from the Town of Cales; and advancing within half a Mile of the Town with several brave Commanders, the Spanish Horse and Foot shew'd themselves, and soon retir'd; but shortly after came out in greater Numbers. Upon which the Earl order'd his Forces to make a fair Retreat, and by that means having entic'd out his Enemies, he turn'd upon them with such an impetuous Torrent, as drove them to the very Gates of the Town. Essex immediately got upon a new Work lately rais'd near the Gate, from whence he discover'd an Entrance into the Town, but so high and steep, that the Men must leap down a Pike's Length. To excite their Courage therefore, he threw down his own Colours into the Place; upon which Evans Lieutenant to Suffex, Savage Captain of the Earl's Company, Bagnal, Pooly, and others leap'd down; while Sir Francis Vere broke down the Gate, and rush'd into the Town with the General and the rest. After a sharp Fight in the Streets, wherein many of the English were hurt from the Tops of Houses, in half an Hour they made their way into the Market Place, where Sir John Wingfield was shot in the Head, and Savage and Bagnal cover'd with Wounds and Blood, were Knighted in the Place. At the same Instant the Lord Admiral and the rest entering the Town, the Spaniards desisted, and retir'd to the Castle and Town-House. The next Day they yielded, upon Condition 'That the Citizens should depart in Safety with their 'wearing Garments, and the rest should go to the Soldiers for Plunder; that 'four hundred and twenty thousand Ducats should be paid for their Ransom, 'and for Security, forty of the principal Citizens should be sent as Hostages in- 'to England. Shortly after Proclamation was made, that no Violence should be offer'd to the Spaniards, who were all convey'd in English Vessels to Port St. Mary; the Ladies and Gentlewomen first, who were suffer'd to depart in their richest Apparel and Jewels: And the Generals in Person stood by the Water-side to see them shipp'd off, without Violence or Dishonour from the ruder sort of Soldiers.

It is plunder'd and demolish'd.

The Damage to the Spaniards.

In the mean Time Sir Walter Raleigh was commanded with his Vessels to fire the Merchant Ships lying at Port-Real, upon which they immediately offer'd two Millions of Ducats to redeem them: But this Offer was rejected by the Admiral, who said, He was sent to destroy Ships, not to ransom them for Money; and accordingly they were all burnt, to the infinite Damage of the Merchants. Thus in an Instant a Fleet full of Men, Merchandize, Provisions, Armour, and twelve hundred Pieces of Ordnance, all valu'd by themselves at twelve Millions of Ducats, was suddenly sunk, consum'd or taken; and the Town also was plunder'd, every Soldier bringing some Portion of its rich Spoils into England, to shew the Service he had perform'd at Cales. They laid the Town in Ashes, except the Churches, batter'd the Walls, demolish'd the Towers, pillag'd and burnt the Island it self, and laid all waste before them, leaving the Rubbish to declare the Ruins the English had made in Spain. The whole Damage that the Spaniard sustain'd from this Expedition, was fairly computed at no less than twenty Millions of Ducats; and all this with the Loss of only one Man of Note, Sir John Wingfield, who slew a Spanish Commander with his own Hand. Then sixty Men being knighted for their Valour, and the rich Spoils got on Shipboard, on the fifth of July the whole Fleet set sail from thence, with this Commendation given them by the Spaniards, That tho' in sacred things the English had shew'd themselves Hereticks, yet in all other Matters, they behav'd themselves like valiant Soldiers, wise Counsellors, and Men of Honour. After some little Cruisings on the Spanish Coasts, they return'd safe into England, contrary to the Inclinations of the Earl of Essex, who not only would have kept Cales, but also have undertaken some new Expedition this Year.

The Queen receiv'd them at their Return with singular Affability, and gave particular Thanks to those who had best signaliz'd themselves, especially to Essex and the Admiral, whose Acts and Conduct she highly applauded. And now considering with her self which of her Commanders to make Governor of the Bril, which was given up by the Confederate States as a Caution-Town for Money due, she made Choice of Sir Francis Vere, altho' the Earl of Essex had recommended others to her for that Post. But another thing he took with greater Dissatisfaction, that in his Absence she had preferr'd the Lord Burleigh's Son, Sir Robert Cecil, to be Secretary of State, where he had formerly with great Earnestness recommended Sir Thomas Podley. Shortly after, the King of Spain, that he might retrieve the Honour he had lost at Cales, rigg'd out a new Fleet for England and Ireland, with a great Number of Irish Fugitives. But being at Sea, most of his Ships were by Storms cast away upon Rocks, and overwhelm'd in the Ocean: So that the very Elements seem'd to fight for the glorious Queen, who heard of her Enemies Fate, before she was inform'd of their Design. Essex disgusted.
The Spanish Fleet ruin'd.

At this Time the Queen, for the better Security of her People, enter'd into a League Defensive and Offensive with the French King, against the King of Spain, upon certain Conditions on both Sides; which League she confirm'd by Oath, in the Chappel at Greenwich, the twenty ninth Day of August, laying her Hand upon the Hand of Henry de la Tour, Duke of Bouillon, and Marshal of France; the Bishop of Chichester holding out the Evangelists, surrounded by a great Number of the Nobility. In September following, Gilbert Earl of Shrewsbury was sent Ambassador into France, to take the French King's Oath, and to present Sir Anthony Mildmay for the Queen's Ambassador in Ordinary, in the room of Sir Henry Unton lately deceas'd, and likewise to invest the King with the Noble Order of the Garter: To which Order, design'd originally for the Honour of Military Men, the Queen had chosen him as a Prince highly renown'd for Martial Glory. And not long after Sir Thomas Baskerville went over into Picardy with two thousand English Foot, according to the Agreement for this Year. A League with France.

In the following Year, the Queen was inform'd, that the King of Spain was preparing a new Fleet against Ireland; whereupon she also prepar'd a Navy of one hundred and twenty Sail, which were divided into three Squadrons, the first Commanded by the Earl of Essex, the second by the Lord Thomas Howard, and the third by Sir Walter Raleigh; in which also several of the Nobility and Gentry were embark'd. On the ninth Day of July they set Sail from Plimouth, directing their Course to Farol and the Groyne; but before they had sail'd forty Leagues, they were toss'd with such a terrible Storm for four Days, that the best Seamen were almost distracted, and with great Difficulty recover'd Plimouth, where they were detain'd by contrary Winds for a whole Month. On the seventeenth of August they got to Sea again, but before they came in view of Spain, they were dispers'd by another dreadful Tempest, in which, one of the two great Ships taken at Cales was dash'd in pieces. At the Isles call'd Azores, the Fleet met again, where Raleigh wanting Water, went on Shore with- A. D.

without Leave; and before he could be furnish'd, was commanded to follow Essex to Fayall: But not finding him there, he observ'd the Port, and calling a Council, the Commanders advis'd him to attack the Place. Upon which Raleigh with some of his prime Volunteers landed, and soon won the Town, but found no such considerable Booty, as they expected in it. The next Day Essex came thither, whom Merrick maliciously inform'd that Raleigh had made this Attempt to prevent his Lordship in the Honour of the Exploit. Whereupon some persuaded the Earl to call a Council of War and cashier him; and others even to take off his Head for Landing without the Leave of his chief Commander. This Matter was soon adjusted by the Mediation of the Lord Howard; but from this and other Matters arose such an unhappy Contest and Emulation between these two great Men, that never could be thoroughly extinguish'd but by Death it self.

and Raleigh.

From hence the Fleet set Sail for Gratiosa, where the Inhabitants crav'd Mercy and obtain'd it; and here Essex would have tarry'd in Expectation of the Spanish Indian Fleet, but Graves the Pilot dissuaded him because of the Badness of the Harbour. This prov'd unfortunate Advice, for the English were not gone above an Hour or two, before the Spanish Fleet, consisting of forty Sail, arriv'd at the Place; but hearing that the English were in these Parts, they directed their Course to Tercera, where all gain'd the Harbour except three Ships which fell into the Hands of the English; who design'd to have set upon the rest in the Port: But finding the Attempt impracticable, they sail'd from thence to St. Michael's, where Southampton, Rutland, Evers, Bredon and Dockwray were Knighted. And then Essex landed within six Miles of the chief Place, near Villa-Franca, a fair Town, and well furnish'd with Merchandize, Wine, Wood and Corn; where they tarry'd six Days, and the common Soldiers found good Booty. At the same Time a rich Carack was discover'd coming from the Indies, which by Means of a Warning Piece from a Dutch Vessel, perceiving the English to be near, run her self a-shore, unloaded the Merchandize, and then fir'd her self. Thus the English met with Disappointments in all Places; and on the ninth of October they set Sail for England: But within two Days, a violent Storm from the North dispers'd them, and likewise the Spanish Fleet at the same Time, which had set out from the Groyne with great Preparations against England; so that they never came in View of each other. Not one of the English Ships perish'd, but many of the Spaniards were lost; one of 'em was cast upon Dartmouth, where the half-starv'd Seamen confess'd that the Spaniards design'd to have seiz'd upon some Port in Cornwall, which being near the Mouth of the Channel, might be convenient to receive Forces from Spain. But Providence now kept these two Nations asunder, and disappointed both their Designs, when they were hast'ning to each others Ruin.

The warm Earl of Essex at his Return found some Promotions made which infinitely disgusted him; Sir Robert Cecil was made Chancellor of the Dutchy; and what more sensibly affected him, the Lord Admiral Howard was created Earl of Nottingham, with a Relation in his Patent of the Victory in Eighty Eight, and his great Services at Cales. This Glory he envy'd him, and besides was much disoblig'd, that he must now take Place of him: For it was Enacted in the Reign of Henry the Eighth, That the chief Officers of the Kingdom should have Precedence of all Men of their Degree. Whereupon the Queen, who had a singular Value for Essex, to satisfy him, created him Earl-Marshal of England; by which he recover'd his Place again.

Shortly after an Ambassador came into England from the King of Poland; who, when the Queen expected he should return her Thanks for procuring a Peace between the King his Master and the great Turk, on the contrary expostulated with her for Breach of Privileges in Trading with Spain, requiring a present Redress, or else the King his Master would do himself Justice.

The Queen with Indignation reply'd extempore in Latin, How have I been deceiv'd! I expected an Ambassador, and behold a Herald; such! a Speech I never heard before.—And after some farther checking him for his too great Freedom, she referr'd him to her Council, and retir'd with Displeasure. But upon the Ambassador's more submissive Behaviour, all Affairs were soon adjusted. In the same Year the Chancellor of Denmark came into England to restore the Garter, with which the Queen had invested the King's Father, and withal offer'd his Master's Mediation to make a Peace between the Queen and the Spaniard. The Queen thank'd him, but design'd not to use his Mediation for what she did not desire, and especially now, when he had lately invaded the French King her Allie, and had taken Amiens, the chief and strongest Place in Picardy. For which Reason the King of France urg'd the Queen for a new Aid of four thousand Men; intimating to her, That he was now offer'd by the Pope's Nuntio a very advantageous Peace, if he would abandon her Interest. But while these Matters were negotiating, Amiens was happily recover'd again by the great Valour of Baskervill and Savage, as the King in his Letters to the Queen thankfully acknowledg'd.

The Queen now to fortifie her self against all Inconveniences, call'd a new Parliament, that met at Westminster on the twenty fourth Day of October, and was open'd with a Speech by Sir Thomas Egerton, made Lord-Keeper, in the Room of Puckering deceas'd. In this Parliament the Queen pass'd several Laws very acceptable to the People; namely, For recovering Depopulations, committed upon Country Farms; For prohibiting Arable Land and Tillage from being turn'd into Pasture; Against imbezeling Lands and Goods given to Charitable Uses; Concerning the Building of Hospitals and Work-Houses for the Poor; For preventing of Frauds in the Queen's Tellers, Receivers, &c. For building Houses of Correction to punish Rogues and Vagrants; For the Restraining Extortions and Rapes; For Confirmation of the Deposing those Popish Bishops in the Beginning of the Reign. 'For these Laws pass'd, the true Religion restor'd, the Republick most happily govern'd, the Nation deliver'd from the Fear of Enemies, Ireland defended, and the French King and the Netherlands reliev'd, the Parliament most heartily congratulated her Majesty: 'And that she might not want sufficient Aids in Time of Necessity, the Clergy voluntarily granted three Subsidies, and the Laity pray'd her to accept of three Subsidies, and six Fifteenths and Tenths; beseeching her as in the Year 1593, that such extraordinary Contributions might not be drawn into a Precedent, unless it were upon the like urgent Necessity. After this the Parliament was dissolv'd on the ninth Day of February in the following Year.

And now that King, who hitherto flourish'd in Martial Glory, began from this Time to restore and promote the Welfare of France, by maintaining and supporting Religion, as well the Roman as the Reformed, reviving the Laws, cherishing Learning, restoring Commerce, and beautifying the Kingdom with splendid Edifices, insomuch that he far surpass'd all the Kings of France before him, and gain'd himself the Name of Henry the Great.

A Peace between France and Spain.

In the mean Time the Queen carefully providing for her own and her Peoples Safety, sent Sir Francis Vere to the Confederate States, to know if they were willing

A Consultation about a Peace with Spain. ling to join in a Treaty of Peace with the Spaniard: And if otherwise, what they would afford towards a War; and to urge them concerning the Repayment of Monies due to her from them. During the Negotiations, there was a grand Consultation held at home, in which it was accurately debated, Whether it would be to the Benefit and Advantage of the Queen and Publick to make a Peace with the Spaniard; and many nice and curious Reasons were urg'd on both Sides. The wise and sedate Lord Burleigh declar'd for Peace, as most eligible and necessary in this critical Juncture. But the vigorous and valiant Earl of Essex stily maintain'd, that no Peace could be made with the Spaniards but such as would be dishonourable to England, and fraudulent on their Side. Infomuch that Burleigh was provok'd to say, That he breath'd out nothing but Slaughter and Blood: And after a warm Dispute about this Subject, in a strange presaging Manner, the Treasurer drew out a Psalm-Book, and without speaking any more Words, pointed him to this Verse, The bloody-minded Man shall not live out half his Days. This Debate occasion'd Essex afterwards to publish an Apology for himself, with Reasons in Justification of his Opinion.

The Queen strikes Essex. In carrying on this Business of Peace, and chusing a fit Person to manage the Affairs in Ireland, which were now in great Disorder, there arose a hot Debate between the Queen and the Earl of Essex, in the Presence only of the Lord Admiral, Sir Robert Cecil, and Windebank, Clerk of the Seal. The Queen thought Sir William Knolls, Uncle to the Earl, to be the fittest Person to be sent into Ireland, and Essex obstinately asserted, that Sir George Carew was fitter than him; and since he could not persuade her Majesty to be of his Opinion, quite forgetting himself and his Duty, uncivilly and in Contempt turn'd his Back upon her, and gave her a scornful Look. Which so rous'd the Female Spirit of the Queen, that not induring such rude Behaviour, she gave him a Box on the Ear, and bad him begon with a Vengeance. He immediately in a Rage laid his Hand upon his Sword, while the Admiral stepp'd between, and swore That he neither could nor would put up so great an Indignity; nor would he have taken it from her great Father Harry; and in a violent Fury withdrew himself from the Court. In his Retirement the Lord-Keeper by a Letter advis'd him to submit to the Queen his Sovereign, and to remember that Passage of Seneca, If the Law punish one that is Guilty, he must submit to Justice; if one that is Innocent, he must submit to Fortune. He answer'd his Letter with great Violence, and us'd these and the like Expressions, I know what I owe as a Subject, and what as an Earl and Marshal of England; but know not how to serve as a Drudge and a Slave. If I should acknowledge my self Guilty, I should injure the Truth, and God the Author of it. My whole Body is wounded by that single Blow; and having receiv'd this Indignity, it were Impiety to serve longer. However, not long after, he became more Submissive, obtain'd his Pardon, and was receiv'd into Favour; the Queen being of such an excellent Disposition, that she always thought it less misbecoming her Majesty to exasperate a Man, than to hate him. Yet from this Circumstance his Friends began to date his Fall, who had observ'd, That Fortune seldom cares'd her slighted Favourites, and Princes more rarely the Persons they had offended.

His Resentment. Not long after his Opposer the Lord Burleigh, being worn out with Labour of Mind, the Gout and old Age, and falling sick, wrote a Letter to the Queen for her leave to lay down his Offices. The Queen visited and comforted him; but within a few Days, having liv'd long enough for Nature, long enough for his own Glory, but not long enough for his Country, he peaceably resign'd his Soul to God, in the seventy eighth Year of his Age: A Man of extraordinary Worth and Abilities, who, not to mention his venerable Presence, his calm and serene Deportment, was so dispos'd by Nature, so polish'd by Education, and so enrich'd with Learning, that that for Wisdom, Integrity, Gravity, Industry, Temperance and Piety, he had no Superior ; and was one of those Few in the World who both liv'd and dy'd in Glory. His Saying was, Prudens qui Patiens; and, That nothing was truly for a Prince's Profit, that was not for his Honour. The knowing Queen had such Esteem for him, that she would always cause him to sit down in her Presence, saying, My Lord, we make use of you, not for your Legs, but for your Head : And visiting him in his Sickness, and the Servants at the Chamber-Door desiring her Majesty to stop, she answer'd, For your Master's sake I will stoop, but not for the King of Spain. One great Service he did his Country a little before his Death, which was to bring the Confederate States to a Composition, for the Payment of eight hundred thousand Pounds, by thirty thousand Pounds per Annum; and likewise to the Conclusion of a new League; by which the Queen, besides the receiving her Debts, was eas'd of a yearly Expence of a hundred and twenty thousand Pounds. The Death of this great Support of the Nation was immediately succeeded by the Death of its most potent Enemy, Philip King of Spain, in the seventy first Year of his Age; a Prince of great Wisdom and Patience, through his Father's Instructions and his own Experience; but in Matters of War for the most part Unfortunate: For being naturally weak, he was wary in taking Advice, and trusted to others in his Wars; by which the three Keys of the Spanish Empire, which his Father taught him to watch carefully, Guletta in Africa, Flushing in the Netherlands, and Cales in Spain were neglected; one being taken by the Turks, another by the Hollanders, and the third by the English, to the great Damage and Dishonour of so great a Monarch: So that it was not without Cause that he advis'd his Son Philip to compose all Differences with the English and the Netherlanders.

His Services.

The Death and Character of Philip King of Spain.

No Year was now free from Treasons and Conspiracies from the Romanists; and in this a new Traitor was discover'd, one Edward Squire, who had first been an ordinary Scrivener, afterwards a Groom in the Queen's Stable; and going as a Soldier in Captain Drake's last Expedition, was taken Prisoner and carry'd into Spain, where he came acquainted with one Walpole an English Jesuit, who caus'd him to be put into the Inquisition for a Heretick. This Man to avoid further Misery, was easily induc'd to turn Papist, and afterwards to attempt any wicked Act for the Catholick Cause. His Ghostly Father taught him that it would be a very meritorious Act to destroy the Queen and the Earl of Essex; and sent him into England with a peculiar Poison, to anoint the Pommel of the Queen's Saddle, and the Chair where the Earl of Essex should sit; which he exactly perform'd, but neither of them took Effect. Whereupon Walpole, suspecting the Fidelity of Squire, was resolv'd to revenge it, and sent a Person into England, who in general Terms should cast this Aspersions upon him. This caus'd Squire to be apprehended and arraign'd for Treason, who not imagining that his Confessor would detect him, directly deny'd all at first; but finding himself really betray'd, confess'd the whole Matter, and suffer'd Death.

Squire's Conspiracy.

Ireland had often been in Rebellion against the English in this Reign, but never in so formidable a Manner as in this Year: For the Head of the Rebels, the Earl of Tyrone, notwithstanding he had lately obtain'd his Pardon for numerous Disturbances, suddenly besieg'd the Fort of Blackwater, and engaging with Marshal Bagnal his mortal Enemy, he gave the English such a Defeat, as they had scarcely sustain'd the like since they first set footing in Ireland; for besides the General, thirteen valiant Commanders, and fifteen hundred common Soldiers were slain in this Encounter: By which the Irish gain'd Arms, Provisions, Ammunition, and Reputation, and the Fort of Blackwater; so that the English were reduc'd from an offensive to a defensive War. This provok'd the Queen, who sent to the brave Earl of Ormond, then Lieutenant-General, to clear the Army of all the Irish; and she sent two thousand Foot, and and a hundred Horse to recruit the Army. After this Tyrone, whose Fame increas'd daily, sent four thousand Kerns into Munster; and the President being not able to resist them, by reason of the Smallness of his Forces, that whole Province also rebell'd, and began to kill, rob and ravage the English, without Measure or Mercy. Thus the Rebellion became in a manner general, and grew to that Height, that it became formidable to the Queen. Tyrone in the mean Time sent submissive Letters to the Earl of Ormond, but with his usual Treachery promis'd the Spaniards that he would accept of no Conditions from the English, magnifying his Victories beyond all Truth and Reason. So that now, by long use it was grown to a destructive Custom in Ireland, that Rebels might with the Mony and Spoils they gain'd from the English, procure themselves Protection and Pardon.

A. D. 1599. Reg. 41. To extinguish this increasing Flame, the Queen thought of sending Charles Blunt Lord Montjoy, to be Deputy of that Kingdom; but the Earl of Essex intimated that he was a Man but of a mean Estate, of no Experience, and too Bookish for such a martial Employment; and in forming the Character of a Man fit for that Office, he so artificially drew his own Picture, that the Queen immediately resolv'd to make him Lord-Deputy of Ireland, and General of the Army. All this he made a shew of Refusing, praying the Queen to bestow those Honours upon some abler Person, yet if any other Person was nam'd, he still made Objections against him, and behav'd himself in such a manner, as gave his Enemies the Advantage of saying, He wanted nothing but an Army at his Command, to set up a Title to the Crown, which his Friends and Flatterers had drawn up for him. Other Courtiers, who desir'd the Absence of this Favourite, push'd him forwards to accept the Command, knowing his youthful Ardour, and Thirst of Glory, would hasten his Ruin; there being no way so certain to destroy a popular and aspiring Man as forcing him upon Business improper for his Management. But tho' he was somewhat anxious, and fearful of his Father's Fate, yet he did or would not perceive all these Arts; therefore with the general Applause of Queen and Council, he was made Lord-Deputy of Ireland. He had a greater Army allotted him than ever appear'd in Ireland, twenty thousand Foot, and thirteen hundred Horse; and whatever else he could desire was obtain'd by the officious, but deceitful Intrigues of his secret Enemies, who were raising him on high, that his Fall might be the greater.

The Earl of Essex made Lord-Deputy of Ireland.

He is unsuccessful and suspicious.

The unfortunate Earl went over into Ireland in the Month of March, and having receiv'd the Sword according to Custom, he immediately made the Earl of Southampton General of the Horse; and contrary to his Instructions, he march'd towards Munster against the inferior Rebels, neglecting Tyrone, the most considerable Enemy in the Kingdom, against whom he was particularly sent over; and all this without acquainting the Queen with his Reasons for so acting, which caus'd her to be extremely dissatisfy'd with his Conduct. Two considerable Defeats the English suffer'd in Ireland; and at length the Earl, contrary to Order, treated secretly with Tyrone, and concluded a Peace with him. When the Queen had notice of this, and that with so strong an Army, in so long a Time, and so great Expence of Mony, Essex had in effect done nothing, she was highly incens'd, blam'd his Actions and Counsels, as over-rash, unfortunate and disrespectful to her self, and freely said, That he had something else in his Thoughts besides doing his Prince and Country Service in Ireland. Nor were her Suspicions ill grounded; for now he began to project a wicked Design of returning into England with a Party of select Men to reduce his Adversaries to his Power by Force of Arms, being perswaded that many would join with him, either out of Affection, or the Desire of Novelties: And had certainly attempted it, if the Earl of Southampton and Sir Christopher Blunt had not deterr'd him from it, as an impious, bloody and dangerous Design. It does not fully appear whether the Queen had Intelligence of

of this Matter, tho' it is reasonable to believe she had; for at this time an Army of six thousand Men were rais'd in London, of which three thousand were appointed to guard the Queen's Person, and the rest to be always near and ready upon all Occasions, under the Command of the Earl of Nottingham; but a few Days after the Army was disbanded.

Within a Month the Earl of Essex posted into England, and accompany'd with several select Friends, went to Nonefuch, where the Queen then lay; and early in the Morning presented himself on his Knees before her Majesty in her Privy-Chamber, when she had no Expectation of him. She receiv'd him somewhat graciously in a short Conference, but not with so pleasing a Countenance as formerly; and at his Departure commanded him to keep his Chamber: For as she was before displeas'd with his ill Conduct, he had now incurr'd her further Displeasure by leaving the Kingdom of Ireland without her Leave. Afterwards his Actions and Proceedings being generally dislik'd by the Council, and aggravated besides by the Fictions and Inventions of his Adversaries, he was committed to the Custody of the Lord-Keeper, that he might not be further withdrawn from his Duty by seditious Counsels. Here entering into Consideration of his Case, he gave himself wholly to Divine Contemplations, and wrote remarkable Letters to his Friends concerning the Vanity of Human Affairs.

He returns into England.

He is committed to custody.

To return to the Affairs of Ireland, where the six Weeks Truce was scarce expir'd, before Tyrone prepar'd again for open Hostilities, and being accus'd by the Council of Ireland for Breach of Faith, he declar'd he had just Cause to renew the War, since the Earl of Essex, on whom he depended for his Life and Safety, was committed to Custody in England; nor would he for the future be concern'd with the Irish Council, which had heretofore dealt fraudulently with him. In the mean Time Rumours were spread abroad among the Rebels, that England in a short Time would be imbroil'd in Civil Commotions, therefore he gave new Incouragement to the Irish Rebels to join with him, to the Destruction of the English Power in Ireland; to which he was farther encourag'd by the Spaniards, who had sent him both Mony and Ammunition, and also by the Pope, who excited him by large Promises and Indulgences; all which Rebellious Practices in Tyrone, were either directly or indirectly charg'd upon the Earl of Essex by his Enemies. In the Depth of the Winter the Queen sent Montjoy her Deputy into Ireland; who with great Care and Industry fortify'd the most important Places in that Kingdom, and so harras'd and manag'd Tyrone with continual Skirmishing, that he soon chang'd the Fortune of the War, drove that Arch-Rebel into his Fastnesses and absconding Places, subdu'd the Rebels in Ulster and Leinster, and in all Places prov'd victorious. Nor had Sir George Carcw less Success in Munster, against the Titular Earl of Desmond; and so fully quieted and subdu'd those Parts, that not so much as one Fort held out against the Queen.

Montjoy made Deputy of Ireland.

In England a new Consultation was debating, concerning a Peace with the King of Spain, which was desir'd both by him and the French King, and by Albert the Arch-Duke, who was now return'd into the Netherlands out of Spain, where he was marry'd to the Infanta. The Queen consenting to the Treaty, left it to the French King to nominate both the Time and the Place for the Meeting of the Commissioners, who appointed the Month of May, and the Town of Boloign in France: But foreseeing that a Question would arise about Precedency, some Persons were appointed to search ancient Records concerning that Point. These Persons found in the Book of the Ceremonies of the Court of Rome, which according to the Canons gave Rule to the Christian Princes, 'That among Kings, the first Place was due to the King of France, the second to the King of England, and the third to the King of Castile, the chief Title of the Kings of Spain; and that the English quietly held this Privilege in the General Councils of Basil, Constance, and others. A Treaty with Spain.

But to no Effect.

Pope Julius the Third gave Sentence for Henry the Seventh, King of England, against Ferdinand then King of Castile. At the appointed Time the Commissioners met at Boloign; Sir Henry Nevil, Sir John Herbert, Sir Thomas Edmunds and Robert Beal, for the English; and a proportionable Number of others for the King of Spain and the Arch-Duke. The English had Instructions first to insist strictly upon Precedency; yet if the Spaniards contended the Matter, then to put it to the Decision of Lots, rather than dissolve the Treaty; and for the rest, to propose and mention the renewing the ancient Burgundian League, Freedom of Commerce, &c. At the Meeting, when they had severally shown their Commissions, the English challeng'd the Precedency, and the Spaniards did the same, and in such a peremptory manner, that without that obtain'd, they would break up the Treaty. Hereupon the English made a Proposal to drop the Question concerning Precedency, and to transact the Business by Writing, and Messengers between both Parties; or that the Treaty might be prorogu'd for sixty Days, so that it might rather seem discontinu'd than dissolv'd. But all this, and several new Proposals came to no Effect; so that after the Space of three Months, the Treaty of Boloign came to nothing.

The Battel of Newport.

In the mean Time the Confederate States were so far from regarding a Peace, that at this Time they were resolv'd upon reducing the Sea-Coasts of Flanders into their Command. Accordingly they landed an Army into that Country of fourteen thousand Foot, and three thousand Horse, under the Command of Prince Maurice of Nassaw; and fifteen hundred of the English under the Command of the two valiant Brothers Sir Francis and Horatio Vere. At which Time there was fought the famous Battel of Newport, where Sir Francis order'd his English to throw off their Cloaths, telling them, That shortly they should need none, or get better; and here nine thousand Spaniards were slain, and the Victory by the Valour of the English fell to the Confederate States: For so forward and courageous were the English in the Battel, that of their fifteen hundred, eight hundred were slain or sore wounded, eight Captains kill'd, and all the rest hurt but two.

The Pope's Designs against England.

All this Year, and the last, several Contests and Complaints arose between the English and French, concerning the Reprizals of Goods taken from each other by Pirates of either Nation; also concerning Customs and Impositions, contrary to the Treaty of Blois, and corrupt and deceitful taking of English Cloaths, to the great Discredit of the Nation. With Denmark also arose Controversies concerning Commerce, and the Fishing of the English upon the Coast of Island and Norway. The Queen likewise at that Time, for the Encrease of Navigation and Commerce, founded the Company of East-India Merchants, who having large Privileges granted them, settled several Factories in those Parts, and carry'd on a great Trade even in this Reign. In the same Year, Pope Clement the Eighth, perceiving the Queen to be declining in Years, sent two bold Breves into England, the one to the Popish Clergy, the other to the Laity, in which he pretended to authorize no Person whatsoever to assume the English Crown after the Queen's Death, but such a one as should promise by Oath to use his utmost Endeavours to promote the Catholick Religion, tho' he was never so near ally'd to the Blood Royal of England. This was design'd chiefly against the present King of Scotland; and as Camden observes, was the Foundation of the famous Powder-Plot in the next Reign.

Thus, with a Year of extraordinary Scarcity of Corn, concluded the Sixteenth Century; in which there occur'd more famous Varieties in Church and State, both in England and all Christendom, than in any Age since the first Propagation of the Gospel and Christianity.

XIV. All Things being in a reasonable Degree of Peace and Security, the Seventeenth Century in England began with the fatal Tragedy of the gallant Earl of Essex, who was hurry'd on to his ruin by a Temper too violent and impetuous. He had been six Months in Custody under the Lord-Keeper, and now out of his own good Nature, the Sense of his Afflictions, and the good Advice of his Friends, he began to repent of his ill Designs, and made such a shew of Piety, Patience, Modesty and Humility, that his Friends hop'd for his Conversion, his Adversaries envy'd him, and the Queen, mollify'd with his submissive Letters, suffer'd him to retire to his own House, under the free Custody of Sir Richard Berkley, often protesting, That she would do nothing against him for his Ruin, but only for his Reformation. But since the vulgar Sort had openly proclaim'd his Innocency; that her Majesty might not be suspected of Prejudice or Injustice, she thought fit to have his Cause heard, not in the Star-Chamber, lest he should be severely fin'd, but in the Lord-Keeper's House, before the Queen's Council, four Earls, two Barons, and four Judges, and that some Censures should be taken of his Actions, yet without any Charge of Perfidiousness. The Heads of his Accusation were, 'That contrary to his Commission he had made the Earl of Southampton General of the Horse, had drawn his Forces into Munster, neglected the chief Rebel Tyrone, and held a private and suspicious Parlee with him, contrary to the Dignity of the Queen's Majesty, and the Person of a Vice-Roy, which he represented: And some Aggravations were made by the Lawyers of some abrupt Sentences in his Letter written to the Lord Privy-Seal. The Earl kneeling at the Table, gave Thanks to God for his Mercies, and to his gracious Princess, that proceeded so mildly against him, professing, He would not contend with her, nor excuse the Errors of his Youth, either in whole or in part; That he always meant well, tho' it happen'd otherwise in Appearance, but now he would bid the World Farewel. And shedding a Flood of Tears, which caus'd many to sympathize with him, the Lord-Keeper in Conclusion proceeded to Sentence, which was, That he should be remov'd from the Place of Privy-Counsellor, suspended from his Offices of Earl-Marshal and Master of the Ordnance, and be detain'd in Custody during the Queen's Pleasure. This Censure was approv'd by all the rest; and many were in hopes that he would be restor'd to Favour, since the Queen had expressly commanded, that he should not be suspended from being Master of the Horse, and that this Censure should by no means remain upon Record.

After this the Earl made a shew of extraordinary Humility, which so pleas'd the merciful Queen, that she remov'd his Keeper from him, set him at Liberty, and gave him leave to retire into the Country; but admonish'd him now to make Discretion his Keeper, and by no means to come to the Court, or near her Person. But as soon as his Servant Cuffe had Access to him, he began to poison his Ears, and to tax him with Cowardice and Weakness; which provok'd the Earl to command his Name to be struck out of the Roll of his Servants, but Merrick his Steward, who was of the same Opinion, prevented it. And the Earl going into the Country, remember'd himself to the Queen by the Lord Henry Howard, in these Words, That he kiss'd the Rod, and the Queen's Hand, which had only corrected, and not ruin'd him; yet he should never enjoy real Comfort, 'till he might behold those blessed Eyes, which had been his propitious Stars to guide him in his Course, while he steer'd at a lawless Distance. But now he resolv'd to feed in the Field like Nebuchadnezzar, 'till it should please his Queen to restore him to his Sense. The Queen secretly rejoicing at these Expressions, said, Would to Heaven his Actions were answerable to his Words; He has long try'd my Patience, I must now try his Humility. And now the Earl grew so confident of the Queen's Favour, that he became a Petitioner to her for the Farm of the sweet Wines, which was a Place of great Profit; but she to try his Temper, return'd him Answer, That she must first understand the Value of it; That Benefits were not to be bestow'd blindfold; That a furious Horse must be kept short of Provender to bring him to due Management; commending the Aphorism of the Physicians, That corrupt Bodies are injur'd by feeding plentifully. These unexpected Answers so inrag'd the Earl that they threw him into his former Frenzy, fir'd him with Indignation, and caus'd him blindly to hearken to the Suggestions of Casse, Merrick, and other Incendiaries, whose implacable Malice hurry'd them to their own and their Master's Destruction. Their exasperating Speeches caus'd him often to join with them, and to drop passionate and indiscreet Words, which coming to the Queen's Knowledge with aggravating Comments and Inferences, alienated her Affections from him. But what most sensibly provok'd her, and made the Breach irreparable, was his indecent reflecting upon her Majesty's Person, saying, That the Queen was now grown an old Woman, no less crooked and distorted in her Mind, than in her Body: Which some of the Court Ladies, whom he had formerly deluded in Matters of Love, taking up at the Rebound, so spitefully represented it, that it blew up new Flames of Discontent between them, and so stung his distracted Mind, that he began to revive the clandestine Designs he had form'd in Ireland, made court to the Puritans and their Ministers, and also to the Papists, by seeming to commiserate their Afflictions. He secretly entertain'd Soldiers, and daring Prodigals, whose Poverty made them ready for any unlawful Enterprize. He and his particular Friends, the Earl of Southampton, Sir Charles Danvers, Sir Ferdinando Gorges, Sir John Davis, and John Littleton of Franke, held their private Cabals in Drury House, where they enter'd upon Resolutions, To seize the Tower, the Court, the Queen's Person, and call a Parliament to erect another Government. These frequent Assemblies, and the great Resort to Essex's House under Pretence of hearing Sermons, increas'd the Suspicions the Court had entertain'd of him, and caus'd him to be call'd before the Council, which he refus'd to obey, being resolv'd to preserve his Liberty, tho' with the Price of his Blood, and to that end had gather'd to his own House Sands, Parker and Monteagle, with about three hundred Gentlemen of good Quality.

Essex relapses.
He raises Soldiers.

The Queen having order'd the Lord Mayor to keep the Citizens in due Obedience, sent the Lord-Keeper, the Earl of Worcester, Sir William Knolls, and Lord Chief Justice Popham, to know the Cause of this unusual Assembly. They were admitted with much Difficulty into Essex's House through the Wicket; and in the Court-Yard they found a confus'd Multitude, with Essex in the middle of them, together with Southampton and Rutland. The Lord-Keeper demanded the Cause of the Tumult, and assur'd him that if any had injur'd him, he should have equal Justice against the Persons; to which Essex answer'd, There was a Plot against his Life; and when the Lord-Keeper urg'd him to be particular, the Multitude interrupted him, crying out, Away, let us begon, they come to betray you, kill them, throw away the Broad-Seal, secure them in Prison. Upon which Essex, retiring with them into the House, commanded the Doors to be shut, saying to the Lords, Have Patience, I will go into the City and advise with the Lord Mayor and Sheriffs, and return immediately. Coming inconsiderately into London, with about two or three hundred in his Company, he cry'd out with the utmost Heat, For the Queen, for the Queen! a Plot is laid for my Life! and went directly towards Sheriff Smith's House in Fen-Church Street; and seeing the Citizens run about in a Maze, he bid them Arm themselves, or they could do him no Good: But not one Man took up Arms for him; and the Sheriff in whom he confided, hearing of his coming, withdrew himself out at a Back-Door, to the Lord Mayor's House, and would not see him. In the mean Time Essex by a Herald was proclaim'd a Traitor in all Parts of the City; and seeing none would espouse his Cause, and that his own Party began to desert, he gave Gorges leave to set the Privy-Counsellors at liberty, who did it, and went with them to the Court by Water. Effex returning to his House, found a Chain drawn cross the Street at St. Paul's, and Pikes and Musketeers planted against him by the Bishop of London, under the Command of Sir John Levison. The Earl in a Rage drew his Sword, and commanded Blunt to fall on; which he did with great Resolution, kill'd one Waite, and was himself desperately wounded, and taken Prisoner. There fell also Henry Tracy, a young Gentleman for whom the Earl had a tender Affection, and one or two Citizens. Being thus repuls'd at this Place, his Hat shot through, and many secretly deserting him, he return'd to his House by Water, burnt several Papers, That they might tell no Tales, and fortify'd his House on all Sides.

Immediately the House was invested by Land by the Lord Thomas Howard His House besieged. the Lord Gray, the Lord Burleigh, the Lord Compton, and others; while the Lord Admiral, the Lord Effingham his Son, the Lord Cobham, Sir John Stanhop, Sir Robert Sidney, and Sir Fulk Grevil enter'd into the Garden by the Thames Side; and being ready to attack the House, he summon'd him by Sidney to yield. Southampton ask'd, To whom they should yield? If to their Adversaries, their Ruin would be inevitable; If to the Queen, their Guilt would be apparent; but if the Lord Admiral would give them Hostages for their Security, they would appear before her Majesty, or else they would sell their Lives as dear as they could. The Lord Admiral answer'd, That such Conditions were not to be propos'd by Rebels; but in Commiseration, to the weaker Sex, he would permit the Countess his Wife, the Lady Rich his Sister, and their Women, who fill'd the Air with their dismal Outcries, to depart in Safety. This the Earl took as a Favour, and only desir'd the Space of an Hour or two to fortifie the Place, through which they should pass, which was granted. Now the Earl of Effex looking upon all Things as desperate and lost, after two or three Persons were kill'd on each Side, once resolv'd to force his Way through his Enemies, to which he was particularly encourag'd by the old Lord Sands, who declar'd, That the bravest Courses were the safest, and that it was more honourable for a Nobleman to die by the Sword, than the Axe. But Effex fluctuating in his Resolutions, and having the Lord Admiral's Promise that all should be civilly treated, all the Noblemen at ten a Clock at Night, falling upon their Knees deliver'd up their Swords, and themselves Prisoners to him. Effex and Southampton were first confin'd to Lambeth-House, and shortly after with Rutland, Sands, Cromwell, Monteagle, Sir Charles Danvers, and Sir Henry Bromley, were committed to the Tower. The next Day, Thomas Lea, Captain of a Company in Ireland, intimating to one Cross a Sea-Captain, how noble an Exploit it were for six brave Soldiers to go to the Queen, and forcibly compel her to release Effex and Southampton, was immediately apprehended, examin'd, found guilty, and executed. He yields.

Upon the nineteenth of February, the two Earls, Effex and Southampton, were brought to their Trials in Westminster-Hall, before many of their Peers, where the Treasurer Buckhurst was made Lord High-Steward for that solemn Occasion. They were jointly indicted of High-Treason, namely, 'That they had plotted to deprive the Queen of her Life and Kingdom, to surprize her in her very Palace; and that they broke out into open Rebellion, by imprisoning the Counsellors of the Kingdom, by exciting the Citizens with vain Fictions, by assaulting the Queen's loyal Subjects, and by defending of Effex's House against her Majesty's Forces: To all which they pleaded not guilty, and Effex averr'd, That he had done nothing, but what was agreeable to the Law of Nature, and upon urgent Necessity. Yelverton the Queen's Sergeant, and Edward Coke her Attorney, open'd the Indictment, and according to the Custom of Lawyers, upbraided Effex with the Queen's Favours, compar'd him to Catiline, and as some thought made too indecent Reflections and Insults upon Men of their Quality and unhappy Circumstances: For Coke ended his Harangue with this this severe Conclusion : It were to be wish'd that this Robert, Earl of Essex, might be the last of this Name, who affected to be Robert the first of that Name King of England. The Earl of Essex with great Courage and Modesty answer'd, That this Art of scandalous Oratory was common to Men of their Profession, who accounted it their Glory to depress innocent Men with Multiplicity of Words, and therefore pray'd the Lords not to regard their Clamours and noisie Suggestions, but weigh the Matter according to Truth, and not by Rigour and Quirks of Law. The Evidences against them being heard, Southampton endeavour'd to excuse himself out of his Love to Essex, and his Ignorance of the Laws, and with great Humility begg'd the Queen's Mercy, whom he had always esteem'd as the lively Image of the Divine Goodness, and against whom his Heart had never harbour'd a disloyal Thought. Essex, when the Heat was over between him and Cecil, answer'd more calmly, That he had no Design but to repel Force by Force ; nor would he have enter'd the City inconsiderately, if he had not thought his Life in Danger ; nor with so small a Number, if he design'd any thing but to defend himself against his private Enemies. After this the Lords withdrew, and in an Hour return'd to their Places, where every one of them pronounc'd Essex and Southampton guilty ; who being brought again to the Bar, and acquainted with it, Essex humbly begg'd the Lords Favours, that they would intercede with her Majesty for Southampton's Pardon, who might do her good Service, But, added he, for my own Life I value it not ; for I desire nothing more than to lay it down with sincere Faith to God, and Loyalty to my Prince, tho' the Law has made another Interpretation of it. Yet I would have none to tell the Queen that I slight her Mercy, tho' I believe I shall never servilely beg it : And I beseech you, my Peers, tho' you have condemn'd me by Law, that you would absolve me in your Consciences, who never design'd any Ill against my Prince.

They are condemn'd.

The next Day Sir Robert Vernon, Sir William Constable, Sir Edmund Bainham, Knights ; John Littleton, Henry Cusse the Earl's Secretary, Captain Whitlock, John and Christopher Wright, and Orel an old Soldier, were arraign'd ; and as soon as they had held up their Hands, and the Queen was inform'd they were unwarily drawn into this Plot, she commanded that none but Littleton, Bainham and Orel should be try'd, and that the rest should be remanded to Prison ; and tho' Sentence pass'd against those that were try'd, yet at last all their Lives were spared. Bainham redeem'd his by a Sum of Money paid to Sir Walter Raleigh, Littleton dy'd of a Distemper, and Orel was pardon'd.

Essex's Confession.

In the mean Time the sorrowful Earl of Essex, disturb'd in his Conscience, and terrify'd by the attending Minister, desir'd to discourse with some of the Privy-Council, and particularly with Secretary Cecil. Upon which Request, the Lord-Keeper, the Lord-Treasurer, the Lord-Admiral and Cecil went to him ; and after he had ask'd Pardon of the Lord-Keeper and Cecil for what he had done or said against them, he assur'd them, That the Queen could never be safe as long as he liv'd, and therefore begg'd that he might be executed privately in the Tower. He discover'd several of his Associates in the Conspiracy ; and desiring to speak with Blunt and Cusse, as soon as he saw them, he cry'd out, Ah Cusse ! Ask Pardon of God and the Queen ; for you were the Persons that chiefly provok'd me to this Disloyalty. Nor was he satisfy'd with this verbal Confession, but in Writing discover'd the Conspirators, which were then in several Countries, as Scotland, Ireland, and the Netherlands.

The twenty fifth of February was appointed for the fatal Day of Execution, when Thomas Montford and William Barlow Doctors of Divinity, with Ashton Minister of the Tower Church, were sent to him early in the Morning, to prepare him for Death. In the Presence of these Men he gave Thanks to God, that his Designs, so dangerous to the Publick, had no Success. He freely told them, That he had now look'd seriously into his Sins, and was Bromley, Lord Chancellor, declar'd this Fact of the Earls, and then commanded the Attorney-General to publish the Cause of his Imprisonment, and the Manner of his Death. Whereupon, Popham first, and then Egerton the Queen's Solicitor, in long Orations lay'd open all his Treasons, and how for fear of his Family, he had laid violent Hands upon himself.

And now the Queen knowing that the Seeds of these Treasons proceeded from abroad, she sought to strengthen her self by Foreign Alliances: And first to oblige the French King, whom the Year before she had chosen into the Order of the Garter, she sent the Earl of Derby into France to invest him with the Robes and Ornaments, with great Pomp and Solemnity. And then understanding that the Guises had engag'd in a dangerous League against the Protestant Religion, the French King and her self, she resolv'd to enter into another with the Princes of Germany: And to this Purpose she sent Sir Thomas Bodley to the King of Denmark, to the Elector Palatine of the Rhine, to the Dukes of Saxony, Wittenberg, Bünmswick and Lunenburgh, to the Marquess of Brandenburgh, and the Lantgrave of Hesse; and into Scotland, she sent Sir Edward Wotton, to let the King understand how sincerely she stood affected to him, and withal to persuaade him into a League of mutual Defence and Offence, and to recommend to him the King of Denmark's Daughter in Marriage. The King was very inclinable to the Substance of the League, but at present the Negotiation was interrupted by the Death of Francis Russel, Son to the Earl of Bedford, slain at a Meeting appointed to compose a Difference between the Borderers, by a sudden Tumult of the Scots, but the Author of the Fact was unknown. The English charg'd it upon the Earl of Arran, and the Lord Fernihurst Governor of the Middle-Borders. Whereupon at the Queen's Complaint, the Earl of Arran was confin'd, and Fernihurst committed to Prison at Dundee, where he dy'd; being a Man of great Valour and Resolution, and one who was always firm to the Interest of the Queen of Scotland.

The Queen's Alliances.

But Queen Elizabeth not thus satisfy'd, by way of Contrivance gave leave to the Scotch Lords, the Hamiltons, Angus, Marre, Glames, and other Exiles in England, to return secretly into Scotland, supplying them with Mony to suppress the Earl of Arran. For Maxwell, lately made Earl of Bothwell, Baron Humes, and others in Scotland, had already promis'd them their Assistance, even in the very Court; where by Wotton's Policy, Sir Patrick Gray, Belenden the Justice-Clerk, and Maitland the Secretary, were persuaaded to join against Arran. The Exile Lords, upon their first Entry into Scotland, commanded all Persons in the King's Name, to aid them for Conservation of the Truth of the Gospel, for freeing the King from corrupt Counsellors, and for maintaining of Amity with the English; so that they were soon join'd with about eight thousand Men. The Earl of Arran hearing of this, hasten'd to the King, and accus'd Patrick Gray as Author of this Commotion; but while Arran was making Provision for the Defence of the Town, his Enemies were ready to scale the Walls: Upon which Arran being inform'd, that they only aim'd at his Head, he secretly fled with one Servant, and the rest retir'd to the King in the Castle; from whence the King sent Gray to demand the Reason of their Coming; they answer'd, To submit themselves, and most humbly to kiss the King's Hand. The King offer'd Restitution of all their Possessions, if they return'd in Peace; but they desir'd to be admitted into his Presence, which was granted upon these Conditions: 'That they should not attempt any Thing against the King's Person, or those he should nominate, nor make any Innovations in the Government. They protested themselves ready to sacrifice their Lives for the King's Safety; and of any Innovations, they had not so much as a Thought; only they requested to have their Adversaries, and the Forts of the Kingdom, put into their Hands. After a Days Consultation, they were admitted into the King's Presence; and immediately the Earls of Montross, Crawford and Roths, Colonel Stuart, Downs, Arran's Brother, and others, were deliver'd into their Hands: The Earl of Arran, who had fled into the Western Islands, was call'd home; and themselves were pardon'd, and pronounc'd good Subjects. Hamilton was made Governor of Dunbritton, Humes of Edinburgh Castle, Angus of the Castle of Tontallon, Marre of Sterlin, and Glames Captain of the King's Guard. Upon this all Proscriptions and Outlawries against all Persons since the King's Inauguration, except some few by Name, were call'd in; and with an unanimous Consent of all Parties, the Treaty of a League with the Queen of England was determin'd, and Commissioners nominated for that Purpose.

A great Commotion in Ireland.

In Ireland likewise was a great Commotion this Year; first the Burks, provok'd by the severe Government of Richard Bingham Governor of Connaught, rais'd a Rebellion; but this was soon suppress'd, for Thomas Burk dy'd fighting, and his two Brothers were taken and executed. After this the Clan-Gibbons, the Clan-Donels, and the Joyes, combin'd in great Numbers, and openly declar'd, That they would have one of the Burks to rule over them, or some other Lord out of Spain, and thereupon harra's'd all the Country with Fire and Sword: And neither by the Persuasions of the Arch-Bishop of Tuam, nor by the Intreaties of the Earl of Clan-Richard, would they be appeas'd, till John Bingham, the Governor's Brother, follow'd them into the Woods, drove away five thousand Head of their Cattle, so that after forty Days, half starv'd, they came forth and submitted themselves. But the Disturbances did not end here; for now the Governor understood, That two thousand Scotch Islanders were landed, and ready to break into Connaught; upon which he gather'd his Men to give them Battel: But they flying into Bogs and Woods, he retreated with all the Signs of Fear, till drawing them out into firm Ground, he with his whole Force set upon their increas'd Body, and kill'd to the Number of three thousand Men; among whom were the two Sons of James Mac-Conel, who had long disturb'd these Parts, and the rest of the Burks who were the Authors of this Rebellion. This was a famous Victory, for the Good of the present and future Times; for by this the Name of the Mac-Williams, or principal Lord in Connaught was utterly extinct, and the insolent Attempts of the Scotch Islanders absolutely suppress'd.

The States of Holland fly for Succour to the Queen.

In the Netherlands at this Time the Confederate States were under great Difficulties; so that they held a solemn Consultation, whether to fly for Protection, to the French King, or the Queen of England. The French Ambassador shew'd many Advantages, and gave many Reasons, why they should rather fly to the French King; the English on the other Side urg'd as many Arguments why they should address themselves to the Queen of England: But in Conclusion, they had first Recourse to the King of France, and afterwards being neglected by him, to the Queen of England. Therefore in England it was nicely consulted and debated, Whether it was convenient to protect them; in which the Council was divided: Some were of Opinion, 'That it was necessary to relieve them, 'for that the Spaniard by conquering them, would greatly indanger the Kingdom 'of England: Others again thought, They were to be accounted no better 'than Rebels to their lawful Sovereign, and therefore unworthy of Assistance. So that after a long debate upon the Matter, the Queen refus'd them her Protection; Yet nevertheless to raise the Siege of Antwerp, then invested by the Prince of Parma, she was willing to supply them with four thousand Soldiers, provided the Town of Sluce, with all the Ordnance, were given into her Hands: But while this was discussing, the City of Antwerp was forc'd to surrender to the Spaniard. This gave new Concern to the generous Queen, who more seriously considering the Consequences, partly as fearing the Growth of the King of Spain's Power, and partly in Commiseration of the distressed Condition of the Protestants, she at last resolv'd to undertake their Protection, 'and 'to supply them with five thousand Foot, and a thousand Horse, under a sufficient General, and to pay them during the War: Upon Condition on their side

She takes them into her Protection.

Side, that by way of Pledge and Security for Repayment of all Charges, they should deliver into her Possession the Town of Flushing, and the Castle of Ramekins, and the Isle of Brill, with the City and two Forts. All which was concluded; and the Queen set forth a large Declaration to justify her Actions. Thus the Heroick Queen openly undertook the Protection of the Netherlands, while all the Princes of Christendom admir'd at such Female Fortitude, which durst provoke so puissant a Monarch: Insomuch the King of Sweden said, That Queen Elizabeth had now taken the Crown from her Head, and adventur'd it upon the doubtful Chance of War.

The wise Queen knowing how much she had incens'd the King of Spain, judg'd it best to turn his Anger to distant Regions; and thereupon sent out Sir Francis Drake and Christopher Carlisle, with a Fleet of twenty one Sail towards the West-Indies, in which were two thousand Volunteers and Mariners. These first surpriz'd the Town of St. Jago, afterwards St. Domingo, where twenty five thousand Crowns were given them to spare the Town from burning, and after that Cartagena, which they held seven Weeks, till the Spaniards redeem'd it for a hundred and ten thousand Crowns. After this the Calenture growing hot, and diminishing their Forces, they return'd towards England, passing by Virginia, a Colony that Sir Walter Raleigh had there planted; from whence Drake brought home with him Ralph Lane, who was the first that brought Tobacco into England, which the Indians took against Crudities in the Stomach. In this Expedition were lost about seven hundred Men, who chiefly dy'd of Calentures; and their Booty amounted to threescore thousand Pounds Sterling, besides two hundred and forty great Brasses and Iron Pieces of Cannon. These Things were transacted under the Torrid Zone in America; when at the same time Captain Davis with two Ships, at the Expence of William Sanderson and other Citizens of London, found out a Way to the East-Indies, by the Northern Parts of America, under the Frigid Zone.

Expedition against the Spanish-Indies.

During these Maritime Adventures, the Earl of Leicester, fired with Ambition of Command and Glory, and fearing his many Enemies at home, obtain'd Liberty of the Queen to go over into Holland with the Title of General of the Queen of England's Auxiliary Forces. He was accompany'd with the young Earl of Essex, the Lords Audley and North, Sir William Russel, Sir Thomas Shirley, Sir Arthur Bassett, Sir Walter Waller, and Sir Gervase Clifton, besides five hundred Gentlemen. Landing at Flushing, he was first entertain'd by his Nephew Sir Philip Sidney the Governor, and after that by the Towns of Zealand and Holland, after a most magnificent Manner: And coming to the Hague in January, the States by Patent committed to him the Command and absolute Authority over the United Provinces, with the pompous Titles of Governor and Captain General of Holland, Zealand, and the Confederate Provinces. So that now being attended with a noble Guard, call'd by all Men Your Excellency, sooth'd with Flatteries, and seated in the highest Degree of Honour, he began ambitiously to assume the Port and Behaviour of a real King; But Queen Elizabeth, who knew how to check the Exorbitancies of her greatest Favourites, to allay his Aspirings, positively wrote to him, That she admir'd how a Man, whom she had rais'd out of the Dust, should so contemptuously violate her Commands; and therefore charg'd him upon his Allegiance, strictly to observe the Injunctions she sent him by Hencage her Vice-Chamberlain. In the other Letters she expostulated with the States, That to her great Dishonour, they had thrown upon the Earl of Leicester, her Subject, the absolute Command over the United Provinces, without her Privy; when she had refus'd it her self; and therefore directed them to divest him of that absolute Authority, to whom she had set such Bounds, as he should not pass. The States return'd Answer, That they were heartily sorry they should incur her Displeasure, by conferring such Authority upon the Earl, without her Knowledge, but begg'd her to consider the Necessity of it; since to avoid Con- fusion, that Authority must be thrown upon some Person: Nor was there any thing shocking in the Word Absolute, since the Power and Government still rested upon the People. By these Letters, and Leicester's artificial Submission, the Queen was gradually appeas'd.

His Actions in the Netherlands.

The Earl of Leicester all this time receiv'd Contributions and Rewards from all Provinces, and made Martial Laws; and endeavouring likewise to raise new Customs upon Merchandize, he incurr'd great Dislike among the common People. His first Service was to relieve Grave, a Town in Brabant, which Count Mansfield had besieg'd; to which Place he sent Count Hohenlo a German, and Norris General of the English Foot, but notwithstanding all their good Service, the Town at length was taken; but Hemart the Governor, for his cowardly Submission, lost his Head. After this, the Prince of Parma march'd into Gelderland, and sat down before Venlo; where Skenk a Free-slander, and Roger Williams a Welshman perform'd a great Exploit; yet that Town was also taken shortly after. But in the mean time, the Lord Willoughby, Governor of Bergen-op-Zone, cut off the Enemies Convoys, and seiz'd their Provisions; and Sir Philip Sidney, and Maurice Son to the Prince of Orange, upon a sudden Attack bravely took Axel, a Town in Flanders. From Venlo, the valiant Prince of Parma march'd to Berke, garrison'd by twelve hundred English, under the Command of Colonel Morgan, and laid Siege to the Place; which the Earl of Leicester came to raise, but finding his Numbers too small for the Attempt, by way of Diversion he invested Duisburgh, which he took before the Prince of Parma could come to relieve it. And now the Prince of Parma, fearing lest Zutphen should be in Danger, commanded Provisions to be sent thither, which the Spaniards carrying in a Fog, the English by chance met them, defeated a Troop of their Horse, slew Hannibal Gonzaga, and several others. But in this Skirmish they lost the Glory of the English Nation, Sir Philip Sidney, who having his Horse slain under him, and mounting another, was shot into the Thigh, and after twenty five Days Torture he dy'd in the Flower of his Age, using these last Words to his Attendants, Govern your Will and Affection by the Will and Word of your Creator; in me behold the End of this World and all its Vanities. He had all the admirable Qualifications and Accomplishments, that could belong to a Man, a Soldier, a Schollar, a Gentleman and a Christian: His Obsequies were magnificently solemniz'd at St. Paul's Cathedral, James King of Scotland made his Epitaph, and both the Universities display'd the utmost of their Wit and Parts in celebrating his Memory.

After this the Earl of Leicester, full of Sorrow for his Nephew's Loss, attack'd the Sconces near Zutphen, where setting upon a Fort he took it after a peculiar manner: For one Edward Stanley, catching hold of a Spaniard's Launce with which he had charg'd him, held it so fast, that he was drawn up by that into the Fort; which so terrify'd the Spaniards, that immediately they quitted it. The Earl Knighted Stanley for this Act, gave him forty Pounds in present Mony, and an annual Pension of a hundred Marks during Life. And now the Season being far advanc'd, Leicester would not lay a formal Siege to the Place, but thought it sufficiently block'd up by the Garrisons in the Towns surrounding it. Therefore he return'd to the Hague, where the States receiv'd him with great Complaints, 'That their Mony was not carefully manag'd, that the Numbers of the English Supplies were not compleat, that Foreign Soldiers were levy'd without their Consent, that the Privileges of the United Provinces were disregarded, and new Projects for Contributions invented; for all which Mischiefs, they requested him to provide some present Remedy. And now designing for England, he gave a friendly Answer to these Complaints; but upon the very Day of his Departure, he first intrusted the Government of the Provinces to the Council of State, and at the very same Instant privately made another Act of Restriction, reserving to himself self the whole Authority over the Governors of Provinces, Cities and Forts; and besides, took away the usual Jurisdiction from the Council of the States, and Presidents of the Provinces; and then sail'd over into England upon the third Day of December. He returns into England.

At home the active Queen was very careful for the Preservation of the Protestant Religion; and she caus'd the Earl of Arundel, who had been in a Prison a whole Year, to be brought to the Star-Chamber, where being charg'd with harbouring of Priests, corresponding with Allen and Parsons the Jesuit, and offering to leave the Kingdom without Licence, he was fin'd ten thousand Pounds, and condemn'd to Imprisonment during the Queen's Pleasure. At the same Time the Queen supply'd the King of Navarre with a large Sum of Money; through whose Side the Guises endeavour'd to wound the Reform'd Religion in Scotland. But her most intente Care was how to unite England and Scotland in one intire Friendship: To which End she sent Thomas Randolph into Scotland, who making Proposals to the King, concerning a League Offensive and Defensive, tho' the King at first requir'd some Additions, and the French Ambassador violently oppos'd the whole, yet at last he consented to it. And in July following, there met at Berwick, Edward Earl of Rutland, William Lord Ewer, and Thomas Randolph for the Queen of England; and Francis Earl of Bothwell, Robert Lord Boyde, and Humes for the King of Scotland. Here the Scotch misliking the Word Offensive, the League was concluded under the Name of The League of strict Amity, containing several Articles; First for the maintaining of the Reform'd Religion, and then other such Articles, as were usual in the most friendly Alliances. Arundel fin'd in the Star-Chamber.
A League between England and Scotland.

X. We have hitherto seen the Queen of Scotland languishing under the Miseries of eighteen Years mysterious Confinement; but now, when all Things seem'd in a peaceable Condition, a new Accident occur'd, which brought this unfortunate Queen to the last Act of her fatal Tragedy; and this was the Discovery of a dangerous Conspiracy against the Queen and Nation. The Beginning was from one John Savage, who by the Persuasion of Gifford, a Doctor of Divinity, and others, was induc'd to believe, That it was a meritorious Work to take away the Lives of Princes Excommunicate, and thereupon vow'd to kill Queen Elizabeth. But to throw the Queen and Council into a State of Security, at the same Time they wrote a Book, exhorting the Papists in England to attempt nothing against their Prince, and to use only the Christian Weapons of Tears, Prayers, Watching and Fasting. About Whitsontide, one Ballard a Seminary Priest of Rheims, being acquainted with Savage's Vow, having treated in France with Mendoza and Charles Paget, about invading England, came over in the Habit of a Soldier, and was by a feign'd Name call'd Captain Foscu. Here he discover'd the whole Design to one Anthony Babington, a hopeful young Gentleman of Derbyshire, who by the Bishop of Glasco, the Scotch Queen's Ambassador in France, had been recommended to her, as one worthy of her Affection; so that between that Queen and him, there often pass'd Letters in unknown Characters. In a short Time, Babington by his Management had drawn into the Plot several other Gentlemen, zealous for the Romish Religion; as Edward Windsor, Brother to the Lord Windsor, Thomas Salisbury, of a good Family in Devonshire, Charles Tilney one of the Queen's Pensioners, Chydiack Tichburn of Hampshire, Edward Abington Son to the Queen's Cofferer, Robert Gage of Surrey, John Travers and John Charnock of Lancashire, John Jones, Barnwel of a noble Family in Ireland, Henry Dunne, Clerk in the First-Fruit Office, and Savage formerly mention'd. One Pollie also insinuated himself into their Company, a Man throughly acquainted with the Affairs of the Scotch Queen, who was thought daily to reveal all their Consultations to Walsingham. To these Gentlemen Babington communicated his Affairs, but not all the Particulars to every A. D. 1586. Reg. 29.

every one; to Ballard, Tichburn and Dunne, he shew'd the Letters that pass'd between him and the Queen of Scotland; Tilney and the rest were to be his Assistants. The Conspirators often met at Taverns, where they every Day consulted Expedients, and drunk and feasted highly, pleasing themselves with the Expectations of great Honours, and were arriv'd to such an extream Vanity, that the Men appointed to be the Assassins, were pictur'd to the Life, and Babington in the midst of them; with these Words, Quorsum hæc alio properantibus. This Picture was said to be privately shown to the Queen, who knew none of their Faces but Barnwell's, who had been often in Court. It happen'd when the Queen was once walking abroad, she espy'd this Barnwell, and turning to Hatton, Captain of the Guard, said, Am not I well guarded, that have not a Man in my Company that wears a Sword? Thus much Barnwell himself told the rest of the Company, and shew'd how easie it had been to have dispatch'd her if the rest had been present.

The Plot discover'd.

Walsingham's rare Management.

This Plot did not continue long undiscover'd, which was first done by the fore-mention'd Doctor Gifford. This Person was a Gentleman of a good Family at Chellington in Staffordshire, not far from Chartley, where the Scotch Queen was now kept Prisoner; and was lately sent by the English Fugitives into France, under the feign'd Name of Luson, to remind Savage of the Vow he had made, and to convey Letters between them and the Queen of Scotland. But being now troubled in Conscience, corrupted with Money, or terrify'd with Fear, he went privately to Walsingham, discover'd who he was, for what End, and by whom he was sent into England. The subtle Walsingham entertain'd him very courteously, and sent him into Staffordshire, to perform the Work he had undertaken: Here Gifford with a few Pieces of Gold bribing the Brewer of the House, where the Scotch Queen was lodg'd, so projected the Matter with him, that by a Hole in the Wall, usually fill'd up with a loose Stone, he should give in and receive out Letters; all which by Messengers purposely laid in the Way came directly to Walsingham's Hands, who broke them open, and copy'd them out; and by the singular Skill of one Thomas Philips discover'd the Meaning of the private Characters, and by the nice Art of Arthur Gregory so curiously seal'd them, that no Man could imagine them to have been open'd, and always sent them to the Parties to whom they were superscrib'd. In the like manner were the former Letters from the Queen of the Scots to Babington intercepted; as also other Letters written at the same Time to Mendoza the Spanish Ambassador, Charles Paget, the Arch-Bishop of Glasgow, Francis Englefield, and others.

As soon as the Queen by these Letters understood what a dreadful Storm hung over her Head, both at home and abroad, she commanded Ballard first to be apprehended, who was suddenly taken in Babington's House, when he was ready for France. Hereupon Babington became told with a thousand Uncertainties of an unresolv'd Mind, and at last repair'd to Walsingham, with whom he had long been a Suitor, for a Licence to go into France, promising to perform great Services in discovering the Practices of the Fugitives. Walsingham with subtle Promises drove the young Gentleman off from Day to Day; and at length persuaded him to lodge at his own House at London for a small Space till he could get his Licence seal'd, where they might have secret Intercourse without Suspicion. Thus far had Walsingham spun the Thread alone, without acquainting the rest of the Queen's Council; and would have drawn it longer, but the Queen would not permit it, Lest, as she said, by not avoiding Danger when she might, she should rather seem to tempt, than to trust Providence. Whereupon Walsingham sent a Note to his Man Scudamore, that he should more strictly observe Babington; which Note was deliver'd in such a Manner, that Babington sitting by a Table when Scudamore read it, overlook'd him, and read the same. Hereupon suspecting all was discover'd, the following Night, when he and Scudamore with two more of Walsingham's Servants had had supp'd plentifully in a Tavern, he arose suddenly from the Board, and leaving his Cloak and Sword behind him; hasten'd in the Dark to Westminster, where Gage chang'd Cloaths with him, and immediately put on those of Char-nocks; and then they withdrew themselves into Sir John's Wood near the City, whither also Barnwell and Dunne made their Retreat. In the mean Time they were proclaim'd Traitors all over England; which drove them into Woods and private Recesses: They shav'd Babington's Head, and disfigur'd his natural Beauty with the Rind of green Wallnuts; and when they were half starv'd, they repair'd to the Houses of the Bellamies, near Harrow on the Hill; where they were hid in Barns, and put in Country Habits. But notwithstanding all their Shiftings, they were discover'd within ten Days, and brought to London, to the great Joy of the Citizens, who publickly express'd their Satisfaction for the Safety of their beloved Queen. The other Accomplices were soon after apprehended, most of them in the Suburbs of the City; Salisbury and Travers in Cheshire, and Jones in Wales, and Bellamy, who had harbour'd them in his House, after he knew they were proclaim'd Traitors, was likewise taken; only Windsor was never found. Many Days were spent in their Examinations, whilst they ruin'd each other by their Confessions, and discover'd the whole Truth of the Conspiracy.

Babington and the rest are taken.

All this busie Time, the Queen of Scotland and her Servants were so strictly observ'd by Powlet, that she knew nothing of all these Transactions. As soon as the Conspirators were apprehended, and in safe Custody, Thomas George was sent to acquaint her with the whole Affair; which he did not perform, 'till she was mounted on Horseback to ride a Hunting, and was not then permitted to return, but under a shew of Honour, was led about to see the Houses of the neighbouring Gentry. At the same Instant, Sir John Manners, Sir Edward Aston, Sir Richard Bagot, and William Wade, seiz'd upon Narve and Curle, the Scotch Queen's Secretaries, and the rest of her Servants, and deliver'd them to separate Keepers and Places, that they might have no Discourse between themselves, nor with their Lady the Queen of Scotland. Next they broke open all Doors and Locks, and upon such Desks and Boxes as had Papers in them, they set their Seals, and sent them to the Queen: In which, before her Majesty's Presence, were found a great Number of Letters from Foreign Parts, likewise the Copies of Letters sent to several Persons, and at least sixty Alphabets of private Characters; as also, Letters to her from some of the English Nobility, containing great Proffers of Love and Service: All which Queen Elizabeth disssembled in Silence, according to her usual Motto, Video & Taceo, I see, and say nothing. Gifford, who had all this Time serv'd their purpose, was now sent into France, as if he had been banish'd out of England: But before his Departure, he left an indented Paper with the French Ambassador in England, with Instructions, that he should deliver no Letters from the Queen of the Scots or the English Fugitives, but to that Person who should shew the Counter-part thereof; which Counter-part was privately sent by him to Sir Francis Walsingham.

The Scotch Queen's Servants and Papers seiz'd.

On the thirteenth of September seven of the Conspirators were arraign'd, and confess'd their Crime, viz. Ballard, Babington, Savage, Barnwell, Tichburn, Tilney and Abington; and the other seven, two Days after, pleaded not guilty, but were condemn'd upon Trial: Only Pollie, tho' he was privy to all Passages, yet, because he had discover'd many Things to Walsingham, was not call'd in Question. Babington was executed with great Severity, and while he was cutting up, cry'd out, Parce mihi, Domine Jesu! Savage broke the Rope, and was cut up alive without any Hanging; which two, with Ballard, Barnwell, Tichburn, Tilney and Abington, were executed with great Rigour, on the twentieth of September, in St. Gile's Fields. The next Day the other seven at the same Place were executed with more Mercy, the Queen detesting the cutting them up alive, as had been done the Day before: These were Salisbury, Dunne,

The Trial and Execution of the Conspirators.

The Queen of Scots accus'd by her Servants. Danne, Jones, Charnock, Travers, and Gage, and with them Bellamy, who had conceal'd Babington after he was proclaim'd Traitor, whose Brother had strangled himself in Prison. When these Men were executed, the Scotch Queen's two Secretaries, Narve a Frenchman and Curle a Scotchman, were examin'd concerning the Letters, the Copies of Letters, and private Characters found in the Queen of the Scots Closet; and they under their own voluntary Subscriptions acknowledg'd, that they were their own Hand-writings, dictated in French by the Queen her self, taken by Narve, turn'd into English by Curle, and copy'd out in secret Characters. Hereupon Sir Edward Wotton was sent immediately into France, to lay before the King the whole Order of the Conspiracy, and shew him the Copies of the Queen of the Scots Letters, confirm'd by the Testimony of several of the English Nobility; so that the French King might be sensible to what Dangers the Queen of England had been reduc'd by the Practices of Morgan, Paget, and others in France.

A grand Debate concerning her. After the Punishment of inferior Persons and Subjects, a grand Debate arose how they should proceed against a crown'd Head, the Sovereign Queen of Scotland, as she was accounted by all her Friends; in which those of the Council had various Sentiments. Some conceiv'd it was hard and improper to use any rigorous Course against her, but only to detain her in safe Custody; both because she was not the Author of the Conspiracy, but only an Accessary; and because she was infirm, and not like to live long. Others, out of a peculiar Care of Religion, were of Opinion, that she should be arraign'd and executed according to Law; and Leicester, according to his Methods, advis'd to have her poison'd, and sent a Divine to Walsingham to prove it lawful, but he honourably protested against all such Actions. Next there arose a Difference in Council, concerning what Law they were to use against her; whether the Statute of the twenty fifth of Edward the Third, 'That pronounc'd all guilty of Treason who plotted the Destruction of the King, rais'd Wars in his Dominions, or adher'd to his Enemies; or else by the twenty seventh of the present Queen, enacted a Year before. At length it was carry'd by those who thought she was rather to be try'd by this last Act, as being made for this very Purpose and Occasion, and therefore to be put in Execution. Whereupon, above forty of the Nobility and chief Men of the Nation were authoriz'd by the Queen's special Commission, 'To inquire by virtue of that Law, and pass Sentence against all such as rais'd Rebellion, invaded the Kingdom, or attempted any Violence against the Queen: All which solemn Commission was design'd for to hear and determine the famous Cause of the Queen of Scotland.

The Commissioners meet at Fotheringay. Accordingly these great Commissioners, with many Lawyers and Attendants, upon the eleventh Day of October, repair'd to Fotheringay Castle in Northamptonshire, where the Scotch Queen was then detain'd Prisoner. The next Day they sent to her Sir Walter Mildmay, Powlet, and Edward Barker a publick Notary, who deliver'd her the Queen's Letters; which she receiv'd with a compos'd and majestick Countenance, and answer'd to this Effect, That it was very surprising, that the Queen should lay her Commands upon her, to submit to a Trial, as tho' she were a Subject, when she was a Queen, no less absolute than her self; therefore she would never act any thing prejudicial to Persons of her Dignity, nor to her Son the King of Scotland. The next Day some Deputies from the Commissioners came to her, with Persons learned in the Civil and Canon Law, to demonstrate to her, 'That neither her Imprisonment, nor her Royal Prerogative, could exempt her from answering in the Kingdom of England, and therefore advis'd her to hear what would be objected against her: Otherwise they threaten'd, That by the Authority of the Law, they could and must proceed against her, tho' she was absent. To which she answer'd, That she was no Subject, and would die a thousand Deaths before she would acknowledge her self to be one; by which she should both

both injure the Majesty of Princes, and subject her self to the Laws, and even to the Religion of England. Nevertheless, she was ready to answer in a full and free Parliament; but as for this Assembly, it was, as she perceiv'd, contriv'd against her, to give some Colour to a legal Proceeding; but she desir'd them to examine their Consciences, and remember, That the Theatre of the whole World was larger than the Kingdom of England. After several Messages and personal Conferences, Hatton the Vice-Chamberlain deliver'd himself after this plausible manner; Madam, you are accus'd, but not condemn'd: You say you are a Queen, be it so; the Royal Dignity is not exempted from answering, either by the Civil or Canon Laws, nor by the Laws of Nations and Nature: If you are Innocent, you injure your Reputation in declining a Trial: You protest your self Innocent; the Queen fears to the contrary with the deepest Sorrow and Affliction. To examine your Innocency are these honourable, prudent and upright Commissioners appointed, who will all rejoice to find you guiltless. The Queen her self will be transported with Joy, who affirm'd to me at my Departure, That she never met with a greater Affliction, than to find you charg'd with such a Crime. Wherefore, laying aside the bootless Claims of Royal Dignity, which now can be of no use to you, appear in Judgment, and display your Innocence; lest by avoiding Trial, you draw upon your self a Suspicion, and stain your Reputation with an indelable Aspersions. This Speech, with some others, had such Influence upon her, that at last with great Reluctancy she submitted to a Trial. yet at last submits to a Trial.

Upon this the Commissioners assembled themselves in the Presence-Chamber, where at the upper End was plac'd a Chair and Canopy of State for the Queen of England; and over-against that, below and at some distance, stood a Chair for the Queen of Scotland. By the Walls on both sides were plac'd Benches, upon which, on the one side sate the Lord Chancellor, the Lord Treasurer, the Earls of Oxford, Kent, Darby, Worcester, Rutland, Cumberland, Warwick, Pembroke and Lincoln, and Viscount Montague; on the other side the Lords Abergavenny, Zouch, Morley, Stafford, Gray, Lumley, Stourton, Sandes, Wentworth, Mordant, St. John, Compton and Cheiney. Nigh these sate the Knights of the Privy-Council, Sir James Crofts, Sir Christopher Hatton, Sir Francis Walsingham, Sir Ralph Sadler, Sir Walter Mildmay, and Sir Amias Powlet. Right before the Earls sate the two Chief Justices, and the Lord Chief Baron; on the other side the two Barons, and the other Judges, with Dale and Ford, Doctors of the Civil Law; and at a Table in the midst, Popham the Queen's Attorney-General, Egerton her Solicitor, Gawdy her Serjeant at Law, the Clerk of the Crown, and two Publick Notaries. With this Formality, and to this remarkable Assembly, the Queen of Scotland presented her self with all Majesty and Decency; and being plac'd in her Seat, and Silence proclaim'd, Bromley Lord Chancellor declar'd to her, That the Queen of England had appointed these Commissioners, to hear what she could answer to the Crimes laid to her Charge; assuring her, That nothing could cause more real Joy to the Queen, than to hear that she had prov'd her self Innocent. Upon this, she rising up said, That tho', as an absolute Princess, she could not be compell'd to appear before these Commissioners, yet to manifest her Innocency, she did condescend to appear. Then Serjeant Gawdy open'd every Specialty of the Law lately made, against which she had taken Exceptions; and shew'd at large by Babington's Confession, by Letters pass'd between them, by the Confessions of Ballard and Savage, by the Confessions of her Secretaries Narve and Curle, That she was privy to their Conspiracies, and consented to the Invasion of England, and the Destruction of the Queen. She readily and acutely answer'd to all Particulars, tho' very numerous, and alledg'd, That Letters might be counterfeited, her Secretaries might be corrupted, and her condemn'd Accusers, in hopes of Life, might be induc'd to confess more than the Truth; and in this she peremptorily insisted, 'That she never consented to any At‘ tempts against the Queen’s Person, and whatever she had done was to free ‘ her self from the Miseries of a long and unjust Imprisonment. After many other Charges by the Commissioners, and as many Replies, which she made with no less modest Behaviour than Presence of Mind, she in Conclusion requested, ‘ That she might be heard in a full Parliament, or before the Queen ‘ her self, and her Council.

 against her.*

After this the Court was adjourn’d ‘till the twenty fifth of October to the Star-Chamber at Westminster, where the Commissioners met, and after Narve and Curle had upon Oath Vivâ Voce, voluntarily avow’d, affirm’d and justify’d, all the several Letters, and Copies of Letters before produc’d, to be true and real, Sentence was pronounc’d against the Queen of Scotland, confirm’d under the Seals and Subscriptions of the Commissioners, and the Reason for it recorded to this Effect, ‘ That since the first Day of June, in the twenty seventh ‘ of this Reign, divers Matters had been compos’d and imagin’d within the ‘ Realm of England, by Anthony Babington and others, with the Privy ‘ of the said Mary, pretending a Title to the Crown of England, tending to ‘ the Hurt, Death and Destruction of the said Lady the Queen of England.
 ‘ And also the aforesaid Mary had also her self compos’d and imagin’d divers ‘ Matters tending to the Hurt, Death and Destruction of the Queen of En- ‘ gland, contrary to a Statute specify’d in the foresaid Commission. This Sentence, which depended chiefly upon the Credit of the Scotch Queen’s two Secretaries, occasion’d variety of Discourse and Censure; while some thought them Persons worthy of Belief, and others of no Credit in this Matter. However the same Day a Declaration was publish’d by the Commissioners and the Judges of the Land, ‘ That the said Sentence did not prejudice James King of Scotland, in ‘ his Title or Honour; but that he was in the same Place, Degree and Right, ‘ as if the said Sentence had never been pronounc’d.

The sixth Parliament in this Reign.

A few Days after, upon the twenty ninth of October, a new Parliament met at Westminster, which was begun by Authority from the Queen, deriv’d to the Arch-Bishop of Canterbury, the Lord Treasurer, and the Earl of Darby; and that not without former Precedents. At this Parliament the Proscriptions of the Lord Paget, Charles Paget, Sir Francis Inglefield, Francis Throgmorton, Anthony Babington, and the rest of the late Conspirators, were confirm’d, and their Goods and Possessions adjudg’d Confiscate. The Estates of the Realm, having by their Votes approv’d and confirm’d the Sentence given against the Queen of Scotland, unanimously presented a Petition to the Queen by the Hand of the Lord Chancellor; in which they earnestly besought her, ‘ That for the ‘ Preservation of Christ’s true Religion, the Quiet and Security of the Realm, ‘ the Preservation of her Majesty’s Person, and the Safety of themselves and ‘ their Posterity, the Sentence given against Mary Queen of Scotland according ‘ to Law might be publish’d. The more to induce her, they call’d to her Remembrance the terrible Examples of God’s Vengeance upon King Saul for sparing of Agag, and upon Ahab for sparing the Life of Benhadad. The Queen with great Majesty both of Elocution and Countenance, answer’d to this Effect,

Her Answer.

‘ That she acknowledg’d God’s miraculous Preservation of her, and she rejoic’d
 ‘ that after twenty eight Years Possession of the Throne, she found the Love ‘ of her People the same, if not greater than ever, which if she once lost, she ‘ might be said to breath, but not to live. And tho’ her Life had been dan‘ gerously struck at, yet she protested that nothing so sensibly griev’d her as ‘ that one of the same Sex and Quality, and of the same Race and Blood, should ‘ fall into such a Misdemeanor. Therefore if her own Life alone depended ‘ upon it, and not the Safety and Welfare of her dear People, she would wil‘ lingly pardon her, and if England might by her Death obtain a more flou‘ rishing Condition, and a better Prince, she would gladly lay down her own ‘ Life; but for her People’s sakes she only desir’d to live. After this the pro‘ ceeded to tell them a Secret, That lately with her own Eyes she had seen an Oath

Oath wherein some bound themselves to kill her within a Month. Yet after all, she desir'd some Space to consider and weigh a Matter of so great Nicety and Importance, concluding, That whatever the best of Subjects might expect from the best of Princes, that they might always expect to receive from her.

Twelve Days after, having often revolv'd the Matter in her Mind, distracted with doubtful Thoughts and Cares, and in great Conflicts how to proceed in so difficult an Affair, she sent Messengers to both Houses of Parliament, Desiring them again to consider of this important Cause, and find out a more grateful Expedient, by which both the Queen of Scotland's Life might be spar'd, and her own Security preserv'd. After long and serious Debates, judging that both the Welfare and Detriment of their Queen concern'd all the Subjects, they unanimously concurr'd in their former Opinion, declaring, That the Queen's Life could not be in Safety, while the other Queen liv'd; unless the other repented and acknowledg'd her Crimes, or were kept in strict Custody, or bound by Oaths and Obligations, or gave Hostages, or lastly departed the Kingdom: And since none of these would probably be Remedies, it remain'd that only her Death could be the Nation's Security: Repentance in her was little to be expected, who would not own her self guilty; close Imprisonment, Obligations, Oaths and Hostages, would all vanish, if the Queen of England once lost her Life; and if she departed the Kingdom, she would soon find Means to Invade it. These Reasons were urg'd to the gentle Queen by the Lord Chancellor and Puckering Speaker of the House of Commons; and she being harrafs'd with various Thoughts and melancholy Apprehensions, protested, That her most earnest Desire had been, That for her People's Security, and her own Safety, some other Expedient might have been invented, than what they had propos'd; but since it was now evident, that her own Safety, without the other's Destruction, was altogether precarious, she was violently affected with inward Sorrow; That she, who had pardon'd so many Rebels, and by Connivance or Silence had neglected so many Treasons, should be compell'd at length to exercise Cruelty against a near Kinswoman and a Queen. Therefore considering the great Conflicts in her Breast, she desir'd them to accept of an Answer without an Answer; concluding her Speech in these Words: If I should say I will not answer your Desires, I might perhaps say more than I intend; and if I should say I will do it, I might plunge my self into as great Inconveniencies as you endeavour to prevent; which I am confident your Wisdoms will not desire, when you consider the Circumstances of Place, Time, and the Manners and Conditions of Mankind. After this the Parliament broke up for a few Days.

She is under great Conflicts about it.

The Parliament urge her again.

Her uncertain Answer.

About the same Time the Lord Buckhurst and Beal were sent to the Queen of Scotland to inform her, That Sentence was pronounc'd against her, and confirm'd by Authority of Parliament as just and lawful, and that the Execution of it was instantly desir'd by the States of the Realm, out of due Regard to Justice, Security, and Necessity; and therefore they perswaded her, That before her Death she would acknowledge her Offences against God and the Queen, For if she liv'd, the establish'd Religion in England could not subsist. At this she seem'd to triumph with more than usual Joy, thanking God, and congratulating her own Felicity, That she should be accounted an Instrument for the Re-establishing Religion in this Island; and earnestly requested, That she might have a Catholick Priest allow'd her to direct her Conscience, and administer the Sacraments to her. A Bishop and a Dean being recommended to her for that purpose, she utterly rejected both, and severely retorted upon the English Nation, That they were accustomed to put their Kings to Death, no Wonder therefore if they exercis'd their Cruelty upon her who was of the same Blood. At the earnest Desire of some Courtiers, in December the Sentence against her was first proclaim'd in London, and then throughout all the Kingdom; in which Proclamation the Queen solemnly protested, That this Promulgation of the Sentence was extorted from her against her own Inclinations, by the Importunity of the whole Body of the Kingdom. The Scotch Queen being inform'd of this, seem'd no ways dejected; but writing to Queen Elizabeth, without any Intercession for her Life, in the most pathetick Terms begg'd of her, ' That she might be oblig'd to her, and none else, for three particular Favours: First, That when her Adversaries had satiated themselves with her innocent Blood, her Body might be convey'd into some Catholick Land for its Burial, particularly into France, where her Mother slept undisturb'd; for in Scotland the Tombs of her Ancestors were violated, and the Churches prophan'd; and in England, where lay both their common Progenitors, all Catholick Rites would be deny'd her: So might her Body at last rest in Peace, which while it was join'd with the Soul, could never find Rest or Quiet. Secondly, That she might be put to Death in private, without her Knowledge, but in the Sight of her Servants and others, who might give Testimony of her Behaviour, and prevent all Aspersions of her Memory. And Thirdly, That her Servants might freely and peaceably depart whether they pleas'd, and enjoy those Legacies which she had bequeath'd them by her Will and Testament. But whether this Letter ever came to Queen Elizabeth's Hands, is uncertain.

Great Inter-cessions made for her from abroad.

The Condemnation of the Queen of Scotland became the Subject of every Mouth and Tongue in the Nation, which caus'd vast Variety of Opinions and Censures; and as the Thing was strange and surprizing, it soon spread to distant Nations, and Intercessions arriv'd from many Countries; and first from Scot- land, where King James labour'd daily to save her Life, and omitted nothing that became a pious Son, and a prudent King. But the Scots were at this Time torn by intestine Factions, and more at that Time favour'd the Reigning than the Captive Queen; infomuch that some of them secretly solicited Queen Elizabeth by Letters to hasten her Execution, which had been deferr'd above two Months, since Sentence was first pass'd. The King of Scotland's Agents were daily interceeding, and all Arguments were us'd that might persuade her Reason, or move her Pity: To which he answer'd, That she was un- measurably sorry that no Means could be found to save the Life of their Queen, and to secure her own. But afterwards when they began to mix Threatnings with their Intreaties, she with some Warmth said, Tell your King what I have done for him, to keep the Crown on his Head since he was born, and that for my Part, I design to keep the League between us; which if he break, it shall be a double Fault. Sir Robert Melvil, finding her in a Passion, requested for eight Days Respite of Execution; to whom she reply'd, Not an Hour. The French King also became an Intercessor for the unfortunate Queen, and by his extraordinary Ambassador propos'd some Expedients, but to no Effect.

A. D. And now when the Necessities of the State, and the grand Stream of the Nation, seem'd to obstruct and over-bear all Means for Clemency and Pity, the

the other; and thereupon he first dealt secretly with William Stafford, a young

Chamber to the Queen, and his Brother at this Time Lieger Ambassador in France; and afterwards proceeded more openly with Trappe his Secretary, to murder Queen Elizabeth. This Stafford, tho' not daring enough to act such a Villany himself, yet recommended one Moody to him, a resolute and desperate Man, who for Money would certainly effect it. Upon this Stafford brought Trappe to Moody, who was then in the Common Jail, and upon Trappe's Offers undertook the Attempt: But then the Consultation was, by what Means it should be effected. Moody propos'd Poison, or else to lay a Bag of Gunpowder under the Queen's Bed, and suddenly fire it; but Trappe approv'd

of neither of these Methods, but chose rather to have it done, as the bold Person did, who shot the Prince of Orange. But while they were thus consulting about the Means of performing the Infernal Exploit, Stafford discover'd all to the Lords of the Council: Whereupon Trappe, who was ready for France, was suddenly apprehended, and upon Examination confess'd the whole Plot. This also caus'd the Ambassador to be sent for to Cecil-House, on the twelfth Day of January; where by the Queen's Appointment he was met by the Lord Burleigh, the Earl of Leicester, Sir Christopher Hatton, and Davison, one of the Secretaries; who acquainted the Ambassador with every Particular that Stafford, Moody and Trappe his Secretary had confess'd. As soon as Stafford was brought forth, and began to speak, the Ambassador interrupted him, and with Reproaches and Asseverations declar'd, that Stafford had first propos'd it to him; when Stafford falling upon his Knees, made fearful Imprecations, that the Ambassador first propos'd it himself. After Stafford had withdrawn, Burleigh gently reprov'd the Ambassador for being conscious or accessary to so vile a Fact; to which he immediately reply'd, That if he had known of any such thing, yet being an Ambassador, he ought to give no Notice of it but to his own King. After much Reasoning, Burleigh admonish'd him to beware how he offended hereafter in this Kind; and provoke the Clemency of a Queen, who knew how to punish an ill Ambassador; and that he was not acquitted from the Guilt, tho' the Queen might at this Time spare his Punishment.

Upon this new Conspiracy, the Scotch Queen's Enemies rais'd many Terrors in Queen Elizabeth's Mind, forming Reports, 'That the Spanish Fleet was arriv'd at Milford Haven; that the Scots had made an Irruption into England; that the Duke of Guise with a numerous Army was landed in Suffex; that the Queen of the Scots was escap'd out of Prison, and had rais'd an Army; that the Northern Parts were up in Rebellion, with other such formidable Relations. With such terrifying Arguments as these, they so gain'd upon the Queen's wavering and perplexed Mind, that she sign'd a Warrant for putting the Sentence of Death in Execution, and one of the Persons that push'd her upon this Extremity, was said to be Patrick Gray, a Person sent by the King of Scotland to dissuade her from it, yet he was frequently using this Expression, Mortua non mordet, The Dead never bite. The Queen notwithstanding, began to weigh with her self, Whether it was really better to free her self from her, or else to spare her Life; and many remarkable Reasons offer'd themselves on both Sides; but those for sparing of her were generally Speculative, while those for destroying her were Practical, and enforc'd by great Numbers. The Courtiers were continually urging the same Point; some Preachers, more severely than became their Functions, aggravated the Matter; and the vulgar Sort, out of Hope or Fear, insolently exercis'd their Wits and Pleasure upon the same deplorable Subject.

In the midst of these fluctuating and perplex'd Imaginations the Queen abandon'd her self to a solitary and melancholy Life, sitting in a silent and thoughtful Posture, and often Sighing out, Aut fer, aut feri, Either bear, or strike: At length from this Sentence, Ne feriare, feri, Strike, lest you be stricken, she deliver'd a Writing sign'd with her own Hand to Davison, one of her Secretaries, commanding a Warrant under the Great Seal of England to be drawn up for the Execution; but only to lye in Readiness, if any Commotion should arise, and commanded him to discover it to no Man. But the next Day, while Fear made her apprehensive of her own Thoughts, her Mind chang'd, and she commanded Davison by William Killigrew that the Warrant should not be drawn; but Davison came to the Queen, and told her Majesty, It was already drawn, and under the Seal. The Queen seem'd extremely concern'd, and blam'd him for his hasty Officiousness: Notwithstanding, he acquainted the Council with the Warrant and the whole Matter, and easily persuaded them them, who were ready to believe what they desir'd, that the Queen had commanded it should be executed. Hereupon Beal, who in Respect of Religion, of all others was the Scotch Queen's greatest Enemy, was without Delay sent down with one or two Executioners, and a Warrant, wherein Authority was given to the Earls of Shrewsbury, Kent, Derby, Cumberland, and others to see her executed: And all this without the Queen's Knowledge, nay expressly against her Order; for she had told Davison, That she would take another Course with the Queen of the Scots, yet he would not command Beal to desist and return: And this carries us to the last Act of this fatal Tragedy.

The Queen of the Scots Behaviour.

As soon as the Earls were arriv'd at Fotheringay, they together with Sir Amias Powlet and Sir Drue Drury, her chief Keepers, came to her, read over the Warrant, and in few Words admonish'd her to prepare her self to die the next Day. She with an undaunted and compos'd Spirit, made this Answer: I did not think the Queen my Sister would have consented to my Death, who am not subject to her Laws; but since it is her Pleasure, Death is most welcome to me; for I account that Soul unworthy of everlasting Joys, whose Body cannot bear one Stroke of the Executioner. She desir'd to have Conference with her Almoner, her Confessor, and Melvil the Master of her Household; but her Confessor was positively deny'd her, and the Bishop and Dean of Peterborough recommended to comfort her. Upon her Refusal of these, the Earl of Kent in a vehement Zeal, broke out into these Words, Your Life will be the Death of our Religion, and your Death will be the Life of it. When the Earls were departed from her, she commanded Supper to be hasten'd, and sitting down eat after her usual temperate Manner. Then observing her Servants, both Men and Women, weeping and deploring her hard Fate, she comforted them with a brave Courage and Magnanimity, commanding them, Rather to rejoice that she was soon to be freed from a World of Miseries. Towards the End of her Supper, she drunk to all her Servants, who pledg'd her in Order upon their Knees, mingling Tears with their Wine, begging Pardon for their Neglect of their Duty, as she also in like manner did of them. After Supper she perus'd her Will, read over the Inventory of her Goods and Jewels, and wrote down the Names of those to whom she gave any Legacies. She put the Gold she had in as many little Purse as she had Servants, more or less in every Purse, according to their Qualities and Merits. She wrote a Letter to her Confessor, that he would make Intercession for her to God in his Prayers; and also wrote Letters of Recommendations for her Servants to the French King and the Duke of Guise. At the ordinary Hour she went to her Repose, and slept quietly some Hours; and then Waking, she spent the rest of the Night in Prayer.

She comes out to Execution.

The fatal Morning being come, which was on the eighteenth of February, she dress'd her self in State, as she us'd upon the highest Festivals; and calling her Servants, order'd her Will to be read, praying their Acceptance of the small Legacies she had given them, having no Ability to extend her Kindness in greater Matters. Then retiring to her Oratory, she continu'd in Sighs, Groans and Prayers, till Thomas Andrews, Sheriff of the County, about eight a Clock, acquainted her, That all was ready: She answer'd, I am so likewise, and came forth in State, with a majestick and compos'd Countenance, a chearful Look, and in a modest Habit; her Head cover'd with a Linnen Veil hanging down to the Crown, her Beads at her Girdle, and an Ivory Crucifix in her Hand. In the Porch she was met by the Noblemen, where Melvil her chief Servant, falling on his Knees, and melting into a Flood of Tears, bitterly deplor'd his miserable Fate, that he must be the unhappy Messenger to Scotland, of the most unfortunate End of his Queen and Mistress. She comforted him, and bad him Rejoice for he should presently see Mary Stuart freed from all her Miseries. Then she order'd him to tell them, That she dy'd constant in her Religion, and firm in her Affection towards Scotland and France: And she she appeal'd to the omniscient God, how greatly she desir'd that the Kingdom of England and Scotland might be united in one. Next she desir'd him to pray her Son to serve God, defend the Catholick Religion, govern his Kingdom in Peace, and never put himself into the Power of another, as she had done; to certifie him that she had done nothing prejudicial to the Crown of Scotland, and to desire him to keep Friendship with the Queen of England. With these Words, and some Tears falling from her Eyes, she urg'd him To be a faithful Servant to her Son, and bad him several Times Farewel.

Then turning to the Lords, she desir'd that her Servants might be civilly us'd, and quietly enjoy the Legacies she had given them; that they might stand by her at her Death, and afterwards be safely convey'd into their own Country. When the Earl of Kent scrupled their being present at her Death, for fear of some superstitious Ceremony, the Queen said, Fear it not, these harmless Souls only desire to take their last leave of their Mistress; and I know my Sister Elizabeth would not deny the Presence of my Women, for the Honour of our Sex. I am her near Kinswoman, descended from her Grandfather, Queen Dowager of France, and the anointed Queen of Scotland. Then it was granted that such of her Servants should be present, as she should please to name, which were Melvil, Burgoign her Physician, her Apothecary, her Surgeon, two of her Women and others; among whom Melvil bore up her Train. Thus, the Gentlemen, two Earls, and the Sheriff of the County going before her, she came to the Scaffold, which was two Foot high, and twelve broad, erected in the Middle of the Hall; on which was plac'd a Chair, a Cushion and a Block, all cover'd with black Cloath. Here Beal read the Warrant, and Fletcher Dean of Peterborough began a long Speech, concerning the Condition of her Life past, present and future. But the Queen interrupted him once or twice, desiring him not to trouble himself, and protesting she was immovably fix'd in the Roman Catholick Religion, and now came to shed her Blood for it. When the Dean perswaded her to a sincere Repentance, and by Faith to rely upon the Merits of Christ, she answer'd, That in that Religion she was born and educated, and now would die in it. The Lords then said they would pray for her, to whom she reply'd, I shall thank you heartily if you will pray with me; but for me to join in Prayer with you, who are of another Persuasion, would be a bainous Sin. Then the Lords order'd the Dean to pray, with whom, while the Multitude in the Hall were praying, she fell upon her Knees, and holding the Crucifix before her, pray'd in Latin with her Servants, out of a Book call'd The Office of the Blessed Virgin Mary. When the Dean had finish'd his Prayers, she in English recommended the Church, her Son, and Queen Elizabeth to God's Protection and Benediction; forgave all her Enemies, and kissing the Crucifix, and signing her self with the Cross, she said, As thy Arms, O Christ, were extended upon the Cross, so, Lord, receive me with the extended Arms of thy Mercy, and forgive me my Sins. Then beginning to disrobe her self, the Executioners offer'd their help; but she put them back, saying, She was not accuslom'd to be serv'd by such Grooms. While her Women with melting Eyes were performing that Office, she affectionately kiss'd them, sign'd them with the Cross, and with a pleasant Countenance bid them forbear their Womanish Lamentations, for now she should rest from all her Sorrows. Having cover'd her Face, and laying her self down to the Block, she repeated the Psalm, In thee, O Lord, do I put my trust, let me never be confounded; then stretching forth her Body, she many Times said, Into thy Hands, O Lord, I commend my Spirit! And at two Strokes her Head was sever'd from her Body, which appear'd to be somewhat gray, tho' she was but forty five Years of Age. At the same Moment the Dean cry'd out, So let the Enemies of Queen Elizabeth perish! The Earl of Kent answer'd Amen; but the Multitude reply'd with nothing but Sighs and Lamentations. Her Body was Embalm'd, and with Regal Obsequies interr'd in the Cathedral Church of Peterborough; but her Cloaths, the Block, and every thing else that had receiv'd a Drop of her Blood, were burnt, to prevent superstitious Consequences.

Her Character.

This deplorable End had Mary Queen of Scotland, a Lady firm and constant to her Religion, of singular Piety towards God, invincible Magnanimity of Mind, Wisdom above her Sex, and admirable Beauty; yet toss'd and cross'd with the Frowns and Varieties of Fortune beyond all the former Examples of crown'd Heads; which some believ'd to have proceeded from the Vengeance of Heaven, for such secret Crimes of hers, as perhaps can never be either excus'd or prov'd 'till the great Day of Judgment; and others, for her violent Adherence to Superstition, and Severity to those of a contrary Persuasion. But tho' we cannot nicely determine this mysterious Affair; yet we may here presume, with a great Man, to observe and admire at the wise Disposition and Ordering of the Divine Providence. For those very Things which both the Queens most of all desir'd, and propos'd to themselves in all their Councils, were by this Means effected and accomplish'd. Queen Mary, as she declar'd at her Death, desir'd nothing more ardently than that the divided Kingdoms of England and Scotland might be united in the Person of her dear Son: And there was nothing which Queen Elizabeth more industriously endeavour'd, than the Preservation of the Protestant Religion, and the Safety and Security of her People: And that the great God granted both their Prayers, England saw with unexpected Satisfaction.

Queen Elizabeth afflicted.

The Death of this Princess however reflected upon the Fame and Conduct of Queen Elizabeth, who little imagin'd such Severity had been acted; and she receiv'd the News with such a Mixture of Grief and Indignation, that her Countenance grew pale, her Speech falter'd, her Spirits fail'd, and she was under such an Astonishment and Confusion that she had no Enjoyment of her Life, Company seem'd a Burden to her, insomuch that she abandon'd her self to Grief and Melancholy, put on deep Mourning, shed abundance of Tears, severely rebuk'd her Council, commanded them out of her Presence, and order'd Davison to be try'd in the Star-Chamber. Thus she continu'd for some Space; but as soon as Grief would give her leave, she wrote a Letter in haste with her own Hand to the King of Scotland, and sent it by Sir Robert Cary, beginning in these Words: My dearest Brother, Would to Heav'n you knew, but not felt, the inexpressible Grief that overwhelms my Mind, upon this deplorable Accident, which has happen'd contrary to my Meaning and Intention; which since my Pen trembles to mention, you will fully understand by this my Kinsman. I request you, that as God and many others can witness my Innocency in this Matter, so you will also believe, that if I had commanded it, I would never deny it.—That as I know this has happen'd deservedly on her Part; so if I had intended it, I would not have charg'd it upon others.—There is not any that loveth you more dearly, and taketh more Care for the Good of you and your Affairs.—God preserve you long in Health and Safety.

She writes to the King of Scotland.

Davison cited in the Star-chamber.

While Cary was on his Journey to Scotland, Davison was cited to the Star-Chamber, before the two Arch-Bishops and several Lords and Judges of the Land, appointed Commissioners for that purpose; where he was charg'd with Contempt of the Queen's Majesty, and a Violation of his Trust, in causing the Execution of the Queen of Scotland, without the Knowledge and Consent of his own Sovereign; which Charge was much aggravated by the Pleadings of Popham, Egerton, Gawdy and Puckering. Davison answer'd, That if he should confess himself guilty of the Crimes objected against him, he should injure his own Reputation, which was dearer to him than his Life; and if he should contest with the Queen in his own Defence, he should do what was misbecoming the Obedience of a Subject, the Behaviour of a Servant, and the Trust and Office of a Secretary. He protested before God and the Commissioners, That he had acted nothing in this Matter, but what he had persuaded suaded himself was the Queen's Will and Pleasure; in which, if he had wrong'd himself either through Ignorance or Negligence, he could not but be exceedingly afflicted, and patiently submitted himself to the Censures of the Commissioners. After many Debates, the Commissioners generally agreed That Davison was an honest Man, and that in this Act he had done the Nation great Service; but for the Manner and Management of it without the Queen's Knowledge, they fin'd him ten thousand Pounds, and Imprisonment during the Queen's Pleasure; and he never could recover her Favour, but only sometimes to have his Wants reliev'd. Thus was Davison, an ingenious Man, but a Stranger to the Artifices of Courts and Courtiers, brought upon the Stage, as some thought, purposely to serve a Turn; but miscarrying in the last Act, was thrust off again, and not without the Pity of many thinking Men, detain'd a long Time in Prison. He is fin'd and imprison'd.

By this Time Sir Robert Cary, who was sent with the Queen's Letter, arriv'd at the Borders of Scotland, but was not permitted to set Foot in that Kingdom: King James would scarce hear him by a third Person, and with much Difficulty receiv'd his Letters: He likewise recall'd his Ambassador from England, and breath'd out nothing but Resentments and Revenge. Upon which the Queen labour'd by her able Ministers and Agents, which she never wanted, to appease his Mind, and divert him from the War he intended. These working with Art and Privacy upon the King's chiefest Counsellors, and those of his Chamber which he most affected, they kept him off from breaking out into open Hostility, which was every Day expected. First Secretary Walsingham by a long Letter to the Lord Thirlstane, who was then most in Credit, and had the chief Administration of Affairs, propos'd divers weighty and important Considerations to divert the King from violent Resolutions. Soon after the Lord Hunsdon, Governor of Berwick, admonish'd the King, 'How dangerous it would be for him now to begin a War against England, and what little Aids he could justly expect from either Spain or France: But if he continu'd his Amity with England, he might be sure that Queen Elizabeth would most lovingly account him as her own Son. Then that he might be assur'd that the Queen his Mother suffer'd without her Privy, she sent him the Sentence against Davison, under the Hands of all the Commissioners, and attested under the Great Seal of England; and likewise another Instrument sign'd by the Judges of England, in which they averr'd, That the Sentence against the Queen of Scotland could no ways prejudice his Right to the Succession. All these gradually gain'd upon his Reason and Judgment; and he soon began to be satisfy'd with Arguments of Walsingham and Hunsdon, the fair Promises of the Queen, and the Hopes of being a Successor in England; which last, considering his present Circumstances among a divided Nobility, a factious Clergy, a discontented People, and a barren Country, was alone an answerable Argument to induce that King to consult his own Interest, and compound the Matter without the Hazards of an unequal War. The King of Scotland's Resentments.

XI. The mighty Queen Elizabeth was now freed from her Rival in Government, and the Head of a contrary Religion, who at different Times had given her great Disquiets for near thirty Years: But these Domestick Storms were scarce allay'd, when others more formidable threaten'd the Nation from abroad, arising from the swelling Ambition and superstitious Resentments of the most powerful Monarch in Europe, the King of Spain. This Prince, upon several Pretences, had many Times form'd Designs of invading the Kingdom of England; but at this Time he began to exert his utmost Power, and made such vast Preparations, as both surpriz'd and kept all Europe in Suspence, not knowing over what Nation the Storm would break, tho' it was most generally thought to be design'd against the Netherlands. For the Discovery of this great Secret, Walsingham employ'd his nicest Faculties and Endeavours, and with A. D. 1587. Reg. 30.

The great Preparation of Spain against England.

answerable Success. This great Statesman was famous for his Spies, his secret Intelligence, and wondrous Management; and is believ'd to have laid the Foundation of the Civil Wars both in France and the Netherlands, so advantageous to England in this Reign: Upon which he told the Queen, That tho' the Spaniard had a strong Appetite and a good Digestion, he had given him such a Bone, as would take him twenty Years to manage, and break his Teeth at last. But now his Business was to discover the present Aims of the King of Spain, which were unknown to any but himself; 'till this Year he had Intelligence from Madrid, that King Philip had told his Council, That he had dispatch'd an Express to Rome, with a Letter writ with his own Hand to the Pope, acquainting him with the true Design of his Preparations, and begging his Blessing upon it; which for some Reasons he could not yet disclose to them, 'till the Return of the Courier. The Secret being thus lodg'd with the Pope, Walsingham, by the Means of a Venetian Priest retain'd at Rome as a Spy, got a Copy of the Original Letter, which was stolen out of the Pope's Cabinet by a Gentleman of the Bed-Chamber, who took the Keys out of the Pope's Pocket while he slept. After this, by his dextrous Management, he caus'd the Spanish Bills to be protested at Genoa, which should have supply'd them with Money for these extraordinary Preparations; by which Means he happily retarded this threatening Invasion for a whole Year.

Walsingham's Policy.

Drake's Expedition.

In the mean Time to divert and molest the Spaniard, the Queen sent out the famous Captain Drake, with four of her Royal Ships and some others, to the Coast of Spain, to surprize and destroy his Ships in his Havens, and intercept his Provisions. Drake faithfully perform'd his Office, and entering into the Port of Cales, sunk, took and fir'd about a hundred Sail of Ships, in which were great Quantities of Ammunition and Provisions: Then returning to Cape St. Vincent, he set upon three Forts, and compell'd them to surrender: Thence setting Sail to the Western Islands, call'd the Azores, by good Fortune he met with a vast and rich Carack, call'd St. Philip, returning from the East-Indies, and easily took it; whereupon the Seamen on both Sides, from the Name of Philip, judg'd it portentous to the King of Spain. At the same Time Thomas Cavendish of Suffolk, in the other Part of the World, who two Years before had set Sail from England with three Ships, passing through the Straits of Magellan, along the Coasts of Chile, Peru, and New-Spain, fir'd a great Number of Spanish Towns, and took and plunder'd nineteen great Ships, and among them a rich Ship of the Spanish King's nigh California, in North America; and so by the Philippine Islands, the Moluccos, the Cape of Good Hope, and the Island of St. Helen, return'd home this Year, being the second after Magellan that had sail'd round the Globe.

And Cavendish

The Treachery of Stanley and York.

As Drake and Cavendish at this Time gain'd great Fame and Renown, so two other Englishmen in the Netherlands purchas'd as much Infamy and Disgrace; these were William Stanley and Rowland York. This last was a Londoner, an audacious Man, and of loose Behaviour; noted for first bringing in the Use of the Rapier into England, whereas before Sword and Buckler were the only Weapons in Duels, and it was thought cowardly either to turn the Point, or strike below the Girdle. He suffering some Affront from the Earl of Leicester, fled, and for a Time serv'd under the Spaniards in the Netherlands, 'till being reconcil'd to Leicester, he was made Governor of the Fort near Zutphen; but being brib'd, he not only surrender'd the Place to the Enemy, but also by the like Treachery drew in William Stanley to betray Daventer to the Spaniards, a rich and strong Town: As a Reward of their Treasons, the Spaniards set York and Stanley at Variance, and poison'd the former and seiz'd his Effects, whose Carcass was three Years after digg'd up by the States, and hang'd upon a Gibbet 'till it rotted: Stanley went into Spain in Hopes of Advancement, but no Man would trust him, according to a Saying in that Country, It is sometimes lawful to give Honour, but never Credit to a Traitor. These treacherous Proceedings brought the Earl of Leicester into much Envy with the Confederate States, because the Traitors were intimate with him; and in long Letters to Queen Elizabeth, they accus'd her Favourite for his publick Mismanagement of Mony and Merchandize, as well as Military Affairs, and imputing the Mischiefs arising from Tark and Stanley all to his Credulity. The Queen, for the examining and composing the Matter, sent over, Thomas Sackville, Lord Buckhurst, Norris and Bartholomew Clerk: But when the officious Diligence of Buckhurst seem'd to bear hard upon Leicester's Reputation, his Favour with the Queen prov'd of that Force, that Buckhurst at his Return was confin'd to his House for several Months.

Afterwards Sluce being invested by the Prince of Parma, the States sent to the Earl of Leicester into England to come and relieve it. The Town being furiously batter'd with seventeen thousand great Shot, and a large Breach made, was defended for a while by Sir Roger Williams, Sir Francis Vere, and Captain Nicholas Baskerville, with great Valour and Reputation; but when Leicester, who came to its Succour, thought fit to retire, it surrender'd to the Prince of Parma. And indeed the States durst not commit any great Army to Leicester's Command, who they knew had a Design to seize Leyden, and some other Towns into his own Hands, and to make himself absolute Governor of those Parts. Whereupon the States us'd such Means with Queen Elizabeth, that Leicester was call'd home with Disgrace; being succeeded by Maurice of Nassaw, Son to the Prince of Orange, now but twenty Years of Age. Peregrine Lord Willoughby, a worthy Commander, was by the Queen made General of the English Forces in the Netherlands, to whom she gave Command to reduce the English Factions to the States Obedience; which by the Assistance of Prince Maurice he easily effected. And now the haughty Leicester being come home, derided and exploded for his Title of Excellency, and perceiving that Accusations were preparing against him by Buckhurst, and others; he privately with Servile Tears cast himself at the Queen's Feet, and begg'd, That as she had sent him out with Honour, she would not receive him back with Disgrace; and that she would not bury him alive, whom she had rais'd from the Dust. This so far prevail'd upon her, that the next Day being call'd to Examination before the Lords, he took his Place amongst them; and when the Secretary began to read the Heads of his Accusation, he interrupted him, saying, That the publick Instructions he had receiv'd were limited with private Restrictions; and making his Appeal to the Queen, eluded the whole Complaint, to the great Disappointment of his Adversaries. Thus was the mighty Favourite restor'd, and gain'd so much Ground, that shortly after he procur'd a Patent to be Vice-Gerent in the Kingdoms of England and Ireland; but Burleigh and Hatton prevented this aspiring Attempt, by shewing the Queen the Danger of it. And being disappointed of his ambitious Designs, he retir'd into the Country, and dy'd the next Year; having his Goods seiz'd on by the Queen's Order, and publicly sold for the Payment of Debts due to the Crown. And this was the End of this prodigious Man; who is describ'd as the most subtle and impious Courtier, and the most aspiring and prevailing Favourite that England ever saw. Tho' as to the latter Part, this great and wise Queen knew how to humble and reduce him; and once told him with a severe Frown and Oath, That he must not expect to Monopolize her Favours, but she would give and take back as she pleas'd; and as she had no Master her self, she would make him know that he had a Mistress.

This Year 1587 was noted for the Death of several other great Persons, as Henry Nevil Lord Abergavenny, Great Grand-Child to Edward Nevil, who in the Reign of Henry the Sixth, gain'd that Title in the Right of his Wife; Anne Stanhope, Dutches of Somerset, ninety Years of Age, who was the Wife of Edward Seymour Duke of Somerset and Protector of England; Sir Ralph Sadler, Chancellor of the Dutchy, and the last Banneret of England, in Camden's and Baker's Time; and lastly Thomas Bromley Chancellor of England, who was succeeded in his Place by Sir Christopher Hatton, who for his Honesty and Sense of Equity was preferr'd before more able Lawyers.

Reg. ³⁰₃₁

The great
Year Eighty Eight.

We are arriv'd at the thirtieth Year of this renown'd Reign, Eighty Eight, which a Koningsberg Astronomer above a hundred Years before, foretold should be a Year of Wonders, and the German Chronologers presag'd would be the Climacterical Year of the World. The Rumours of Wars, which had been feeble and remote, now daily encreas'd; and resounded through the World, That a most prodigious Navy was rigg'd and prepar'd in Spain against England; and that the most famous Captains, renowned Commanders and expert Soldiers were sent for from Italy, from Sicily, and from as far as America, to manage this vast Enterprize. Yet at the same Time a Treaty of Peace was depending between England and Spain in the Netherlands: The Earl of Darby, the Lord Cobham, Sir James Cross, Dale and Rogers, Doctors of Law, were Commissioners for Queen Elizabeth; the Count Aremberg, Champignie, Richardot, Mais and Garvyer, were for the Prince of Parma and the Spaniard; and all had their continu'd Meetings near Ostend. But it appear'd that the Spanish Commissioners design'd more to lull the English into a Security, that they might make no Provisions for War, than that they had any Intentions of real Proceedings; since they rejected all reasonable Conditions that were offer'd, and trifled and protracted Time, 'till the Spanish Fleet was come upon the Coast, and the Sound of the great Guns from Sea broke up the Assembly, and dismiss'd the English Commissioners.

The great Spanish Armada.

The Preparations of the King of Spain were extraordinary, his Fleet consisting of a hundred and thirty four Sail; whereof seventy two Galeasses and Galleons, vast bulky Ships like floating Castles; in which were about twenty thousand Soldiers, eight thousand Mariners, two thousand Gally-Slaves, and two thousand six hundred and thirty Great Guns; besides prodigious Quantities of Bullets, Powder, Field-Pieces, Muskets, Pikes, Halberts, Carriages, Horses, Mules, Torches, Lanthorns, Canvas, Hides, Lead, Chains, Whips, Butchering-Knives, and whatever else could serve for Ostentation or Terror. In this Fleet were also about a hundred Monks and Jesuits, under the Superintendency of Cardinal Allen an Englishman, who took care to translate the Pope's Bull into the English Tongue: And there were above a hundred and twenty Noble Men Volunteers of great Account; nor was there a Noble Family in Spain, but had a Son, Brother, or Nephew in this Expedition, in Hopes of Riches and Revenues in England. For the greater Holiness of the Action, twelve of their Ships were call'd by the Name of the Twelve Apostles; and their Cause and their whole Force were recommended to the Pope, and the Prayers of all good Catholics, and set forth in a Book in Print, in which all their Preparations were recited; which were so extraordinary throughout all Spain, Italy and Sicily, that the Spaniards themselves were amaz'd at the Fleet, and with the utmost Confidence stil'd it, The Invincible Armada. As this Pope Sixtus Quintus had Excommunicated Queen Elizabeth, absolv'd all her Subjects, and consecrated the Expedition, as a Croisado against Turks and Infidels; it occasion'd the Duke of Savoy, and some other Catholick Princes, to list themselves Volunteers in so meritorious an Enterprize. Nor was this all, for the Prince of Parma in the Netherlands had made his utmost Preparations for the same Attempt, and was appointed to be ready with fifty thousand old Soldiers, with all other Accoutrements to join the Armada on the Coast of Flanders, and by his Shipping to transport the whole Army, and land them at the Mouth of the Thames.

The Queen's
Preparations.

On the other side, the undaunted Queen, with indefatigable Industry, made all suitable Preparations against such a formidable Invader, which she manag'd with a Masculine Skill and Bravery. The Command of the Fleet was given to the Admiral the Lord Charles Howard of Effingham, a Man

Man nobly qualify'd for such a Work; who with the valiant Sir Francis Drake the Vice-Admiral, was appointed to be ready at Plimouth: And the Lord Henry Seymour, second Son to the Duke of Somerset, was order'd to lye upon the Coasts of Flanders, with forty English and Dutch Ships, to hinder the Prince of Parma from coming out with his Forces. Twenty thousand Soldiers were dispos'd along the Coasts for the Land-Service: Besides which, two Armies were rais'd of well-experienc'd Men; the one consisting of twenty two thousand Foot, and a thousand Horse, under the Earl of Leicester, which incamp'd at Tilbury; and the other under the Lord Hunsdon, consisting of thirty four thousand Foot, and two thousand Horse, to guard the Queen's Person. Arthur Lord Gray, Sir Francis Knolls, Sir John Norris, Sir Richard Bingham, Sir Roger Williams, and other excellent Soldiers, were chosen to make a Council of War, and consult about the ordering of the Land-Service. These declar'd, among other Particulars, That the Places most convenient for the Enemies Landing, as Milford Haven, Falmouth, Plimouth, Portland, the Isle of Wight, Portsmouth, the Downs, the Thames Mouth, Harwich, Tarmouth, Hull, and such others, should be well mann'd and fortify'd: That the Train'd Soldiers of those Shires, which lay near the Sea-Coast, should defend those Places, and be ready at the Alarm to hinder the Enemy from Landing; and if they did Land to lay the Country waste, that they might find no Subsistence, and by continually crying Arm, Arm, give the Enemy no rest; but yet they were not to give Battel, 'till more Commanders and their Soldiers were come up. At the same Time, many fearing the Papists at home, no less than the Spaniards abroad, perswaded the Queen to take off the Heads of some of the chief of them; but she generously detesting such Cruelty, only took Order, that some of them should be confin'd to Wisbech Castle. And having her piercing Eyes and capacious Mind every way, she quicken'd the Confederate States, secur'd the Affairs of Ireland, and procur'd the King of Scotland to stand against the Power of the Spaniard.

All things being in Readiness on the Spaniard's Side, the wondrous Armada set Sail from the Mouth of the Tago, on the twenty ninth Day of May,^{The Armada set Sail.} under the Command of Don Alphonso Duke of Medina, and under him John de Recalde, an experienc'd Sea Captain. Never did the Western Ocean behold such a pompous and magnificent Spectacle before it appear'd with all the Ornaments of Delight, and Horrors of Destruction. But this vast moving City, as it was call'd, was suddenly dispers'd by a great Storm; so that with great Difficulty they met some few Days after near the Groyne in Gallicia, but could not proceed in their Voyage before the twelfth Day of July. Before which Time, the English Fleet set forwards out of Plimouth, standing towards the Coast of Spain; but partly by reason of contrary Winds, and partly upon Advice that the Spaniards were return'd, and upon some Doubt also, that they might pass by them towards England, while they were seeking them at a Distance, they return'd back to Plimouth. At which Time, a confident tho' false Report came to the Admiral, that the Spaniards could not possibly proceed in their Design this Year; upon which the English Officers were in Expectations of being disbanded, and many of the Men went a Shoar; when suddenly the famous Armada was discover'd near the Mouth of the British Channel. Upon which the Lord Admiral, finding the Winds contrary, tow'd out the Fleet into the main Sea, with singular Diligence and Industry, and with admirable Alacrity of the Seamen, whom he encourag'd, by performing their meanest Offices with his own Hands. The next Day the English discover'd the mighty Navy, with provid' Turrets like Castles, in Front like a Half-Moon, with Wings extending seven Miles in Length, creeping with slow Pace, tho' with full Sails; as tho' the Winds grew faint with moving them, and the Ocean groan'd under the Vastness of the Burden.^{It enters the British Channel.}

The first Fight. The English Admiral wisely suffer'd them to stalk by him, that he might chace them in the Rear with a full Wind; and on the twenty first of July, sending a Pinnace before call'd the Defiance, denounc'd War by discharging her Ordnance, and without fearing their Numbers immediately fell in and thunder'd with the utmost Fury upon the Spanish Admiral, as he thought, tho' it prov'd to be de Leva's Ship. He was bravely seconded by the gallant Commanders, Drake, Hawkins and Forbisher, who pour'd in such Volleys and Broad-sides upon the hindmost Squadron, commanded by Recalde, that he was soon forc'd to fly to the main Fleet for Succour; finding that the English had a great Advantage, not only in the Wind, but in the Lowness of their Ships, and their extraordinary Celerity in tacking and moving as they had Occasion. The Night following a vast Ship of Biscay, where the King of Spain's Treasure was kept, took Fire by Chance or Treachery, but was timely extinguish'd by other Vessels, and the Treasure remov'd. This fell into the Hands of the English next Day, and a great Galleon with four hundred and fifty Men, having broken her Fore-mast, was taken by Sir Francis Drake, and fifty five thousand Ducats in Gold which he found in her were distributed among his own Men. On the twenty third Day of the Month, there was a second Engagement, with terrible Thunders on both Sides, in which most of the Spanish Shot flew over the English Ships without Damage; only Cock an English Captain dy'd valiantly, who with his little Vessel bravely charg'd into the midst of his Enemies. The next Day they rested on both Sides; in which Time the English Admiral rang'd his whole Fleet into four distinct Squadrons; the first commanded by himself, the second by Drake, the third by Hawkins, and the fourth by Forbisher. Thus on the twenty fifth Day they came to a third Engagement, in which the English by their extraordinary Management and Bravery, had again the Advantage: So that from this Time the Spaniards held on their Course, and dispatch'd a Messenger to the Prince of Parma, requiring him immediately to join with the Armada, and withal to send them Bullets. The Day following, the Lord Admiral knighted Thomas Howard, the Lord Sheffield, Roger Townsend, John Hawkins, and Martin Forbisher, for their brave Services; and holding a Council of War, they resolv'd not to attack the Enemy, till they came to the Strait of Calais, where the Lord Henry Seymour, and Sir William Winter, with a new Squadron waited for their Arrival. And now the English were so far from being terrify'd with this Invincible Navy, that many of the Nobility and Gentry hir'd Ships at their own Charges, and came to the Admiral; as the Earls of Oxford, Northumberland and Cumberland, Thomas and Robert Cecil, Henry Brook, Charles Blunt, Walter Raleigh, William Hatton, Robert Cary, Ambrose Willoughby, Thomas Gerard, Arthur Gorge, and others of considerable Note.

*The Armada
Calais.*

On the twenty seventh of this Month, the grand Armada came to Anchor before Calais, and was follow'd within Cannon-shot by the English Admiral, to whom Seimour and Winter join'd their Ships; so that the English now consisted of a hundred and forty Sail, all nimble and serviceable Vessels, and furnish'd with active and courageous Seamen; yet only fifteen of them did chiefly sustain the Brunt of the Engagement. And now again the Spaniards sent repeated Messengers to the Prince of Parma, to send them forty Fly-Boats, without which they were not able to fight with the English, by Reason of the Bulk and Unweildiness of their Ships; and they urg'd him immediately to put to Sea with his great Army. But he was unprepar'd in many Respects, and his Flat-bottom'd Boats were leaky, and his Men not gather'd together; and besides, the Hollanders lay cruising before the Ports of Dunkirk and Newport, in such a Manner and Condition, that he durst not venture out. And yet, being an expert and industrious Commander, he seem'd to omit nothing that lay in his Power, through the vehement Desire he had to conquer England.

But

But Queen Elizabeth's wife Foresight prevented both his Diligence, and the credulous Hopes of the Spaniards: For by her Command, the Day after the Spaniards had cast Anchor, the Admiral made ready eight of his worst Ships, cover'd with Wild-Fire, Pitch and Rosin, and fill'd with Sulphur, and other combustible Matter, and sent them flaming down the Wind among the Spanish Fleet in the darkest Time of the Night, under the Command of Young and Prowse. This unusual Sight, which represented the Ocean and Skies in one Conflagration, rais'd a prodigious Fear in the Spaniards, as tho' these Ships were fill'd with unheard of Engines of Destruction; and with a dismal Outcry, they cut all their Cables, and put to Sea with the greatest Precipitation and Confusion. One of the largest Ships broke her Rudder, and floating without Command, was the next Day taken by Preston, Gerrard and Harvy, who slew the Commander Moncada, and four hundred Soldiers, deliver'd three hundred Gally-Slaves, and took fifty thousand Ducats in Gold; but the Vessel and Ordnance became Wreck to the Governor of Calais. Drake and Fenner in the mean Time perceiving the Spanish Fleet gradually to gather together before Graveling, attack'd them with great Bravery, and began a fourth Engagement; and being join'd by the Admiral, and several other Commanders, they did vast Damage to the Enemies tall Ships, without receiving any considerable Hurt themselves. The Galleon call'd St. Matthew was severely batter'd by Seymour and Winter, driven towards Ostend, attack'd by the Zelanders, and at last taken by the Flushingers. And now the insulting Armada, wanting several Necessaries, and losing all Hopes of the Prince of Parma's Assistance, resolv'd to return by the North to Spain; in which Passage they lost many Ships and Men; the English Fleet still following their Rear, 'till they were forc'd to desist for want of Powder.

The Armada
dispers'd by Fireships.

The fourth Fight.

The Armada
retires.

While these things pass'd at Sea, the Heroick Queen came to Tilbury, and with a masculine Spirit view'd her Camp and Army; and riding about through the several Ranks, with a Commander's Truncheon in her Hand, it was incredible what Fires were blown up in her Soldiers Breasts by her obliging Behaviour, and her invigorating Speeches. But in a short time there was no further Occasion for her Presence; for the Spaniards having met with the most mortifying Disappointments and Encounters, put their whole Safety in their Flight. And this terrible Armada, which made all Europe tremble, and was four Years in preparing with infinite Expence, was in the Space of one Month many Times attack'd by the undaunted English, and at last overthrown, with great Slaughter and Damage on their Side, and with the Loss of only a hundred Men, and one small Vessel on the English: And after It had been driven round about all Britain by Scotland, the Orcades and Ireland, thrown out all the Mules and Horses, grievously toss'd, and extremely distress'd, impair'd and mangled by Storms and Wrecks, and endur'd all manner of Miseries, at length return'd home with the greatest Shame and Dishonour. Of the hundred and thirty four Ships that set out from Spain, fifty three only return'd; about one half of the Men were lost, and there was not a Family of Note in Spain but suffer'd in this Expedition, having lost a Son, or a Brother, or some near Kinsman. But King Philip himself receiv'd the News with an astonishing Calmness: He was writing a Letter in his Closet, when he receiv'd Intelligence of the Ruin of his Armada, upon which he coolly said, He sent his Fleet to fight against the English, and not against the Winds; and without Change or Emotion, continu'd to finish'd his Letter.

The Losses of the Spaniards.

For the glorious Success and Deliverance this Year, the pious Queen commanded publick Prayers and Thanksgivings to be us'd throughout all the Churches in England, and she her self was carry'd in a triumphant Manner, in an open Chariot, through the Streets of London to St. Paul's Cathedral, being attended by a gallant Train of Noblemen and others, and receiv'd with all the Pomp, Splendor and Exultation, that the whole City could demonstrate.

Reg. 31.
A general Thanksgiving
in England.

Being

Being arriv'd at the West Door of the Cathedral, where all the Enemies Banners were hung up and display'd; she prostrated her self to the Ground, and audibly return'd her Thanks to Heaven; afterwards she heard a Sermon, wherein all the Glory of the Deliverance was given to God alone. On the Lord Admiral she settled a constant Revenue for his happy Services, and frequently commended him and the Captains of her Ships, as Men born for the Preservation of their Country. The rest she courteously saluted by Name as oft as she saw them, which extreamly endear'd her to the People; and those who were indigent or wounded, she reliev'd with noble Pensions. In Memory of this Victory several Coins were struck, with a Fleet flying with full Sails, and the Motto, Venit, vidit, fugit; and others to the Honour of the Queen, with Fire-ships and a Fleet all in Confusion, inscrib'd Dux Fœmina facti. The learned Men, both at home and abroad, congratulating the Victory with transported Hearts, wrote Triumphal Poems in all Languages upon this glorious Subject.

The King of Scotland true to the English Interest.

The publick Joy was augmented by the Arrival of Sir Robert Sidney out of Scotland, who brought Intelligence from thence, that the King had over-pass'd all Injuries, was lovingly affected to the English and the establish'd Religion, and desir'd to imbrace a sincere and perfect Amity with Queen Elizabeth. For as for the King of Spain, he pleasantly told the Ambassador, That he expected no other Favour from him, than what Polyphemus promis'd Uliesses, That after all the rest were devour'd, he should be swallow'd last. So that the mighty Queen was in the Height of all her Glory both at Home and Abroad; belov'd by her Friends, and fear'd by her Enemies, who were never after in a Condition to attack her Kingdom the second Time; but found it difficult to defend their own against her, and her brave Martial Commanders. Thus, with the Death of the Earl of Leicester, formerly mention'd, and some inferior Transactions, ended the famous Year Eighty Eight; a Name doubly to be remember'd by the English Nation to all succeeding Generations.

A. D. XII. The mighty Queen having over-pass'd two threatening Storms, the one from the Queen of the Scots at home, and the other from the Spaniard abroad, began now to think of Reprisals, and to act more offensively against her most formidable Enemies. Towards which Design a new Parliament was call'd, which is not mention'd by Camden and the common Historians. It met upon the fourth Day of February, and continuing no longer than the twenty ninth Day of March, it was then dissolv'd. Here for the publick Safety of her Majesty and her Realms, the House of Commons with the utmost Alacrity aided her with the unusual and extraordinary Gift of four Fifteenths and Tenths, and two entire Subsidies, to which the Clergy added two Subsidies of their own. In the Conclusion, the Parliament desir'd her to proclaim open War against the King of Spain, who had so lately invaded her Dominions, whom they concluded to have been the Root and Fountain of all the Conspiracies practis'd, and of all the Rebellions rais'd against her Majesty, and the Protestant Religion. This appear'd about the same Time; for the Spaniards had another Plot against England, designing to invade it by way of Scotland. In which Affair they employ'd Bruce a Priest, and Chreiton and Hays Jesuits, who easily drew into their Party the Earls of Huntley, Arrol, and Crawford, Zealots for the Romish Religion, and Bothwell, a Man of an unsteady and disloyal Temper. Their chief Design was to seize upon the King's Person, to let in Foreign Troops, to restore Popery, to invade England, and to revenge the Death of the Queen of Scotland: But King James by a speedy March against them, overthrew that Design in Scotland; and Queen Elizabeth by apprehending, trying, and condemning Philip Howard, Earl of Arundel, who espous'd the Spanish Party, tho' she mercifully gave him his Life, put an End to the whole Enterprize.

The Papists Designs in Scotland.

This

heartily sorry that he had so obstinately defended an unjust Cause at the Bar. He thank'd the Queen who had granted him a private Execution, lest his Mind, at present compos'd, might be disturb'd by the Peoples Behaviour; for he had learn'd how vain a Thing was popular Breath, and how he deserv'd to be cut off from the Commonwealth, for the Contagion of his Enterprize, which like a foul Disease had spread and infected many. In the mean Time the Queen's Mind was violently agitated with various Apprehensions; and her former Affection reviv'd, which with the Remembrance of past Services, produc'd such tender Emotions of Pity and Clemency, that she sent her Commands by Sir Edward Cary, that he should not be executed: On the other Side his perverse Obstinacy, who scorn'd to ask her Pardon, and had openly declar'd, That his Life would be the Queen's Destruction, did so push her on to Justice and Severity, that soon after she sent a fresh Command by Darcy, that he should be executed. Accordingly he was brought to a Scaffold erected in the Tower, near which sat some few Lords, some of the Aldermen of London, and several Knights, among whom was Raleigh, purposely, as he said, to answer to any Accusation the Earl might make against him; but as others thought, to feed his Eyes with the Sufferings of his Enemy; therefore he was advis'd out of Decency to withdraw into the Armory, where he beheld the whole Tragedy. The Earl having ascended the Scaffold with the above-nam'd Divines, uncover'd his Head, and lifting up his Eyes to Heaven, confess'd his Sins, and begg'd Mercy for them, especially this last, which he call'd, A bloody, crying and outrageous Sin. He pray'd the Queen and her Ministers to forgive him, And that God would give her a long and happy Reign, protesting, That he never design'd to lay violent Hands on her Person. Then he pray'd God to strengthen his Mind against the Terrors of Death, and intreated the Spectators to join with him in a short Prayer, which he deliver'd with great Devotion. Then he rehears'd the Apostle's Creed; and laying himself down, plac'd his Neck upon the Block; and having repeated the first Verses of the fifty first Psalm, and commended his Spirit into the Hands of God, his Head was struck off at the third Blow; but the first took away both Sense and Motion. Thus fatally dy'd Robert D'Evereux, Earl of Essex, in the thirty fourth Year and Prime of his Age; a Person endow'd with all those Accomplishments that serve to finish a Nobleman, and a gallant Warrior, whose Genealogy was ancient and illustrious. He had been a great Favourite, and loaden with Preferments; had a towering Spirit, and an obliging Affability; but he was not born for a Courtier, for he could neither flatter nor dissemble, but always carry'd his Love and Hatred in his Countenance. His great Thirst after Popularity, and his continual Ingrossing of Fame procur'd him many Enemies, and made his Mind boil into undecent Passions, more advantageous to his Enemies Designs than his own. For they lighted their Candle at his Fire; and this Heat being blown into a Flame by some fiery Spirits about him, stain'd his good Nature with Thoughts of Revenge, which his Enemies turn'd upon the Queen her self; so that the same Coal with which he design'd to consume his Enemies Houses, kindled his own Funeral Pile. Thus Pride and Ambition do often usurp the Names of Greatness and Gallantry, till they prove the Downfall and Ruin of the bravest Men upon Earth.

The Queen disturb'd in her Mind.

Essex brought to the Scaffold.

His Execution and Character.

Not many Days after Sir Christopher Blunt, Sir Charles Danvers, Sir John Davis, Sir Gilly Merick, and Cusse, being accus'd of the same Crimes with the Earl, were brought to their Trials, and being convicted by the Jury, receiv'd the Sentence of Death, and were all executed at Tyburn; except the two first, who being nobly descended, were beheaded upon Tower-Hill. To this Cause also there belongs a peculiar Censure, given at this Time in the Star-Chamber: The Earl of Essex complain'd at his Trial, that his Letters were counterfeited, and upon a diligent Enquiry into the Matter, a bold Imposture was discover'd. The Countess of Essex, being apprehensive, that in those troublesome Times some Mischiefs might befall her Husband and her self, put some Letters which she had receiv'd from him into a Cabinet, and intrusted it in the Hands of a Dutch Woman call'd Rihove, who hiding them in her House, they were accidentally discover'd by her Husband John Daniel; who reading them over, and observing some Passages in them that might incense the Queen and endanger the Earl, caus'd them to be transcrib'd by a Person expert at Counterfeiting of Hands. And when the timorous Countess was ready to be deliver'd of a Child, he told her that unless she would give him three thousand Pounds, he would put them into the Hands of her Husband's Enemies. The good Lady, to prevent that threatening Danger, immediately gave him eleven hundred and seventy Pounds; and still for that great Sum the Impostor only gave her the Counterfeit Copies, and kept the Originals, to get another Sum for them from the Earl's Enemies. For which he was condemn'd to perpetual Imprisonment, fin'd in three thousand Pounds, two of which was to be paid to the Countess, and to stand with his Ears nail'd to the Pillory, with this Inscription on his Breast, A wicked Forger and Impostor.

The tenth Parliament in this Reign.

Not long after the vigilant Queen summon'd her last Parliament, which met at Westminster upon the twenty seventh Day of October; in which grievous Complaints were made by the House of Commons concerning the Mischiefs of Monopolies. The Queen, by way of Prevention, sent out Proclamations, declaring the said Licences and Patents to be void in part, leaving some Part to the Determination of the Laws; which was so acceptable to the Commons, that they immediately sent eighty select Persons, together with their Speaker, to return their hearty Thanks to her Majesty. She on the other Side in a tender Speech gave them Thanks, For being such faithful Ministers to her, and recalling her from an Error proceeding from her Ignorance, not Will. After that she declar'd to them, That she had rather her Heart or Hand should perish, than that either one or the other should allow such Privileges to Monopolists as might be prejudicial to her dear People. That the Splendor of Regal Majesty had not so blinded her Eyes, that licentious Power should prevail more than Justice. That she was none of those Princes that would be deceiv'd by the Glory of the Name; for she knew the Commonwealth was to be govern'd for the Good of those committed to her, not of her self to whom it was intrusted; and that an Account was one Day to be given before a superior Judge. She thought her self most happy, that she had by God's Assistance so prosperously govern'd the Commonwealth; and that she had such loving Subjects, as for their Good she would willingly leave both her Kingdom and Life. This Speech, and her endearing Behaviour, so pleas'd and charm'd the Commons, that they now gave her greater Aids than ever she had receiv'd, namely four intire Subsidies, and eighteen Fifteenths and Tenths: After which this Parliament, after a six Weeks Session, was dissolv'd upon the nineteenth Day of December.

The Queen's Generosity.

Reg. 44.

The famous Siege of Ostend.

During these Transactions at home, the Arch-Duke Albert besieg'd Ostend in the Netherlands, and the Confederate States being oblig'd for their own Preservation to defend it, they made Sir Francis Vere Governor of it, under the Title of General of all the Forces within and without Ostend. This Place, within the Memory of that Generation, was but a few Cottages for poor Fishermen on a naked Shore; but at the Beginning of the Netherland Wars, was fortify'd by the States, first with a Palisado; afterwards upon the Sea working in, and making a very convenient Harbour, they added a Trench to it, and plac'd an English Garrison in it. These Men first under John Conway, and afterwards under Sir John Norris, so disturb'd and over-run Flanders, that the Prince of Parma began to lay Siege to it, but in vain. Le Motte attempted it by Treachery, but was repell'd with great Loss; and the Arch-Duke Albert surrounded it with seventeen Sconces. But when the Garrisons with these Sconces prov'd as burdensome and vexatious to Flanders as the Enemies, and

and the Haven being thought convenient both to harbour the Spanish Gallies, and disturb the Navigation of the English and Hollanders, the Spaniards resolv'd to take it at any Expence, and the States on the other hand were as resolute to preserve it. Never in that Age was a Siege more obstinately maintain'd, or more gallantly defended; nor a greater Slaughter of Men, or a Piece of Service that lasted a longer Space. At the End of five Months, Sir Francis Vere finding his Forces diminish'd by frequent Sallies, the Enemies Shot and the Pestilence, a Part of the old Town swallow'd by the Sea, their Provision almost spent, and by reason of contrary Winds no Hopes of Supplies, which he had often in vain demanded; and understanding that the Enemy were ready to make a general Assault upon the Town, he desir'd a Parly with the Arch-Duke concerning a Surrender of the Place; and after Hostages were given on both Sides, Commissioners were sent to treat about it. But General Vere only protracted Time, and fed them with Hopes of a Surrender, 'till fresh Supplies of Men arriv'd; and then sent back the Commissioners, excusing himself by that Military Axiom, That to over-reach an Enemy is both pleasant and advantageous, and therefore desir'd their Pardon, if in case of the like Necessity he should make use of the same Stratagem. The Arch-Duke in Revenge made a furious Assault the next Day, but was beaten back with Loss; and General Vere, when he had repair'd the shaken and batter'd Places, was recall'd by the States, who thought fit every five Months to send a new Governor with fresh Supplies of Men: Which successive Governors, with great Management and Resolution, defended the Town above three Years and three Months, against all the furious Attacks of the Sea and the Enemy. And it would have been thought happy by vast Numbers, if the Sea had been let in and had swallow'd it up; for the best and bravest Soldiers of the Netherlands, Spain, England, France, Scotland, and Italy, while they contended for a barren Plat of Sand, found here one common Sepulchre, tho' with that an eternal Monument of their Valour.

As to the Affairs of Ireland, the Inhabitants there had been in long Expectations of Assistance from Spain, which now to their great Joy arriv'd in Safety at Kingsale; and having peaceably enter'd the Town and refresh'd themselves, Don John d'Aquila, who commanded them, with the Title of General of the Catholick King in God's War, for maintaining the Faith in Ireland, publish'd several Papers, to persuade the People, 'That Queen Elizabeth was by several Sentences of the Pope depriv'd of her Crown, that her Subjects were absolv'd from their Oath of Allegiance, and that now the Spaniards were come to deliver Ireland from the Jaws of Hell; and by that specious Pretence he induc'd great Numbers of lewd and dissolute Persons to join with him. The Lord-Deputy having drawn together what Forces he could, invested Kingsale, forc'd the Castle of Kincurran to surrender; and with the Assistance of Vice-Admiral Levison, straiten'd the Town with a closer Siege, which was soon after a little relax'd, in regard Levison with his Fleet was oblig'd to sail from thence against two thousand Spaniards, landed at Bear-Haven, Castle-Haven and Baltimore, five of whose Ships he happily sunk. About the same Time, Tyrone, O-Donel, O-Rock, and the principal Rebels drew near, and joining the new-landed Spaniards, compos'd an Army of six thousand Foot and five hundred Horse; and were swell'd with such an Assurance of Victory, as being fresh Men, more numerous, and well provided with Necessaries, while the English were extreemly fatigu'd with a Winter's Siege, and both Men and Horses destitute of Provisions and Conveniences. However when both Armies came to ingage, they soon found their Error; for the Spaniards were miserably slaughter'd, and the Irish threw down their Arms, and betook themselves to Flight. Don Alphonso O Campo was taken Prisoner, with three Spanish Leaders and six Ensigns; twelve hundred Men were slain, and nine Colours taken; and of the English few were kill'd, though many were wounded. Upon this this the two Rebel Earls, Tyrone and O-Donel, made their Escape; the former to his Northern Shelters, and the latter into Spain. The next Day the Lord-Deputy commanded Bodley to survey the Works about Kingsale, to finish the Mount, and draw the Trenches nearer the Town; which caus'd D'Aquila to send a Trumpeter and desire a Parly, and that General signify'd to Sir William Godolphin, ' That he had found the Lord-Deputy a sharp but honourable Enemy, and the Irish weak, rude and perfidious; that the Catholick King had sent him to assist two Earls, whom he now question'd whether they were in the World, since one Blast of War had blown one into Spain, and the other into the North; wherefore he was willing to treat of a Peace, which might be advantageous to the English, and not prejudicial to the Spaniards; tho' he wanted nothing for a Siege, and daily expected Succours to enable him to perform his Master's Commands. At length it was concluded that the Spaniards should surrender Kingsale, with the Castles and Forts at Bear-Haven, Castle-Haven and Baltimore, and depart honourably with their Goods and Liberties, without being molested by any English Ship in their Voyage to Spain; all which was soon after perform'd. Great and many were the Advantages of the Victory and Treaty; for Ireland that was staggering, and ready to revolt, was hereby kept in Obedience, the Spaniards driven out of the Country, the Rebels dispers'd, the Queen's Authority restor'd, the Hearts of honest Men reviv'd, and a solid and perfect Peace establish'd in the Kingdom of Ireland.

They and the Irish are beaten.

The last Expeditions against the Spaniards.

The Spaniards being thus happily expell'd out of Ireland, the wise Queen, to prevent their Return into that Kingdom, sent out Sir Richard Levison and Sir William Monson, with eight of her own Men of War, and some inferior Ships, to make new Attempts upon the Coasts of Spain. On the nineteenth Day of March Levison set Sail, and Monson afterwards, having in vain tarry'd behind for some Dutch Ships to join with them. Levison in the mean Time fell in with the Spanish Fleet of thirty eight Sail, which brought the Treasure from America, and ingag'd them, but to no great Effect. When Monson was come up with the rest of the Fleet, they receiv'd certain Intelligence that a mighty Indian Carack of sixteen hundred Tun, and richly laden, was upon the Coast of Portugal, where they found it: But it lay close under a Fort, attended with eleven Gallies, and the Carack it self appear'd like a strong Castle; yet they resolv'd to fire it, if they could not take it. The next Day they thunder'd so furiously against the Gallies, that within seven Hours the Marques of St. Crosse, together with the Gallies he commanded, retir'd, and two of them were taken and fir'd, in which were great Quantities of Powder design'd for the Netherlands. Upon which Levison signify'd to the Captain of the Carack, that the Gallies in which they contided were repuls'd and remov'd, therefore if they now refus'd Mercy, they were to expect none hereafter. After much Debate on both Sides, it was at last agreed, That the Carack, with all the Goods and Ordnance, should be yielded up to Levison. Thus the English having a fair Wind, return'd home with a Booty amounting to a Million of Ducats, by the Portuguese Account, and not above five of their Men lost in the Expedition.

A Contest between the Jesuits and the Secular Priests.

About this Time a famous Contest arose between the Jesuits and the Secular Priests in England: For Blackwell, who was wholly at the Command of Garnet, General of the Jesuits in England, usurp'd an Authority over the Secular Priests, depriv'd them of their Faculties, and procur'd a Breve from the Pope, declaring them Schismatics and Hereticks, from which they clear'd themselves by a Censure of the University of Paris. In publishing of several Books, the Secular Priests highly extoll'd the Queen, and made it appear, ' That in the first eleven Years of her Reign, there was not one Papist had his Life call'd in question for his Religion; and that in ten Years after the Publication of the Bull of Pope Pius Quintus, and the Rebellion of the Papists, not above twelve Priests were put to Death for Treason, 'till in the Year 1580, when

‘the Jesuits first crept into England. Then they largely shew’d, That the ‘wicked Designs of the Jesuits confounded all, and enforc’d the making of se‘vere Laws against Catholicks. That ever since English Seminaries had been ‘erected by the Procurement of Parsons a Jesuit, fifty had been yearly sent ‘to disturb the Peace of the Kingdom of England: That Parsons excited
 ‘the Spaniards to invade England and Ireland, and set up the Title of ‘the Infanta of Spain to the Crown of England: That Holt a Jesuit ‘persuaded Hesket to raise a Rebellion, and hir’d Cullen, Tork and Williams
 ‘to kill the Queen; and that Walpole a Jesuit persuaded Squire to poison her.
 ‘Infomuch that the Queen, whose Judgment was, That Conscience ought ‘never to be forc’d, was necessitated to use Severity, or betray her own and ‘her Kingdom’s Safety. They reproach’d Parsons with being a Bastard, the ‘Dregs of the People, and a turbulent seditious Equivocator: They condemn’d ‘the defamatory Libels which the Jesuits had writ against the Queen, and the ‘Authors as Traitors to God and her Majesty; and desir’d the English Catho‘licks not to send their Children to be educated in the Jesuits Colleges, where ‘they imbib’d the Poison of Treason and Rebellion with their first Rudiments.
 These Contests were politickly promoted by the Bishop of London, as advantageous to the Church of England; but the Privy-Council were of Opinion, that notwithstanding this pretended Animosity, they were both agreed to pervert her Majesty’s Subjects, and therefore were both banish’d by Proclamation: Which prov’d very seasonable; for while these Disputes were depending, Thomas Winter and Tesmund a Jesuit were sent over into Spain, where they carry’d on a dangerous Conspiracy for cutting off Queen Elizabeth, and excluding the King of Scotland from his Succession to the Crown of England.

Both Parties are banish’d.

In France, the Marshal Biron, for entering into dangerous Attempts against the publick Peace of that Nation, was arraign’d and beheaded. His Confession brought some others into Danger; and amongst them the Duke of Buillon, of the Protestant Religion, so that when he was cited, he durst not appear, but fled into Germany. Upon this Accident the King of France sent a Message to Queen Elizabeth, complaining, ‘That the Duke had declar’d his Marriage ‘unlawful, and the Pope’s Dispensation of no Validity, pronouncing his Sons ‘Illegitimate; had destin’d the Prince of Conde to the Succession of the Crown, ‘and conspir’d the Destruction of the chief of the Nobility. The Queen was much concern’d for this Protestant Duke, and by her Leiger Ambassador ad-vis’d the King, not too credulously to entertain those Reports, as doubting these Suggestions might proceed from some of the Spanish Faction. Upon which the King became very angry, and said, That the Queen had a better Opinion of the Duke than he deserv’d, and that he was one of the chief Founders of the Earl of Essex’s Treason, for that being question’d by him about it, was not able to deny it. About the same Time also, the Duke of Savoy by Stratagems and open Force proceeded against the State of Geneva; upon which the generous Queen reliev’d them with large Sums of Mony, gather’d amongst the Clergy and Laity all over England.

Foreign Affairs.

As most Places began to be at rest before the Death of the mighty Queen, so Ireland this Year was brought to a perfect Peace by the final Submission of the Arch-Rebel Tyrone; who being haunted with an evil Conscience, and suspicious of his own Party, wrote submissive Letters to the Queen and the Lord-Deputy, and gave such Marks of true Repentance, that the Queen order’d the Lord-Deputy to receive him into Mercy, provided he would beg it upon his Knees with that Humility he promis’d in his Letters. Upon notice of this welcome News Tyrone repair’d to the Court at Dublin, and being admitted into the Presence-Chamber, where the Lord-Deputy sat in his Chair of State, with great Numbers about him, he fell on his Knees at the very Entrance, and then advancing nearer with a dejected Countenance, said, I ac-

Queen and Sovereign, to whose Royal Clemency, as to a sacred Anchor I fly, offering up my Life and Estate to her Disposal; and as I have felt her former Bounty and present Power, so now I humbly beg that I may taste of her Mercy, and be made an eternal Example of her Princely Clemency. My Age is not so far spent, my Body so feeble, nor my Mind so broken, but that by my valiant and faithful Service, I may yet expiate the Sin of my Rebellion. Thus ended the famous Tyrone's Rebellion by the auspicious Fortune of the Queen, and the good Conduct of the Lord-Deputy Montjoy, about eight Years after it first began: Which was continu'd so long, by the too great Slight and Covetousness of the English, who were unwilling to grant proportionable Supplies; and was protracted by unseasonable Emulations, dissembled Truces, difficult Accesses in the Country, and by the Temper of the Irish, who trusted more to the Celerity of their Feet, then the Strength of their Hands.

And now all Things being in Peace at home, and in a good Prospect with Spain abroad, after the mighty Queen had acted the noblest Parts in the Theatre of the World, she who had hitherto enjoy'd a continu'd State of Health, now became sensible of the Infirmities of old Age, by a general Weakness and Indisposition that had lately seiz'd upon her. Therefore she remov'd from Westminster to her Palace at Richmond, which she call'd her Warm Box where she could best trust her distemper'd old Body, and where she could more freely attend the Service of God, and the Salvation of her Soul. And here commanding her Inauguration Ring to be fil'd off her Finger, as being grown into the Flesh and painful, it was by all thought an unfortunate Omen, and that the Marriage between her and her dear People was near a Dissolution. Her Sickness began with a Swelling in her Throat, but that soon abated; and then by Degrees her Appetite fail'd, and she had no Relish for any thing she tasted. She much despis'd the Counsels of Physicians, declaring, She was satiated with this present Life, and desir'd to be translated to a State of Immortality, and to escape out of this dark and disorder'd State of human Affairs: That Death, so abhorr'd by many, was only the Payment of a Debt to Nature; and that our Spirits were of Right to be restor'd to God from whom they came. Thus her Body by slow Degrees consum'd away, and she became very lean, weak and faint; and her Mind seem'd more afflicted than her Body, being Night and Day disturb'd with an uneasy Remembrance of the late executed Earl of Essex, as likewise with her too great Compliance with Tyrone, whom she had in some measure rewarded for his Treasons and Perjuries. Her Sorrows were daily increas'd, and render'd more insupportable by the melancholy Humour which then abounded in her Blood, and from a just Indignation to find her self neglected by some who were too ready to worship a rising Sun; yet still she bore her last Sickness with a wonderful Constancy and noble Patience of Mind. And now the Lord-Admiral informing the rest of the Privy-Council, what the Queen had sometime said to him concerning the Succession, they all thought fit that he, with the Lord-Keeper and Secretary of State, should wait upon her Majesty, and in the Name of all of them understand her Pleasure concerning her Successor. The Queen made Answer with a weak Voice, but sound Mind, I said that my Throne was the Throne of Kings, and that I would have no mean Person succeed me. The Secretary asking her the plain Meaning of these Words, she said, I will that a King succeed me; and who should that be, but my nearest Kinsman the King of Scotland? When she had said this, and recommended her Name and Memory to her Nobility, she cast off all Thoughts of this Life, and wholly betook her self to Acts of Piety and Devotion; keeping the Arch-Bishop of Canterbury near her, with whom she often pray'd with great Zeal and Fervency. When that pious Prelate advis'd her to place all her Trust in the Merits of Christ, she answer'd with a gasping Breath, That she was weary of this miserable Life, subject to

so many Calamities and Dangers ; that from her Soul she begg'd to pass to that eternal Light which flow'd with most perfect Felicity ; and was hastning to her Heavenly Kingdom, to the Presence, and into the holy Arms of her good Saviour. Then turning a little, and laying her Head upon her right Arm, she compos'd her self for her Dissolution, with a quiet Mind and calm Countenance ; and when the Arch-Bishop desir'd her to keep her Thoughts upon God, she just answer'd, I do, nor does my Mind wander from him. The last Moments of her Life were of the same Nature ; for it appear'd by the Motions of her Hands and Eyes, that they were spent in the most sublime Devotions and Mental Prayer. Thus gradually expiring, on the twenty fourth of March, near Mid-Night, she peaceably resign'd her pious Soul to God, after a long and incomparable Reign of forty four Years, four Months, and six Days, in the seventieth Year of her Age, to which Age no King of England but one ever arriv'd. Her Death.

Thus dy'd the renown'd Virgin Queen, cover'd with all the Glories of this World, and nobly qualify'd for those of the next ; having had all the Virtues and Accomplishments of her mighty Father, and scarce any of his Vices and Imperfections ; only she was in some Cases a little too parsimonious, and a little too liable to Passion and the Love of Flattery. The News of her Death immediately fill'd the Court, the City and the whole Nation with such Floods of Tears, and produc'd such Marks of inexpressible Sorrow, as were never known before ; and in Reality no Princes since the Creation had ever more sincerely the Hearts of their Subjects, than this illustrious Queen. We have before given the Character of her Person, and mention'd her Qualifications ; all which are still more compleatly learnt from the History of her Reign ; which if the Goodness and Excellency of it may be measur'd by the great Happiness of the People, may justly be esteem'd the most glorious yet extant in our Annals. The Wisdom, the Grandeur, and the Fame of it, have been largely celebrated and display'd by the noblest Pens both at home and abroad. At Rome, where she was both hated and excommunicated, Pope Sixtus Quintus us'd to speak with the greatest Honour of her Government ; and profanely wish'd he might enjoy her but one Night, that he might beget a second Alexander the Great. Her Court was as compleat an Academy of honourable Counsellors, illustrious Peers, gallant Courtiers, learned Professors, and profound Politicians, as ever attended any Christian Prince : And as her great Statesmen reflected new Lustre upon her own Wisdom and Understanding, in making so worthy a Choice ; so she never was so happy in her Choice, as when she govern'd by her own Judgment without the Advice of others. Having surmounted the chiefest Difficulties in Church and State, one of her great Observations was That the People of England were more governable in Times of War, than in Times of Peace. Tho' she never thirsted after any unjust Inlargement of her Dominions, yet the great Affairs of Europe principally depended upon her Directions ; while sitting at the Helm of all, she arbitrated and guided their Estates both in Peace and War. Spain endeavouring to overflow all, was driven back, and scarce able to maintain its own Banks. In France, the House of Valois was happily supported by her Counsels, that of Bourbon advanc'd by her Countenance, Forces and Treasure ; Scotland reliev'd by her Love, the Netherlands by her Power, Portugal's King by her Bounty, and Poland by her Commiseration : Likewise Germany, Denmark and Swedeland, often took up and laid down Arms at her Pleasure and Disposal. Nor could the utmost Bounds of Europe, Russia and Tartary, limit the Extent of her great Fame ; but it spread further into the more remote Parts of Asia, Africa and America, among the Turks, the Persians, Barbarians and Indians. In most of whose Dominions, to the great enriching of her Kingdom, she settled Commerce, and gain'd large Privileges for the Encouragement of her Merchants, whom she cherish'd as a most necessary and important Part of her Common-wealth. Her Character and Reign.

The Blemishes in the Government.

Notwithstanding all the various Excellencies of this Reign, and the admirable Virtues and Qualifications of the Queen her self, we ought not to dismiss her Character, without taking Notice of the real Spots and Blemishes of the Government; both as to Church and State. The Establishment of the Reformation has been justly accounted one of the greatest Glories of this Reign, and what procur'd the Blessings of Heaven upon it for so many Years: Yet in the same Parliament, the Queen consented to several unjustifiable Incroachments upon the Lands and Revenues of the Church, for which it suffers to this Day, tho' some have been lately gloriously restor'd; not to mention several other bold Attempts in this Reign. The other Blemish is the mysterious Proceedings in the Scotch Affairs, and strange Treatment of the Queen of Scotland; but this is candidly interpreted to be more her great Misfortune, than her real Fault; as the other is thought by some to have been occasion'd more by her Ignorance in that very Case, and from the Necessities of that infirm Juncture of Affairs; tho' some Alienations of the Church Revenues cannot be excus'd. Besides these, several Scandals have been charg'd upon her by some implacable and malignant Pens; which, being as much beneath the Dignity of History, as they are short of Probability, are better omitted, than recited. But if we set aside the forementioned Particulars, and consider the whole Reign in general, we find it the most surprising and amazing Thing in the World, that all that is great and glorious should be manag'd, and the chief Affairs of Europe should move and be directed by a Woman's Nod. This for a whole hundred Years has been a continu'd Subject of Admiration, 'till the new Wonders of our present Age began to eclipse all the Glories of former Times; and, to our unexpressible Joy, have nobly convinc'd us, That as the greatest Magnanimity is agreeable to the sweetest Dispositions, so no Attempt can be too Extensive, nor no Enterprize too Great for the Female Sex. †

I. Hitherto we have treated of the Monarchy of England it self, and with the different Accessions of Ireland and Wales; but now we are arriv'd at a new State of Affairs, and a more remarkable Addition to the English Empire, namely, the ancient Kingdom of Scotland, which was happily join'd in the Person, and under the Subjection of James Stuart the present King of Scotland. And considering the vast Effusion of Blood, and immense Sums of Mony, that for several Ages had been wasted and expended between the two contending Nations, nothing could be judg'd more fortunate and propitious, than this long desir'd Conjunction, and nothing could sooner alleviate and extinguish the Remembrance of the wonderful Felicities of the last Reign. So that all People began soon to dry up their Tears, and to cast their Eyes towards the bright Northern Star, which was now to guide and influence the whole Island. Therefore immediately upon the Death of Queen Elizabeth, the Lords of the Council gave full Satisfaction to the People in proclaiming James the Sixth, King of Scotland, by the Name of James the First, King of England, France and Ireland, Defender of the Faith, &c. to the great Joy of all true Englishmen, as well for his unquestionable Claim, as his Profession of the establish'd Religion, as also for his singular Learning and Experience, with which he was qualify'd for the Management of so great an Empire; having now attain'd to the Age of thirty six Years and nine Months, and exercis'd in the Practice of Regal Government from the first

Years

Years of his Infancy. His Title was good beyond all Dispute, being descended from the united Families of Lancaster and York, King Henry the Seventh, and Queen Elizabeth his Wife; whose Issue by the Male failing in the last deceas'd Queen Elizabeth, the Issue of Margaret their eldest Daughter was the next Heir, which Lady marry'd to James the Fourth, King of Scotland, and by him had James the Fifth, whose only Daughter Queen Mary was Mother to this present Monarch.

Notice given to him in Scotland.

The first News of Queen Elizabeth's Death was brought to him by Sir Robert Cary, a younger Son of the late Lord Hunsdon, who coming without Order, and the greatest Expedition, was afterwards rewarded with a Barony of the Realm. But tho' this was sufficient for the King's Information, yet it was not sufficient for the Lords of the Council, in Discharge of their Duty; therefore as soon as they could provide proper Persons, they sent Sir Charles Piercy, and Mr. Thomas Somerset, and after them Sir Thomas Lake Clerk of the Signet, a Man well acquainted with the State of the Kingdom, both to inform him of the general Applause and Satisfaction of the Nation, and of the present State and Condition of the Realm, that he might not be altogether a Stranger at his Arrival. Queen Elizabeth indeed had left him a great and flourishing Kingdom, without Incumbrance, rich and free; no Wars abroad, no Sedition at home; a Kingdom furnish'd with all the Fruits of Peace, Plenty of all Things necessary, and the chief of all Necessaries, a wise Council: For she left Sir Thomas Egerton Lord-Chancellor, Thomas Lord Buckhurst Lord-Treasurer, Charles Earl of Nottingham Lord-Admiral, and Sir Robert Cecil principal Secretary of State; four such Men, as the meanest of them were fit to sit at the Helm of any Kingdom in Europe. All these the new King by his Letters kept in their Stations, and afterwards added some others of his own chusing; as the Earls of Northumberland and Cumberland, the Lord Thomas Howard and the Lord Henry Howard, the one the Brother and the other the Son of the late Duke of Norfolk, who had suffer'd so much for the Queen his Mother. But tho' the advancing of these two last, was probably done out of Favour to that Family; yet, one of them being a known, and the other a reputed Papist, it was immediately apprehended as a Favour to the whole Party; and the Catholicks were not a little confident of his good Inclinations to them in general. And in reality it was convenient they should at this Time have such kind of Imaginations; for more than once in the late Reign Briefes had been transmitted from Rome to the Catholicks in England, to admit of none to succeed in the Kingdom, When that miserable Woman should die, but such a Person, of whose good Inclinations to the See of Rome, they should at least be well persuaded. Whatever this Prince's Inclinations and Actions were then and afterwards, this is certain that no King of England ever came to the Throne with greater Love and Reputation than himself.

His Progress.

King James having settled the Government of his Kingdom of Scotland, and made Preparations to take Possession of a greater Kingdom, on the fifth of April, with a noble Attendance of Lords and others, he set forwards from Edinburgh, and on the seventh arriv'd at Berwick, and the ninth at New-Castle, where he staid three Days, and heard the Bishop of Durham preach on Sunday; and the Inhabitants were so transported with his Arrival and Presence, that during his Stay they bore all the Charge of his Household. On the thirteenth of April he set forwards to Durham, from thence the fourteenth to Waltworth, and the fifteenth towards the City of York, where his Train increas'd to such a Multitude, that he was necessitated to publish an Inhibition to prevent too great a Concourse. As he was in all Places receiv'd with Royal Entertainment and rich Presents, so he carry'd himself with great Affability, and with much Freedom distributed his Favours, in most Places discharging all Prisoners that were not confin'd for Treason or Murther; and so great was the Obsequiousness and Applauses of all Men, that a rough Scotchman openly said, This People

People would spoil a good King. After three Days stay at York, where the Earl of Cumberland was declar'd the King's Sword-bearer in that Place, his Majesty went to Sir Edward Stanhope's House at Grimston, from thence to Pontfract, and so to Doncaster, and on the twenty first Day arriv'd at Newark upon Trent; where a Cut-purse being taken in the Fact, was by the King's Warrant alone hang'd, without any formal Trial, which afterwards gave some Occasion for Reflection. On the twenty second, hunting all the Way, he arriv'd at Beaveir Castle, and the twenty third at Burleigh House near Stamford, where he tarry'd two or three Days with great Satisfaction. On the twenty seventh he remov'd to Hinchinbrook by Huntington, a House of Sir Oliver Cromwell's, where he was solemnly met by the Heads of the University of Cambridge; and as he pass'd through Godmanchester, the Bailiffs of the Town presented him with seventy Team of Horse all trac'd to fair new Ploughs, declaring to his Majesty, That it was the ancient Custom so to do when any King of England pass'd through their Town, and by which they held their Lands, as Tenants to the King. At Royston he first lodg'd at his own Charge; and from thence went to Sir Thomas Sadler's House at Standon, where he staid on Sunday, and heard the Bishop of London preach. On the second of May he remov'd to Brosbourn, a House of Sir Henry Cook's, Coferer to the late Queen, and now to the King, where he was met by the Lord-Keeper, the Lord-Treasurer, the Lord-Admiral, and divers other Lords of the Kingdom. The next Day he arriv'd at Theobalds, a House belonging to Sir Robert Cecil, who had accompany'd him from York; where all the Lords of the Privy-Council presented themselves, and there the Lord-Keeper made a solemn Oration. On Saturday the seventh of May he rod towards London, being met on the Road by the Lord Mayor, Aldermen and Sheriffs, who by their Orator Sir Richard Martin, made him an eloquent Speech; and thus the King arriv'd with a glorious Train at the Charter-House, near Smith-field, a Place belonging to the Lord Thomas Howard, where he staid four Days. In his whole Journey, which lasted above a Month, he made many Distributions of Honour: At Theobalds he made several Noblemen of Scotland of his Privy Council, as the Duke of Lenox, the Earl of Marre, the Lord Hume, Sir George Hume, Sir James Elphinston, the Lord of Kingloss, and immediately after the Lords Zouch and Burgley. After that he made Sir George Hume Earl of Dunbarre, Sir Thomas Ereskin Earl of Kelley, Sir John Ramsay Earl of Holmerness, Sir James Hay Earl of Carlisle, and Sir Richard Preston Earl of Kildare. As to Knights, he made great Numbers of both Nations, particularly twenty eight at Theobalds, about eighty at the Charter-House, and a hundred not many Days after, and still far greater Numbers before the Year was out, so that many admir'd what Occasion the King could have for so many Milites in the Time of Peace: Yet it was thought fit to give a free Courte to the Pallage of Honour, which during Queen Elizabeth's Reign had been so stopp'd, that few Counties of England had knights enough to make a Jury. On the seventeenth of May he made fourteen new Serjeants at Law, and on the twentieth, four new English Lords, namely, Sir Robert Cecil Baron of Esmond, Sir Robert Sidney Baron of Penhurst, Sir William Knolls Baron of Greys, and Sir Edward Wotton Baron of Morley; and shortly after, the Lord Henry Howard Earl of Northampton, and Thomas Sackville, Lord Buckhurst, Earl of Dorset.

Tho' King James was now safely arriv'd at London, yet he accounted himself but half settled, till his Queen and Children were also with him; therefore there were now appointed many Lords and Ladies to conduct them into England: Of Lords, the Earl of Suffex, the Earl of Lincoln, the Lord Compton, the Lord Norris, and Sir George Carew, Lord President of Munster: Of Ladies, the Countess of Worcester, the Countess of Kildare, the Lady Anne Herbert Daughter to the Earl of Pembroke, the Lord Scroop's Lady, the Lady Rich, Wife to the Lord Rich, and the Lady Walsingham, one of the late Queen's Bed-Chamber. But tho' these were only appointed by Name, yet many other Lords and great Ladies went voluntarily to attend their new Queen; as the Countess of Bedford, the Lady Hastings, the Lady Cecil, the Lady Hatton, the Lady Harington, and several others: And with this glorious Attendance the Queen, with two of her Children, Prince Henry nine Years of Age, and the Lady Elizabeth, arriv'd at York on the eleventh of June. Where resting themselves a few Days, on the twenty seventh of the same Month they came to Eaton in Northamptonshire, a House belonging to Sir George Fermor, where the King himself met them at Dinner; and afterwards they rode together to a House of Sir John Fortescue, and so to the City of London. The King's younger Son, Charles Duke of Albany, did not come at this Time, as being not three Years of Age, and therefore thought not able to endure such a Journey; but the following Year, falling sick of a Fever, Doctor Atkins, one of the King's Physicians, was sent to take Care of him, who in six Weeks cur'd him of his Distemper; and in October brought him safe to Windsor, where the King then resided; for which Service he met with great Rewards, and no less advantageous Practice.

Ambassadors from Foreign Princes.

The King had by this Time found the Love and Affection of his own People, but the Inclinations of the neighbouring Princes towards him was at present in Suspence; 'till about the Beginning of June, there came first an Ambassador from the Prince Palatine of the Rhine; shortly after another from the States of Holland and Zealand; then another from the Arch-Duke of Austria; another from the King of Spain; a Fifth from the State of Venice; another from the Duke of Tuscany, and lastly Monsieur de Rosny from the King of France; all congratulating his happy Accession to the Throne of England. For the more solemn Reception of which Ambassadors, and all others for the future, the King instituted a new Officer by the Name of Master of the Ceremonies, allowing him two hundred Pounds a Year Fee; and the first that had this Place was Sir Lewis Lewkenor, a Gentleman who besides other Accomplishments, was very skilful in the neighbouring Languages. All this while the King mov'd within his own Sphere, and had transacted nothing out of the Nation: But now in the Month of June he sent the Earl of Rutland Ambassador to his Brother-in-Law the King of Denmark, upon two Occasions; the one was to offer himself to be God-Father to his Son, who was nam'd Christianus, and the other was to present him with the honourable Order of the Garter: Upon the like Imployment, he shortly after sent the Lord Spencer to Frederick Duke of Wirtemberg; both which Lords saw the said Princes invested with the Garter, and after solemn Entertainments return'd home.

Tyrone pardoned.

In England, it was probably conceiv'd that all Offences against Queen Elizabeth had been forgotten; but King James, more sensible of Wrongs done to her than himself, would not suffer Valentine Thomas so to escape; who after he had lain many Years Prisoner in the Tower, was on the fourth of June arraign'd at the King's Bench-Bar; and for Conspiring against the late Queen and some of her Council, was on the seventh of June, after six a Clock at Night, drawn to Sir. Thomas Watrings, and there hang'd and quarter'd. About this Time the honourable Charles Lord Montjoy return'd out of Ireland, and brought with him the famous Rebel Hugh O-Neal, Earl of Tyrone; at whose Arrival the Lord Montjoy was sworn of the King's Privy-Council; and Tyrone himself, who had been the Cause of such an Effusion of English Blood, was notwithstanding pardon'd, and Proclamation made, that he should be treated by all Men with Respect and Honour. The Lord Montjoy, as a Reward for his good Services, was created Earl of Devonshire; and thus having given Way to new Creations, they soon after broke in like a Deluge upon the Nation; the King being an inexhaustible Fountain of Honour, which might serve for all Kinds of Rewards and Purposes.

While

While all Men enjoy'd the Blessings of Peace and Plenty, suddenly, like a Storm in a fair Day, there broke out a Conspiracy of a strange Composition; for as most Treasons are compos'd of Men of one particular Faction, in this there were Persons of all sorts, Priests and Lay-Men, Papists and Protestants, Noblemen, Knights and Gentlemen: So that several would have thought it to have been a deep laid Conspiracy; but it prov'd so shallow, that it could scarce be observ'd what the Authors of it design'd, or what they would have effected. It seems the great Favour King James had shewn to the Earl of Southampton, who nearly escap'd when the Earl of Essex suffer'd, prov'd highly disobliging to all his Opposers; and it was said, that as the King had sent to enlarge the Earl of Southampton, and appointed him to meet him upon the Way, so when he heard that his two chief Opposites, the Lord Cobham and Sir Walter Raleigh, were likewise design'd to meet him, he sent them word, That they might save themselves that Labour. However it was, they found some Cause for a fatal Discontent, which hurry'd them into the Company and Society of some who had more real Designs against the Government than themselves. Sir Walter Raleigh had been turn'd out of his Place of Captain of the Guards, which was given to a Scotch Lord, to his great Disgust; and not long after parting, with his Sister at London, he recommended himself to her Prayers, saying, That he was going whence he thought never to return; which she understood of some Combate he had undertaken, and discovering it to her Neighbours, the Words were carry'd to Court, where they receiv'd a different Construction. Upon this and other Accidents several were apprehended, as Henry Lord Cobham, George Brook his Brother, Thomas Lord Grey, Sir Walter Raleigh, Sir Griffith Markham, and Sir Edward Parham Knights, Bartholomew Brookesby, and Anthony Copley, Gentlemen, William Watson and William Clark Romish Priests. Tho' they were apprehended in July, yet they came not to their Trials 'till November following; for by reason of a Pestilence then raging in London, the Term was deferr'd, and order'd to be kept at Winchester; only the Courts of the Exchequer, Wards and Liveries, and the Dutchy of Lancaster were kept at the King's Mannor at Richmond.

Reg. 1.

A strange Conspiracy.

Sir Walter Raleigh disgusted.

In the mean Time his Majesty held a solemn Feast at Windsor, where Prince Henry was install'd Knight of the Garter, as also the Duke of Lenox, the Earl of Southampton, the Earl of Marre, and the Earl of Pembroke. After which Preparations were made for the King's Coronation, which was preceded by a new Stream of Creations and Honours. Sir Thomas Egerton, Lord Chancellor, was made Baron of Elsmere; Sir William Russel, Baron of Thornough; Sir Henry Gray, Baron of Groby; Sir John Peter, Baron of Writtle; Sir John Harrington, Baron of Exton; Sir Henry Denvers, Baron of Dantsey; Sir Thomas Gerrard, Baron of Gerrard Bromley in Staffordshire; and Sir Robert Spencer, Baron of Wormeleyton. After which the King conferr'd inferior Orders, and made Knights of all the Judges and Serjeants at Law, all Civilians and Clerks of the Signet, and all his Gentlemen Ushers, with several others: And lastly he made sixty two Knights of the Bath, most of Noblemen's Sons, and the rest Gentlemen of special Worth. These Things compleated, on the twenty fifth Day of July, being the Feast of St. James, the King and Queen were both solemnly crown'd and anointed at Westminster, by the Hands of John Wight, Arch-Bishop of Canterbury, in the Presence of the Nobility and others, namely Sir Robert Lee Lord Mayor of London, the Aldermen his Brethren, and twelve principal Citizens admitted to attend on them. All other Citizens were stopp'd from passing either by Land or Water by Reason of the Plague; and on the first of August following all Suitors were by Proclamation forbidden to repair to the Court 'till the Winter following. And indeed the Sicknels rag'd so much, that in the City of London this Year there dy'd above thirty thousand of that Distemper.

New Advancements.

The King's Coronation.

On

The Trial of the Conspirators.

On the fourth of November, the Lord Cobham, Sir Walter Raleigh, and the rest of the Delinquents formerly mention'd, were remov'd from the Tower by strong Guards, and arraign'd at Winchester. Their Indictment lay for conspiring to kill the King, to raise Rebellion, to alter Religion, to subvert the State, and to procure a Foreign Invasion. Concerning the first Point it was prov'd, That the Lord Grey design'd to obtain the levying of two thousand Men, for the Defence of the Netherlands, and with them to seize upon the King and Prince, and secure the Lords of the Council in their Chambers. For the other Particulars, it was prov'd or alledg'd, That the Lord Cobham and Sir Walter Raleigh met at St. Martins in the Fields, and there consulted about moving Sedition, raising Rebellion, altering Religion, subverting the State, and setting up the Lady Arbella Stuart. And for the particular Point of subverting the State, it was prov'd, That Watson the Priest was design'd to be Lord-Chancellor, George Brook Lord-Treasurer, Sir Griffith Markham Secretary, and the Lord Grey to be Master of the Horse, and Earl-Marshal of England. And for the effecting of these Treasons, it was prov'd, That Watson had drawn up particular Oaths in Writing, by which all Parties were bound to Secrecy. Then for the last Point, it was urg'd, That Sir Walter Raleigh was appointed to treat with Count Aremberg for a large Sum of Mony, and the Lord Cobham to apply himself to the Arch-Duke and King of Spain, to induce them to assist the Lady Arbella. These Particulars being largely alledg'd against them on the several Days of their Indictments, what was chiefly reply'd in Mitigation of their Crimes was, first, That these Things could not be Treason, because the King was not yet crown'd; and secondly, That the whole was but a verbal Matter, and never took Effect, therefore it could not be Treason. But these Assertions being both refuted by the Court, they were all, but Sir Edward Parham, found guilty of High-Treason, and Sentence pass'd upon them.

They are condemn'd.

In Pursuance of this Sentence, the two Priests, Watson and Clerk, were executed at Winchester on the twenty ninth Day of November; and George Brook was beheaded on the fifth of December; but then the Hand of Justice was stopp'd, and the King was pleas'd to shew Mercy after this peculiar Manner. After the Death of the three last nam'd Delinquents, he sign'd three other Warrants for the Execution of the Lord Cobham, the Lord Grey, and Sir Griffith Markham, upon a prefix'd Day; but before that Day he privately sign'd another Paper, written with his own Hand, and directed to the Sheriff, by which he countermanded the former Warrants. And that this gracious Design might be manag'd with Secrecy, and produce an agreeable Surprize, he sent the Paper by Mr. John Gybbe, a Scotch Man, and one utterly unknown to all in Office upon this Occasion, appointing him to deliver it in such a Manner, that it might not take Effect, 'till after their several Confessions, and at the very Point of their Execution; all which was exactly perform'd. At which Moment it was remarkable to see how the Offenders upon their Knees lamented and detested their Crimes, and most of all applauded and extoll'd the King's uncommon Tendernefs and Commiseration. But tho' they were thus pardon'd, yet they were carry'd back to the Tower; where the Lord Grey not long after dy'd, which extinguish'd that Barony and Family which had formerly produc'd many valiant and worthy Men. Sir Griffith Markham after some Time was set at Liberty, and retired beyond Sea, where he liv'd long after in a very mean Condition. The Lord Cobham likewise was afterwards discharg'd from his Imprisonment, but depriv'd of his Estate, living many Years in great Penury and Misery; and in his Person ended that noble Family, which had flourish'd in great Honour for many Ages. Sir Walter Raleigh was detain'd several Years in the Tower, where with great Reputation he spent his Time in Writing one of the noblest Histories in the World; and might have continu'd a happy Man, had he never been releas'd.

As some have thought this whole Conspiracy, as well as that of the Gowries in Scotland, to have been only a State Trick to weaken a Party, so most are of Opinion that the Part of Sir Walter Raleigh, so great a Man and a Protestant, was all Riddle and Mystery. Weldon, if he may be credited, has ventur'd to unfold this, and tells us, That the greatest Evidence against Raleigh was Cobham's Accusation, whom he only desir'd might appear Viva Voce, and he would yield without further Defence; but his Enemies knowing that Cobham neither would nor could accuse him, they made use of Wade, the Lieutenant of the Tower and Cecil's great Confident, to persuade him to Sign a Paper of Accusation against him. This being refus'd, at last Wade prevail'd upon Cobham's Weakness to set his Hand to a blank Paper, over which Wade wrote the Accusation. Cecil therefore upon Raleigh's Trial, often asked him if he would confess, provided Cobham accus'd him under his Hand? Raleigh reply'd, That he knew Cobham a weak Man, and knew not how far he might be insnar'd; but was confident he would not accuse him to his Face, and therefore he had no Reason to venture his Life upon it. On this Defence he insist'd 'till nine at Night; at last his Fate carry'd him against his Reason, and he consented that upon producing of Cobham's Hand he would yield, when immediately that Paper was produc'd, which was really his Hand, but the Contents the Contrivance of Wade. Afterwards the Queen falling into a desperate Sickness, which the Physicians thought incurable, Sir Walter Raleigh, being an excellent Chymist and Master of all Kinds of Learning, undertook and perform'd the Cure; for which he would receive no other Reward, but that his Majesty would send certain Lords to the Tower to examine the Lord Cobham, Whether he had at any Time under his Hand accus'd him of Treason. Whereupon the King sent six Lords, who were Enemies to Raleigh, to make Enquiry into this puzzling Affair. Cobham protested, That he never did or could accuse Sir Walter, but acknowledg'd that he was by a Slight prevail'd upon to set his Hand to a Blank-Paper, but never knew what the Contents of it were to be. The six Lords returning to the King, made one of them their Spokesman, who said, Sir, my Lord Cobham has confirm'd all that ever he wrote or said; which was a horrid Equivocation, for 'tis true, he made good whatever he wrote; but he wrote nothing to accuse Sir Walter Raleigh. Thus was the King abus'd, according to Weldon's Account, and Sir Walter much more; who by that Means was afterwards brought to entire Ruin.

The Case of Sir Walter Raleigh.

II. The King being now happily and peaceably establish'd in his Throne, like a Wise and Pious Prince, proceeded to consider the State of the true Religion in his Kingdom. He found a great Difference arising between the Episcopal Party, and those call'd by the Name of Puritans, and both active in attaining their Ends, and that several Petitions were exhibited to him for the Reformation of Abuses in the Church; therefore at the Importunity of both Parties he appointed a solemn Conference at Hampton-Court, to be held by some Bishops, Deans and Doctors, together with some of the most grave and modest among the Complainers. The Bishops were those of Canterbury, London, Winchester, Durham, Worcester, St. Davids, Chichester, Carlisle and Peterborough; the Deans were those of the Chappel, Christ-Church, Worcester, Westminster, Paul's, Chester and Windsor, together with Doctor Field and Doctor King. For the Petitioners were Doctor Reynolds, Doctor Spark, Mr. Knewstubb, and Mr. Chatterton. All these being call'd into the Privy-Chamber, his Majesty spoke to this Effect; That following the Example of all Christian Princes, who usually began their Reigns with the Establishment of the Church, he had now, at his Entering upon the Throne, assembled them, for settling an uniform Order in the same, for planting Unity, removing Dissentions, and reforming Abuses, which were naturally incident to all Politick Bodies. And that he might not be misapprehended, and his Designs in assembling them misconstrued,

The Conference at Hampton-Court.

The King's Speech.

he

he declar'd that his Meaning was not to make any Innovation of the Government establish'd, which he knew was approv'd of God, but to hear and examine the Complaints that were made, and remove the Occasion of them; therefore he desir'd the Petitioners to begin, and shew what were their Grievances.

The Complaints of those call'd Puritans.

Doctor Reynolds with the other three, falling upon their Knees, after a short Preamble, reduc'd the Matters in Question into two Heads; some he said concern'd the Doctrine of the Church, and others the Government. Concerning the Doctrine, that in the Books of Articles, some Things were obscure, and some Things defective, which they desir'd to be supply'd and explain'd, of which he nam'd some Particulars; which being a while discuss'd and debated, and the Doctor professing he had receiv'd Satisfaction, the King said, That if these were their greatest Grievances, such Importunity needed not to be us'd to him, and that a more private Course had been better. Then proceeding to speak of the Government of the Church, they complain'd of the Want and Scarcity of sufficient Ministers in every Parish, of the Subscription urg'd to the Common-Prayer Book, the Censures inflicted by Lay-Chancellors, the Cross in Baptism, the Ring in Marriage, the Surplice, and some other Circumstantials. After about three Hours Debates, they were all commanded to meet again in the same Place some few Days after, at which Time they were to know his Majesty's Pleasure concerning these Matters.

satisfy'd.*

At the appointed Day, which was the eighteenth of January, the Bishops, Deans and Doctors of the Arches being call'd first, the Arch-Bishop presented certain Notes of Explanation of the Liturgy, which the King had recommended to the Bishop's Care. Accordingly the King question'd them concerning the Exercise of the High-Commission, the Oath Ex Officio, the Censure of Excommunication, and the Matter of Subscription; and when they had answer'd to all Points to his Majesty's Satisfaction, Doctor Reynolds and the others were desir'd to appear in the Chamber, and the aforesaid Explanations read to them, with which likewise they profess'd to be satisfy'd and content. The King upon this expressing a great Satisfaction with what had pass'd among them, seriously exhorted them to the Preservation of Unity, and the Bishops to treat their Inferiors with all Lenity, and use the mildest Methods for reclaiming those who were of a contrary Opinion; warning the others also to beware of Obstinacy in their Opinions, and Disobedience to the Orders of the Church. Obedience and Humility, added he, are the Marks of good and honest Men, such as I believe you to be; but I fear many of your Sort are humorous, and too busie in perverting of others. The Exceptions against the Common-Prayer Book, as I perceive, are Matters of meer Weakness, and they who are discreet will be gain'd by Time and gentle Persuasions; and if they be indiscreet, it is better to remove them, than the Church should suffer by their Contentions. For the Bishops I will answer, That it is not their Design immediately to enforce Obedience, but by Fatherly Admonitions and Conferences to gain those that are disaffected; but if any be of an obstinate and turbulent Spirit, I will have them inforc'd to a Conformity. Neither tell me, That the wearing of a Surplice, or using the Cross in Baptism, can diminish the Credit of Ministers that were formerly of another Opinion; for that is the Scotch Argument, when any thing was concluded not agreeing with their Humours, the only Reason for their Disobedience is, that it stands not with their Credit to yield, having been so long of a contrary Opinion. I will have none of that, but that a Time be limited by the Bishops of every Diocese, and such as will not submit, whoever they are, let them be remov'd; for we must not prefer the Credit of a few private Men to the general Peace of the Church. Throughout all this remarkable Conference, in every Point that was mov'd, or came to be discuss'd, the King shew'd such a Knowledge and Readiness, as rais'd no small Admiration in all the Hearers. The Lord-Chancellor Egerton being surpriz'd to see him so expeditious and perfect in all Kinds of Divinity, said, That he had often heard and read, that a King was a mixt Person with a Priest, but never found it verify'd till that Day. And Arch-Bishop Whitgift, a most learned and pious Man, went further, and said, He was verily persuaded that the King spoke by the Spirit of God. This great Man, who had the highest Concern for the Church, finding the King inclinable after this to make some Alterations, is said to have dy'd of Grief on the twenty ninth of February. He was succeeded in his See by Richard Bancroft Bishop of London, but not with the same Spirit; for what Whitgift strove to effect with Sweetness and Gentleness, Bancroft prosecuted with Rigour and Severity, to the great Weakening of the Church, as many have rationally believ'd.

Besides the main Fruit of this famous Conference, the uniform Settlement of the Church, several other important Matters were at the same Time projected, and by his Majesty's provident Care had then their Conception, tho' after Times brought them to Perfection. The first was his sacred Order for a new Translation of the Holy Scriptures, according to the Originals, as also for an uniform Reading of them in all Churches. To which pious End, three select Companies from London and the two Universities, most skilful in Languages, being imploy'd, after long Conference, much Reading, and diligent comparing of former Translations, it was publish'd in due Time, and to this Day continues in Use. The King's second Project was, that as in England, so also in Ireland, Wales, and the Northern Parts, the same Religion might be fully planted and establish'd. Which purpose he so zealously prosecuted, especially for the Kingdom of Scotland, that he held it not sufficient to join these two Crowns into one temporal Monarchy, unless he saw them united in the Rites and Government of one Spiritual Hierarchy. Nor was his Wisdom less conspicuous than his Zeal, in making so happy a Choice of such English Divines, as not long after were sent for this Design into Scotland. The chief of whom was Doctor George Abbot afterwards Arch-Bishop of Canterbury, whose Labours, as Speed assures us, were a Document to others, how admirably successful is true Learning, where it is guided by true Prudence, and Piety to God is join'd with Charity to Men. But notwithstanding all the King's Care, the Jesuits being in hopes to catch something by troubling the Stream, flock'd into England in great Numbers; and the King perceiving that their near Approaches put his Person and Religion into Danger, he issu'd out a Proclamation, commanding all Priests and Jesuits to depart out of the Kingdom, and if any of them should presume to return again, they should be prosecuted according to Law. This somewhat allay'd the Heats and Hopes of the Jesuits, and their Correspondents; but it made Way for more dark and secret Conspiracies, which they afterwards put in practice. Another Proclamation came out for Uniformity in Religion according to Law, and to reduce those who had not receiv'd Satisfaction at the Conference at Hampton-Court; for now it became a doubtful Question among many, whether the Jesuits or the Nonconformists were greatest Enemies to the Church of England. The Consequences of this were found to be afterwards, that of the ten thousand Ministers in England, not above forty nine stood out and were depriv'd. After this there came out many other Proclamations, against Monopolies, Salt-Petre Men, Purveyors, Cart-Takers, and other insolent Officers that were grievous to the Subject.

The King's first appearing abroad was privately, to visit some of his Houses, for naturally he did not love to be gaz'd on; and those Formalities of State which set a Lustre upon Princes in the Peoples Eye, were but so many Burthens to him: For his private Recreations at home, and his Hunting Exercises abroad, were his greatest Delight, when he met with the least Company. Continuing in the Tower, in order to pass through the City in State, he took great Pleasure in baiting of Lions; and the first Parliament being to meet on the nineteenth Day of March, he with his Queen and Prince Henry, four Days before, rode from the Tower to Whitehall, having his Eyes entertain'd with the Pageants and Splendor of the City, and his Ears fill'd with the Compliments and Applauses of the People. But he was not like his Predecessor, Queen Elizabeth, who with a well-pleas'd Affection met her Peoples Acclamations, thinking most highly of her self when she was born upon the Wings of their humble Supplications. He endur'd this Day's Fatigue with Patience, and that of his Triumphal Riding to the Parliament, as not expecting to meet with the like again; but afterwards in his publick Appearances, especially in his Sports, the Accesses of the People render'd him so impatient, that he often dispers'd them with Frowns, and sometimes with Curses: So various and noted are the Natures and Actions of Princes, that the same Person may pass for a good Man, that will not be accounted a good Prince.

The first Parliament in this Reign.

The King's Speech.

At the Opening of the Parliament, the King was pleas'd to entertain them with a very long and extraordinary Speech, containing great Variety both as to the Matter and Method; in which he interweav'd the Rights and Duties of the Monarchy, with the Privileges of the Subject, so that all Men thought it worthy of Commendation. In speaking of the Prerogative he declar'd, That the Difference between a rightful King and an usurping Tyrant was this; that the Latter thought his Kingdom and People were ordain'd for the Satisfaction of his Desires and unreasonable Appetites; while the Former, on the contrary, acknowledg'd himself to be ordain'd for procuring the Wealth and Prosperity of his People, and that in these consisted his principal worldly Felicity. And a little after he said, That as the Head is ordain'd for the Body, and not the Body for the Head; so must a righteous King know himself to be ordain'd for his People, and not his People for him. These and many other Passages gave a general Satisfaction, but some Things he said concerning Religion was not so universally receiv'd: For the Romanists were uneasie at his saying, They were unsufferable in the Kingdom, as long as they maintain'd the Pope to be their spiritual Head, and to have Power to dethrone Kings. On the other side the Separatists were offended at his acknowledging The Roman Church to be our Mother Church, tho' defil'd with some Infirmities and Corruptions, and his declaring, That if the Papists would lay aside King-killing, and some other gross Errors, he would be content to meet them half Way, so that all Novelties might be renounc'd on either Side. So that every one grounded his Hopes, or his Fears, upon the Shallows of his own Fancy, not exactly knowing what Course the King would steer. But in general the Parliament applauding the King, and admiring his Abilities, made a Recognition of his Right to the Crown of England, to which they oblig'd themselves, their Heirs and Posterity; so that the King as it were triumph'd upon a Throne of the Peoples Love and Duty.

A Recognition of the King's Title.

An Union attempted between England and Scotland.

One of the great Designs of the King was to have an intire Union made between the two Kingdoms of England and Scotland; accordingly the Parliament pass'd an Act to Authorize certain Commissioners, namely fourteen of the chief Lords of the Kingdom, and above double the Number of Commoners to manage and effect that laudable End. These Commissioners, any eight of the Lords and twenty of the Commons, had Power to assemble, meet, treat and consult with certain select Commissioners to be nominated and authoriz'd by the Parliament in Scotland, concerning such Matters and Causes, as they in their Wifdoms should think convenient and necessary, for the Honour of the King, and the common Good of both Nations. In order to promote this great Work, the King caus'd himself to be proclaim'd King of Great Britain, and the Names of England and Scotland to be discontinu'd; the Scotch Coins were made current, and the English Ships had St. George's and St. Andrew's Crosses quarter'd together in their Flags. But all these Designs had not their desir'd Effects, as appear'd afterwards; but still many wise and good Laws pass'd in this Parliament, too numerous to be recited in this Place. Only we ought not to omit mentioning the King's Religious Care of the Church, which, to the almost only

Besides this laudable Care, the Clergy in Convocation, by the King's Directi- ons and Authority, did many Things to the Honour and Establishment of the Church of England, and made many excellent Canons, which are in Force to this Day, and are the last that had a full and legal Sanction. The Parliament having sat almost three Months, the Speaker of the House of Commons made a long Speech answerable to that made before by the King, after which it was on the seventh Day of July prorogu'd to the seventh of February following. The Parlia- ment prorogu'd.

In Relation to Foreign Affairs, King James had hitherto been consider'd in two Capacities, one as King of Scotland, in which he was in perfect Amity with the Spaniard, and the other as King of England, which caus'd him to be at Enmity with that Monarch; but he as Rex pacificus chose the best from both, and stood altogether for the Olive-Branch. Therefore when at his first Arrival in England, he found Letters of Reprisal granted against the Spaniards, he first caus'd them all to be call'd in, and then consented to a Treaty of lasting Peace and Amity. In which Treaty, negotiated at London, the Commis- sioners for the King of England were the Earls of Dorset, Nottingham, De- vonshire, and Northampton, and Secretary Cecil lately made Viscount Cran- burn; for the King of Spain were the Constable of Castile, the Earl of Villa Mediana, and Alexander Robidius Professor of Law; and for the Arch-Duke were the Count de Aremberg, Richardot President of the Privy-Council, and Werreikin principal Secretary. By these a Peace was concluded, consisting of many Articles, which were said to be very advantageous to the Spaniard, and in a great Measure purchas'd by the Gifts of the Constable of Castile, which were so rich and numerous, that there was not one Courtier of Note who did not taste of Spain's Bounty either in Gold or Jewels; and we are told that Audley-End, and other magnificent Structures had their Foundation from Spanish Gold. The Treaty being finish'd, the King of Spain, besides the Constable of Castile, sent la Syerra his Great Chamberlain, accompany'd with several Marquesses, Earls and Barons, who arriving in England with great Pomp, were by the Earl of Devon- shire, on the nineteenth of August, brought to Court; where the King in his Chappel, and in the Presence of the Commissioners and other English Lords, while the Constable held the King's Hands between his own, took his Oath upon the Holy Bible, religiously to observe and keep all the Articles agreed upon in the said League and Treaty. A Treaty of Peace conclu- ded between England and Spain.

In March following, the Earl of Nottingham, Admiral of England, was sent into Spain, in like manner to take the Oath of the Spanish King; who ac- company'd with three Lords, many Knights, Gentlemen, and others, to the Number of six hundred and fifty, on the fifteenth of April arriv'd at the Groyne, from whence he was conducted three hundred Miles to Valledolid, where the King of Spain then kept his Court, being entertain'd in all Places at that King's Charge, with such extraordinary Provisions and Demonstrations of Joy, as plainly manifested the great Satisfaction the Spaniards had in the English Amity. Indeed they were astonish'd at the Splendor of the Embassie, and the Beauty of the Gentlemen that made up the Retinue: For the Jesuits had reported that the English had all the Uggliness of Hell, as a Punishment for their Apostacy from Rome; but when they beheld the Looks of Angels, they with Indignation re- sented the Impostors of their Confessors. The Lord Ambassador being arriv'd A. D. 1605. Reg. 3. An Embassie into Spain.

at Court, he caus'd Thomas Knolls to deliver the Presents sent from the King of England, which were six stately Horses, with Saddles and Trappings richly imbroider'd; three for the King, and three for the Queen; two Cross-Bows, with five Sheafs of Arrows; four Fowling-Pieces, inlaid with rich Plates of Gold, and a Couple of Lyme-Hounds of singular Excellencies; all which the King and Queen very kindly receiv'd. On the thirtieth of May, the Lord Ambassador being desir'd to appear, the King came forth into a large Room; where having a Table set before him, and a Bible very reverently laid upon it, together with a Crucifix, the Arch-Bishop of Toledo read the Oath, while the Lord Ambassador held the King's Hands between his own, and the King kneeling down, laid his Hands upon the Book, and after his Oath subscrib'd the Articles formerly concluded. While the Earl of Nottingham was thus imploy'd in Spain, Edward Earl of Hartford was likewise sent to Albertus and Isabella, Arch-Dukes of Austria, to take their Oaths, for Confirmation of the said Articles of Peace; which were taken at Brussels the first Day of May, with extraordinary State and Solemnity. After which, as the Earl bestow'd on the Arch-Duke's Servants, to the Sum of three thousand Pounds, so the Arch-Duke at his Departure presented the Earl with a Jewel worth nine hundred Pounds, and a Suit of Arras worth three hundred, and bore his Charges all the Time of his Stay at Brussels. Thus was King James truly stil'd Rex Pacificus, being now in full Peace and Amity with all the Princes of Christendom; a Happiness which few of his Ancestors ever enjoy'd; which continu'd Peace, as some have thought it the Glory, so others have accounted it the great Unhappiness of his whole Reign. Before the full Conclusion of it, the strong Town of Ostend, after above three Years Siege, and the Deaths of above a hundred and twenty thousand Men on both Sides, was taken by the Marquess Spinola, for which he was highly honour'd by the King of Spain.

In these peaceable Times, the munificent King open'd new Fountains of Honour, beginning first with his second Son Charles Duke of Albany, then but four Years of Age, who with unusual Pomp and Solemnity was created Duke of York. Afterwards keeping St. George's Feast at Greenwich, the King there made two Knights of the Garter, namely Duke Ulrick Heir of Norway, and Brother to the present Queen Anne, and the noble Lord Henry Howard Earl of Northampton. A few Days after, in the Hall at Greenwich, richly hang'd with Arras, he created three Earls, one Viscount, and four Barons; namely Secretary Cecil, and Viscount Cranburn, Earl of Salisbury; Thomas Cecil, Lord Burleigh, and his eldest Brother, Earl of Exeter; Sir Philip Herbert, younger Brother to the Earl of Pembroke, Earl of Montgomery; Robert Sidney, Baron of Penshurst and Lord-Chamberlain to the Queen, Viscount Lisle; Sir John Stanhope, Vice-Chamberlain to the King, Lord Stanhope of Harrington; Sir George Carew, Vice-Chamberlain to the Queen, Lord Carew of Clepton; Mr. Thomas Arundel of Devonshire, Lord Arundel of Warder; and Mr. William Cavendish, Lord Cavendish of Hardwick. Not long after, on the fifteenth of June, a notorious Scotchman call'd Thomas Dowglas was committed to the Tower, being sent into England three Days before by the Count Palatine of the Rhine. His Offence was, that he had counterfeited the King's Privy-Seal to several Princes of Germany; one to the Arch-Bishop of Coloign, another to the Arch-Bishop of Triers, another to the Duke of Cleves, another to the Arch-Bishop of Mentz, and a fifth to the Count Palatine of the Rhine. Of all which, being examin'd and convicted, he was drawn on a Hurdle into Smithfield, and there hang'd and quarter'd. On the twenty seventh of August, the King with his Queen made a Visit to the University of Oxford; where their Entertainment was suitable to the Dignity of their Persons, and the Honour of so noble and august a Body.

III. Whilst all Things appear'd in a most happy and peaceable Condition, no Storms abroad, no Troubles at home, there was suddenly detected a horrible Conspiracy against the King, and the whole Body of the State of England; of such a prodigious and infernal Nature, as no Age or History can parallel; proceeding from a restless Spirit of Envy, and an implacable Zeal inflam'd against the Protestant Succession and Religion. This had its Rise and Foundation in the latter End of the last Reign, when Pope Clement the Eighth publish'd his bold Breves in England, to exclude the King of Scotland from the Succession; but all Endeavours failing then, and in the Beginning of this Reign, new and unheard of Attempts were now put in practice to support a desperate Cause. The principal Contriver of this black Conspiracy was Robert Catesby, a Gentleman of great Account in Northamptonshire, descended from that famous Catesby, who had been chief Counsellor to King Richard the Third, to whose Family the Divine Vengeance had now ordain'd a disastrous Period: This rash Gentleman, not able to perform the Work alone, drew in many to assist him, as Thomas Piercy, Thomas Winter, John Graunt, Ambrose Rookwood, Christopher Wright, Francis Tresham, Guido Fawks, and at last Sir Everard Digby, all zealous Papists and Promoters of the Catholick Cause. Five of these meeting together behind St. Clement's Church, and consulting by what Methods they might retrieve their declining Cause, Piercy immediately propos'd the killing of the King, and offer'd to perform it at the hazard of his own Life: But Catesby, who had a much deeper Contrivance in his Thoughts, reply'd, That if he should succeed, the Catholick Cause would be no better, while the Prince and Duke of York were alive; and if they were remov'd, still the Counsellors, Nobility, Judges, Knights, and many others would remain, sufficient to cross all their Purposes: Therefore he had thought of a safer and more effectual Way, which was at one Time and with one signal Blow to cut off all their Enemies; by blowing up the Parliament-House with Gun-powder, at the very Moment the King and the Estates of the Realm were assembled. This was approv'd on by all, as a noble and extraordinary Project; but first it was thought proper to ask the Opinion of their Ghostly Fathers, and be inform'd of the Lawfulness of the Fact, from Henry Garnet, Oswold Tesmond, and John Gerard Jesuits; who being consulted applauded the Enterprize; assuring them, They might proceed with a good Conscience and perform the Deed, since the Design was against Hereticks and Excommunicated Persons.

The Beginning of the Powder-Plot.

The Parties
concern'd.

Their grand Design.

Having gain'd this Point, and being satisfy'd in their Consciences, for their greater Security, they proceeded to take an Oath of Secrecy, swearing to each other, By the sacred Trinity and the blessed Sacrament, which they were then going to receive, that neither directly nor indirectly, by Words or Circumstances, they would discover the Purpose they had taken to any whomsoever, nor would desist from performing the same, without leave from their Associates. The Oath was administer'd in the Presence of Gerard the Jesuit; and having heard Mass, and receiv'd the Sacrament, Piercy was appointed to hire a House close adjoining to the Upper House of Parliament, for the more safe and secret Working of their Mine design'd for the Powder. This being obtain'd, and Guy Fawks assuming the Name of John Johnson Servant to Mr. Piercy, about Christmas, in the Year 1604, they began their Work with no small Labour and Difficulty, in digging through a vast thick Wall; and had several Intermissions, by reason of the Prorogation of the Parliament from the seventh of February to the third of October, and lastly to the fifth of November. About Candlemas they had almost wrought their Mine through the Wall, when suddenly they heard a Noise in the next Room, which threw them into a great Consternation, for fear of a Discovery; but sending Guy Fawks to find out the Occasion, he brought advice, that it was a Cellar where Sea-Coals had been laid, which were now under Sale, and the Room offer'd to be let for a yearly Rent. This Room

Their Oath of Secrecy.

Room being directly under the Parliament-House, and most proper for their Purpose, was immediately hir'd by Mr. Piercy, who brought thirty six Barrels of Gun-Powder from Lambeth, and placing them in this Cellar, cover'd them over with great Quantities of Sea-Coal, Billets and Faggots.

They find a Cellar for their Purpose.

The first Part of the Plot being brought to so hopeful an Issue, it now remain'd to consider what was to be effected, when the fatal Blow should be given: For tho' the King and Prince might be slain, yet the Duke of York and the Lady Elizabeth would still be safe, and consequently their main End endanger'd if not defeated. Therefore Piercy, by reason of his Acquaintance in the House, undertook to secure the Duke of York; and for surprizing the Lady Elizabeth, they agreed upon a Match of Hunting near to Dunchurch, where under Colour of Sport they might draw Company together, and secure her at the Lord Harrington's House in Warwickshire, where she then resided. The next Doubt they propos'd was where to procure Money and Horses; for which Digby made offer of fifteen hundred Pounds, Tresham of two hundred, and Piercy promis'd to bring all he could gather from Northumberland Rents, which he thought would amount to four thousand Pounds, and to provide ten Horses for his Share; not doubting, when having the Heir Apparent in their Hands, but they should find Means for their Purpose. A third Question propos'd, was what Lords they should save from going to the Parliament; which they agreed to be as many Catholicks as they could prevent with Conveniency. Next it was mov'd amongst them, what Foreign Princes should be acquainted with their Designs, and whose Aid they should seek: In which it was agreed, That none of them should be made Privy to the Conspiracy, as fearing they could not obtain their Secrecy; but for Aid after the Work perform'd, they might have Time to apply themselves to France, Spain or Flanders. Lastly they resolv'd to make the best Use of the Lady Elizabeth, and to proclaim her Queen: To which purpose they had a Proclamation form'd, in which no mention was made of altering Religion, because they wanted sufficient Forces; and 'till they could sufficiently strengthen their Party, they would not acknowledge the Fact to be theirs, but use their Endeavours to charge it upon the Puritans.

Thus far the monstrous Design was carry'd on with a promising Aspect to all the Conspirators; and now all Dangers being foreseen, and all Engines provided against the fifth Day of the next November, there remain'd nothing but the Performance of the last Act of the intended Tragedy. But of a sudden the infernal Secret, cover'd with all the Clouds of Darkeness, and secur'd by all the Fences of Human Policy, was brought to Light after a wonderful Manner. The Lord Monteagle, Son and Heir to the Lord Morley, being in his Lodgings at seven at Night, was surpriz'd with a Letter given him by one of his Footmen, who receiv'd it in the Street from an unknown Person, with a strict Charge to put it into his Master's Hand. The Letter was this: My Lord, Out of the Love I bear to some of your Friends, I have regard to your Preservation; therefore would advise you, as you tender your Life, to invent some Excuse to shift off your Attendance at this Parliament: For God and Man have concur'd to punish the Wickedness of this Time. Think not slightly of this Advertisement, but retire your self into your Country, where you may expect the Event in Safety: For tho' there be no Appearance of any Stir, yet I say they shall receive a terrible Blow in this Parliament, and shall not see who hurt them. This Counsel is not to be contemn'd, because it may do you Good, and can do you no Harm; for the Danger is pass'd as soon as you have burnt the Letter: And I hope God will give you the Grace to make good Use of it, to whose holy Protection I commit you. It was only ten Days before the Parliament that this Letter was receiv'd, and but twelve Hours before their Meeting that the Plot was really discover'd; in which it seems wonderful, that when so many were concern'd in it, it should remain conceal'd for almost the Space of a Year. Some Advices were indeed sent to the King, and several of the Council from beyond Sea, 'That the Papists were preparing a Petition for a Toleration for Religion at the Meeting of the Parliament, which should be so well back'd, that the King would be loath to refuse it; but these were only look'd upon as little Designs to put the King in Fear of a weak Party. And this Lord, when he receiv'd the Letter, still doubted that it was only some private Artifice to deter him from attending the Parliament; but yet out of a Tenderness to the King's Preservation, he resolv'd to communicate it to the Earl of Salisbury, the principal Secretary; and going the same Night to White-hall, he deliver'd the Letter to him. The Secretary acquainted the Lord-Chamberlain, the Admiral, and some others of the Council with it; and examining every Line of it, resolv'd to shew it to the King at his Return from his Hunting at Royston, and not to search further 'till they should hear his Opinion.

Which is communicated to the Council.

The King returning to London on the last of October, the Letter was shown him the next Day; and having carefully read and consider'd it, he said, It was not to be condemn'd, for the Stile seem'd more quick and nervous than that of Libels, Pasquils, and the like. The Secretary perceiving the King to apprehend the Matter more deeply than he expected, told him, That the Letter seem'd to have proceeded from Folly or Madness; and pointing to that Passage, 'The Danger is pass'd as soon as you have burnt the Letter, he said, The Warning would be of no Use, if the Burning of the Letter would remove the Danger. But the King desir'd him to consider the former Sentence, where it was said, 'They should receive a terrible Blow in the Parliament, and not see

'who hurt them, and when he should join that with the other, he should find it to be a sudden Danger there meant, such as Blowing up by Powder. Therefore he order'd all the Rooms about the Parliament-House to be search'd, both above and below, to prevent all future Dangers; which Business, belonging to the Chamberlain, was purposely deferr'd 'till the Afternoon before the first Session of Parliament. At which Time the Chamberlain taking with him the Lord Monteagle, who was highly desirous to see the Event, went and view'd all the Rooms, where he perceiv'd in the Vault under the Upper House a great Quantity of Faggots, Billets and Coals; and demanding of Whinyard, the Keeper of the Wardrobe, to what Use he had put those Cellars, he answer'd, That Mr. Piercy had hired the House and Cellar, and the Wood and Coals were the Gentleman's Fuel for Winter. The Chamberlain casting his Eye aside, and espying a suspicious Man in the Corner of the Vault, transiently ask'd who he was, and was answer'd, He was Mr. Piercy's Man, who kept the House for his Master. Thus having view'd all Places after a seeming careless Manner, he return'd and made report of all to the King, which increas'd his Majesty's first Apprehensions; who thereupon gave order for turning up the Wood and Coals to the very Bottom; and if nothing were found, it was agreed that Whinyard should pretend the Stealing of some of the King's Furniture in his Keeping, which might give Colour to the Search. Accordingly Sir Thomas Knevet, a Gentleman of the Privy-Chamber, and a Justice of the Peace for Westminster, was appointed for this Business; who going thither with some few in Company about Midnight, found a Man standing at the Entrance of the Vault in a Cloak and Boots, which he immediately apprehended. Then entering the Place, by overturning the Billets and Coals, they soon found the Serpents Nest, stor'd with thirty six Barrels of Gun-Powder; and searching the Villain who should have brooded these Eggs, they found about him a Dark-Lanthorn, three Matches, and other Contrivances to have given Fire to the Train at an exact Juncture of Time. This was Guido Fawks, who pass'd for Piercy's Man, and was so far from relenting, that he declar'd with an Oath, That if he had been found within the House, he would have blown up himself and them together. Sir Thomas securing the Man, immediately repair'd to the Palace, and shew'd the Chamberlain and Secretary how he had succeeded; who making themselves ready, with what Counsellors they could get, went all together ther to his Majesty's Bed-Chamber. The King being awak'd, the Chamberlain, not able to conceal his Joy, cry'd aloud, The Treason was discover'd, and the Traitor in their Hands! Then the Council were order'd to examine the Prisoner concerning his Accomplices; but he, nothing dejected or mov'd with so honourable a Presence, boldly avow'd the Fact, and was only sorry that he had fail'd in the Execution, declaring, That the Devil, and not God had betray'd his good Design. All that Day he would discover no one Associate, but took all the Blame upon himself, professing he had done it for Religion and Conscience Sake; and speaking of the King, he deny'd him to be his Sovereign, in regard he was a Heretick; and therefore it was no Sin to destroy him. This was his Behaviour for a while; but being convey'd to the Tower, and the Rack presented, he laid open the whole Substance of the Conspiracy, and confess'd the whole Truth.

The Conspirators are taken.

In the Time of this strange Discovery, Catesby, Piercy, Winter, Tresham, and the younger Wright, were lodg'd in the City; who hearing that all was discover'd, hasten'd into the Country, appointing to meet at Dunchurch in Warwickshire, where Digby resided. John Graunt, with some Confederate Recusants, had the same Night broke open a Stable of one Bourch, a Manager of large Horses, and took away seven or eight belonging to certain Noblemen in the Country; for he concluded the Conspiracy had taken effect, and was preparing to surprize the Princess Elizabeth, whose Residence was not far from the Place. But within a very short Time, Piercy and others that were fled from London, assuring them of a total Miscarriage, they desperately resolv'd upon a publick Rebellion, and pretending the Cause of Religion, endeavour'd to draw some Companies together; yet when they had gather'd all their Forces, they could not produce a hundred Men. In the mean Time Sir Fulk Grevill, Deputy-Lieutenant of Warwickshire, hearing of Graunt's Outrage, and supposing it the Beginning of a Rebellion, sent Advice to the neighbouring Towns, and warn'd them to be upon their Guard. The Sheriff of the County likewise calling the People to Arms, pursu'd these desperate People from Shire to Shire; and Sir Richard Walsh, the Sheriff of Worcestershire, having found where they had taken Harbour, sent a Trumpet and Messenger, commanding them in his Majesty's Name to surrender, and promising to intercede for their Lives. But they, finding their Crimes to be unpardonable, return'd Answer, That the Sheriff must have more powerful Assistance than he had brought, before he could command or compel them. The Sheriff, provok'd by their insulting Answer, prepar'd to attack the House; and while they made their Defence, it happen'd that a Spark of Fire falling among some Powder they were drying, blew up the House, which so scorch'd their Faces and Bodies, that losing their Courage, they open'd the Gate, and expos'd themselves to the Fury of the People. Catesby, Piercy and Sir Thomas Winter joining Backs, and resolving to die rather than be taken, the two first were kill'd with one Shot, and the other after some Wounds was made Prisoner: The two Wrights were also kill'd, but Rookwood, Graunt, Digby and Bates were taken and secur'd. Tresham had staid at London, and changing his Lodgings, thought to have met an Opportunity of escaping by Sea, but was at last discover'd; as likewise was Robert Winter, with one Littleton, who with all the rest were committed to the Tower of London. Upon Examination, Thomas Winter ingenuously confess'd the whole Conspiracy, writing down the Particulars with his own Hand, and acknowledging the Offence to be greater than could be forgiven. Digby extenuated the Crime by the Despair to which they were driven, having Hopes from the King at his Accession to the Crown, That the Catholicks should have a free Toleration of Religion, which being deny'd they had ventur'd upon these impious Attempts. Tresham in his Confession nam'd Garnet the Jesuit as privy to the Conspiracy; but afterwards by his Wife's Instigation deny'd it, declaring he had injur'd him, and had not seen him for sixteen Years; yet

Garnet

Garnet being apprehended after his Death, confess'd that they had met several Times within the last half Year.

In the mean Time the King met his Parliament upon Saturday the ninth of November, and made a long and remarkable Speech to the publick Estates; in which having aggravated the Danger by many Circumstances, and as much magnify'd the Mercies of God in the Discovery, when he mention'd the Trial and Punishment of the Offenders, he was observ'd to retain an excellent Temper in his Discourse, wishing that no innocent Person, either domestick or foreign, should thereby receive any Hurt: For, added he, however the blind Superstition of their Errors in Religion has been the only Motive in this desperate Attempt, it must not be thought that all who profess the Roman Religion are guilty of the same: For as it is true, that no other Sect, or Heresie, not excepting Turk, Jew, or Pagan, or those that worship the Devil, did ever maintain by the Grounds of their Religion, that it was lawful and meritorious to murder Princes or People upon the account of that; yet it is true on the other Side, that many honest Men, blinded perhaps with some Opinions of Popery, as if they be not sound in the Real Presence, the Number of the Sacraments, and some such School-Questions, do either not know, or not believe at least, all the true Grounds of Popery, which is indeed the Mystery of Iniquity. And therefore we justly confess that many Papists, especially our Forefathers, laying their only Trust upon Christ and his Merits, may be sav'd; detesting in that Point, and thinking that Cruelty of Puritans worthy of Fire that will allow no Salvation to any Papists. And then concluding that Part of his Discourse he declar'd, As on the one Part many honest Men, seduc'd with some Errors of Popery, may yet remain good and faithful Subjects; so on the other Part, none of those who truly know and believe the whole Grounds of Popery, can prove either good Christians or faithful Subjects. Having finish'd his Speech, without further Business he prorogu'd the Parliament to the twenty first Day of January next.

The second Session of the second Parliament.

The King's Speech.

The King's Management and Wisdom in this Affair was highly applauded, and universal Rejoicings appear'd among the People; insomuch, that the Ambassadors of the King of Spain and the Arch-Duke made Bonfires, and threw Money among the People in Token of their great Satisfaction. And on the fourth of January the Spanish Ambassador deliver'd a Present to his Majesty from the King his Master, consisting of six Jennets of Andalusia, with Saddles most richly imbroider'd, and Trappings of fine Cloath of Tissue. This was a Present sent before any Knowledge had of the Powder-Plot; but as soon as this was known, there was immediately another Present sent from the Queen of Spain to the Queen of England, purposely to congratulate the King's happy Deliverance from the execrable Treason, and brought by Don John de Mendosa, which was a curious Robe of Murry Sattin, twice imbroider'd about every Seam and Skirt with Gold; the fore Part of which was set with forty eight Tags three Inches long of beaten Gold, hollow within, and fill'd with Amber-Greece: Also two large Chains of Gold, two rich Carkanets, a Velvet Cap with Gold Buttons, finely enamel'd, and a Girdle suitable to the Buttons; all which were presented together in a capacious Vessel of Gold, in Form of a Basin: So that it seems none more rejoic'd for the Overthrow of this Plot for the Catholick Cause, than the Catholick King himself. And now King James was not unmindful of the Lord Monteagle, the first Discoverer of this Conspiracy; for he gave to him and his Heirs for ever, two hundred Pounds a Year in Fee-Farm Rents, and five hundred Pounds a Year besides, during his Life, as a Reward for his good Service.

Congratulations and Presents from Spain.

On the twenty first Day of January the Parliament again met according to the Prorogation; and six Days after a Commission was directed to several Lords and Judges of both Benches, for the Trial of the several Conspirators, namely, Sir Everard Digby Knight, John Graunt, Ambrose Rookwood, and Robert

The Punishment of the Conspirators.

Winter, Esquires, Thomas Winter, Robert Keys, Thomas Bades, and Guido Fawks, Gentlemen or Yeomen. These were all fairly convicted and condemn'd to die; and on the Thursday following Sir Everard Digby, Robert Winter, Graunt and Bates, were accordingly drawn, hang'd and quarter'd at the West-End of St. Paul's Church in London; and on the next Day, the other four, Thomas Winter, Keys, Rookwood and Fawks, were after the same manner executed in the Parliament Yard at Westminster. Of all whom, none was so much lamented as Sir Everard Digby, and not without Cause; for he was a noble Personage, and of excellent Parts, and had it seems been subtilly drawn in, and bound to Secrecy by Oath, when he least imagin'd such a Treason. Not long after, Henry Garnet, Provincial of the English Jesuits, was arraign'd at Guild-Hall, for concealing and promoting the aforesaid Treason, where he was condemn'd to be drawn, hang'd and quarter'd; and accordingly on the third Day of May, he was drawn from the Tower to the West-End of St. Paul's Church, and there executed. At his Death he acknowledg'd his Crime, begg'd Forgiveness, and exhorted all Catholicks never to attempt any Treason against the King or State, as a Method to which God would never give Success. Besides those who suffer'd Death, some others were brought into Danger and Trouble; particularly Henry Lord Mordant, and Edward Lord Sturton, who were brought from the Tower to the Star-Chamber; where tho' they were not charg'd with any direct Point of Treason, yet were obliquely accus'd of neglecting to appear at the Parliament, according to the Summons; for which Neglect alone, without any further Charge, the former was fin'd ten thousand Marks, and the latter six thousand, and both to be Prisoners during the King's Pleasure. But the Burthen fell heavier upon the Earl of Northumberland, who after them being brought to the Star-Chamber, was more directly charg'd with Circumstances concerning the Treason, especially with Regard to Thomas Percy, whom he had admitted to be one of the King's Gentlemen Pensioners, without administering to him the Oath of Supremacy, knowing him to be a Recusant; for which he was punish'd with a thirty thousand Pound Fine, Forfeiture of all his Offices, and Imprisonment during the King's Pleasure.

The People in a Consternation.

While the Parliament was sitting, and all Men in a pleasing State of Security, the publick Satisfaction was strangely disturb'd by a sudden Rumour and Outcry at Court, That the King was stabb'd with an invenom'd Knife at Oking, twenty Miles from London. Upon which the Court-Gates were immediately shut, and double Guards set in all Places about the City, and all Mens Minds were infinitely confounded and distracted: But within two Hours all these Clouds were dispers'd, and a new Sun-shine appear'd, when it was unquestionably known, that the King was safe, and in perfect Health: For which a Proclamation was immediately issu'd out to signify the same to the People; and that Afternoon the King came himself to Whitehall, where innumerable Multitudes, transported with Joy, came flocking to see him. And so general was the Triumph, that the Spanish Ambassador gave Sir Lewis Lewknor, Master of the Ceremonies, a valuable Chain of Gold for bringing him the News. Tho' afterwards, according to Sir Richard Baker, it was thought by some, that this Rumour was politickly invented to cause the Parliament and People to be more tender of the King's Safety; and by making them more sensible what a Treasure they enjoy'd by his Life, they might more willingly part with their Treasure for his well-living. However it was happy for the King, for the Parliament did every Thing that might oblige his Majesty, and gave him three intire Subsidies, and six Fifteenths; besides four Subsidies of four Shillings in the Pound, granted him by the Clergy of the Realm in Convocation. The Parliament likewise made many material Laws for the Discovery and Suppressing of Popish Recusants; and they attainted the Blood of those Traitors that were executed, as also those who were slain in the Field, or dy'd in the Prison. And to compleat all, 'With Hearts full of Affection for God's great Deliverance of
'the

‘ the whole Kingdom from Ruin and Desolation, they made a special Act to have
 ‘ the fifth Day of November for ever solemniz’d with publick Thanksgivings : The fifth of November made a Holy-Day.
 ‘ Imputing the Discovery of the Treason to God, inspiring the King with a ‘ divine Spirit to interpret some dark Phrases in the Letter, above and beyond ‘ all ordinary Construction. When this and many other Acts had pass’d the Royal Assent, on the twenty seventh of May the Parliament was prorogu’d to the eighteenth of November.

And here happily ended that famous Conspiracy, call’d the Gun-Powder-Plot, the Blackness of which hath been ever since annually displaid by the most eloquent Tongues and Pens in the Kingdom; which Thuanus calls such a Monster of Conspiracies as no Age or Country did ever produce; in which the King, Queen, the Royal Family, Nobility, Prelates, Judges, Knights and Gentry, and in effect the whole Body of the Kingdom, were to be exterminated; so that it might be well call’d a Wickedness beyond Expression, as well as Excuse. Yet so different are the Notions or Interests of Mankind, that Garnet and the rest of the Traitors executed for this Plot, were afterwards reputed and pronounc’d Martyrs for the Catholick Cause by the College of Jesuits in Rome.

IV. This last threatening Storm was succeeded by a Calm of several Years, A. D. 1606. Reg. 4. The Arrival of Christian King of Denmark.
 without any violent Agitations, or many memorable Actions; in which Pleasures, Entertainments and Expences, took their several Turns in Court, City and Country. All which were introduc’d by the Arrival of Christianus King of Denmark, Brother to the Queen, who having been long expected, with eight Ships enter’d the River Thames, and anchor’d before Grave’s-End, being met the next Day by King James with Prince Henry, and several of the Lords in Barges, who formally conducted him to London, where he staid above three Weeks. In which Time he was entertain’d with all the Magnificence that could be invented, the King and he riding in great State through the City, where stately Pageants were erected in many Places; and after he had been shown all the chief Buildings and Rarities of the City, had been feasted by the King, by the Earl of Salisbury four Days together at Theobalds, and had seen Tilting, Fencing, Wrestling, and many other Exercises, on the twelfth of August, conducted by the King, the Queen and Prince, and many great Lords, he took Shipping, and in eight Days arriv’d safe in Denmark: A peculiar Happiness when Princes can converse together like private Persons, and are not kept asunder by Jealousies of State. After the King of Denmark’s Departure, on the twenty third of September there arriv’d in London, Francis Prince of Vaudemont, third Son to the Duke of Lorrain, accompany’d with seven Earls, ten Barons, forty Gentlemen of Quality, and a hundred and twenty others; who all went by Coach to the King at Hampton-Court, where for fourteen Days together they were fested, and royally entertain’d, and then return’d home.

On the eighteenth Day of November, the Parliament according to Prorogation met again at Westminster, where the main Consideration was the Union with Scotland, which was much urg’d by those who knew the King’s Mind: The fourth Session of the first Parliament.
 Among whom Sir Francis Bacon, now his Majesty’s Sollicitor, was a principal Instrument, who came prepar’d for it, and first mov’d the House of Commons, ‘ That the Scots might be Naturaliz’d by Act of Parliament; which was oppos’d by several strong and modest Arguments. After many several Debates and Arguings on both Sides concerning this remarkable Affair, on the last Day of March in the following Year, the King sent for both Houses of Parliament to Whitehall, to whom in a formal Speech he earnestly press’d the Matter, and declar’d, ‘ That as there was but Unus Rex, so there ought to be but Unus Grex, and Una Lex; and that his Intention was not, as some idly alledg’d, to give England the Labour and Sweat, and Scotland the Fruit and Sweet; and ‘ he profess’d, he sought this Union only to advance the Greatness of the Empire A. pire here in England, yet with such Cautions as might stand with the Weal of both States. He likewise gave distinct Answer to Objections against, and the Inconveniencies arising from this Union; but all did not satisfy the Parliament, who still apprehended the King's Partiality to his Countrymen, and that Damage would proceed from an Union, where the Laws and Government were of different Natures. The Scots would by no means lessen, or in any Degree derogate from the Dignity of their long continu'd Monarchy; and the English thought they had no Reason to yield to them, and derogate from themselves; and so the Matter rested in this Session of Parliament. They still fear'd that the King would have such an Influence upon the Judges, that the Scots would be Naturaliz'd too soon, therefore they would not be accessary to it; which not long after was confirm'd in Calvin's Case of the Post-nati, and reported by the Lord Chief-Justice Cook, the Lord Chancellor Ellesmere, and most of the Judges of the Kingdom, in the Exchequer Chamber, tho' many Arguments were brought against it. On the fourth Day of July, the Parliament was again prorogu'd first to the sixteenth of November next, and then to the ninth of February in the Year 1609.

Counties.*

Before the Parliament broke up, some Disturbances happen'd in the Midland Parts of the Nation, as in Northamptonshire, Warwickshire and Leicestershire, where many assembled together, first not in a treasonable, but in a riotous and felonious Manner, throwing down many Inclosures, and committing many Outrages of the like kind, and all without any particular Head. Till at length there arose a mean Person, call'd John Reynolds, whom they nam'd Captain Pouch, because he wore a large Leather Pouch by his Side, declaring to the rest, That in that he had sufficient to defend himself against Opposers; tho' it afterwards appear'd that all the Magick in that Repository lay in a Piece of Green Cheese. A Proclamation was issu'd out, strictly commanding them to surcease their Disorders, and declaring them Traitors if they persisted; but this had no Effect, till the King sent the Earl of Huntington, the Earl of Exeter, the Lord Zouch, and Sir Edward Cook, Lord Chief-Justice of England, to suppress them by Force of Arms, and to punish the Levellers according to the Nature of their Crimes; some by Death, as for Treason, and others by Fines, as for Riots; of the former Kind Captain Pouch was made an Example, which put an End to the Disturbance. Besides this Instance of ill dispos'd Persons of the meaner Sort, the Earl of Tyrone, ungratefully forgetting the King's Clemency to him, together with Tirconell, the Lord of Dungannon, and several other Irish Lords, fled into Foreign Parts, purposely to solicit those Princes against their own Sovereign, and to offer the Kingdom of Ireland to the Pope, all which was immediately signify'd to the Realm by Proclamation.

*The King made Free of the Cloth-Work-

Now the King pass'd his Time in Ease and Diversions; and in the Month of June, being attended by several Lords, he din'd with the Lord Mayor of London, Sir John Wats; who after Dinner presented him with a Purse full of Gold, and humbly besought his Majesty, that he would be pleas'd to be free of his Company the Cloth-Workers. To which the King graciously condescended; and thereupon call'd to Sir William Stone, Master of the Company, and familiarly said, Stone, give me thy Hand, I am now a Cloth-Worker; and in Token of my special Favour to this Society, I do here give a brace of Bucks yearly for ever to this Company, at the Election of the Master and Wardens: At which Time also many Lords and Gentlemen were made free of the Cloth-Workers. In the following Month, the King and Prince, with many Lords, din'd at Merchant-Tailors Hall, where the Master and Wardens of that Society presented his Majesty with a Purse of Gold, giving him humble Thanks for honouring their Company with his Royal Presence: And likewise shew'd him a Roll wherein were register'd the Names of seven Kings, one Queen, seventeen Princes and Dukes, two Dutchesles, one Arch-Bishop, thirty one Earls, sixty sixty six Barons, seven Abbots, seven Priors, with a great Number of Knights and Esquires, who had been free of that Company; which his Majesty graciously accepted, but told them, That he himself was already free of another Company; but the Prince his Son should be free of theirs, and that he would see the Garland put on his Head. Whereupon the Master presented the Prince also with a Purse of Gold, which he graciously accepted, and said, That not only himself would be free of the Merchant-Tailors, but the Lords also that were with him should do the like; all which was perform'd with no small Solemnity. and the Prince of the Merchant-Tailors.

And now the King proceeded to his wonted Bounty in new Creations, and by a Writ call'd Sir Thomas Knewet to the Parliament by the Name of Baron of Estrick; and the next Day Sir Julius Caesar, Chancellor of the Exchequer, was sworn a Privy-Counsellor. Not long after Sir Jervis Clifton, Knight, was call'd to the Parliament by Writ, by the Name and Title of Baron of Layton Brameswold; whose only Daughter and Heir was soon after marry'd to Eysme Stuart, Baron D'Aubigny in France, sole Brother to the Duke of Lenox, whom he afterwards succeeded in that Dignity. And as the King in the last Year was pleas'd to advance two great Men to the honourable Order of the Garter, namely, the Earl of Salisbury, and Thomas Howard Viscount Bindon; so in the following Year, and the Month of May 1608, he rais'd two others to that Honour, namely George Earl of Dunbar, and Philip Earl of Montgomery; the former of which left both his Honour and Life not very long after, and was magnificently interr'd in the Abby Church at Westminster. New Promotions.

Reg. 6.

Tho' the Affair of the Union was not approv'd by the Parliament of England, yet that of Scotland at this Time was more inclinable to join in it, especially when they found the King of England so zealous for it. He naturally thought that the Work would be more easily effected, if a Beginning was made in Scotland, and therefore he call'd a Parliament in that Kingdom, which was held by Lodowick Duke of Lenox, as Commissioner for his Majesty, in the Room of the Earl of Montross then deceas'd. The Estates, to facilitate the King's Desire, did allow all the Articles concluded by the Commissioners in the Treaty, with this Proviso, 'That the same should be in like manner ratify'd by the Parliament of England, otherwise the Conclusions taken should not have the Force of a Law: And it was also declar'd, 'That if the Union should take Effect, the Kingdom of Scotland notwithstanding should remain an absolute and free Monarchy; and the Fundamental Laws receive no Alteration. But after all the King's Endeavours, by means of the Suspicions of the English, and the Stiffness of the Scotch, the whole Design fell and sunk to nothing; and all that was obtain'd from the English Parliament, was, That the Laws of Hostility, anciently made between England and Scotland, were repeal'd, that the old Resentments which caus'd the Disunion might be remov'd. And in the said Act they provided, 'That if a natural born Englishman did commit any Misdemeanor in Scotland, and fly into England, he should be try'd where he was taken, and not carry'd into Scotland to receive Sentence there; 'till such Time as both Kingdoms shall be made one in Laws and Government. And further they proceeded not; for they found and fear'd the old Enmity would for some Time continue: For since the King's coming into England, the loose and unsettled Borderers, that liv'd upon Spoil and Rapine, had upon these new Changes committed new Outrages; who tho' they were suppress'd by the Garrisons of Berwick and Carlisle, and many of them made Examples, yet Custom and Habit had bred a natural Fierceness in them, which nothing but new Laws and Usages could fully restrain. The Laws made in Scotland to the Prejudice of the English, were likewise repeal'd; so that all Passages were made and left smooth on both Sides, for future Times to accomplish that Work. The Scots inclinable to an Union.

The Design drops.

This Year was somewhat remarkable for the Execution both of Priests and Pirates; for on the eleventh of April, George Jervis a seminary Priest, and the Some Persons executed.
twenty twenty third of June following, Thomas Garnet a Jesuit, were both executed according to Law at Tyburn; and the latter had the Favour offer'd him to be pardon'd, if he would but take the Oath of Allegiance, which he utterly refus'd. About the same Time there were many famous English Pirates, some of whom likewise turn'd Mahometans, and liv'd in great State at Tunis, among which were Ward, Bishop, Sir Francis Verney, and Glanville. These and several others, after many Depredations and outrageous Acts at Sea, were suppress'd partly by the King of Spain, and partly by the King of England, and nineteen of their Associates being taken, were according to their Deserts hang'd at Wapping.

The Earl of Dorset's Death.

Salisbury made Treasurer.

In the same Year the Lord-Treasurer, Thomas Earl of Dorset, being at the Council-Table at Whitehall, dy'd suddenly, while he was pulling out some Papers of his Title to Lucies Lands in Kent, which put an End to that Dispute which he had brought before the Council. His sudden Death, and effeminate Life, gave Occasion to his Enemies to make severe and unusual Interpretations; but his Head being open'd, there were found in it certain little Bags of Water, which by breaking might naturally cause such a Death. He was undoubtedly of excellent Parts, and in his Place exceeding industrious; in which he was succeeded by the famous Earl of Salisbury, a Courtier and Politician from his Infancy; tho' Nature was not propitious to his Outside, as having a crook'd Back, yet she supply'd that Defect with admirable Endowments of Mind. The Earl of Northampton was also made Lord Privy-Seal, and these were the two prime Ministers of State, upon whose Shoulders the King laid the main Burden of all his Affairs. Another great Minister was the Earl of Suffolk, who was made Lord-Chamberlain; but he came far behind in the Management of the King's Business, having a Spirit of a grosser Nature, fitter to part a Fray, and compose the Differences of a disorder'd Court, than those of a Kingdom.

A. D. 1602. Reg. 7. Being supported by these Counsellors, the King joining with Henry the Fourth of France, undertook a Mediation between the King of Spain and the Confederate States of Holland, and brought them to a Treaty of Amity, in which the States were acknowledg'd Free and Independent; and this after they had manag'd a famous and bloody Contest of above forty Years Continuance. This was the first Scene in which King James appear'd abroad, either as a Party or Mediator, since his Accession to the Throne of England; and tho' the Treaty prov'd of extraordinary Consequence, yet it is said that his Part in it was as mean as that of the King of France was glorious; and his Conduct towards the States, for whom he mediated, and towards France with whom he join'd, was quite different from the Methods and Maxims of his renowned Predecessor. For besides several unusual Condescensions to the French in the Persons of his Ambassadors, which gave Foreigners a mean Idea of his Government, he was tax'd with being subtle and insincere in the Treaty which he appear'd to promote and incourage. And what Opinion the French Ministers had of him in this Affair, appears from the printed Negotiations of Jeannin, the chief Agent for France, who in several Letters to the French King his Master, wrote That King James was never hearty in the Treaty, but had all along condemn'd the Hollanders for throwing off the Sovereignty of Spain, upon the Account of its bad Example. In Answer to one of which Letters, King Henry, whose Opinion of King James was never very great, own'd his Knowledge of that King's ill Intentions towards the States, and withal told Jeannin, That his Carriage did not break his Sleep; and concluded his Letter with an Expression of Contempt, rarely us'd among Princes of that Rank, I know his Capacity, and the Inclinations of his Subjects.

About this Time, the Suburbs between London and Westminster had many ruinous Piles of Buildings, which Age had worn out, and Industry and Riches began to revive. Among the rest the Lord-Treasurer Salisbury, out of the old Stables Stables of Durham-House in the Strand, erected a noble Fabrick to be Rival to the Old-Exchange, which the King by his Presence dignify'd with the Name of Britain's Burse, since call'd the New-Exchange. But he took particular Notice of the increasing Buildings upon the new Foundations, which he look'd upon as a weakly Constitution in the Head of the Kingdom, as drawing a Flux of Humours and Diseases too near the Court; besides he fear'd the Plague might endanger Whitehall, if that Distemper increas'd. And therefore, with mature Deliberation of his Council, he forbad all new Buildings to be erected for the future, within two Miles of the City; and by Proclamation strictly commanded, if any were made, they should be pull'd down, which however was not observ'd 'till seven Years after. On the eighth of May, by another Proclamation the King prohibited all Foreign Nations, that after August they should not Fish upon any of the Coasts of England, Scotland or Ireland, nor the adjacent Isles, without the special Licence from the Commissioners ordain'd for that Purpose. At this Time the making of Allum, which hitherto with great Charges had been brought from Foreign Parts, was by several that labour'd in it, and now lastly by Sir John Bouchier brought to Perfection in England; and thereupon the King prohibited upon Pain of Confiscation any Allum to be brought from beyond the Seas, and assum'd the whole Trade and Business of it to himself.

The New-Exchange built.

Other Buildings prohibited.

At this Time Prince Henry, arriving at sixteen Years of Age, began to show himself in a more Heroick Manner than was usual with Princes of his Time, by Tiltings, Barriers, and other Martial Exercises on Horseback; which caught the Peoples Eyes, and made their Tongues the Messengers of their Hearts, in daily extolling his hopeful and gallant Behaviour to Admiration. Being thus qualify'd, the King now thought him full Ripe for the Honour of Knighthood, in order to which, according to an ancient Custom, the King receiv'd an Aid of his Subjects throughout England, which was levy'd with great Moderation. Then to add new Splendor to this glorious Youth, he not long after created him Prince of Wales, after this solemn Manner: Gar-ter King at Arms bore the Letters Patents, the Earl of Suffex the Robes of Purple Velvet, the Earl of Huntington the Train, the Earl of Cumberland the Sword, the Earl of Rutland the Ring, the Earl of Darby the Rod, the Earl of Shrewsbury the Cap and Coronet, the Earl of Nottingham and Northampton supported the Prince, who was only in his Surcoat and Bare-headed. Being conducted in that Manner to the King, and attended by twenty five Knights of the Bath of eminent Note, Secretary Salisbury read the Letters Patents, while the Prince continu'd upon his Knees before the King; and at the accustom'd Words the King invested him with the Robe, the Sword, the Cap and Coronet, the Rod and the Ring, and then with a Kiss the Solemnity ended. After this, it was thought proper that he should keep his Court by himself; and thereupon Sir Thomas Chaloner, a learned Gentleman, who had before been his Governor, was now made his Lord-Chamberlain, Sir Edward Philips his Chancellor, and all other Officers assign'd him belonging to the Court of a Prince, which was kept at St. James's. In all his Management he shew'd himself so ripe for Majesty, that he seem'd to be a King while he was yet but a Prince; and all Mens Eyes began to be fix'd upon him as the great Hopes of the Nation, to the increasing Jealousie of the King himself, who now endeavouring to find a suitable Match for him, sent Sir Charles Cornwallis Ambassador into Spain to treat with that King for his eldest Daughter; but this never met with the desir'd Effect.

Prince Henry created Prince of Wales.

He has a distinct Court.

This Year prov'd fatal to King Henry the Great of France, who in the midst of all his Grandeur and Glory, was by one Ravillack assassinated and slain in the open Streets of Paris, to the Surprise of all Christendom. It has been observ'd, That this great Man, when he came first to the Crown, was a profess'd Protestant; but finding himself in a tottering Condition among his Popish Subjects, jects; he began first to comply with them in Ecclesiastical Affairs; which yet so little satisfy'd the Jesuits, that one of their Instruments stabb'd him into the Mouth with a Knife, without much Hurt: Upon which Accident an Intimate of his freely told him, That the Hand of God was visible in this Action; for he had now deny'd his Religion but with his Mouth; but let him take Care of denying it with his Heart, for if he did, he fear'd God would strike him there also: Both which were remarkably accomplish'd. The Contagion and Fear of this Blow soon reach'd into England, where the King by Proclamation strictly commanded all Jesuits and Priests out of the Kingdom, and all Recusants to their own Houses, and not to come within ten Miles of the Court, without special Licence. Then to secure all his Subjects, he caus'd 'em to take the Oath of Allegiance; which the Parliament, then sitting, both Lords and Commons began, and the rest of the People follow'd, to the King's great Satisfaction. Then turning from Matters of Policy to those of Trade, upon the humble Petition of the East-India Merchants, the King was pleas'd to enlarge their Privileges granted them by Queen Elizabeth, gave them a Charter to continue for ever, and enabled them to be a Body Corporate; which so encourag'd the Merchants, that they built a Ship of twelve hundred Tun, the greatest that was ever made in this Kingdom by Merchants; which the King and Prince honour'd with going to Deptford to see it, and then nam'd it The Trades Increase: And at the same Time gave to Sir Thomas Smith, Governor of that Company, a fair Chain of Gold, with a Jewel, wherein was his own Picture. But this great Ship, having been in the Red Sea, and returning to Banham, was there unfortunately Lost, and most of her Men cast away. But then the King himself built the finest Man of War that was ever known in England, being of the Burthen of fourteen hundred Tuns, and carrying sixty four Pieces of great Ordnance; which he gave to his Son Prince Henry, and nam'd it after his own Dignity, The Prince.

The fifth Session of the first Parliament.

The King's Speech.

But long before these Transactions, the Parliament that had been prorogu'd in the Year 1607, met again on the ninth Day of February, and continu'd sitting a great Part of the Year with fewer Compliments, and less Satisfaction than formerly. For the King and his Friends were now labouring hard, and using all Methods and Arguments to induce them to grant new Supplies of Money, when many thought there was no just Occasion; and there wanted not some in both Houses that openly said, THE WHOLE WEALTH OF England was not sufficient for the King's vast Bounty, and therefore it was in vain to give him Money who would give it away again: For it was said that he had made Gold and Silver as plentiful in Edinburgh, as it was in Jerusalem in the Reign of Solomon. Besides this, they began to complain of general Grievances, and of the King's Inroachments upon the publick Liberty, by his Proclamations, the High-Commission Court, and by other Means. To put a stop to these and the like Oppositions, the King summon'd both Houses of Parliament to Whitehall; where in a Speech he told them, That tho' the King's Heart was in the Hands of the Lord, yet he would set it before the Eyes of the People; alluring them, That he never design'd to govern by any Law but that of the Land, tho' it was disputed among them, as if he had an Intention to alter the Law, and govern by the absolute Power of a King. He knew the Power of Kings, and compar'd it to the Power Divine: For as God can create and destroy, make and unmake at his Pleasure, so Kings can give Life and Death, judge all, and be judg'd of none. They can exalt low Things, and abuse high Things, making the Subjects like Men at Chess, a Pawn to take a Bishop or a Knight. But still all Kings, who were not Tyrants, or Perjur'd, would always bind themselves within the Limits of the Laws, and they that perswaded them to the contrary, were Vipers and Pests both against them and the Common-wealth. Yet, as it was Blasphemy to dispute what God might do, so it was Sedition in Subjects to dispute what a King might do in the Height of his Power : And as he would not have Subjects discourse of his Power, so he would do nothing but what was consonant to Law and Reason. After this he proceeded to speak much in Commendation of the Common Law; and to thank the House of Commons for burning some Papers presented as Grievances, giving them Rules how to receive Grievances, among which, They should not meddle with the main Points of Government, which would be to lessen his Craft, who had been thirty Years at his Trade in Scotland, and serv'd an Apprenticeship of seven Years here. But after these, with more obliging Expressions, he shew'd the emergent Cause of his great Expences, declaring, That when he first open'd his Necessities to them, his Purse only labour'd, but now his Desires were made so publick, his Reputation labour'd as well as his Purse : For the World would think it want of Love in them, or Merit in him, that had lessen'd their Hearts, and ty'd up their Hands. In Conclusion, after the passing of many good Laws, which the Reader will meet with in the Statute Book, he obtain'd one Subsidy and a Fifteenth ; and after this Parliament had continu'd above six Years in Being, and had five Meetings, and went through a great Number of useful Acts, both for promoting many Advantages, and suppressing many Mischiefs, it was dissolv'd upon the thirty first Day of December. The Parliament dissolv'd.

V. All Things being now in a reasonable State of Quiet and Calmness, the King may be said to live at this Time in the Height of his Diversions and Expences, keeping two several Courts besides his own; for as the Prince was Master of St. Jam's's, so the Queen was Mistress of Somerset-House, to which she gave the Name of Denmark-House, and that continu'd as long as she liv'd. She was not without several great Men to attend her, for outward Magnificence, the Court being then in a continu'd Course of Interludes and Maskarades, where she and her Ladies, like so many Sea-Nymphs, or Nereids, often appear'd in strange and various Dresses, to the Wonder of the Spectators ; while the King himself was not a little delighted with such extraordinary Entertainments, that made the Night more glorious than the Day. She had also her particular Favourites in one Place, as the King had his in another ; for she affected the Earl of Pembroke the elder Brother, and he the younger, whom he made Earl of Montgomery and Knight of the Garter. But still either not finding him suitable to his Humour or Affections, or viewing another more agreeable Object, his Fancy run with a violent Stream upon a young Gentleman, born about Edinburgh, of no great Parts or Birth, but of a comely Aspect, and a courtly Address. His Name was Robert Car, who being lately come from France, in a Tournament before the King, by a Fall off his Horse broke his Leg; which Accident gave the King occasion to take Notice of him, and hearing that his Name was Car, remember'd he had a Page of that Name when he came first into England, which was found to be the same Person. The King recollecting his Thoughts, fix'd them upon this Object of Commiseration, and gave particular Orders to have him lodg'd in the Court, and to have his own Physicians and Surgeons use their best Endeavours for his Recovery. The King often visited him during his Restraint, sometimes an Hour or more discoursing with him upon several Subjects ; and tho' he found no great Depth of Learning or Experience, yet such a smooth and calm Outside, made him judge there might be a fit Harbour for his most retir'd Thoughts. As soon as he recover'd, the King with great Satisfaction made him a Knight, and Gentleman of his Bed-Chamber, took the Pains himself to teach him the Latin Tongue, and laid a Foundation by his daily Discourses to improve him into a Capacity of receiving his most endearing Affections.

And now all Addresses were made to Sir Robert Car, who was said to be Favourite in Ordinary ; no Suit nor Reward were manag'd but by his Means ; his Hand distributed Favours, and his Hand restrain'd them ; and the Lords could scarce have a Smile without his Approbation. And what greatly added to his encreasing Power, was the Death of the Earl of Dunbar, who was the King's old Servant, and the Cabinet of his Secret Counsels; so that he solely took them into his Charge, together with the Office of Lord High-Treasurer of Scotland, which Staff the other had left behind him: And tho' it could be no mighty Supporter, yet the Credit of it carry'd some Reputation into his own Country, where it was his Happiness to be extoll'd, as well as in England. Then further to aggrandise this young Favourite, the King created him Baron of Brandspeck, and Viscount Rocheſter, and shortly after Knight of the Garter, together with his Son Charles Duke of York, and the Earl of Arundel. Thus was he drawn up by the Beams of Majesty, to shine with the greatest Splendor, often conteſting with the Prince himſelf in his own Sphere. For the Prince, being of a high-born Spirit, and meeting with a young Competitor in his Father's Affections, of a ſhort and ſudden Growth, thought the Infection would increaſe too near him, and therefore he uſ'd all reaſonable Means to ſtifle and ſuppreſs it: And this Conteſt was gradually blown up by ſome Sparks of Love, as well as Emulation, being both amorous, warm and youthful, and by Accident fixing their Thoughts upon one Object, contracted to a third Perſon, in which the Viſcount gain'd the Superiority, but to his final Ruin.

He is a great Favourite.

A. D. 1612. In the mean Time, while Fortune thus ſmil'd upon the Viſcount Rocheſter, it frown'd with as much Severity upon the Lord Sanquir, a Baron of the ſame Nation, and marry'd into a conſiderable Family in England. This Man too much valuing himſelf upon his unfortunate Skill in Fencing, undertook a Deſign to affront and diſparage a Fencing-Maſter in his own School, whoſe Name was John Turner; but he apprehenſive of his Deſign, preſs'd ſo rudely upon the Baron, that he push'd out one of his Eyes. The Baron being afterwards in the Court of France, where that King freely entertaining him in Diſcourſe, ask'd him how he loſt his Eye; and underſtanding it was done by a Sword, without knowing the Circumſtances, he reply'd, Does the Man live that did it? The Queſtion from the Mouth of a King blew up new Fires of Revenge in the Baron's Breſt; and ſeveral Years after, coming into England, he hir'd two of his Countrymen, Gray and Carlisle, to murder the Fencing-Maſter, which they did with a Caſe of Piſtols at his own Houſe in White-Friars. One of the Murderers was apprehended upon the Borders of Scotland, the other in a Ship bound for Hamburgh; and the Lord Sanquir having abſconded, and hearing that no leſs than a thouſand Pounds was offer'd for his Head, he reſign'd himſelf to the King's Mercy, by the Mediation of Dr. Abbot, now Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury, to whom he preſented himſelf as an Object of Commiſeration. But no Interceſſion could prevail, and their Lives ſatify'd the Law, without allowing the Baron the Death of a Nobleman, who in a very penitent Manner ſuffer'd before the Gate of Weſtminſterhall.

The Caſe of the Lord Sanquir.

His Execution.

Still the juvenile Favourite Rocheſter maintain'd his Ground againſt all Oppoſers; and among his chief Friends Sir Thomas Overbury was the Creature he moſt particularly honour'd with his Familiarity. This begot an Emulation between the two great Earls of Salisbury and Suffolk, who ſhould ingroſs him; each preſenting, proffering, and accumulating Favours upon Overbury's Relations. His Father was accordingly made a Judge in Wales, and he himſelf was offer'd a Place; but being naturally of a rough and insolent Temper, and ſwell'd with being the Confident of ſuch a Favourite, whoſe Munificence could not be retail'd without him, he with a kind of Scorn neglected both their Friendſhips, and yet made uſe of them when he had Occaſion. Before that Time the politick Miniſter, the Earl of Salisbury, had made an Alliance with the Houſe of Suffolk, by marrying his eldeſt Son, the Lord Cranborn, to Catharine the eldeſt Daughter of that Family; and that Reſentments might not become Hereditary, he was a great Inſtrument in marrying the young Earl of Effex to the Lady Frances Howard, another of thoſe Siſters. The Earl of Effex was then but fourteen fourteen Years of Age, and the Lady thirteen when they were marry'd; and therefore he was sent to Travel in Foreign Countries 'till Time might capacitate their Co-Habitation. The Lady in the mean Time was kept by her Mother, and educated in all the enchanting Pleasures of the Court; and being a celebrated Beauty, every Tongue became an Orator at her Shrine, and the Prince himself sent out many amorous Glances as the Ambassadors of his Inclinations. But the victorious Lady more favouring the increasing Fortunes of the Viscount Rochester, the most zealous of her Adorers, the Prince slighted her, as tho' he had offer'd his Addresſes more to distract the other's Amours, than to pursue his own Desires. Upon the Return of the Earl of Essex, the Countess, who was actuated by the most violent Resolutions of Enjoyment, had a double Task to undergo; first to hinder her Husband from carnal Knowledge of her, and then to secure the Viscount's Affections; for unlawful Love always produces the greatest Jealousies and Confusions. In order to effect her impious Designs, she had recourse to infernal Arts, and consulted one Mrs. Turner, a Doctor of Physick's Widow, whom Prodigality had reduc'd to Poverty, and render'd her fit for any Mischiefe; and she introduc'd into their Consultation one Forman an Astrologer, and a reputed Magician, who supply'd the Lady with Charms, Spells and philtrous Potions, both to debilitate the Ardour of the Husband, and to inflame the Passion of the Gallant. These Things being manag'd and administer'd according to unknown Arts, they gave this uneasie Woman Assurances of extraordinary Effects. Her amorous Invitations that drew the Viscount to admire her, were imputed to the Operation of those Drugs he had tasted; and the very unnatural Comportment she express'd to her Husband, was concluded by her to be the Effects of those wonderful Potions and Powders administer'd to him: So ready is the Imagination to take Impression of those Things we are willing to believe.

The unhappy Marriage of the Earl of Essex.

The Wicked Designs of his Countess.

The innocent Earl being made sensible of his own Misfortunes, complain'd to her Father, in hopes of Relief; and through his Importunities and Threatnings, she was perswaded to retire into the Country to Chartley with her Husband; where her Disappointments so enrag'd her Spleen, that she would scarce afford common Civility to him, and brought her self to a continu'd Melancholy and Sullenness. At length she wrote to her wicked Correspondents Forman and Mrs. Turner, That she saw little Effect produc'd by all the Potions she had given her Husband, for he seem'd more eager after her than ever, and she was sensible that the Viscount would never love her, if he knew her Husband enjoy'd her, whom with Difficulty she had put off; but how long she should be able to resist his Violence she knew not, and therefore unless they design'd to see her the most miserable Creature in the World, they should speedily assist her, and for their Reward they should make their own Proposals. And now all the abominable Tricks that could arise from Sorcery and Female Aversion being imploy'd to debilitate the Earl, he at length suffer'd her to steer her own Course; and the next Winter came up with her to London, where she us'd all the Ornaments that Art and Nature could invent, to inflame the Viscount's Affections; and her Absence increasing his Passion, they had many repeated Meetings. Several Persons qualify'd for such kind of Offices were imploy'd; and when Nature was infecbled and exhausted, new Spirits were purchas'd at the most extravagant Rates to rekindle their unlawful Fires. Thus the Viscount triumph'd in his Conquests, but as to the Height of the King's Favours, the great Salisbury was still an Obstacle in his Way, so that he could not arrive to that Pitch of Grandeur in his Time, that he afterwards obtain'd. One Thing among the rest, in which he defeated or disappointed him, was in Moderating the King's Bounty to him on this Occasion: The King had given to Rochester five thousand Pounds, which this Treasurer thought too extravagant a Present, where there was so little Merit, therefore he laid the Money in Silver upon Tables in his Gallery at Salisbury House; and having invited the King to Dinner, he made this Room the Passage to his Entertainment. The King surpriz'd at the Sight of these great Heaps of Money, ask'd for what purpose it was assign'd; to whom the Earl reply'd, That he had Orders from his Majesty to give so much to the Viscount Rochester. The King, who either carelessly thought five thousand Pounds was no more than the Name of so much in Scotland, or subtly finding the Treasurer's Meaning, said, It was too much for one Man, and made him be contented with less than half of the Sum. But the King was generally profuse to his Favourites; particularly one Day being in his Gallery at Whitehall, with only Sir Henry Rich a young ingenious Knight, and James Maxwell, one of his Bed-Chamber; some Porters pass'd by with three thousand Pounds going to the Privy-Purse: Sir Henry whispering Maxwell, the King ask'd what he said; and being told he wish'd for such a Sum, he immediately order'd the Porters to carry it to his Lodgings, with this Expression, You think you have a great Reward; but I am more delighted in giving you the Money, than you in receiving it.

And now the King cast his Thoughts towards Peterborough, where the Body of his unfortunate Mother lay, which he caus'd to be translated to a Magnificent Tomb at Westminster; where many solemn Ceremonies were perform'd, to pay the last Tribute to her Memory. About the same Time the King, in special Favour for the present Plantation of English Colonies in Virginia, granted a Lottery to be held at the West-End of St. Paul's; of which one Thomas Sharples, a Tailor of London, had the chief Prize, amounting to four thousand Crowns in fair Plate. This Year was also observable for the Arrival of Sir Robert Sherley, third Son to Sir Thomas Sherley of Suffex, who for sixteen Years had betaken himself to Travel, and had serv'd several Christian Princes for the Space of five Years, but chiefly Rodolphus the Emperor, who for his Services made him an Earl of the Empire. He afterwards travell'd into Persia, and serv'd that Emperor ten Years, who made him General of the Artillery, and had so great an Esteem for his Person, that he gave him the Lady Tersia in Marriage, whose Sister was one of the Queens of Persia: After which, the Persian employ'd him to several Princes of Europe; and sent him in a special Embassie to King James in England, to whom he deliver'd his Letters, and shew'd his Commission; all which testify'd the Persian's great Love and Affection to his Majesty, with voluntary Offers of free Commerce to all his Subjects throughout the Persian Dominions. After a Year's Stay in England, in which Time his Lady was deliver'd of a Son, to whom the Queen was God-Mother, and Prince Henry God-Father, he left the Child in this Kingdom, and then with his Lady took Shipping for Persia.

Prince Pala-

The Death of Prince Henry.

It was in the tenth Year of King James's Reign, and the sixteenth of October, when the illustrious Prince Frederick, Count Palatine of the Rhine, with whom a Treaty of Marriage had been made with the King's Daughter Elizabeth, arriv'd at Gravesend; to whom the Duke of Lenox and several other Lords were sent by his Majesty, who conducted him to Whitehall, and from thence into the great Banqueting-House; where the King, the Queen, the Prince, and the Lady her self, entertain'd him after the most obliging Manner, and then by Barge conducted him to Essex House, appointed for his Reception. It was many Years since any King's Daughter had been marry'd in England; which now occurring, and to so worthy a Prince, was a just Cause of Triumph and Rejoycing: But according to the frequent Changes of human Happiness, Joy was no sooner set forth, but was pursu'd by an unexpressible Sorrow; first by the Sickness, and then the Death of that great Delight and Hopes of the Nation, Prince Henry, who on the sixth Day of November was snatch'd away at the Age of eighteen Years, eight Months, and seventeen Days. Several Passages are related of this excellent Prince that redound to his Honour; particularly once when he was Hunting the Stag, it happen'd that the Game was kill'd, and his Sport spoil'd by a Butcher's Dog; at which the Company endeavour'd your'd to incense him against the Butcher, and told him, That if his Father had been thus interrupted, he would have sworn so that no Man could have endur'd it : Away, reply'd the Prince, all the Diversion in the World is not worth one Oath. At another Time, when the French Ambassador, upon taking his leave, ask'd him, What Service he would command him to his Master, the Prince bad him tell his Master What he was doing, being then tossing a Pike. The World is always ready to attribute the Deaths of beloved Princes to unfair Practices, and it became the general Rumour of that Time, that the Prince was poison'd. Censures upon it. We dare not determine that nice Matter, yet the Presumptions seem too strong to be bury'd in Silence ; especially if we consider the violent Contests between him and Rocheſter, and the wicked Practices of that implacable Man. For the Prince being an open-hearted Man, and resenting every Injury done to his Nation, had once declar'd, That if ever he was King, he would not leave one of that Family unpunish'd ; and therefore he and the Howards could not think themselves secure, 'till he had paid his Debt to Nature ; and so the Manner of his Death was pass'd over by a Certificate from some Court Physicians, 'That his Liver was paler than ordinary, his Gall without any Choler in it, his Spleen, Midriff and Lungs were very black, and his Stomach in no Part offended ; as if no Poison could produce such Effects. On the seventh of December he was solemnly carry'd on a Hearse to Westminster, where the Pomp of his Funeral was fully compleated by the Tears and Lamentations of the People.

But all Tears were soon dry'd up at Court, where all Preparations were making for the Solemnities of a Christmass, and a Marriage between the Prince Palatine and the excellent Lady Elizabeth. In order to the latter, on the seventh of February, the Prince was first install'd Knight of the Garter at Windsor, together with the Deputy of Grave Maurice of Nassaw. And on Shrove-Sunday, and St. Valentine's Day, the much desir'd Marriage was solemniz'd after an extraordinary Manner in the Chappel at Whitehall. The beautiful Bride was publickly led by two Batchelors, her Brother Prince Charles, and the Earl of Northampton, Lord Privy-Seal ; she being gloriously adorn'd in White, having a resplendent Crown of Gold upon her Head, her Hair dishevel'd down her Back, nobly shining with Jewels like a Constellation, and her Train supported by twelve young Ladies, finely attir'd with all the Emblems of Innocence. The King himself gave her in Marriage, the Archbishop of Canterbury perform'd the Office, and the Bishop of Bath and Wells preach'd the Nuptial Sermon ; during which Time, some peculiar Coruscations and Lightnings of Joy appear'd in her Countenance, which some thought to be Presages of her future Misfortunes. This Marriage was celebrated the first Night with a magnificent Masque of the chief of the Nobility, both Lords and Ladies ; the second Night with another of the Gentlemen of the Middle-Temple and Lincolns-Inn ; and the third Night with another as remarkable presented by the Gentlemen of the Inner-Temple and Grays-Inn : And after this the Lord Mayor and Aldermen presented the fair Bride with a Chain of Oriental Pearl, valu'd at two thousand Pounds. Now when all Things had been perform'd for the Honour of this Marriage, which either Love and Observance could invent, or Art and Magnificence could effect, on the tenth of April the illustrious Couple took leave of the King and Queen at Rocheſter ; and there taking Shipping, they arriv'd not long after at Flushing : From whence the Earl of Lenox, the Earl of Arundel, the Viscount Lisle, and the Lord Harington waited upon them to their capital City of Heidelberg ; being receiv'd in all Places as they pass'd with great Pomp and State. On the fourteenth of June the English Lords return'd home ; only the Lord Harington dy'd by the way at Worms, whose Corps was brought over, and interr'd in England. A Gentleman much lamented in his own Person, but much more in that of his admiral Son, whose Decease shortly after put a Period to that noble Family. About

Salisbury's Death.*

About the same Time dy'd that famous Statesman, the Earl of Salisbury, and Lord Treasurer of England; a Person of admirable Abilities, and one of whom Osborn confesses, That with all his Faults, he was a Man of incomparable Prudence, who coming so near such an unadvised Scatterer as King James, might have much more enrich'd his Family, had he not look'd upon low Things with Contempt; leaving much to the Gleaning of his Servants, of whom many were afterwards advanc'd. He further intimates, 'That this Earl was the 'first ill Treasurer, and the last good one since Queen Elizabeth's Reign; the last Part of which Censure might naturally arise from the numerous and sudden Changes in this high Office. For within this Reign, and the Compass of a very few Years, the Earl of Salisbury was succeeded by five several Treasurers: First, The Earl of Suffolk, who held the Office longest, and was discharg'd in a great Measure for the Mismanagement of his Lady: Secondly, Sir Henry Montague, taken from the King's Bench, and made Earl of Manchester, and within less than a Year discharg'd: Thirdly, Sir Lyonel Cranfield, who was made Earl of Middlesex, and then not only thrown out, but also fin'd fifty thousand Pounds: Fourthly, Sir James Lee, taken from the King's Bench, and made Earl of Marlborough, who thought fit to resign his Place in a short Time: And lastly, Sir Richard Weston, from Chancellor of the Exchequer was made Lord Treasurer, and shortly after Earl of Portland.

Changes in the Treasury.*

Rochester's Greatest.

Upon the Death of the Earl of Salisbury, the aspiring Rochester without Controul assum'd the whole Administration of the Government, executed the Place of Principal Secretary, receiv'd Pacquets and dispatch'd Answers, without the Knowledge of the King or Council, and all done by the Privy, if not Assistance of his Confident Sir Thomas Overbury. But when that Gentleman understood that Rochester design'd to marry the Lady Essex, he dealt freely and honestly with him, declaring to him, That nothing could be more destructive to both their growing Hopes, than to lay a Foundation upon so much Injustice, as to marry another Man's Wife, while her Husband was living; and therefore passionately desir'd him, To fix his Thoughts upon a more honourable Object, and not upon one, whose Disloyalty to her Husband was branded with perpetual Infamy. This rough Advice found no Reception in the debauch'd Mind of the Viscount, who being fascinated with the Charms of his amorous Mistress, did not only estrange himself from the Friendship of Overbury, but both denounc'd Enmity, and also excited the Fury of the Countess against him: And she, fir'd with the most implacable Resentments, mustering up all the Passion and Envy that a Female Malice could invent, never left him 'till she had discharg'd all the Volleys of her Rage upon him. She importun'd the Earl of Northampton her Uncle, to vindicate the Honour of their Family; ly; and he joining with the Viscount, they agreed to take away Overbury's Life by Poison; but that not being easie to be done in a publick Way, they contriv'd to exasperate the King against him, and procure him to be imprison'd, that they might with greater Privacy effect his Ruin. The King about this Time designing to send an Ambassador into Flanders to the Arch-Duke, the Viscount treacherously recommended Sir Thomas Overbury to him for that Service; and dealing on both Sides he us'd all Methods to dissuade him from undertaking the Employment, as well knowing that his Refusal would highly disoblige the King. Overbury was not so little a Courtier, or so void of Reason, as not to see the Danger of disobeying the King's Commands; therefore the Viscount promis'd him both to mollifie the King's Displeasure, and to procure him better Preferment; while on the other Side he so aggravated his Offence in Refusing his Obedience, and so incens'd the King, that the poor Gentleman was without Hearing sent to the Tower for Contempt. Then to compleat his strange Tragedy, Sir William Wade Lieutenant of the Tower was displac'd, and Sir Jervase Elways put into his Room.

He is thrown into the Tower.

This

This first Point being gain'd, the Countess, like another Alecto, drove on furiously with two Wheels, which ran over all Impediments; the one was to procure a Divorce between her and her Husband, that she might marry the Viscount; and the other was to remove Sir Thomas Overbury, who had laid such a Stain upon her Honour, as nothing but his Blood could expiate. For these she had several Instruments and Agents, particularly the Earl of Northampton, who resenting his Niece's Grievances, acquainted the King with her Virgin Modesty, how unwilling she was to divulge her Husband's Infirmities, and how long she had been marry'd without enjoying the Rights of a Wife; that the Earl's Inability must needs produce an unnatural Conjunction, such as neither Law nor Reason could excuse; and that there was an entire Affection between the Viscount and her self, which ought to be encourag'd, as more suitable to Equity and Nature. This was seconded by the Viscount's humble Submissions to the King's great Wisdom, who he acknowledg'd had not only rais'd him to his present Condition, but might yet make him more happy, by uniting him to a Lady of so much Honour and Virtue. The King, who abundantly delighted to compleat the Happiness of those he lov'd, immediately granted a Commission under the Broad-Seal, to several Bishops and others, to try the whole Cause, who accordingly made their Appearance. But before they proceeded any further, they empanell'd a Jury of twelve discreet Matrons to search the Countess, whither she was a Maid or not, as she pretended to be in her written Allegations; for if that prov'd true, they might fix upon a Nullity, and so separate them for the Honour of her Virginity. The Countess, under a Pretence of Modesty and Shame to undergo such an Examination, would not expose her Face to the Light, but procur'd leave of the Court to appear in a Veil before the Matrons; by which Means she had an Opportunity to send in a young Girl in her Place, who in the Opinion of the Jury pass'd for a real Virgin. Then Articles being drawn up in Form, the good Earl, willing to be freed from so horrid a Plague, confess'd that he had several Times attempted to enjoy her, but he never did, and believ'd he never should. Upon these Grounds the Judges proceeded to a formal Sentence of Divorce and Separation, in such Terms as are more fit to be transcrib'd by Persons of any Profession than my own. The scandalous Reports that had flown about concerning this Lady, caus'd some worthy Men to decline the Business, particularly the Arch-Bishop of Canterbury and Bishop of London refus'd to appear, tho' they were nominated in the Commission; and what is said in Favour of the rest of the Judges, is, That they might not know that another Female was impos'd upon the Jury instead of the Lady Essex.

While one great Engine was working at Lambeth, the other had its Motion in the Tower, push'd forwards by the Lady Essex against the unfortunate Sir Thomas Overbury; and two of her Agents, Forman and Gresham being dead, she rely'd wholly upon the Assistance of Mrs. Turner, who procur'd one Weston, formerly her Husband's Servant, and not unskill'd in the Art of Poisoning, to be the Instrument to effect their impious Purposes. The Lady also procur'd Sir Thomas Munson to recommend him to Sir Jervase Elwayes, and he to Sir Thomas Overbury to be his Attendant; by whose Means, with the Assistance of one Franklin, and the Connivance of the Lieutenant, several Potions were administer'd to consume Nature insensibly. But these were not thought quick enough to satiate that Malice, that was as active as subtle; therefore stronger Ingredients were infus'd, and given him in his Broths, his Meats and his Tarts; and his very Salt was usually mixt with White-Mercury. Thus was the poor abandon'd Gentleman daily rack'd and tortur'd with a horrid Distemper; but being young and of a strong Constitution, was able to struggle a long Time with these corroding Tormentors: But his Body being not always able to bear such unnatural Pressures, he fell extreamly sick; and having no Friend that could or durst visit him, none to supplicate but the merciless Causers of his Misery,

Reg. 12.

The Pomp of the Nuptials.

In the mean Time the Countess being freed from her Husband, triumph'd and shin'd above all the Court Ladies, and became admir'd by the King, as well as lov'd by Rochester; who to deserve so valuable a Lady was now created Earl of Somerset; and all the splendid Equipage, and magnificent Preparations, that could fill a Court with Delight, or the People with Wonder, were not wanting for the Marriage. On the twenty sixth Day of December the new Earl and Countess were marry'd at Whitehall, in the Presence of the King, Queen and Prince, and a great Confluence of the Bishops and Temporal Nobility: The Bishop of Bath and Wells marry'd them, and the Dean of Westminster preach'd the Nuptial Sermon, and that Night was concluded with a glorious Masque of Lords and Ladies; which a few Nights after was much exceeded by another of the Prince's Gentlemen, to the extraordinary Satisfaction of the King, who caus'd it to be acted a second Time, upon the third Day of January. But Whitehall was too narrow to contain the Triumphs for this Marriage, which were extended into the City; for on the next Day, the happy Pair, accompany'd by the Duke of Lenox, the Lord Privy-Seal, the Lord Chamberlain, the Earls of Worcester, Pembroke and Montgomery, with a numerous Train of Nobility and Gentry, were invited to a Feast in the City at Merchant-Taylor's-Hall; where the Lord Mayor and Aldermen entertain'd them with extraordinary Pomp and Formality, and after the Treat with a Wassail, two Masques, a Play and a Ball; and after all the whole Company were invited to a magnificent Banquet, which continu'd 'till three in the Morning. Before these Pleasures were well digested, upon Twelfth-Day, the Gentlemen of Grays-Inn invited the Bride and Bridegroom to a solemn Masque; which concluded all the triumphal Gaities of this remarkable Marriage.

Overbury in great Distress.

The Noise of these Rejoicings resounding in the most secret Recesses, brought the News to Sir Thomas Overbury, a poor Relief to a Man in Misery, who was conscious to himself, that all his Sufferings proceeded from his Opposition to what was now fully surmounted; so that in his dark Confinement he could not see the least Glimmerings of Liberty, when he consider'd the implacable Nature of the Woman. But yet presuming upon the former Friendship between the Earl of Somerset and himself, he wrote to him in the midst of his Glory, to let him know his deplorable Condition, and how vastly his Health was impair'd, which he imputed to his Recluseness and want of Air; humbly imploring his Assistance, that he might no longer languish under the Burden of his intolerable Infirmities. Somerset not willing to have him exclaim, made Answer, That the King was now full of great Business; but he would take the first Opportunity to move him for his Relief, and make his great Indisposition a Ground for the King's Mercy; including in the Letter a White Powder, which he desir'd him to take; assuring him, That tho' it made him a little sick at first, it would do him much good in the End. The poor abus'd Gentleman took his Powder, which having a poisonous Quality, added to his Affliction; yet it was not strong enough to compleat the Design. The Lieutenant of the Tower daily listen'd to his Complaints with all the outward Marks of Commiseration, but always declar'd what he said to the Authors of his Calamities; so that his very Words were rack'd, as well as his Body tormented. Thus he continu'd in this dismal Place above four Months, languishing under unheard of Pains; 'till his Enemies being more impatient that he endur'd so long, than that he suffer'd so much, they finish'd their Work by an impoison'd Glyster compounded by Franklin, which in a few Days ended his miserable Life. Here we may see the unhappy Fate, and precarious Fame of Princes govern'd by Minions and Favourites; and how many Ways the King's Name was us'd and abus'd in perpetuating this execrable Fact: First in procuring the King to send Sir Thomas on an Embassy into Flanders; Secondly in committing him to the Tower

Tower for his Refusal; Thirdly in continuing a close Prisoner from all Relations and Servants, a Practice never known for a bare Contempt; and lastly in practising his Death, when he was under the King's immediate Protection.

The Earl of Northampton, who was a great Actor in this Tragical Event, inhumanly endeavour'd to kill him a second Time by ruining his Fame, and raising a Report, 'That he dy'd of the Pox, and had prodigious Sores and Ulcers in his Body, that produc'd such Putrefaction, that the People, unable to endure the noisome Smell, were forc'd to throw him in a loose Sheet into a Coffin, and bury him privately on Tower-Hill; concluding in a Letter to the Earl of Somerset, That God was gracious in cutting off evil Instruments before their Time; tho' he little imagin'd that he was then pronouncing his own Sentence and Doom. For he being one of the principal Ministers of State, and a Papist in Reality, tho' a Protestant by Profession, he did many Kindnesses to the Roman Catholicks contrary to Law; and a Letter of his being intercepted, that was directed to Cardinal Bellarmino, discover'd both his Religion and his Intentions: Which Things being first whisper'd, then urg'd against him, they touch'd him to the Heart; so that he suddenly retir'd, dispos'd of his Estate, and dy'd. He had a capacious Mind aiming at great Things, which he was the better able to effect by living a Batchelor to an old Age, being always attended with Gentlemen of Quality, to whom he was very bountiful. Leaving no Issue to propagate his Name, he built a noble House by Charing-Cross to continue it, by him call'd Suffolk-House, and since Northumberland-House. His contriving Overbury's Death was yet a Secret, and made no Noise against him; but when it broke out, Fame loaded his Memory with all the Blackness that Infamy and Odium could produce.

The Earl of Northampton's Death.

Still the great Favourite, the Earl of Somerset, and his Business met with no Stop nor Interruption, 'till by Degrees he perceiv'd he must a little alter his Biass, or find some new Ways to bring in Mony; for the Revenues of the Crown were not sufficient to maintain such vast Expences, occasion'd by his Riot, tho' he had all the Earl of Westmorland's Lands at his Marriage and Creation added to his Earldom. Therefore a new Project was advanc'd and now effected, which the Earl of Salisbury had formerly promoted, upon the Occasion of new Colonies and Plantations to be establish'd at London-Derry and Colerain in Ireland, of which Alderman Cockain was the first Governor. In order to promote these and the like Improvements, King James instituted a new Order of Knights, call'd Baronets, which were to be Hereditary, and to take Place next to Barons younger Sons, and appointed certain Laws to make them capable of being admitted: First that they should maintain thirty Foot Soldiers in Ireland for three Years, at the Rate of eight Pence a Day; and to pay down a whole Year's Wages at the passing of their Patent, the whole amounting to a thousand Pound for their Honour: That they should be Gentlemen of Blood of Three Descents; and lastly should have Land of Inheritance in Possession, or immediate Reversion, to the Value of a thousand Pounds a Year. Then to keep the Order from swarming, it was limited to the Number of two hundred, and as the Issue should fail, the Order to cease; of these Sir Nicholas Bacon in the County of Suffolk was the first. Sir Richard Baker observes, That he who examines how well the Institution and the Order has been observ'd, will find it to be here as it was in the Order of St. Michael in France, into which at first none were admitted but Princes and eminent Persons, but afterwards all Sorts of Men without Distinction, which made it a Question, Whether the Dignity of the Order did more grace the Persons, or the Meanness of the Persons disgrace the Order; and when the Laws of an Institution are not in some Measure observ'd, it seems to make a Nullity in the Collation.

The first Institution of Baronets.

Notwithstanding these, and other Projects of raising the Value of the Gold Coin, the King's Expences prov'd too large for his Incomes and Revenues; therefore after four Years Intermision, he resolv'd to have Recourse to a Parliament,

The second Parliament in this Reign.

which was summon'd to meet on the fifth of April. There were several about the Court, presuming to have Friends in every County and Borough, undertook to make Elections of such Members for Knights and Burgesses, as should solely comply with the King's Desires; of whom Somerset was the Head and Chief: But this prov'd a meer Embrio, and became abortive. For the Parliament meeting according to their Summons, when they were excited to give Mony, in Consideration of the King's marrying his Daughter, and his unusual Entertainments, with other Expences, they instead of contributing to the King's Wants, freely laid open his Wastes, especially those made to the Scots, ' With whom they desir'd a Share of his Favour, also beseeching his Majesty to ' stem the Current of the future Access of that Nation to his Presence and ' Bounty. They likewise enquir'd into the Causes of the unexpected Encrease ' of Popish Recusants since the Gun-Powder Plot, the Detestation of which, ' they thought, should have utterly extinguish'd the whole Party; and this ' they found was owing to his Majesty's Admission of Popish Nobility into his ' Councils; his Silencing of many watchful and diligent Ministers; the several Treaties he had made, not only for the Marriage of the deceased Prince ' Henry, but for the present Prince Charles, with the Daughters of Popish ' Princes; all which disheartned the Protestant, and encourag'd the Recusant. These, and other Miscarriages in the Government being freely remonstrated, the King, without receiving any Advantage, or passing any Act, put a stop to all, and dissolv'd the Parliament on the seventh Day of June. After which he committed several of the most tumultuous Members of the Commons to the Tower and other Prisons, without Bail or Main-Prize. And lastly he proceeded to the most uneasie of all Aids in England, a Benevolence upon the Subject; where those that did not give their Mony, were oblig'd to give their Names: So that what was in its Nature and Essence a free Gift, was judg'd in its Effect and Consequence, a heavy Imposition.

It is dissolv'd.

The King of Denmark's second Arrival in England.

In the same Year, and the Month of July, Christian King of Denmark, out of a great Love to his Sister and King James, came a second Time into England; but being secure of himself, he travell'd privately, and with a small Retinue, so that he unexpectedly enter'd Somerset-House, where the Queen resided, before the Nation had any Knowledge of his Arrival. But King James being then in his Progress in Bedfordshire, upon the News of it, immediately return'd back; and after he had entertain'd him fourteen Days with Hunting, Hawking, Running at the Ring, Bear-Baiting, Plays, Fire-Works, and Fencings, on the first of August, Prince Charles brought him aboard his Ship, where he took his last Leave and return'd home. Thus these two Kings met with a Happiness, rare among Princes, of freely seeing and conversing with each other, without any Marks of Danger or Jealousie.

A. D. VI. The King having now reign'd above twelve Years in England, by 1615. turning the Stream of his Bounty into particular Channels, gave more and
 Reg. 13. more Occasion to uneasie People to show their Disgusts and Resentments; for he had generally the Misfortune, incident to many Princes, to be too much govern'd by Favourites. The Earl of Somerset, lately made Lord-Chamberlain, now like a mighty Coloss stood the Fury of all the Tempests rais'd against him, making those who carry'd the greatest Sail to strike and come under him; nor would he suffer any Place in Court, or Dignity in State, to be conferr'd on any, which was not sweeten'd with his Smile that gave it, or their Bounty that enjoy'd it. This Pride and Avarice, join'd to his other Miscarriages, caus'd such a Number of Underminers, that he soon found he had but a tottering Foundation, with no other Support but the King's Favour, which by Providence and inferior Accidents was gradually remov'd; making a Way towards the Vengeance due to the Blood of Sir Thomas Overbury.

Wilson, Baker, Aris, and Clarendon.

For about this Time the King began to cast his Eye upon a new and brighter Object, a young Gentleman nam'd George Villers, a younger Son to Sir George Villers of Brookesby in Leicestershire by his second Lady of the Family of the Beaumonts. This promising Youth being left by his Father with a small Fortune, his Mother took an extraordinary Care in his Education; and having a beautiful Person and a graceful Deportment, to compleat his Accomplishments she sent him into France, where he spent two or three Years in attaining the Language, and perfecting himself in the Exercises of Riding and Dancing, which last was his Master-piece: And thus taught and qualify'd, and gloriously attir'd, at the Age of twenty one Years, he made his Appearance in the Court of England, after he had been well acquainted with the Nature and Customs of that of France. The Lord Clarendon observes, that King James, of all Wise Men living, was the most delighted and taken with handsom Persons and fine Cloaths; so that he was soon captivated with this pleasing Object, first affording him his Smiles, and making him his Cup-Bearer, and then bringing him nearer by several Steps, lest he should too much expose him to the Malice of a jealous Competitor. The Courtiers soon perceiving the King's Inclinations, began to adore this Rising Star, and the more because they hated Somerset, and knew that the Rise of one Favourite would be the Ruin of the other; for which Reason also, the Queen her self, tho' she express'd great Fears of Villers's future Power, consented to join in his Advancement, to Suppress the exorbitant Authority of the other. He was Cup-Bearer but a few Weeks before he mounted higher, and being Knighted, without any other Qualification he was made Gentleman of the Bed-Chamber, and then Knight of the Order of the Garter; and in a short Time, considering the Vastness of the Ascent, he was made a Baron, a Viscount, an Earl, and a Marquess, and became Lord High-Admiral of England, Lord Warden of the Cinque-Ports, Master of the Horse, and entirely dispos'd of all the Favours of the King, in conferring all the Honours and Offices of three Kingdoms without a Rival.

The Rise of George Villers.

His Greatness.

The Beginnings of these accumulated Graces became very formidable to the Earl of Somerset, who as he began to decline, became more sensible of the Terrors arising from the innocent Blood of Overbury; therefore was as active to preserve himself, as his Enemies were to ruin him. Tho' nothing at present was laid to his Charge but the imbezelling some of the King's Jewels, yet finding himself in a tottering Condition, he threw himself at the King's Feet, acknowledging The great Trust his Majesty had repos'd in him, and the mighty publick Weight lying upon him, which through Youth and Ignorance might make him slip into some Miscarriages; therefore he humbly besought his Majesty to grant him a general Pardon for what was pass'd, that he might not be expos'd to the Malice of those who would make the worst Interpretation of all his Actions. The King who had rais'd this fair Edifice, being unwilling to have it quite destroy'd, gave Order for the drawing up a general Pardon, in so ample and full a Manner, that it might rather exceed than take rise from any former Precedent; which was immediately sent to the Broad-Seal. But the Queen having Intelligence of this, and using her Power with the Lord-Chancellor Egerton, put a stop to the Seal 'till the King should come to Town, who was then on his Progress in the West. And now what had been privately murmur'd in Corners openly resounded in the Streets; for the Apothecary's Boy that gave Overbury the Clister, falling sick at Flushing, reveal'd the whole Practice, of which Sir Ralph Wenwood, Secretary of State, gave a full Relation by his Correspondent; and a small Breach being thus made, the Earl had Enemies enough to rush in and overwhelm him. The King being inform'd of these Transactions, and struck with Horror at the Relation, he sent for the Judges, and gave them strict Charge to examine the Matter with the utmost Severity, making Imprecations against them and their Families if they did not endeavour to discover it; and if he spar'd any that was guilty, he wish'd God's Somerset declines.

Curse might light upon him and his Posterity; so Zealous the King appear'd in the Prosecution of this black Affair. Upon this he repair'd to Royston, and took Somerſet along with him, whose Ears were now continually tormented with fresh Reports and Discoveries; but he still thought himself too firm in the King's Favour to be remov'd. Therefore when the Lord Chief-Justice Cook sent for him, he went to the King with an open Complaint, reputing it an extraordinary Presumption; but the King made Answer, Thou must go then, for if Cook sends for me I must go too. Others say that when he came to take his Leave of the King, his Majesty embrac'd and kiss'd him often, urging him to hasten his Return, and showing an extream Concern to be without his Company, but as soon as he was gone, said with a Smile, I shall never see thy Face again. However it was, his Countess was apprehended before his Arrival at London, and committed to Custody in Black-Friars; and as soon as he came he was seiz'd, and committed to the Charge of Dr. Mountain, Dean of Westminster; and then they proceeded without Interruption, try'd, convicted, and condemn'd all the Offenders.

He and his Countess are imprison'd for Overbury's Murder.

The Condemnation of the rest of the Offenders.

Weston was the first Man examin'd and try'd, who stood very stiff and obstinate, till the Bishop of London on one side, and the Lord Cook on the other, so effectually manag'd him, that he laid open the whole Conspiracy; and being at the Gallows allur'd with Promises to deny his former Confession, his Mind being prepar'd for Death, he resisted the Temptation, and penitentially seal'd the Truth of it with his last Breath; and Hollis, Wentworth, and Lumsden, who had violently urg'd him to pervert Justice, were afterwards fin'd and imprison'd. Mrs. Turner follow'd next, a notorious Example of Pride and Laciviousness, who now became sensible of the Follies and Impieties of her past Life. Sir Jervaes Ellways, Lieutenant of the Tower, was the third who suffer'd on Tower-Hill, and was pity'd more than the rest, being seduc'd by the Earl of Northampton to be a Spectator, rather than an Actor in this bloody Tragedy; which Connivance was too Criminal to be vindicated. At his Death he left two useful Sentences for human Instruction: The first, Not to vow any thing to God, but to perform it; the second, Not to take too great Delight in a Pen; for one began, and the other perfected his Ruin. The fourth that fell by the Hand of Justice was Franklin, a Man whose sordid Behaviour at his Death agreeing with his pernicious Life, his Memory deserves no further Notice.

After the Execution of these inferior Criminals, the primary Murderers, A. D. the Earl of Somerſet and his Countess, were solemnly arraign'd before their 1616. Peers; where all the scandalous Letters between the Lady and Forman were Reg. 14. read in open Court, and the Wax and Brazen-Poppets were publicly expos'd, to display the Folly, as well as the Malignity of her Actions. But the Earl and her self being both condemn'd to die, found the King's Mercy, notwithstanding his former Imprecation, and after some Time of Imprisonment in the Tower were set at Liberty, and liv'd in private and obscure Condition: Manifesting, That no Content or Happiness can be truly establish'd, but on the solid Foundation of Justice. For that Love that caus'd them to break through all Reason and Opposition, either on her Side declining towards some new Object, as was commonly reported; or on his inclining to Reluctancy towards the old, became at length so languid, that it quite pin'd away, and they liv'd long after in the same House as Strangers to each other. Her Death happen'd first, having all reasonable Marks of the Vengeance of Heaven, being accompany'd with such loathsome and prodigious Circumstances, as are not fit to be mention'd, only that they were directly opposite to all the fatal Charms of her former Beauty that ever could produce Love or Desire. The Earl's Death was obscure, without Fame, and without Posterity; of whom we shall say no more, but that he had several commendable Qualities, and publick Affections, till they were all swallow'd up in this Gulf of Beauty, which plung'd him into these these dangerous Contrivances. Sir Thomas Monson, another of the Countesses Agents, had pass'd one Day's Trial at Guildhall; but the Lord Chief-Justice Cook, in his Rhetorical Flourishes at his Arraignment, dropp'd some Expressions, as if he could discover more than the Death of a private Person; intimating, tho' remotely, That Overbury's untimely Death had some thing in it of Divine Retaliation, as if he had been guilty of the same Crime against Prince Henry; blessing himself with Admiration at the Horror of such Actions. In which he flew to so high a Strain, that he was taken down by a Court Lure, Sir Thomas Monson's Trial laid aside, and he soon after set at Liberty, and the Judge was humbled ever after. This sudden stopping of Monson's Trial, fill'd Mens Minds with strange Imaginations; and the Lady Arabella dying about this Time in the Tower rais'd new Apprehensions and Suspicions, that she dy'd no natural Death; so naturally does one evil Action introduce the Belief of another. The Lady was Daughter to Charles Stuart, younger Brother to the Father of King James by Elizabeth Cavendish, who privately marry'd to Sir William Seymour, Son to the Lord Beauchamp, and Grandson to the Earl of Hartford: So that both were at some Distance ally'd to the Crown; which caus'd all her Trouble and Confinement, so dangerous is every Appearance that borders upon Sovereign Titles.

The Lady Arabella's Death.

During the several Trials of Overbury's Murtherers, some publick Acts were perform'd of another Nature; particularly a memorable one was compleated by Mr. Hugh Middleton, a Citizen and Gold-Smith in London, who having an Act of Parliament for his Warrant, with infinite Expence, and indefatigable Labour, brought Water to the City of London from the two great Springs of Chadwell an Amwell in Hartfordshire; having cut a Channel from thence to a Place near Islington, whither he convey'd it to a large Pond, and from thence in Pipes of young Elms to all Places of the City. As this was a great Conveniency to the City, so another Act was perform'd which added much to the Pleasure of the Place: For on the North-Side of London, a Place call'd Moorfields, environ'd with deep stinking Ditches, and noisom Common-shoars, was now not only made fair and sweet, but so levell'd into Walks, and set with Trees, that it became the pleasantest Place in all the City. On the following Year another thing was done for the Benefit and Beauty of the City; for Smithfield, which was before a rude and miry Place, was now pav'd all over, and strong Rails separating the middle Part of it, were set up to make it a fair Walking-Place, and fit for Markets, or any other publick Use.

Several Conveniences added to the City.

Wilson, Baker, Spottiswood, Rushmore, An. Camd &c.

VII. In these peaceable Times, the Temples of Janus being shut, all warlike Habiliments were turn'd into Masking-Attire, Halcyon Days shin'd round the Isle, and the Influence of the King's pacifick Mind had almost an universal Operation. Spain's Ambition was content to be bounded with the Pyrenean Hills and the Atlantick Ocean, reaping the Fruits of Italy and Sicily, hoarding the Treasures of the Indies, and willingly singing a Requiem to the Netherlands. France wanting sufficient Exercise, began to surfeit with Diseases at home, which by Fits broke out into Tumours among themselves: And the Germans were swell'd into a Dropsie of Voluptuousness, by a continu'd Plenty, and the Delights of Peace. In these Times of Rest, the grand Care and Concern of the King of England was for his only Son Charles, now about seventeen Years of Age, whom this Year he solemnly made Prince of Wales, with a Creation of twenty five Knights of the Bath, and a publick Tournaement of forty Gentlemen of the Inns of Court. But the principal Part of his Care was how to find a proper Match for him, about which he was so earnest and intent, that for most of the latter Part of his Reign, it over-rul'd all his Counsels, and had a mighty Influence upon the whole State of Christendom. His Intentions were ever Zealous for the Honour and Height of Royal Majesty, and his Desire was to match him with one of the highest Rank; tho' of a different Religion. There-

A. D. 1616. Reg. 14.

The King's Son Charles made Prince of Wales.

Therefore his Thoughts were so long and earnestly fix'd upon Spain, that it gave that King great Advantages over him and his Creatures. There had been a Treaty of Marriage between the late Prince Henry and a Daughter of Spain, which on the Spaniard's Part was found to be a meer Compliment, carry'd on with the accustomed Gravity and Formality of that Nation. For the wise Earl of Salisbury pursu'd and drove the Matter to that Point, that the Duke of Lerma, wanting further Evasions, disclaim'd the very Being of a Marriage-Treaty. Nevertheless, the Spanish Ambassador, to acquit himself to England, and vindicate his Honesty, openly produc'd his Commission, together with Letters of Instruction from the Duke's own Hand: Which manner of Dealing might have been a sufficient Cause of Indignation against any future Motions of this Nature.

His Father's Designs for his Marriage.

The Management with Spain.

Therefore after the Death of Prince Henry, King James turn'd his Thoughts upon a Daughter of Henry the Fourth, late King of France, as the most proper Match for his Son Charles; and by Sir Thomas Edmonds, his Legier Ambassador, endeavour'd to know the Mind of that Court; but could not discern their Affections, being not very willing to discover his own. At length, in this Year 1616, he took an Occasion to send the Lord Hayes extraordinary Ambassador to the French King, with unusual Pomp and Magnificence, to Congratulate his Marriage with Anne the Infanta of Spain; and at that Time resolv'd to make a full and compleat Trial. The Subject Matter was declar'd, and in Appearance well approv'd, but still had no Success; for the Duke of Savoy had engag'd King Lewis, and prevail'd for his Son the Prince of Piedmont. In the very Time of this Negotiation in France, the Duke of Lerma frequently intimated to Sir John Digby, Ambassador in Spain, 'An extraordinary Desire in the King his Master, not only to maintain Amity with the King of Great Britain, but to join in all Methods that might be offer'd for the nearer Uniting of their Majesties, and their Crowns; as also a Disposition in this regard, to marry his second Daughter to the Prince of Wales.' The Ambassador, remembring the last Defeat, was extraordinary cautious how he gave Ear to the Spaniard's Proposals; but after many Debates, innumerable Scruples rais'd, and Difficulties urg'd, the Matter was brought to this Issue, 'That the several Difficulties should be digested into certain Heads, and select Persons be appointed for a Conference, but with this Proviso, That the Kings on either side should not be interested, nor their Names us'd, 'till by clearing of Particulars there should be great Appearances that the Marriage would take effect. Upon a Review of these Proceedings, Digby advis'd King James, 'Not to suffer his other Resolutions to be interrupted by this Overture, which might be made purely to divert the Match with France, and to keep his Majesty from declaring himself against Spain, in the Affairs of Cleves and Juli-ers, still undermin'd; nevertheless, he might be pleas'd for a while to spend the French Treaty, and to entertain this Motion; to which End he desir'd from him, only some private Instructions for his Direction and Warrant. These remote Conferences made Way for that tedious solemn Treaty of several Years Continuance, in which the Advantage was apparent on the Spaniard's side, who was indeed very formal and specious in it, but no ways warm and vigorous, if in any Degree real. But King James having a violent Inclination that way, when he was once induc'd and elevated with Hopes, was so fix'd upon it, that he would grant all Things possible rather than break it, and was impatient in dissembling his own Eagerness. This Affair was chiefly manag'd by the famous Gondomar, a Man exquisitely form'd for the Purpose, who by his facetious Ways had highly captivated the King's Affections.

The King now endeavour'd to move all Impediments that lay in the Way to his darling Design, and study'd all Methods to render himself acceptable to Spain. The Walls of Great Britain, the English Fleet, once the strongest of all Europe, now lay useless in the Road, disarm'd and in a ruinous Condition; while Gon- domar

domar, as we are told, alledg'd to King James, that the refitting and furnishing of it would raise Suspicion in the King his Master, and avert his Mind from the design'd Alliance. Moreover the King resolv'd to surrender the three Towns of Flushing, Ramekins and Brill, which were held by Way of Caution from the United Provinces 'till vast Sums were repaid, and which were the Keys of the Netherlands, and open'd the Passages in and out of the Maes, the Rhine, and the Scheld. For a Sum not amounting to the tenth Part of the Debt, due at this Time from Holland to England, he freed himself from those Places, to prevent Requests and Propositions from the King of Spain, who claim'd the Propriety of them; and Gondomar push'd hard to obtain them, as knowing the great Advantage of their Situation. Such was the King's Care and Contrivance to keep Faith with the Confederate States, and not disoblige Spain; and to make this appear a politick Action, it was alledg'd, That the vast Expence in keeping those Forts, was as considerable as the Advantages of Possession. However the States were certainly great Gainers, and all the Power of the English Interest in their Country was by this Means weakned, and brought to a Period; and the Alienation between King James and these Provinces, which appear'd of late, and was nourish'd by Bernvelt a Pentioner of Spain, was now increas'd, by the Observation and Discovery of his Compliances with Spain.

The King delivers the Cautionary Towns to Holland.

His Interest lost in those Parts.

Before these Transactions, several Alterations were made in the Ministry, beginning with a Breach between the Lord Chief-Justice Cook, and the Lord Chancellor Egerton, which made a Passage to both their Declensions. Sir Edward Cook was discharg'd from his Place, and within two Days Sir Henry Montague, the King's Serjeant at Law, was plac'd in his Room. The Person remov'd was a Man of excellent Parts, and an extraordinary Lawyer, but Passion and Pride was too predominant in him; yet being turn'd out chiefly by Villers, he might have been restor'd, if he would have given a Gratuity; but he honourably answer'd, A Judge ought not to receive, or give a Bribe. About the same Time, the Lord Chancellor, weary with the Imployment and weakned with Age, desir'd the King's Permission to retire; upon which the Seal and Place was given to the famous Sir Francis Bacon, the Attorney-General; and the Lord Egerton, or rather Ellesmer, wore out the Remainder of his Life in Quiet, dying in a good old Age full of Honour and Fame, proving the Fountain of a noble Posterity, who were afterwards advanc'd to the Earldom of Bridgewater. Time and Age had also worn out Sir Ralph Winwood, the King's able and faithful Secretary, who dying, Sir Robert Naunton, and Sir George Calvert, were made Secretaries; Men of contrary Religions and Parties, but join'd by the King, like contrary Elements, to find a Medium between them. But the greatest Remove was the Earl of Suffolk, the Lord Treasurer, who began to sink upon Somerset's Fall; and now both his and his Wife's Extortions and Briberies being laid open, he not only lost his Place, which was given to Sir Henry Montague, but was also fin'd thirty thousand Pounds. About the same Time, Sir John Bennet, Judge of the Prerogative Court, being charg'd by his own Servant with Bribery, he was turn'd out of his Place, and censur'd in the Star-Chamber to pay twenty thousand Pounds; being succeeded by William Byrde, a Man of greater Integrity. Also Sir Henry Yelverton, the King's Attorney, for secretly adding new Privileges to the Charter of London, was remov'd in Displeasure, and Sir Thomas Coventry put in his Room; tho' afterwards Yelverton, for his great Undertakings in the Law, was made a puisny Judge of the Common-Pleas.

As there were frequent Varieties in Matters of State, so great Waverings were now discover'd in Mens Minds in Points of Religion; some went over from the Church of England to the See of Rome, and others came from Rome into the English Church. Among the rest, one of eminent Note, M. Antonius de Dominis, Arch-Bishop of Spalato, a Man tho' old, corpulent and unfit for for Travel, came into England. Here he both preach'd and wrote against the Church of Rome; and extoll'd the Protestant Religion, 'till he came to be made Dean of Windsor, and Master of the Savoy, which he enjoy'd some Years: And then, whether out of an Humour of Change, or in Expectation of greater Preferment at home, he return'd to Rome, where he renounc'd and reproach'd the Protestant Religion: But all he could do to satisfie that Court had no Effect, for the Inquisition laid hold upon him, he dy'd in Prison, and after his Death they burnt his Body for a Heretick. We are assur'd that to this Man the World has been oblig'd for that noble History of The Council of Trent; for by his Means and the Measures he had concerted with the famous Father Paul, before he left Italy, Arch-Bishop Abbot got the Manuscript transmitted by Parcels into England.

The King's Journey to Scotland.

It was now above fourteen Years since the King had seen his native Country Scotland, whereupon he resolv'd to take a Progress thither, beginning his Journey in the Spring, and warming the Country as he went with the Glories of the Court. In his slow Passage, the Days were generally shorten'd with the Diversions of Hawking, Hunting, and Horse-Racing, and the Nights extended by the Entertainments of Feasting, Masking and Dancing. And the King had proper Instruments for these Sports about his Person, as Sir George Goring, Sir Edward Zouch, Sir John Fennit, and others, who knew exactly how to please his Majesty with their Witticisms, their Disguises and Maskarades; but chiefly his great Favourite Villers, who being an excellent Dancer, brought that Pastime into the highest Request. Upon this Man he had shower'd many Titles and Preferments, one of which was Earl of Buckingham, who now reign'd sole Monarch in the King's Affections; his Majesty could not be well without him, and the Nobility could not be happy but by his Means, so that all Addresses were made to him for every Place or Office, in the Court or Country. In the Disposal of which, the Lord Clarendon says he was guided more by the Rules of Appetite than of Judgement, exalting almost all his own numerous Family, and Dependants, whose greatest Merit was their Alliance to him; which equally offended the ancient Nobility and the People, who daily saw the Flowers of the Crown fading and wither'd, and the Demeasns and Revenues sacrific'd to enrich a private Family, scarce known to the Nation, and the Expences of the Court so vast and unlimited, that they had a sad Prospect of that Poverty and Necessity, which afterwards fell on the Crown, almost to the Ruin of it. The King enter'd Scotland in the beginning of May, where he stay'd about three Months, took several Progress's, receiv'd many Entertainments, and made several Establishments, and return'd into England in the Month of August.

The King's Return.

The Book of Sports published.

The King being a great Lover of Sports and Recreations, this Year put out a Book, that gave Tolleration for the use of all common Pastimes after Evening Prayers on Sundays; which was call'd The Book of Sports, and all Ministers were enjoind to read it to their Parishioners in the Churches, and those who refus'd were summon'd into the High-Commission Court, imprison'd and suspended; all which gave great Offence to many pious and conscientious Persons, and was one Cause of the many Mischiefs in the succeeding Reign. This new Encroachment upon the Sabbath gave both King and People more Liberty to prophane the Day with Authority; tho' the Arch-Bishop, and several of the Bishops, took the Liberty to declare against such Practices. And as Prophaneness crept in on one Side, so Superstition increas'd on the other, by the means of new Swarms of Romish Priests, who now dealt much in pretended miraculous Operations. One Company of them repair'd to Staffordshire, among the Family of the Giffords in that Country, Gentlemen of plentiful Estates, where they practis'd their subtle Artifices to seduce the People. Among which there was a notorious Instance of the Boy of Bilston, who pretended to be bewitch'd and possess'd by the Devil, proving one of the greatest Impostures of the the Age. After he had plaid many strange and deluding Tricks, and caus'd a poor Woman to be condemn'd for a Witch at the Assizes, the Cheat was by much Time and Diligence detected by Dr. Morton Bishop of the Diocese, who happily preserv'd an innocent Woman, display'd the Roman Forgeries, and converted a wicked Boy, who afterwards prov'd a good Man; as the whole Story may be seen at large in Wilson.

About this Time the Fate of the famous Sir Walter Raleigh began to operate after a peculiar Manner; of whom Prince Henry was wont to say, That no King but his Father would have kept such a Man in a Cage. He had been almost two Years releas'd out of the Tower, where he had been a Prisoner twelve Years, during which he compil'd his incomparable History of the World; a Design and Performance so great, that no other Man of less Parts and Abilities could have accomplish'd. Being now enlarg'd, and desirous of Action and a full Liberty, he propos'd to the King to undertake a Voyage to America, upon a particular Assurance from one Captain Kemish of gaining a Mine of Gold in Guiana, a Country which he had formerly known. The King knowing him to be a Man of Skill and Bravery, gave him Liberty, and a Commission under the great Seal of England to set out Men and Ships for that Service; but commanded him upon his Allegiance to give under his Hand, the Number of his Men, the Burthen and Strength of his Ships, together with the Country and River which he was to enter. All which was exactly done, and came so timely to Gondomar's Knowledge, that a full Account was sent to Spain, and from thence to the Indies, before the English Fleet set Sail from the Thames: So that Sir Walter was unfortunately betray'd in the Beginning of a Design, which some thought so Romantick in it self.

Sir Walter Raleigh undertakes a Voyage to America.

He is betray'd.

In the mean Time his Reputation and Merit brought many Gentlemen of Quality to venture their Estates and Persons, in this promising Enterprize; and being gallantly furnish'd with all Things necessary for Peace or War, they set out with ten Ships, encountring no Difficulties 'till they came to Cape Verde in Africa; but there, and at Bravo, they met with many violent Storms, which prov'd a great Hindrance to their Voyage, being forc'd to leave their Cables, Anchors and Water-Casks behind them; so that by length of Time, Heat of the Climate, and Want of Water, a great Sicknefs fell among them, and swept away many of their best Men, both for Sea and Land Service. But with much Patience and Hardships gaining Sight of the Coast of Guiana, they came to Anchor in the River Caliana; where they landed their sick Men, set up Barges and Shallops that were brought out of England in Quarters, wash'd their Ships, and took in fresh Water, being furnish'd and assisted by the Indians whom Sir Walter had formerly known. He, in this general Contagion, having struggled with a long Sicknefs, and being yet unable to move otherwise than in a Chair, gave order to five small Ships to sail up the River Orinoque, under the Conduct of Captain Kemish, towards the Mine of which he had inform'd Sir Walter in England. In these five Ships were as many Companies of Foot, under Command of Captain Walter Raleigh the General's eldest Son, Captain Parker, Captain North, Captain Thornhurst, and Captain Chedley, Gentlemen of great Valour, and infinite Patience, in suffering Hunger, Heat and Labour. As they pass'd up the River, the Spaniards began the War, and fir'd at the English Ships with great and small Shot; yet still they landed their Forces without much Loss, near the Town call'd St. Thomas, of which with little Difficulty they made themselves Masters, but with the Death of Captain Raleigh, to the great Grief of the Assailants. Tho' the Spaniards were not strong enough to defend the Town, yet they were sufficiently prepar'd to secure the Mine; so that Captain Kemish finding it impracticable to get up to it by Water, and the Avenues by Land so well guarded, he thought the Enterprize too hazardous, and with deep Sorrow return'd.

Ffffff

Sir

Sir Walter Raleigh, with the News of his Son's unhappy Death, and the fruitless Return of Kemish, was touch'd to the very Soul, crying out to Kemish, That he had utterly ruin'd him, and wounded his Credit with the King beyond Recovery; but he, who was the first Mover of the Design, must expect to bear the weight of the King's Anger as well as himself. Kemish, as deeply tormented as himself, and less able to sustain the Burden, retir'd to his Cabin overwhelmed with Melancholy, and shot himself; and the Bullet only breaking the Rib, which was too slow for his Fury, he desperately thrust a Knife in after it up to the Haft, and with him the Glory of the whole Voyage expired. For the Design being thus discover'd and broken, their Ships being leaky, Provisions failing, and the Men missing the Golden Showers they expected, several of them began to Mutiny, some would return home; and the major Part forc'd the General to swear, not to go home without their Allowance. Then some would go for Italy, some for France, and few for England, fearing the Spanish Power there more than they did in the Indies; and thus being shatter'd in Judgment, with greater Storms than the Seas and Winds had produc'd, Sir Walter at length arriv'd with four Ships at Kingsale in Ireland, where he staid for some short Space in Safety.

The Voyage unsuccessful.

A. D. 1618. The News of the taking and burning St. Thomas coming to Gondomar, he violently set upon the timorous King, and insisted upon Reparation; and the Matter was aggravated with the blackest Circumstances by those of the Spanish Faction, as if this Enterprize not only might make a Breach of that design'd Marriage between Prince Charles and the Infanta, but also prove an Infringement of the Peace and Amity establish'd between the two Crowns. The King's Fears being kindled into Anger, he disavow'd the whole Action; and lest other of his Subjects should by this Example attempt the like Hostility against Spain, he issu'd out a Proclamation, in which he shew'd his Detestation of such Proceedings, and threaten'd severe Punishment to the Actors; which gave some Satisfaction to Gondomar, whose chief Design was now to get Sir Walter Raleigh into his Power. Therefore he subtly veil'd over his Resentments, that whilst Sir Walter lay in Ireland, he neither found nor heard of such great Difficulties, but that he might appear safely in England; and the Men not willing to be banish'd their own Country, put in at Plimouth. Raleigh was no sooner on Shoar, but he had private Intimation, which gave him Cause to suspect the Smoothness of the Beginning would have a rough Conclusion: Therefore he attempted an Escape from thence in a Bark of Rockelle; but being suddenly apprehended by Sir Lewis Stukley, his Kinsman, who had a private Warrant for that Purpose, he was brought to London, and recommittd to the Tower, from whence he attempted a second Escape, but was taken upon the Thames, and more closely committed. Being now in safe Custody, all his Transactions in this Voyage were put upon the Rack, and by his Adversaries stretch'd to his Disadvantage; yet he still excus'd the main Charge by saying he was forc'd to take St. Thomas by the Spaniards first attacking him, without which he could not arrive at the Mine. Gondomar prov'd an Adversary too powerful for him, so that at length his Life was offer'd up as a Sacrifice for Spain, but not upon such Grounds as that Ambassador had design'd: For he desir'd a Judgment upon the pretended Breach of Peace, that by this Occasion he might subtly gain from the English an Acknowledgement of his Master's Right in those Parts of America, and prevent all future Attempts of that Kind. But the late Voyage was not so much as brought into Question, only his former Condemnation, which was believ'd to have been obtain'd by an Artifice, was now reviv'd; his Arraignment at Winchester fifteen Years before was laid before him at the King's Bench-Bar, where it was demanded of him, Why Execution should not pass upon him, according to the Sentence therein pronounc'd? Sir Walter courageously answer'd, That he was restor'd by the King's late Commission, which gave him new Life and Vigour; for he that has Power over the Lives of others must necessarily be Master of his own. This reasonable Plea was by no means admitted by the Court, therefore he desir'd that some Time might be allow'd him to prepare for Death; but it was answer'd, That the Time appointed was the next Morning, and it was not to be doubted, but that he had long since prepar'd himself for Death.

The next Day, to the deep Concern of many worthy Persons, he was brought to a Scaffold purposely erected in the Palace-Yard in Westminster, where with a brave Constancy and Christian Courage he lost his Head, in the sixty sixth Year of his Age; at which Stroke such Abundance of Blood issu'd from his Veins, as shew'd he had a sufficient Stock to have continu'd many Years, if it had not been taken away by the Hands of Violence. This was the fatal End of the great Sir Walter Raleigh, highly in Favour with Queen Elizabeth, and next to Drake the great Scourge and Terror of the Spaniards; a Man of extraordinary Bravery and admirable Abilities, who in his excellent Writings has nobly trac'd the Steps of the Divine Providence and Vengeance in the Falls of great Men, yet after all could not escape himself. This has given Occasion to others to trace those leading to his own Fate; and to insinuate, as the Hardships he sustain'd were Indications of the Hand of Heaven, so his unjust swallowing such large Portions of the Church's Revenues in the late Reign, and his thirsting after the Blood of the Earl of Essex, did at length call for Punishment, by a double Deprivation, one of Estate, and the other of Life.

He is beheaded.

His Character.

However, it was one of the great Blemishes of the Reign of King James, who now seem'd totally wedded to the Spanish Interest, or at least fully resolv'd to carry his Cause in the Marriage of Prince Charles with the Infanta. Therefore after many tedious Delays and Obstructions, he this Year enter'd into certain Articles with the King of Spain; the Sum of which were, 'That the Pope's Dispensation should be first obtain'd by the King of Spain: That the Children of this Marriage should not be compell'd in Matters of Religion, nor their Titles prejudic'd if they prov'd Catholicks: That the Infanta's Family might be Catholick, and have a decent Place for Divine Service, according to the Use of the Church of Rome, the Ecclesiasticks wearing their proper Habits: That she should have a competent Number of Chaplains, a Confessor, &c. That the Marriage should be first solemniz'd in Spain according to the Council of Trent, and afterwards reiterated so as to make it valid according to the Laws of England. In the allowing of these Articles, the King thus express'd himself, Since this Marriage is to be with a Lady of a different Religion from us, it becomes us to be so tender, as on the one side to give them all Convenient Satisfaction, so on the other, to admit nothing that may blemish our Conscience, or detract from the Religion here establish'd. The People of England, equally hating the Spaniards and the Popish Religion, were irreconcilably averse to the Marriage, and would have bought it off at the dearest Rate; and as far as they durst oppos'd it by Speeches, Counsels, Wishes and Prayers; but if any spoke lower than the rest, he was soon silenc'd or check'd from above; when as in Spain and in Flanders, Books and Pictures were publish'd to expose both the King and State, for which the English Ambassadors in vain sought for Satisfaction. The English Catholicks extremely desir'd the Match, hoping for a Moderation of Fines and Laws, perhaps a Toleration, if not a total Restoration of their Religion; for they gain'd more and more Indulgence by this slow-pac'd Treaty; and the Articles of Religion were long forming in the Spanish Court, and enlarg'd and multiply'd by endless Demands.

Articles of the Spanish Match.

The English averse to it.

The King at this Time was also busily employ'd in Matters of Religion, occasion'd by the Spreading of the Doctrines of Arminius in Holland, whose Followers were call'd Remonstrants. The King hearing some Years ago, that the States of Holland were determin'd to chuse one Vorstius, the chief of these Remonstrants, to be Divinity Professor in Leyden, whose Opinions were contrary trary to those King James had imbib'd, he earnestly solicited the States, both by his own Letters and by his Ambassador Sir Ralph Winwood, by no means to admit the said Vorstius to that Employment, lest his Doctrines should spread themselves into his Dominions. The Ambassador in the King's Name pressing the Matter, the States answer'd in Justification of Vorstius, 'That he was chosen according to ancient Custom, by the Curators of Leyden; and whereas he was afterwards charg'd by some Persons to be unsound in Doctrine, the Curators thought fit, with the Consent of Vorstius, that both at Leyden and the Hague, he should appear and answer his Accusers, which he did, and none came to charge him. But not long after six Ministers undertook to prove that Vorstius had publish'd false Doctrine, who being heard in a full Assembly of the States, they could find no Reason to displace him: And they assu- redly believ'd, That if his Majesty of Great Britain were inform'd of the true Circumstances of this Affair, he would according to his great Wisdom conceive favourably of them; their Proceedings being with all Reverence, Care and Respect to his Majesty's serious Admonition. The King perceiving by this Answer, that the States thought too well of Vorstius that they would not comply with his Request, he caus'd his Books to be publicly burnt in St. Paul's Church-Yard, and in both the Universities, and again wrote to the States, That if they did not displace him, he would publicly protest against them. Sir Ralph Winwood represented this to the States, and finding them cold and backwards in proceeding against Vorstius, he severely remonstrated against them; to which the King finding them only to make dilatory Answers, he at last exhorted them to call a National Council, to put an End to these Controversies, to which they at length consented.

The Arminians or Remonstrants knowing that they were like to be out-number'd, oppos'd the calling of a Council; and it was discover'd that Barnevelt, the chief of the Remonstrants, now Arminius was dead, had secretly levy'd Soldiers in Utrecht, to defend themselves against Maurice Prince of Orange, who sided with the contrary Party; on Notice of which the Prince with five hundred Men march'd to Utrecht, which struck such a Terror into the new levy'd Companies, that at the first Word of Command they laid down their Arms and submitted. After this, Barnevelt, Hogenberts, Leydenberg, and Grotius, the four Chiefs of the Arminian Party, were seiz'd, and committed to several Prisons. Leydenberg in Despair stabb'd himself in Prison; Hogenberts and Grotius were condemn'd to perpetual Imprisonment; but Grotius after some Time, made an escape in a Trunk, which his Wife told the Soldiers of the Castle was full of Arminian Books, which she would send away that they might not distract her Husband's Head. Barnevelt met with the hardest Fate, for he was beheaded at the Hague: Yet he liv'd long enough to see his own Opinions condemn'd at a National Synod held at Dort, whither King James sent Dr. Carlton, Bishop of Landaff; Dr. Hall, Dean of Worcester; Dr. Davenant, Divinity Professor, and Master of Queen's College in Cambridge; Dr. Ward, Master of Sidney College in Cambridge; and Mr. Belcanquel, a Scotchman and Batchelor of Divinity; where they met with Divines from the Palatine, Hesse, Geneva, Bern, Emden, and other Provinces, who generally agreed to condemn the Doctrines of Arminius, concerning Conditional Election and Reprobation, the Universality of Redemption, &c. But herein King James in a great Measure lost his Aim; for this Censure caus'd these deep Points to be more nicely search'd and examin'd, and these condemn'd Opinions sprouted and gather'd Strength by being topt by a combin'd Party; so that in this and the next Reign, Arminianism became fashionable in England, and was generally oppos'd to Puritanism.

Shortly after there appear'd a mighty Blazing-Star in Libra, which occasion'd Variety of Conjectures concerning its Influence and Prognostication. Many thought it portended the Death of Queen Anne, who after its Appearance ance dy'd of a Dropsey at Hampton-Court, when she was forty five Years of Age. She was brought from thence to her Palace in the Strand, for the more triumphant Glory of her Obsequies, which were celebrated at Westminster above a Month after. VIII. The King for a considerable Space continu'd a very melancholy Widower; which was a sort of Introduction to further Troubles, Perplexities and Imbarassments, from which he was scarce ever free all the rest and most infirm Part of his Reign. These had their Rise from the Fires that broke out in Germany in the preceding Year, between the Protestant Princes and the House of Austria; which Commotions involv'd and drew along the Affairs of most Christian Princes, especially the two Potent Kings of England and Spain. The Catholick Cause, and the Lot of the House of Austria, induc'd and oblig'd the King of Spain, who was the strongest Branch of that Family; and King James was engag'd both by common and particular Interest, the Religion he profess'd, and the State of his Son-in-Law, the Elector Palatine, who was a principal Agent in these Wars. It was a mighty Concern to the whole Christian World, and the Issue had a main Dependance upon the King of England, being the most powerful Prince of the Protestant Profession; but his Proceedings were now strangely govern'd by the unhappy Spanish Treaty; so that it brought great Dishonour to himself, and insuperable Calamities to his Son-in-Law.

The King's Troubles.

The German Troubles and Commotions began with the Emperor's Crowning his Cousin Ferdinand King of Bohemia and Hungary; but with a Reservation of all Regal Power to himself during Life. The Consequence of this soon prov'd a terrible Oppression of the Protestants in Bohemia, which at that Time were very numerous, and had large Privileges, as well as great Power and Authority. These States and Nobles of the Country, summoning an Assembly at Prague to redress their Grievances, were oppos'd by some of the Emperor's Ministers of State, the very Day of their Meeting; the Manner of which exasperated them to such a Height of Passion, that they threw Slabata the Emperor's Chief-Justice, Smesantius one of the Council, and Fabritius the Secretary, from a high Window into the Castle Ditch. Upon cooler Thoughts the Bohemians endeavour'd to palliate this rash Action by Apologies to the Emperor; but at the same Time they strengthen'd themselves with new Levies both of Horse and Foot, the better to secure their own Peace, and to banish the main Incendiaries, the Jesuits, out of Prague, whose distemper'd Zeal had first kindled the Flame. The Emperor finding these Disturbances, rais'd an Army under the Command of Count Bucquoy; and the Protestant States perceiving the Emperor inrag'd, rais'd two Armies, one commanded by Count Thurne, and the other by Count Mansfeldt. Some Skirmishes pass'd between the Imperial and Bohemian Forces, and some Towns were taken on both Sides; but in the Heat of these Contests, the old Emperor dy'd in the Beginning of the Year 1619. Upon which the Count Palatine of the Rhine, who in the Interregnum is chief Vicar of the Empire, publish'd his Right by the Golden Bull to govern in Chief, 'till a new Emperor be chosen; and by Advice he assum'd the Power, requiring the People to demean themselves peaceably under his Government.

The Emperor
Matthias dies.

After many Struggles, Ferdinand King of Hungary and Bohemia, and adopted Heir of Matthias the late Emperor, at Frankfort was elected King of the Romans, and afterwards crown'd Emperor of Germany. The States of Bohemia disclaim'd the Election as invalid, because he could not be an Elector himself as King of Bohemia; for that he had never been actually in Possession of the Crown. And tho' their Dissent could not lessen the Election of Ferdinand to

to the Empire, yet they protested by Oath, never to acknowledge him their King. These Heats grew into greater Flames, and the Protestant States of Moravia, Silesia, and Hungary, join'd with the Bohemians, and banish'd the Jesuits. They were prosperous in the Beginning; but the Austrian Party receiv'd Vigour by new Supplies out of Hungary and Flanders; and the Emperor capitulated with the Duke of Bavaria to levy Forces to his Use, for the Expence of which he engag'd Part of his Country to him. The War daily increasing, the King of England interpos'd in these Differences, and sent the Viscount Doncaster extraordinary Ambassador to mediate a Reconciliation. His constant Love of Peace, and his present Fear of the fatal Issue of such Commotions, together with the Request of the King of Spain, mov'd him to undertake this Affair. It was the Spaniard's Policy to make him a Reconciler, and so by that Means to place him in a State of Neutrality, and frustrate the Hopes of that Support the Princes of the Union might expect from him by the Interest of the Count Palatine: For which Cause the King of Spain spread abroad specious Pretences, That King James should be the sole and grand Arbiter of this Cause of Christendom. Nevertheless his Mediation was neglected by the Catholick Confederates, and his Ambassador slighted and postpon'd in the Business. And at the same Time, the King's Agent Mr. Cottington, being sensible of their unworthy Dealings in the Court of Spain, profess'd, That his most useful Service, and best agreeing with his own Conscience, would be to disengage the King his Master. However the Bohemians resolv'd to proceed in their own Way; and being assembled for that Purpose, with the Consent of their Confederates, they solemnly elected Frederick Count Palatine of the Rhine, for their King; still hoping to be strengthen'd and secur'd by the Alliance and Assistance of his Father-in-law, the King of Great Britain.

King James disapproves the Election.

The Count Palatine being elected King of Bohemia, immediately crav'd Advice of King James his Father-in-law, concerning the Acceptance of that Royal Dignity. When this important Business was debated in the King's Council, Arch-Bishop Abbot, whose Infirmities would not permit him to be present in the Consultation, wrote a zealous and fervent Letter to the Secretary of State, to urge the King's utmost Assistance in this critical Juncture, which might turn highly to the Advancement of the Protestant Religion all over Europe. But the King was unfortunately engag'd in those Ways, out of which he could not easily extricate himself. Besides it did not please him to find Kingdoms dispos'd after such a Manner, as that his Son-in-law should snatch a Crown out of so hot a Fire; and he was wont to say, That the Bohemians made use of him, as the Fox did of the Cat's Foot to pull the Apple out of the Fire for his own Eating. In the mean Time, before the King could give any Answer, the Count Palatine was perswaded by the Protestant States to accept of the Election; and thereupon he made his Entrance into Prague upon the last of October, and on the Fourth of November was solemnly crown'd King of Bohemia. Of all which he sent speedy Advice into England, excusing the Suddenness of this Action, because the Urgency of the Cause would admit of no further Deliberation. King James surpriz'd at this bold Step, disavow'd the Act, and would never so much as grace his Son-in-law with the Stile or Title of his new Dignity. But Sir Richard Weston and Sir Edward Conway were sent Ambassadors into Bohemia, to make up the Breach between the Emperor and the Elector Palatine. And he was so very apprehensive, lest the Palatine's Nearness to him might give Cause of Suspicion to his Brother of Spain, that he commanded his Agent Cottington to give that King plenary Information of all Proceedings, and to let him understand that whatever the Palatine had done, was without his Countenance, Procurement or Allowance. The King of Spain, tho' he condemn'd Doncaster's Proceedings, was at length satisfy'd with King James's Integrity, declaring, That it would gain the more Authority and Estimation, if he should continue to disclaim that which had been done so contrary to his Opinion.

The Count Palatine was no sooner settled in his new Kingdom, when the Emperor publish'd a Proscription against him, ' wherein he proclaim'd him ' guilty of High-Treason, excluded him out of the publick Peace, and profe- ' cuted him as the publick Enemy of the Empire, and a Contemner of his Im- ' perial Majesty; likewise absolving all his Subjects from their Oaths and Du- ' ties to him, and commanding all Persons whatsoever to abandon him and his ' Adherents. All the Princes and Potentates in the Empire were alarm'd, and began to make ready for War, joining to that Side whither their Interests or Inclinations led them. In Spain also they made all Preparations for the same War; only the King of England would take no Alarm, abhorring War in ge- neral, and disliking the Palatine's Cause as a dangerous Precedent against Mo- narchy, being still fed with Hopes of composing all Differences by the Success of the Spanish Treaty. For which Purpose Sir Walter Aston was sent 'Am- bassador into Spain, and Gondomar return'd into England, to continue there, 'till the long-debated Match should be concluded. The Articles of Religion for Securing Liberty of Conscience to the Infanta and her Family were greatly en- larg'd by the Commissioners, and allow'd by the King of England; but still without a Dispensation from Rome, all the Transactions were but Nullities. And for this Cause it was expected, that King James should propose such Con- ditions for the Increase and Advantage of the Catholick Religion, that the Pope might deliberate whether they might any ways merit the Dispensation. To this Demand the King made Answer in his Letter to the King of Spain, ' That ' he had done as much in Favour of the Catholicks as the Times would bear, ' and promis'd upon the Word of a King, That no Roman Priest, or other Ca- ' tholick, should henceforth be condemn'd upon any Capital Law: And tho' he ' could not at present rescind the Laws, inflicting only pecuniary Mulcts, yet ' he would so mitigate them, as to oblige his Catholick Subjects to him: And ' if the Marriage took effect, his Daughter-in-law should find him ready to in- ' dulge all Favours which she should request for those of her Religion. With this the Spanish Council acknowledg'd great Satisfaction; and a Paper was drawn up accordingly by a Junto of Canonists, Lawyers, and Divines, to per- suade the Pope to perform his Part.

In the mean Time an Army of thirty thousand Men was raising in Flanders, under the Command of the Marquis Spinola; which gave King James an Oc- casion to enquire after the Cause of such great Preparations. The Marquis gave Answer, That he receiv'd his Commission seal'd up, with a Command, not to open it 'till his Army was compleated, and brought to a Rendezvous; but the King had sufficient Proof to allure him, that his Army was design'd for the Palatinate. Yet after all, no more than one Regiment, under the Command of Sir Horatio Vere, could be obtain'd from him, tho' two more were promis'd. When Spinola had his Rendezvous, where he muster'd twenty six thousand Foot and four thousand Horse, he open'd his Commission, which requir'd him to make War against all such as should be confederate with the Bohemian Rebels; all which he communicated to the Ambassador of Great Britain. At the same Time the English began their March, with as brave a Regiment as had appear'd in any Age, consisting most of Gentlemen, under a most worthy Commander, who was accompany'd with the Earls of Oxford and Essex, Persons ennobled as well by their own Virtues, as by those of their Progenitors. This handful of Men reach'd the Palatinate with some Difficulty, by the particular Aid and Conduct of Henry Prince of Nassau. But Spinola, having got the Start of the English, by reason of a far shorter March, had no sooner arriv'd, but he took in several Towns, and greatly prevail'd over a dispirited People: Yet he cau- tiously declin'd the Hazard of a Battel with the Protestant Confederates; nor was the Marquis of Ansbach, the Head of them, very forward to engage his Forces. And now the great Access of Strength to the Emperor's Party, and this slender Aid from the King of Great Britain, to preserve his Childrens In- heritance, extreamly dishearten'd the German Princes, and at length dissolv'd the Confederacy. After a short Space, the Season of the Year advancing, the Princes of the Union retir'd into their several Countries, and the English Regiment was dispos'd into three principal Garrisons: Sir Horatio Vere commanded in Manheim, Sir Gerard Herbert in Heidelberg, and Captain Burrows in Frankendale; having only Power to preserve themselves in those Walls, while the Enemy rang'd the Country at their Pleasure.

But with small Success.

As the new King of Bohemia suffer'd extreamly in his Hereditary Dominions, so at this Time he met with a more severe Fate in his own Kingdom, which soon put a Period to his short Reign. The Imperial Forces gathering Strength under Bavaria, Bucquoy, and D. Balthazar, advanc'd towards Prague, with a Resolution to fight King Frederick; upon which the Bohemians quitted their Garrisons, to make their Army the more compleat. So upon the eighth Day of Novemöer, being Sunday, both Armies met for the fatal Decision of the grand Controversie: The Bohemians stood upon the most advantageous Ground, between the Imperialists and the City of Prague; but the Enemy breaking through, dispers'd and ruin'd the whole Army, and effectually pursu'd their Victory. The King and Queen, surpriz'd with this Defeat, among a wavering People, in a City not very defensible, were constrain'd to fly the next Morning, with what Things they could carry with them. The Queen, being of the more gallant Spirit, bore it with most Undauntedness; but the King suffer'd doubly as he went, being condemn'd for keeping his Soldiers without Pay, having a vast Mass of Money by him, which he was forc'd to leave behind him, to augment the Spoils of his Enemies. Thus after one Year's Reign, King Frederick first lost a deciding Battel, with all his Treasure, and shortly

He loses all after all his Kingdom of Bohemia, and not long after that, all his Hereditary Lands and Dominions in Germany; being at length forc'd to abandon his Native Country, all his Honours and Places, and with his Lady and Children retire into Holland for a Place of Refuge and Residence.

He loses all his Dominions.

The Spanish Policy.

The Misfortunes of this Family began now to rouse King James, and to move him both to Pity and to Action: Wherefore a Council being call'd, an Order was made to promote the Palatine's Restoration; and the King, to encourage the Princes of the Union, and to keep them in Arms, sent them thirty thousand Pounds; yet withal resolv'd to treat for a Peace, and dispatch'd Sir Edward Villers to carry the Palatine's Submission to the Emperor, upon Conditions to be conceiv'd according to Equity and Conveniency. On the other Side the Spaniards never more flatter'd King James, than after the Defeat at Prague: They declar'd that he should order all Things according to his Pleasure, for the Palatine's Restoration, and be obey'd; that the Infanta's Portion was preparing, and that the Pope was oblig'd to grant the Dispensation, from whom they resolv'd to take no Denial: All which was encourag'd by Digby, Cottington, Arundel, Worcester, and especially by Buckingham and Gondomar; which last had gain'd the Access of a Favourite, rather than a Foreign Ambassador; so that Sir Robert Naunton, for showing a Dislike to him, notwithstanding his known Worth, was remov'd from his Secretary's Place, and Conway put in his Room. The King took great Delight in the Company and Conversation of Gondomar; a Person, as Nani observes, who with a stupendious Acuteness of Wit, so confounded pleasant Things with serious, that it was not easie to be discern'd when he rally'd, or when he spoke of Business. He knew how to insinuate and transform himself to the King's own Way and Humour; was full of Conceits, Jests and witty Sayings, and would sometimes speak false Latine purposely to please the King, telling him, That his Majesty spoke Latine like a Pedant, but himself like a Gentleman. By such little pleasing Arts, and others of a more bountiful Nature with the Nobility and Ladies, he gain'd an extraordinary Influence, and serv'd his own Master with great Advantage.

Gondomar's Influence.

The

The Favourite Earl was now made Marquess of Buckingham, and to his Mastership of the Horse was added the Office of Lord High-Admiral of England; and continually lying in the King's Bosom, every Man paid Tribute to his gracious Smiles. His Mother was made Countess of Buckingham, her eldest Son was made first a Knight, and afterwards Viscount of Purbeck, her other Son was created Earl of Anglesey; and now happy was that Person who could gain a Kinswoman, it being the next Way to a rich Office, or a swelling Title. The King, who never much regarded Women, had now his Court fill'd with young Ladies; Relations to the Marquess. Sir Henry Montague, Lord Chief-Justice, who was reported to have given twenty thousand Pounds for the Office of Lord-Treasurer, before the Year expir'd, had it taken from him, and it was conferr'd upon Sir Lionel Cranfield, who by being bred up in the Custom-House, and knowing the secret Arts of those Offices, best knew how to supply by Projects, what was consum'd by a riotous and prodigal Court. But the great Step to this Office, was Cranfield's marrying one of the Marquess's Kindred, which soon rais'd him to be Earl of Middlesex; and the Lord Chief-Justice Montague, in lieu of his Mony, was made President of the Council, Viscount Mandeville, Earl of Manchester, and after Worcester's Decease, Lord Privy-Seal. The Marquess of Buckingham, in Appearance made all these Removes and Advancements, but in Reality most of the Affairs in Church and State were privately transacted by his Mother, for most Addresses were first made to her, and so convey'd to be finish'd by her Son, who generally regarded his Pleasure more than his Profit: Which caus'd Gondomar, among his other pleasant Stories, to write into Spain, That there was never more Hopes of England's returning to Popery than now; for there were more Prayers and Offerings made here to the Mother, than to the Son.

*The Power of Buckingham's
Mother.*

The Marquess himself, as he was a Man of excellent Symetry and Gracefulness, so he affected Beauty where he found it; but being a general Lover, he treated all Women accordingly, only to gratifie his own unlawful Ends, and then dismiss them for the more prevailing Charms of the next fair Lady. He design'd to have practis'd this Method upon the Earl of Rutland's only Daughter, who was to be Mistress of all her Father's vast Fortunes: He spread his fine Nets for her, carry'd her to his Lodgings in Whitehall, kept her there for some Space, and then return'd her back to her Father. But the stout old Earl, fir'd with Indignation, sent him this threatening Message, That he was too much of a Gentleman to suffer such an Indignity; therefore if he did not immediately repair his Daughter's Honour by marrying her, his Greatness should not protect him from his Justice. The Marquess, who perhaps made use of this Stratagem to gain her Father's Consent, she being the greatest Match in the Kingdom, had no Reason to dislike the Proposal, and therefore he soon salvd up the Wound by consummating the Marriage. This young Lady was bred up a Roman Catholick by her Mother, but was converted by Dr. White to be a zealous Protestant; which crossing the Inclinations of the old Countess of Buckingham, who was a fiery Romanist, she with the Help of her Jesuits at length plac'd her on the first Foundation.

The King himself being jealous of uncontroll'd Sovereignty, and impatient of his Peoples viewing the Mysteries of State, had fallen into a great Dislike of Parliaments, and for several Years had given way to Patents, Monopolies, and such distasteful Projects: And probably many of his Ministers, fearing an Enquiry into their own Actions, suggested to him, That he had better furnish himself by those Ways, and the Match now in Treaty, than by Subsidies accompany'd with the Redress of Grievances. Nevertheless he now resolv'd to call a Parliament, conceiving it might prove of special Advantage: For he found the Affections of the People much rais'd for the Recovery of the Palatinate, which would naturally open their Purses to the Supply of his Wants; then the Treaty of Spain might effect the Business, without the Expence and

Troubles of War, and the good Agreement between him and his People would quicken the Spaniard to conclude the Match. Accordingly a Parliament was summon'd to meet on the thirtieth Day of January at Westminster; where the King made a long Speech, which may be seen at large in the Introduction to Nalson's Collections; in which he laid open his great and numerous Expences, and handsomly pleaded for suitable Supplies; he also declar'd his great Readiness to recover the Palatinate, for which rather than fail he would engage his Crown, his Blood, and his Son's Blood, to effect it. At the same Time his Majesty sent the Lord Digby Ambassador to the Emperor to urge him to a positive Answer, whether the Palatinate might be recover'd by Peace, before he proceeded to actual War; and now expecting the Emperor's Answer, the Parliament proceeded in their Work, receiving Petitions from several Persons imprison'd and ruin'd by the horrid Extortions of voracious Patentees and Monopolizers, who were active in promoting illegal Exactions, to which the King's Necessities and ill-advis'd Counsellors had driven him. The chief Instruments of these Grievances were Sir Giles Mompeffon, and Sir Francis Mitchel. The former had Fortune sufficient to have maintain'd him fairly in the Country, but at Court he wanted this Novelty for his better Support; to whom Mitchel was made a Co-Partner, a servile Suburb Justice of Peace, who living by the Failings of his Neighbouring Females, was brought to Court and Knighted, and corroborated by these Letters Patents to oppress the needy Commoners. All which being canvas'd and laid open in Parliament, Mompeffon made his Escape, and Sir Francis Mitchel was censur'd after this Manner: First he was degraded with all the debasing Ceremonies that Justice could invent, and after that was made to ride through the City with his Face to the Horse's Tail, with a Paper on his Breast and Back declaring his Crimes: This expos'd him to the Scorn and Contempt of the Rabble in his Passage; but a large Fine and long Imprisonment secur'd him from further Mischief. The pecuniary Punishment fell as heavily upon Mompeffon, and upon other lesser Confederates, which put an End to this Grievance.

Not long after the great Lord-Chancellor Bacon was brought to a Censure for the most extravagant Weaknesses that ever enter'd into the Heart of a wise Man: He was a true Emblem of human Frailty, being more than a Man in some Things, and less than a Woman in others. His Crimes were Bribery and Extortion, yet more those of his Servants and Dependants than his own, all which were prov'd and aggravated against him by so many Circumstances, that he who in most things was thought a Man of the greatest Parts in the Kingdom, and elevated above Pity, now fell miserably below it; and his eloquent Tongue that us'd to charm his Auditors with admirable Harangues, was now forc'd to descend to servile Supplications; for throwing himself and his Cause at his Judges Feet, before his Sentence was pass'd, 'he humbly begg'd the Lords in Parliament, That his penitent Submission might be his Sentence, the Loss of 'the Great Seal his Punishment, and that their Lordships would recommend 'him to his Majesty's Grace and Pardon for all that was past. Thus his great and towering Spirit was brought low, and Humiliation might have rais'd him up again, if the Weight of his Mildemeanors had not kept him down. He lost both his Peerage and Seal, and the Beam was wavering whether he should carry the Title of Viscount St. Albans to his Grave, which now was all he had; and to lighten his Misery, many were crush'd in Pieces by his Fall, through the Debts he had contracted; and tho' he had a Pension from the King, he wanted to his last; living obscurely in his Lodgings at Grays-Inn, where the Remembrance of former Plenty and Grandeur lay so heavy upon his ingenious and now melancholy Temper, that he pin'd and consum'd away. He was of a very grave and comely Presence; of a quick and high flying Wit, striving in some things rather to be admir'd than understood, and yet when he pleas'd to descend no Man was more intelligible. In short, he was of a most capacious Mind, and a great Master of all Kinds of Learning, and the World is so much oblig'd to his noble Discoveries in Nature, that his Name will be celebrated with Honour to Perpetuity. Gondomar hearing of his Miscarriages, and meeting him the Lent before his Censures, thought to pay him with his Spanish Sarcasms, saying, My Lord, I wish you a good EASTER; and you, my Lord, reply'd the Chancellor, a good PASSOVER: For he could neither indure his English Buffoonry, nor his Spanish Treaty, tho' he was too wise to oppose them publickly. He treasur'd up nothing either for himself or his Family, but his fatal Error was his Indulgence to his Servants; and his Decrees were always made with so much Equity, that none were ever revers'd as unjust. He was succeeded in his Place by Dr. Williams, Dean of Westminster, who was first made Bishop of Lincoln, and afterwards Arch-Bishop of York. Dr. Williams made Lord-Keeper.

In this Parliament, tho' no Laws and Statutes were pass'd, yet many Debates arose, relating to the King's Power and Prerogative, and particularly in the House of Lords, where the King had the strongest Party; yet several of that House stood up boldly for the publick Liberty, as the Earls of Oxford, Southampton, Essex, and Warwick, the Lord Say and Seal, and the Lord Spencer. This last Lord speaking something in the House of Actions of their great Ancestors, Arundel being displeas'd, said, My Lord, when these things were doing, your Ancestors were keeping Sheep, reflecting upon the numerous Flocks he lov'd: Spencer immediately reply'd, When my Ancestors were keeping Sheep, as you say, your Ancestors were plotting Treason. This caus'd such a Heat, that Arundel as the Aggressor was sent to the Tower, where after some Time, upon his Submission to the House, he was restor'd. The Commons on the other Side were no less warm and impatient, highly disrelishing both the Treaties with the Emperor and the King of Spain; and Gondomar had so rais'd the Peoples Fury, that he was revil'd and assaulted in the Streets of London. Upon which the King resolv'd upon exemplary Justice; and being inform'd that one Man was apprehended, who had us'd railing Speeches against the Ambassador, it was his Majesty's Pleasure, that on the next Morning he should be publickly and severely whipt through London, beginning at Aldgate, and so along by the Place where the Affront was offer'd in Fleetstreet, to Temple-Bar, without any Manner of Favour. This terrible Punishment more enrag'd the People against Gondomar, who by means of his Power with the King, had transported Ordnance and other Warlick Provisions, to furnish the Spanish Arsenals; and it was believ'd that he privately procur'd the sending of Sir Robert Mansel into the Mediterranean Sea, against the Pirates of Algier. The Merchants of England, by them much infested, were also induc'd to move for this Expedition, in which the English Fleet perform'd gallant Exploits, and bravely fir'd the Pirates Ships within their Harbours. Nevertheless by this the English Strength was diverted, the Treasure exhausted, and the Spanish Fleets and Merchants secur'd from those Robbers, and Spain left at Liberty to assist in subduing the Palatinate. Heats in both Houses.

The Parliament having sat about four Months, the King was desirous to give them a Time of Recess; therefore on the fourth of June, a Message was sent to the House, 'That his Majesty, by the Advice of his Privy-Council, thought 'fit to Adjourn the Parliament, lest the Season of the Year, by the continual Concourse of People, should cause Infection: Which Adjournment, keeping the Parliament still in Being, was thought better than a Prorogation. The Commons were extremely sorry at their Disappointment, having but just before made so hearty a Declaration to assist his Majesty in the Affair of the Palatinate. A Committee of both Houses attending his Majesty, he declar'd to them, That he took it very ill, That the Commons should dispute his Reasons of Adjournment, all Power being in him alone, to call, adjourn, prorogue, and dissolve Parliaments. The Adjournment was appointed 'till November following, with a Declaration, That in the mean Time he would by his own The Parliament Adjourn'd by the King.

Authority redress Grievances. Moreover he issu'd out a Second Proclamation against licentious Speeches and Discourses concerning Affairs of State: For notwithstanding the Strictness of the King's former Commands, the Peoples inordinate Liberty of irreverend Language daily increas'd. Wherefore the King now threaten'd Severity, as well against the Concealers of such Discourses, as against the Lavishness of audacious Tongues and Pens. The King grew more and more uneasie, being continually sollicitated both from Spain and Rome, to enlarge his Favours to the Popish Recusants; for Reports were then brought to Rome that all the Catholicks in his Dominions were cruelly treated. And besides this, a Rumour was there spread, That King James in a Speech in Parliament had declar'd, That notwithstanding the Spanish Match, the English Catholicks should not in the least Point be in a better Condition, when he had only said, That if any of that Party grew insolent, let his People count him unworthy to reign, if he gave not extraordinary Punishment. Thus was the King unhappily embarrass'd and intangled in the Ways he had chosen; for it was not possible for him at once to please his People, and to satisfy his Foreign Interests.

The Second Meeting in of the Parliament.

At the Beginning of the Winter, the Lord Digby return'd from solliciting the Emperor, and the Duke of Bavaria, to the Restoration of the Palatinate, where he had met with no reasonable Success. And on the twentieth of November, when the Parliament met a Second Time, the King commanded him to give an Account of his Journey to the House of Commons, and to represent how necessary it was for the King to obtain that by War, which he could not procure by a Peace. But tho' the King by his Ministers encourag'd the Parliament to a War, yet they found him more inclinable to Peace, both in regard of Gondomar's Power with him, his Indulgence to Roman Catholicks, and his Fondness of the Spanish Match, which he hop'd might heal all Breaches; tho' it was positively dislik'd and disapprov'd by all England, besides Romanists and those of the Spanish Faction. Therefore the House of Commons, before they granted Subsidies, resolv'd to try the King's Spirit by a solemn Petition and Remonstrance, in which they laid open to his Majesty the several great and increasing Dangers arising from the Romish Religion in general, the Power of Papists in particular, and the great Oppressions of the Protestants in Foreign Parts; representing at the same Time proper Remedies for these great Calamities, too long to mention in this Place. The Commons were more apprehensive of the Danger of their Religion, not only from the terrible Wounds lately given by the House of Austria, but also from the Severities the Protestants met with in France, from Lewis the Thirteenth, who at this Time besieg'd them in Montaubon and Rochelle, and other Places, against all the Arguments and Mediations of King James's Ambassador. When the Remonstrance was brought to Perfection, the King had a Copy of it before the House had time to send their Members with it; in which something so highly displeas'd him, that he wrote the following Letter from Newmarket to Sir Thomas Richardson, Speaker of the House of Commons. We have heard by divers Reports, to our great Grief, that some fiery and popular Spirits in the House of Commons, have publickly argu'd and debated Matters far above their Reach and Capacities, tending highly to our Dishonour, and Breach of the Royal Prerogative. These are therefore to command You, in our Name to make known to the House, that none therein shall presume henceforth to meddle with any Thing concerning our Government, or deep Matters of State, nor with our Son's Match with the Daughter of Spain, nor to touch the Honour of that King, or any other our Friends or Confederates. And if they have already touch'd any of those Points, which we have here forbidden, in a Petition of theirs, which is to be sent unto us, it is our Pleasure that You tell them, That except they Reform it before it comes to our Hands, we will not deign the hearing of it.

The King
writes to the Speaker.

When

When the House had duly consider'd the Reasons they had to draw up their Remonstrance, which at that Time were very cogent and prevailing with them, they sent the said Remonstrance, together with a new Petition to the King, in which they declar'd, ' That the Honour and Safety of the King and his Posterity, the Welfare of Religion and State of the Kingdom, are at no Time unfit for a Parliamentary Consideration; not that they took upon themselves, but as Loyal Subjects, to demonstrate such Things to his Majesty, which they were not assur'd could otherwise come so fully and clearly to his Knowledge. And whereas his Majesty seem'd to restrain them from intermeddling with the Matters of Government, that have their Motion in the Courts of Justice, and seem'd to abridge them of the ancient Liberty of Parliaments, Freedom of Speech, they were now forc'd to pray his Majesty to allow it, and to take away the Doubts and Scruples, which his Letter to the Speaker had brought upon them. After this the House were much discourag'd to proceed to Business, while there was so great a Difference between the King and them; for the King thought their Actions an Inroad upon his Prerogative, and they thought the King's Expressions an Infringement of their Liberty; therefore they resolv'd to give over all Business, till they had an Answer to their Petitions. The King hearing of this, was exceedingly vex'd and uneasie, and very roughly entertain'd the twelve Members that were sent to him; some say he call'd for twelve Chairs for them, saying, Here are twelve Kings come to me. After he had consider'd their Desires and Requests in their last Petition, he return'd them a long Answer in Writing, mix'd with some severe Expressions, in which he said, That their first Petition was unworthy of Answer, that their giving Advice about his Son's Match, and urging him to a War, was Intrenching upon his Prerogative, insinuating that the first concerning his Son was High-Treason. In the latter End he tells them, That he wonders they should make so unjust a Comment upon the Words in his Letter to the Speaker, as if he meant to restrain them from their ancient Privileges and Liberties in Parliament: For tho' he cannot allow the Stile, calling it their ancient and undoubted Right and Inheritance, but rather have wish'd they had said, That their Privileges were derived from the Grace and Permission of his Ancestors and himself, since most of them grew from Precedents, rather showing a Tolleration than an Inheritance, yet he gave them his Royal Assurance, that as long as they continu'd within the Limits of their Duty, he would be as careful to maintain their Liberties and Privileges, as ever any of his Predecessors did, nay, as he was to preserve his own Royal Prerogative.

The Parliament's Reply.

The King's Rejoinder.

But before this Heat arose in the House of Commons, the Lords began to consider how cheap they were made by the Multitude of Irish and Scotch Earls and Viscounts the King had created, not the Natives of those Kingdoms, but private English Gentlemen, who had purchas'd and assum'd those Titles, to get above the English Barony, contrary to the Laws and Customs of the Land. Therefore a Petition to the King was drawn up and sign'd by thirty three Lords, praying that the Privilege of their Birth-Rights might be preserv'd, and a Stop put to this growing Mischief. The King was extremely uneasie at this Petition, not knowing what Contests the Endeavours for Place and Precedency might produce: And being fully prepar'd, he sent for the Petitioners separately, and privately expostulated the Business with them one by one, beginning roughly with some of them; yet still he clos'd with them at last, as tho' his Anger was rais'd to make them humble, and reconcile themselves to him, that he might the better reconcile himself to them. And to the Earl of Essex he threw out this Expression, I fear thee not Essex, if thou wert as well belov'd as thy Father, and hadst forty thousand Men at thy Heels: Which Words were utter'd with such a Force, as if he had chid himself for letting him escape from him. And tho' this Petition did not derogate from the Dignity of those Creations past, yet the King willingly restrain'd himself for the Time to come.

The Petition of the Lords.

But

The Commons Protestation.

But the House of Commons proceeded to bolder Attempts; and judging the King's Letters so many Impediments to their Privileges, and for all the King's Promises the Protestant Religion was unsecure, if the Spanish Match succeeded, they resolv'd, whatever might be the Consequence, to leave some Prints and Footsteps of their Parliamentary Rights and Privileges to their Posterities, as their Ancestors had done to them; and therefore on the nineteenth of December, they register'd the following Protestation in their Journal Book, after they had given two entire Subsidies. That the Liberties, Franchises, Privileges and Jurisdictions of Parliaments, are the ancient and undoubted Birth-Right and Inheritance of the Subjects of England; and that the arduous and urgent Affairs concerning the King, State and Defence of the Realm, and of the Church of England, and the Maintenance and making Laws, and Redress of Mischiefs and Grievances, which daily happen within this Realm, are proper Subjects, and Matter of Council and Debate in Parliament. That in handling and proceeding in such Business, every Member of Parliament hath, and of Right ought to have Freedom of Speech, to propound, treat, reason, and bring the same to Conclusions. That the Commons in Parliament have likewise Liberty and Freedom to treat of these Matters, in such Order as in their Judgments shall seem fittest. That every Member of the said House hath like Freedom; from all Impeachment, Imprisonment and Molestation, other than by Censure of the House it self, for, or concerning any Speaking, Reasoning, or Declaring of any Matter or Matters, touching the Parliament, or Parliament Business. And that if any of the said Members be complain'd of, or question'd for any Thing done or said in Parliament, the same is to be shew'd to the King, by the Advice and Assent of all the Commons assembled in Parliament, before the King give credit to any private Information.

The King opposes it.

The King was again alarm'd by this Protestation, and he who naturally lov'd Peace both at home and abroad, had a War rais'd within his own Breast: For if he should be silent or connive at this Protestation, it would remain as a strong Bulwark for the People to Posterity. Therefore neglecting his Pleasures and Health in the Country, he came hastily up to London, and upon the thirtieth of December, in a full Assembly of the Council, and in the Presence of the Judges, he declar'd the said Protestation void, invalid, and of none Effect, and with his Hand took the said Protestation out of the Journal Book of the Clerk of the House of Commons, and commanded an Act of Council to be made thereupon, and this Act to be enter'd in the Register of the Council-Causes. And to put a Stop to all Complaints, as he conceiv'd, on the sixth of January he by a Proclamation dissolv'd the Parliament, after it had continu'd almost a Year, without passing one Act besides the Subsidies, of which the Commons gave two and the Clergy three. The Proclamation set forth, 'That the Meeting, Continuing, and Dissolving of Parliaments does so peculiarly belong to the King, that he needs not give any Account thereof to any other; yet he thought fit to declare, That in the Dissolution of this Parliament he had the Advice and uniform Consent of his whole Council; and that some particular Members took inordinate Liberty, not only to treat of his High Prerogatives, and Matters not fit to be argu'd in Parliament, but also to speak disrespectfully of Foreign Princes: That they spent their Time in disputing Privileges, and discanting upon the Words and Syllables of his Letters and Messages; and that these ill temper'd Spirits sow'd Tares among the Corn, and by their Carriage have impos'd upon him a Necessity of discontinuing the present Parliament. And lastly he declar'd, That tho' the Parliament was broken off, yet he intended to govern well; and should be glad to lay hold on the first Occasion to call another.

The Parliament dissolved.

This unexpected Dissolution and Proclamation gave Occasion to several sawcy Tongues to slander their Sovereign and his Government; especially when they found that several eminent Members of the House of Commons, as Sir Edward Cook,

Cook, Sir Robert Philips, Mr. Selden, Mr. Pym, Mr. Mallery, and others, were committed to the Tower and other Persons. They said that Great Britain was now grown less than Little England, which had lost its Strength by Changing of Sexes; and the scandalous Story of David Rizio, written by the King's Tutor Buchanan, had dy'd in every English Man's Opinion, if it had not been reviv'd by these Controversies with the Parliament. And as Troubles bred Disturbances at home, so they caus'd no less Dishonour abroad, for they now despis'd the King's Power, as much as they formerly did his Courage; and in the King of Spain's own Towns, in their publick Comedies, they presented Messengers bringing News in haste, That the Palatinate would shortly be replenish'd with a most formidable Army; For the King of Denmark would furnish them with a hundred thousand Pickel'd Herrings, the Hollanders with as many Butter-Boxes, and England with as many Ambassadors. In one Place they pictur'd King James with a Scabbard without a Sword, and in another with a Sword that none could draw out, tho' several were pulling at it; and at Brussels they painted him with his Pockets hanging out, and no Money in them, or his Purse. And what was highly pitiable, as well as vilely dishonourable, at Antwerp they pictur'd the unfortunate Queen of Bohemia like a poor Irish Mantler, with her Hair dishevel'd, and her Child on her Back, with the King her Father carrying the Cradel after her. And every one of these Pictures had several Motto's, expressing the Fruitfulness of their Malice; such Derisions and Reflections were put upon the King, and in him upon the whole Nation. But Spanhemius more seriously and solemnly sums up the Ills that attended the Conduct of King James, and his Son-in-law in Germany, 'That thereby the Protestant Religion was entirely rooted out of Bohemia, the Electoral Dignity transferr'd from the Palatine Family, the Palatinate it self lost, the Liberty of Germany overthrown, and the Famous Library of Heidelberg remov'd to Rome, to the irreparable Prejudice of Learning. So that Gondomar seem'd to have some Reason to say in one of his Letters to the Duke of Lerma, That he had lull'd King James so fast asleep, that he hop'd neither the Cries of his Daughter nor her Children, nor the repeated Sollicitations of his Parliament and Subjects on their Behalf, should be able to awaken him.

IX. King James having freed himself from the Complaining of a troublesome Parliament, still retain'd his main Designs and Resolutions of complicating the Marriage of his Son with the Infanta of Spain; where King Philip the Third being lately dead, was succeeded by Philip the Fourth. In order to effect this long and dilatory Affair, he sent the Lord Digby his Ambassador Extraordinary into Spain; who landed at St. Andero, a poor Maritime Town in Biscay, where the People usually went bare-foot. In that mean Place his Lordship had the Patience to stay a Fortnight in Expectation of the Spanish Court Civilities; but in Reality was so flighted by tedious and impertinent Delays, and at last by base and fordid Accommodations, that it was admir'd how he could bear it, and that the Spaniards were not asham'd to offer it to an Ambassador. It was thought the more strange, since King James had now treated the Roman Catholicks at home with so much Indulgence, that Gondomar boasted he had releas'd four thousand Recusants by his own Mediation; either to make his Service more acceptable to his Master, or to let him see how willing King James was to advance that Match which had never been really design'd in Spain. Then to expedite the Dispensation at Rome, he wrote to some of the most active Cardinals there, and receiv'd Answers from them, by Gege, his Agent, full of promising Hopes. And that he might give some publick Testimony of his Indulgence, he commanded Bishop Williams, then Lord-keeper, to pass Writs under the great Seal, to require the Judges of every Circuit to enlarge all such Papists as were imprison'd for Recusancy, which was accordingly observ'd and perform'd. This Bishop, as was formerly hinted, succeeded ceeded the famous Lord Bacon; and for some Time continu'd in Favour with the Marquess of Buckingham, and the Countess his Mother, whose Creature he was, and who, as it was believ'd, could mold and form him into any Shape to serve their Purposes; but afterwards growing high and stiff, they laid him aside. He was of a comely and stately Presence, which being animated with a great Spirit, made him appear very proud to vulgar Eyes; tho' really as he was a Man of extraordinary Parts, aiming at great Things, so he was of a bountiful Mind to all Men in Want, and a noble Patron to support where Merit wanted a Supply. This was shown in his Treatment of Monsieur de Moulin, a famous Minister of France, driven by Persecution into England; which being told the Bishop, he order'd Doctor Hacket his Chaplain to make him a Visit from him, and likewise to carry him some Mony, not naming any Sum, purposely to sound the Generosity of his Chaplain. Doctor Hacket finding the Bishop to mention no certain Sum said, He could give him no less than twenty Pounds. Upon which his Lordship suddenly answer'd, Is twenty Pounds a fit Present from me to a Man of his Parts and Merits? Take a hundred Pounds, and present it from me, telling him he shall not want, and I will come shortly and visit him my self. Which he afterwards perform'd, and made good his Promise, in supplying him during his Abode in England.

*Arch-Bishop
fortune.*

About this Time, the Reverend Prelate, Doctor Abbot Arch-Bishop of Canterbury, began to fall into Disgrace at Court, his Enemies taking Advantage of a late sad Misfortune; for shooting at a Deer with a Cross-Bow in Bramzil Park, the Arrow glancing casually kill'd the Keeper. This unfortunate Accident was such a sensible Affliction to this pious Man, that he retir'd to an Alms-House of his own Building at Guilford in Surrey, there to mortifie himself from the Enjoyment of worldly Pleasures. Some were of Opinion that it disabled him from exercising his Episcopal Function; but the King granting a Commission to enquire into the Fact, he found Friends that restor'd him from his Alms-House to his Palace, and he conferr'd a comfortable Subsistence upon the Widow and Children of this unhappily slain Man. But however, having disgusted the King by disapproving the Spanish Match, he never could recover any great Authority; and a Plant was now growing up that overspread him while he liv'd, and after his Decease obtain'd the Primacy. And this was the famous Dr. William Laud, a Person of extraordinary Spirit and Zeal, who was now made Bishop of St. David's, by the Interest of the Marquess of Buckingham and the Lord-Keeper Williams. This great and fiery Man, at Oxford had shown himself a mortal Opposer of the Puritans, of whom Abbot was thought to be a Favourer, and was there charg'd not only with Arminianism, but with holding several of the Romish Tenets. But for the scandalous Manner of his Rise, related by Coke, and pretendedly attested, it is so contrary to probability, that it can deserve no Place in History. The King had been disoblig'd at some Actions of his, therefore Buckingham his great Friend resolv'd to make use of Williams to raise him into the Bishoprick; and Williams knowing the Disposal of the Seal was at the other's Pleasure, found himself oblig'd to become Laud's Advocate to the King. But his Majesty was at first utterly averse, for several Reasons; but the Keeper earnestly persisting, the King at last said, Is there no Hold, but you will carry it! Then take him to you; but on my Soul, you will repent it: And so departed in a great Passion, with other fierce and ominous Words, publicly discours'd in Court; after this Arminianism daily increas'd, and Puritanism was more strictly watch'd; but to restrain the licentious Tongues among either Party, the King issu'd out a Letter to the Arch-Bishop of Canterbury, with several good Articles and Directions to all Preachers whatsoever, as may be seen at large in Wilson and Rushworth.

As the King now labour'd to settle things at home, and keep his People in Obedience, so he was as active abroad to preserve his own Reputation: For he still still concluded that he should save all Miscarriages by the intended Match with Spain, and that his People might see he could discern further into deep Matters of State than they, and so make the Error theirs. Therefore he industriously urg'd it by his Agents and Ambassadors, and all Indulgences to Recusants were admitted to smooth and soften their Addresses. The Lord Vaux, The King's Endeavours for the Spanish Match. a Roman Catholick, had liberty to transport four thousand English, to reinforce the King of Spain's Armies, both against King James's Confederates of Holland, where his banish'd Children had Refuge, and against their Country it self the Palatinate, which he had so much endeavour'd to preserve. The Articles of Marriage had taken up much Time in Debate, between the Commissioners of the two Kings, before they could be brought to any Form; and those concerning Religion had many various Shapes and Turns, 'till they were dress'd to their Satisfaction; and when they were form'd and fashion'd by them, the Pope stript them, and new modell'd them as he pleas'd. So that the sending and resending between Spain and Rome, and Rome and Spain, wasted much Time, and might have serv'd for a Colour to draw the Treaty in Infinitum. Wherefore King James wrote several Letters to the Lord Digby, whom he made Earl of Bristol; and he was commanded to declare plainly to the King of Spain, 'How far the King his Master had condescended in Matters of Religion, which was more than was capitulated in the late King of Spain's Reign; 'and if that would give Content, to proceed to a Conclusion of the Marriage, 'without further Delay; if otherwise, that then without more Loss of Time, 'the King his Master may dispose of his Son, and the King of Spain of the 'Infanta, as they pleas'd. But the Spaniard still continu'd in his former Pace, and would not be spurr'd forwards; and the Earl of Bristol still assur'd his Master, That the King of Spain, tho' slow in his Proceedings, was real in his Intentions. And tho' the Articles were fully drawn up in form, and agreed on both Sides, yet it is plain from the King of Spain's Letter to Olivarez this Year, that the Spaniard never design'd the Match at all, in which he positively tells him, 'That his Father had the same Design, as well as himself, and 'so declar'd upon his Death-Bed; therefore he would have him break it off as 'soon as conveniently he could. Thus was King James's Plain-heartedness deluded, his Honour blemish'd, his Love among his Subjects diminish'd, his Childrens Patrimony destroy'd, and he himself left without any Satisfaction. The Spaniards unfair Dealings.

This strange and unreasonable Management in the Court of Spain gave Rise and Occasion to a very peculiar if not romantick Project form'd by the Marquess of Buckingham, who envy'd the Earl of Bristol for having the sole Management of so great an Affair. Therefore he took an Opportunity to insinuate to Prince Charles the common Misfortune of Men of his Rank, 'That in so nice a Part of their worldly Happiness, as depended upon their Marriage, 'they had so small a Share, usually depending upon the uncertain Credit of 'others, for the Nature, Humour and Beauty of the Ladies they were to marry. 'Next, how brave and gallant it would appear for his Highness to make a 'Journey into Spain, and bring home his Lady; that it would put an End to 'all those slow Formalities, which might still retard the Infanta's Voyage for 'several Months; all which would be immediately remov'd by his engaging 'Appearance: That it would be such a singular Obligation to the Infanta, as 'she could never sufficiently esteem or requite, as being a Respect rarely paid by 'any other Prince, upon the like occasion: That in the great Affair concerning the Palatinate, it was very probable the King of Spain might readily 'gratify his personal Interposition, which in a Treaty with an Ambassador 'might be protracted, or attended with the starting of new Difficulties: However, the Mediation could not but be frankly undertaken by the Infanta herself, who would ambitiously make it part of her great Debt to the Prince, 'that he might by her Influence present to his Majesty the Peace and Restoration of his Family; which could not be effected by any other human Means. These

These Discourses made so deep an Impression upon the Mind and Spirit of the Prince, who was naturally inclin'd to Adventures, that he was transported with the Thought of it, and impatiently solicitous to compass the Design. The most apparent Difficulty was how they should procure the King's Consent, who they knew to be very quick-sighted in discerning Difficulties, and raising Objections, but very slow in mastering and unravelling them; who, not knowing how to struggle with desperate Contingencies, abhorr'd to be involv'd and intangled with them. This was therefore first to be attempted by the Prince himself, and to communicate it to the King as his humble Suit, with this Circumstance, that since all his Actions depended intirely upon his Majesty's own Approbation, he would vouchsafe to promise Not to communicate the thing propos'd, before he had first taken his own Resolution: And that this Condition should be first obtain'd, before the substantial Part should be discover'd; and so this Approach being first made, the Success and Prosecution was to be left to the Credit and Dexterity of the Marquess.

The King consents to the Prince's Journey.

All things being thus concerted, the two Adventurers soon found a proper Opportunity to make their Approaches. His Majesty chearfully consenting to the main Condition of Secrecy, the Prince upon his Knees declar'd his importunate Suit and Request, while the Marquess stood by, and enlarg'd upon the infinite Obligations his Majesty would accumulate upon the Prince, by his yielding to the tender Passion with which his Highness was transported; which being refus'd, would make a deep Impression upon his Spirits, and be accounted as the greatest Misfortune that could befall him in this World. The Prince taking Opportunity from the good Temper of his Father, insist'd upon two Points, That his Presence in Spain would immediately conclude the Marriage, and likewise determine the Restitution of the Palatinate to his Brother and Sister; both which the King passionately desir'd. These Discourses, urg'd with the utmost Artifice and Address, so prevail'd upon the King, that with less Hesitation than was usual, and much less than was agreeable to his Wisdom and Character, he gave his Approbation and Consent that the Prince should make the Journey he so earnestly desir'd. They therefore, to prevent any new Measures which a solemn Preparation for so rash an Undertaking might gradually occasion, as soon as they had gain'd the King's Promise upon the main, represented, 'That the Security of such a Design depended on Expedition; that were they to stay either for the equipping a Fleet fit to attend the Prince of Wales, or 'till a Pass might be obtain'd from France, the principal Ends of their Journey would by Delays be disappointed: That therefore, since the Design had hitherto been a Secret to all but themselves, they might with the Attendance of only two Servants, get through France, before they could be mis'd at Whitehall: Which indeed was very probable, and so the more readily consented to by the King; the Time of their Departure, the Servants that were to attend them, and whatever else should be thought necessary, being deferr'd 'till a second Consultation on the next Day.

He repents.

But when the timorous King in his Retirement came seriously to revolve what had been so loosely consult'd, as he had a wonderful Sagacity in such Reflections, a thousand Dangers and Difficulties occur'd to his distracted Thoughts; suggested as well by the violent Affection of a Father to his only Son, as the Influence he thought it might have on his People, too much inclin'd to murmur, and complain of the least Inadvertency; together with the Reputation he should forfeit among all Foreign Princes, if he so much departed from his Dignity, as to expose the immediate Heir of three Kingdoms to all the Jealousies and Dangers that might arise from that fathomless Abyss, Reason of State. These Reflexions were so terrible to him, that they robb'd him of all Peace and Rest; so that when the Prince and Marquess came to him about the Dispatch, he fell into a violent Passion with Tears, and told them, That he was undone, and that it would break his Heart, if they pursu'd their Resolution. Then he recounted recounted to them all the numerous Difficulties and Mischiefs that had occur'd to himself in his Retirement ; particularly observing to the Marquess, who was already unpopular to the highest Degree, how unavoidable his Ruin must be ; concluding with that Disorder and Passion with which he began, and with Sighs and Tears conjur'd them, That they would no longer urge him to consent to a thing so contrary to his Reason and Understanding, the Performance of which would prove his Death. The Prince and the Marquess took no Pains to answer any of his Majesty's Reasons : His Highness only reminded him of the Promise he had made the Day before, Which if he should violate, it would make him never think of Marriage more. But the Marquess, who better knew what Arguments would prevail, treated him more rudely, and with all the Insolence of a Favourite told him, His Breach of a Promise so solemnly made, would ruin his Credit with all Mankind ; that some Rascal had furnish'd him with his pitiful Reasons ; and that it would be such a Disobligation to the Prince, whose Heart was fix'd upon the Journey after his Majesty's Approbation, that he could never forget it, nor forgive any Man who had been the Occasion of it. So that at length the Prince by his humble and importunate Entreaties, and Buckingham by his rougher Dialect, prevail'd so far, that the Debate upon the Journey was resum'd, in which it was agreed, That they should take their leaves of the King in two Days, his Highness pretending to hunt at Theobalds, and the Marquess to take Physick at Chelsey.

Buckingham

They next proceeded to the manner of Attendance, and told the King, That being to have no more than two in their Company, they had fix'd upon Sir Francis Cottington, and Endymion Porter, who were both grateful to the King, the former being Secretary to the Prince, and the other of his Bed-Chamber ; so that his Majesty wish'd that it might be immediately imparted to them, because many things might occur to them, as necessary to the Journey, which they two would not think on. Whereupon Sir Francis Cottington, waiting then in the outward Room, was quickly brought in ; to whom the King said, Here is Baby Charles and Stenny (for so he usually call'd the Marquess) have a Mind to go Post into Spain, to fetch home the Infanta, and designing to have but two in their Company, have chosen you for one, what think you of the Journey ? Sir Francis, surpriz'd and trembling at the Consequence, reply'd, That he could not think well of it ; for the Spaniards, when they had the Prince in Possession, would make what new Overtures they believ'd most advantageous to themselves, and among the rest, many that concern'd Religion, and the Exercise of it in England, and by that means ruin all the Attempts that have been for the compleating the Match. Upon this the King threw himself upon his Bed, and said, I told you this before, and fell into new Passion and Lamentation, That he was undone, and should loose Baby Charles ! Hereupon the Marquess reproach'd Cottington with all possible Bitterness of Words, and told him, That the King only ask'd him about the Journey, and best Way of Travelling, and not his Advice upon Matters of State, which he had the Presumption to give against his Master, and which he should repent as long as he liv'd. This threw the poor King into a new Agony, on the behalf of a Servant like to suffer for answering honestly, upon which he reply'd with some Heat, and a profane Oath, You are very much to blame to use him thus ; he has answer'd like an honest and wise Man to the Question I ask'd him, and you know 'tis no more than I told you before he came in. However, after all this Passion and Heats on both sides, the King yielded ; having by this plainly discover'd that the whole Intrigue was first contriv'd by the Marquess, and now pursu'd by his Spirit and Impetuosity.

Journey.

The two Adventurers being ready, with their two Attendants, set forwards with false Beards to cover their smooth Faces, and pass'd towards Dover under the Names of Jack Smith and Tom Smith, in all Places leaving greater Impressions of their Bounty than was agreeable with their Disguises. At Dover

the

the officious Mayor examin'd them so strictly, that the Marquess was forc'd to discover himself in private, and tell him he was going to visit the Fleet; so they had liberty to take Shipping, and landed at Boloign the same Day, making the swiftest Motion by Post-Horses 'till they arriv'd at Paris. There the Prince spent one Day to view the Grandeur of the City, and Splendor of the Court; and they both together saw the Queen Mother at Dinner, the King in the Gallery after Dinner, and towards the Evening they had a full View of the Queen Infanta, and the Princess Henrietta Maria, with most of the Beauties of the Court, at the Practice of a Masking Dance; being admitted by the Duke of Montbason, the Queen's Lord-Chamberlain, in Courtesie to Strangers, when many of the French were refus'd. Here the Prince saw those Eyes, which afterwards so inflam'd his Heart, that it was thought to be one Occasion of inflaming three Kingdoms. From Paris they pass'd with all Expedition to Bordeaux, where the Duke d'Espemon, Governor of the City, offer'd them the Civilities of his House; but Sir Francis Cottington, handsomly declin'd the Invitation by informing him, That they were Gentlemen that desir'd to improve themselves, and had not Breeding suitable to his Grandeur. They met with some Difficulties also at Bayonne, the last Town in France, where the Count de Gramont was Governor; who being a pregnant Man read something extraordinary in their Looks, but this being a Time of Peace, he out of ordinary Civility let them pass: Yet within a few Hours after they had taken Post, he had Notice by a Courier from the Spanish Ambassador to the English Court, that the Prince of England was among them; so that the Prince had great Fortune in meeting with such little Interruption, when the French might have made great Advantages by stopping his Passage.

They arrive in Spain.

Upon Saturday the sixth of March they arriv'd at Madrid; where the Prince and Marquess came one Day before Cottington and Porter, to raise the less Noise in Appearances. They lighted at the Earl of Bristol's House in the Evening, where the Marquess brought in the Portmanteau, while his Master staid without with the Guide, 'till he had prepar'd a way for Privacy. The Earl of Bristol was astonish'd at the Sight; and the next Morning the City was fill'd with Rumours of the Arrival of some great Prince; which was sufficiently known to the King of Spain, tho' he thought fit to conceal it. In the Evening Buckingham and Bristol went to Court, and had private Audience of the King, who sent his grand Favourite Olivarez back with them, to congratulate the Prince's Arrival, who let the Prince know how infinitely happy his Master was in the Enjoyment of him there, and that the Obligation was so great, that he deserv'd to have the Infanta thrown into his Arms; all this while kneeling, kissing his Hands, and imbracing his Thigh, with all the Marks of Spanish Humility. Next he address'd himself to the Marquess of Buckingham, telling him, That now the Prince of England was in Spain, his Master and he would divide the World between them, with other Flights of Rhetorick and Fancy. After his Departure, about ten a Clock at Night, the King of Spain came in a close Coach to visit the Prince, who having Notice of his coming, met him in the Way; and there they spent some Time in such Caresses and Embraces as are usual at the Interviews of great Princes and Monarchs. Gondomar, lately return'd, had also his peculiar Compliment the next Day; for he declar'd to the Prince, That he had strange News to tell him, which was, That an Englishman was sworn Privy-Counsellor to the King of Spain; meaning himself, who had lately receiv'd that Honour, tho' he was an Englishman in his Heart.

Their kind Reception.

The common Sort did highly applaud this brave Adventure, and express'd his Welcome by Shouts and Acclamations of Joy; and immediately they marry'd him to the Infanta, as it were by publick Voice. The King and Council contriv'd how to give his Highness the most honourable Reception, and decreed, that upon all Occasions of Meeting he should have the Precedency of the King;

King; that he should make his Entrance into the Royal Palace, in the same State that the Kings of Spain us'd to do on the Day of their Coronation, and that one of the chief Quarters in the King's Palace should be prepar'd for his Lodgings; that a hundred of the Guard should attend him, and all the Council obey him as the King's own Person. A general Pardon was publish'd; the Prisons were open'd, and hundreds of Offenders were set at Liberty; and a late Proclamation against Excess in Apparel was revok'd. The following Day after Dinner the King came in Person, with his Favourite Olivarez, and several other of the Nobility, to conduct the Prince from the Town to the Court, having Horses and all Equipage proper for such Shew and Grandeur. Thus nobly mounted, they rode through the Streets under a Canopy in as much State as at a Coronation, the Prince riding on the King's right Hand. The Queen and the Infanta from a Window in the Court saw them; and when they dismounted the Infanta retir'd, and the Queen went to her Chamber, in Expectation of a Visit. When the King and Prince enter'd her Room, she rose to meet them, making a low Obeisance to the Prince, which he return'd with a profound reverential Bow; and after some Compliments, they sat down on three Royal Seats, the Queen in the middle, and the Prince on her right Hand; when after half an Hour's Conversation, the Queen brought the Prince to the utmost Extent of her Chamber, and the King to a stately Apartment provided for him. Immediately after the Queen by her Major-domo gave him a further Welcome, with several rich Presents of Perfumes, and costly wearing Linnen; and the King sent him two Golden Keys, which would open all his private Lodgings, and his Bed-Chamber, letting him know, that he had free Access to him at all Hours. Here he was constantly attended and serv'd with Grandeess and Titulados, as the King himself; and was entertain'd with many Shows and Triumphs, and several daily Pastimes. And one Day running at the Ring, in Company of many of the Nobility, his Highness was the only Person that bore the Ring away, and that in the Presence of the Infanta his Mistress; which was interpreted as a fortunate Presage at the Beginning of his Atchievement. In sum, there wanted nothing that human Invention could produce to manifest and display the Height of outward Glory. And now the English Nobility came over in great Numbers into Spain, and the Marquess of Buckingham had the new Title of Duke sent him by King James, that he might be in the highest Rank among the Spanish Grandeess; and the Prince was so encircled with a magnificent Retinue of his own People, that it might be said, there was an English Court in the Palace of the King of Spain.

The Prince highly honour'd

When all the splendid Ceremonies were a little over, the Prince began to consider the main Business of his Journey, and desir'd a more intimate Access to his Mistress, which Olivarez promis'd from Day to Day, but still delay'd: But at length, when unperform'd Promises were heighten'd into Shame, he plainly confess'd that it was agreed by the King and Council, That he might not see her as a Lover, 'till the Dispensation came from Rome; but he had sometimes Access to her as a Prince in a publick Way, the King of Spain being always present, and the Earl of Bristol Interpreter. It was observ'd that the Prince had sometimes his Eyes immovably fix'd upon the Lady for half an Hour together, in a thoughtful speculative Posture, other times he watch'd a full Hour in a close Coach in the Streets to see her as she went abroad; and one particular Time, he climb'd over a lofty Wall, and hazarded his Life, to see her in a Garden. But now the chief Obstructions seem'd to have proceeded from the Pope, who us'd all Endeavours to cause the Prince to turn Catholick; the People of Spain were not a little elevated with such Hopes, and Promises were made to him of great Assistance, if his own People should rebel upon that Consideration. Orations and Processions and pompous Shows were made to allure him; Popish Books were dedicated, and Popish Pictures were presented to him; they carry'd him to the most Religious Places, and to Persons famous Endeavours to make him turn Catholick.

for pretended Miracles ; and the Pope himself wrote a smooth insinuating Letter to him, and another to the Duke of Buckingham, to bring about this glorious Conversion. He return'd a civil Answer to the Pope's Letter, but as he had first answer'd Olivarez, He came not thither for Religion, but for a Wife, so he remain'd stedfast in his Religion, nor did he express any shew of Change, when he was under the greatest Temptations.

A. D. 1623. Reg. 21. At length, after innumerable Scruples and Impediments, the long solicited Dispensation came from Pope Gregory to the Court of Spain, but so clog'd that it caus'd new Delays and Difficulties, which where at last surmounted by the King of Spain, who now began to be seriously inclin'd to the Match, and caus'd it to be publickly declar'd at Madrid. After which certain Articles, to the Number of twenty three, were sign'd and sworn to by the King of England, the Prince and Privy-Council. These were stil'd by the Cardinals, Propositions for the right Augmentation and Weal of the Roman Catholick Religion, and were much of the same Nature with those of which we have given the Substance, Page 947; only in one Article it was provided ' That the Sons and Daughters that should be born of Marriage, should be brought up in the Company of the Infanta, at least 'till the Age of ten Years. Besides these publick Articles, which were confirm'd under the Great Seal of England, Rushworth has given us some private Articles, sworn to by King James and the Prince, greatly to the Advantage of the Romanists in England; but of these Nalson justly doubts, as being too much void of Proof, as well as Probability. Thus the great Business seem'd to have been accomplish'd; which gave King James so much Satisfaction, that being transported with an Assurance of the Match, he was heard to say, Now all the Devils in Hell cannot break it; to which one softly reply'd, There was never a Devil left in Hell, for they were all gone into Spain to make it up. In Spain the Infanta was stil'd The Princess of England, and was kept no longer in her Virgin Retirements. In England a Chappel was building for her at St. James's, and Don Carlos, the Spanish Ambassador, laid the first Stone: Her Picture was every where to be seen, and a Fleet was prepar'd for her Passage; and the greatest Enemies to the Alliance submitted to the King's Will. But in all this Capitulation between the two Crowns, the Restitution of the Palatinate was laid aside; the King conceiving that the Consummation of the Match would over-rule and settle that Affair to his intire Satisfaction. The French were very apprehensive of this Conjunction, and thought it safest to make Peace at home, and employ their Strength to bound the Incroachments of the Emperor and King of Spain: By which means a severe Persecution ceas'd in that Kingdom; the Protestants were permitted to call home their banish'd Ministers, to build their ruin'd Churches, and enjoy their Liberty in Religion. This Happiness did King James's joining with Spain procure to an almost ruin'd People.

But after all the King's Concessions, the Spaniards contriv'd new Delays, and propos'd harder Terms; and the Pope had oblig'd the Catholick King to see the Conditions perform'd, and to protract the Marriage, 'till Matters in England were put in perfect Execution. Whereupon the Divines advis'd the King, that the Promises of Marriage be immediately made, but the Consummation and the Delivery of the Infanta, be deferr'd 'till May in the following Year. But while they were contriving new Remora's, Pope Gregory that granted the Dispensation dy'd, which furnish'd them with a Pretence that the Dispensation was now invalid; yet with a Reserve to keep up the Prince's Spirit, That it should be no Hindrance to the Match, for the new Pope would immediately perform his Part; and the King of Spain assur'd the Prince, That if he would stay 'till Christmas, the Marriage should then be really celebrated. These repeated Delays, and continu'd Obstructions, caus'd the Duke of Buckingham, who was highly disoblig'd at Olivarez, to send home such provoking Accounts of the Spanish Procrastinations, that King James writ to Buckingham in Articles of the Marriage.

New Delays in the Spanish Court.

in the most exprefs Terms to bring his Son back with all speed, and if his Son's Youthful Follies shou'd tie him to a longer Expectation, he charg'd him upon his Allegiance to come away, and leave him there. This Letter was immediately shewn by the Duke to the Prince, which so effectually wrought upon him, that he took up a sudden Resolution to return into England. Of which the Grandees in Spain having Notice, they were exceedingly concerned; for their Design was to detain the Prince there all Winter, not only hoping to turn him to their Religion, but to marry him to the Infanta, that she being with Child before the Spring, they might keep her there 'till she was deliver'd, that so the Child might be educated and naturaliz'd a Spaniard, both in Affection and Religion, which this sudden Resolution hindering, it extreamly startled them. Olivarez charg'd the Duke of Buckingham with giving him Assurance of the Prince's turning Catholick, which the Duke told him was false; which caus'd very angry and resenting Expressions on both sides: So that the Duke, not regarding a ceremonious Farewel, departed hastily a little before the Prince, pretending to prepare the English Fleet that lay at Port St. Andero for the Prince's Transportation. According to his open Temper, at his Departure, he told Olivarez, That he was oblig'd to the King, Queen and Infanta, in an eternal Tie of Gratitude; but for himself, he had so far disoblig'd him, that he could not, without Flattery, make the least Profession of Friendship for him. Olivarez gave a short Reply, That he accepted of what he had spoken. The Duke departing with so little Satisfaction, the Spaniards concluded, that he would endeavour by all Means possible to hinder the Marriage.

Departure.*

But his Highness had gain'd an universal Love and Esteem, and was look'd upon to be a truly noble, discreet, and well deserving Prince; his grave Deportment suited with the very Genius of that Nation, which during the whole Stay was supported with the greatest Affability, Solidity and Constancy, and at his Departure, with unparallel'd Bounty, presenting Jewels of inestimable Value to the Infanta, and several Grandees. Before which, the King of Spain and the Prince both took solemn Oaths to accomplish the Marriage, and to make the Espousals ten Days after the Dispensation from the new Pope should arrive; and a Procuration was seal'd by the Prince to the King of Spain, and his Brother, and left in the Hands of the Earl of Bristol, to stop the Delivery of the Proxies, 'till further Direction from him, alledging, That the Infanta might retire into a Cloister, and defraud him of a Wife; but these Instructions were to be conceal'd from the Earl, 'till the Dispensation came from Rome.

The Espousals agreed.

After six Months Stay, to the vast Expence of the Kings of England and Spain, the Prince took a most solemn Farewel of the Queen and Infanta, who look'd upon the Marriage as compleated in Effect; and the Infanta caus'd many Divine Duties to be perform'd, for the Safety of his Return into England, expecting to follow him in no long Space. When the Prince told her, His Heart could never be out of Anxiety, 'till she had pass'd the intended Voyage, and was safe on the British Land, she answer'd with a modest Blush, That if she were in Danger upon the Ocean, or discompos'd with the rolling Waves, she should take Courage, and remember all the Way to whom she was going. The King himself conducted him as far as the Escorial, and there nobly feasted him; and at the Minute of parting acknowledg'd the Obligation which his Highness had laid upon him, by putting himself in his Hands, a thing so unusual with Princes: Prottesting, He earnestly desir'd a nearer Conjunction of Brotherly Affection, for the more intire Unity between them. The Prince extoll'd the high Favours he had found during his Abroad in his Court and Presence, which had begotten such an Estimation of his Worth, as he knew not how to value; but he would leave a Mediator to supply his own Defects, if he would make him so happy as to continue him in her good Opinion, his most fair and most dear Mistress. From thence, attended with a Train of Spanish Courtiers to the English Fleet, he took Shipping, with great Hazard to his Person;

This Prince's Departure.

His Arrival in England.

Person; and it was observ'd, That the first Words he spoke after he was embark'd, were, That it was a great Weakness and Folly in the Spaniard, to grant him a free Passage, after they had us'd him so ill. He arriv'd at Portsmouth on the fifth of October, and soon appear'd to be the Kingdom's Delight and Darling; the Peoples Hearts were fir'd at the Sight and News of him, and unanimously prais'd God, without any publick Edict of Thanksgiving. Publick Societies and private Families overflow'd with the most rapturous Expressions of Pleasure and Wonder; and when he enter'd London, the Bonfires, which the Peoples Joy had kindled, seem'd to turn the City into one Flame.

New Proposals to Spain.

The King was then at Royston, to whom the Prince and Duke of Buckingham rod Post, and gave him a fair and plausible Narration of all their Proceedings, laying the whole Weight of Odium upon the Spanish Delays, and the Earl of Bristol's Miscarriages; which the King, as an indulgent Father to his Son, and a kind Friend to his Favourite, took for current Payment, without further Examination. And to retaliate the former Usage of the Spaniards, the Prince and Duke join'd with those of the Council and Nobility who were averse to the Spanish Match, cementing their Power with that Strength, that a Parliament was to be call'd, and the People consulted; that they laying open the fraudulent Proceedings of the Spaniard, the King's Justice in breaking the Treaty might be more conspicuous to the World. The News of a Parliament to break this Match was quickly carry'd through the Nation; and, according to their Expectations, it prov'd very grateful to the People, and gain'd them much Respect and Honour. But the first thing they did was to procure an absolute Command from the King to the Earl of Bristol, to suspend the Delivery of the Proxy 'till Christmas, tho' the Dispensation should come sooner; and being resolv'd to affront the King of Spain for his former Delays, Bristol in his Letter had positive Instructions to demand the Restitution of the Palatinate and the Electoral Dignity, which had been wav'd and neglected in the Conclusion of the Treaty: The King in his Letter writing, It would be very strange in me to receive one Daughter in Joy, and leave another in Sighs and Tears. But Bristol's Power of deferring the Espousals 'till Christmas, was to be kept within his own Breast, and not made publick, 'till the Dispensation should come to discover it: And there was a Clause in the Procuration left by the Prince, that the Power of that Instrument should expire at Christmas; so that the Execution of it was to be respited 'till it was altogether invalid. All this was extremely ungrateful to the Earl of Bristol, who had so long labour'd, and was still endeavouring to bring about the Match.

Great Provisions for the Match in Spain.

In the mean Time the Spaniards made all solemn Provisions for the accomplishing so glorious a Work; and the King of Spain sent a special Ambassador into England to congratulate the Prince's happy Voyage and safe Return; and from thence he had Instructions to go into Flanders, Germany and Italy, to make known to all Princes, Potentates and Allies, how near the Treaty of Marriage was to be consummated. As soon as the Dispensation came from the new Pope, in the Beginning of December, Bonfires were made throughout all Spain, and the great Ordnance every where thunder'd out the general Joy. The ninth of the Month was prefix'd for the Marriage Day, a noble Terras was erected between the Court and the next Church, almost a quarter of a Mile in length, cover'd with Tapestry, for the greater Magnificence, and all things appointed in the highest State for such an extraordinary Solemnity. Great Presents were providing in the Court of Spain for King James and the Prince; the Infanta's Family, design'd for England, was settled and establish'd; she had prepar'd the richest Suits for her Lord and Husband, had long practis'd the English Tongue to make it Natural, and began to draw the Letters which she design'd to have written the Day of her Espousals to the Prince her Husband, and the King her Father-in-Law. Her Journey into England was resolv'd to be in the Beginning of March; and tho' her Portion was not nam'd in the Articles,

ticles, yet it was fix'd at no less than two Millions of Mony, which was four Times as much as had been given with any Daughter of Spain. In this State and Perfection were the Affairs of Spain, when King James's Commands at once blasted all this blooming Glory: For Bristol had now Orders to declare positively to the King of Spain, That without the Restoration of the Palatinate, and the Electoral Dignity, the Treaty should proceed no further; which was a strange Surprize to the King and Infanta, when the one was like to lose his Honour, and the other her Lover. His Answer was, That the Palatinate was none of his to give, and the Electorate was in the Power of another; but if the Emperor and the Duke of Bavaria would not yield to Reason, he would arm himself against them. But this Answer was not Satisfactory from one who had us'd so many subtle Pretensions, and had been a prime Instrument in the Ruin of the Count Palatine. Therefore, a Breach being apparent, the King of Spain sent to the Earl of Bristol to demand no more Audiences of him, to deliver no more Letters to the Infanta, and gave Command that none hereafter should call her Princess of England. This was the End of the famous seven Years Treaty; in which the King of England, a King of Peace, notwithstanding all the Spanish Armado's, gain'd the Victory; and Spain for many Years did not receive so retaliating and dishonourable a Defeat. And this was an Amazement to the Christian World, that when the Match was brought to such Perfection, the Motion should be rejected by that Side, which pursu'd it with so much Eagerness and unweary'd Patience; which by some has been call'd a Master-piece, by others a Mystery of State, of which many various and uncertain Conjectures have been made.

The Match suddenly broke.

With the Breach of this Spanish Match ended the Life of the famous Antiquary and Historian Mr. William Camden, Clerenceaux King at Arms, in the seventy fourth Year of his Age; a Person highly esteem'd by Foreigners, as well as those of his own Country. The latter are oblig'd to him not only for his noble Productions, but also for his Munificence in founding a History-Professorship in the University of Oxford; doubly immortalizing his Name, both in his own happy Discoveries, and the laudable Incouragement given to the Labours of Posterity and future Ages.

X. We are now approaching to the last great Turn of Affairs in this Reign, which had such remarkable Effects in the next, namely the Marriage with France, which Buckingham had been a considerable Time in contriving and projecting. This Duke having by a long Converse made himself Favourite to the Prince, as well as to the King, perswaded his Highness to look back to the Beauty he had seen in France, which was nearer to him, and probably more easie to be obtain'd. But the Treaty with Spain ought first to be dissolv'd, to give a Colour of Honour to a Proceeding with the other; and that was what nothing but a Parliament could fully accomplish, who once removing the Cause, a Treaty of Peace, were best able to make good the Effect, which would be a War that must follow it. Therefore a Parliament was summon'd the twelfth Day of February; when the Grief that the sudden Death of the Duke of Richmond had given the King, caus'd it to be deferr'd to the nineteenth of the same Month. Here the King in a long and very obliging Speech, 'us'd his utmost Endeavours to sweeten the Parliament into a good Opinion of all his Actions, and of his sincere Desires to comply with them in every thing, for the Good of the Kingdom, and his utter Aversion to the Infringement of their Liberties. He desir'd to be accounted the Husband of his People; and because he was blam'd for Remissness in Maintenance of Religion, and in encouraging a Toleration to Papists, he declar'd, As God should judge him, he never thought, or ever in Words express'd any thing that savour'd of it: Only sometimes, for special Reasons, he did not so fully put the Laws in Execution, but conniv'd at some things that might have hinder'd more weighty Affairs.

Reg. 22.

The fourth Parliament in this Reign.

Affairs. As to what related to the breaking off the Spanish Match, he referr'd them to the Prince and Duke of Buckingham, to give them Satisfaction in that Affair. And towards the latter End he declar'd, He spoke as a Chri- stian King, that never any Traveller, in the burning, dry and sandy Desarts, more thirsted for Water to quench his Thirst, than he did for a happy Conclusion of this Parliament, and that it might atone for the Miscarriages of the three former.

Buckingham's Narrative of the Spanish Treaty.

Within three or four Days, the Prince began to speak of the Spanish Affairs in Parliament, in which he forgot not to mention the Duke of Buckingham with more than ordinary Affection, who observing the heavy Resentment the King had of what was past, and the Affection he still bore to the Spanish Trea- ty, resolv'd to use all possible Means to ingratiate himself with the Parliament and People, who he knew always detested the Match, and indeed any Alliance with Spain. So when at a Conference between the two Houses, which his Highness and the Duke were desir'd to manage, the Prince had made a short Introduction, and commended the Duke for his great Care of him in Spain, and his Dexterity in bringing him away, he referr'd the whole Relation to him, who before that august Body declar'd, 'That the real Design of the Prince's Journey into Spain, had been to make a clear Discovery of the Spani- ard's Integrity, and if he was sincere in what he pretended. That the Ambassador, who had the sole Management of that great Affair, wrote in one Dispatch that all was concluded, and in the next, that new Difficulties and fresh Demands were started and insisted upon. These Ebbs and Floods made the Prince apprehend, that their Business was to amuse us while they had other secret Designs in Agitation; and thereupon his Highness had prevail'd upon his Father that he might make that Journey. That they were no sooner arriv'd at Madrid, than they discover'd their Purpose never was to give him the Infanta. That instead of proceeding upon the Articles, which were thought concluded, they urg'd new Demands, and that so peremptorily in Matters of Religion, that the principal Clergy-Men, and most eminent of the King's Preachers, had not only frequent Conferences with the Prince to persuade him to turn Papist, but had procur'd the Pope to write a Letter himself to his Highness upon the same Subject; but it had pleas'd God to give him not only a constant and unshaken Heart in his Religion, but such Strength of Argument to defend the same, that they stood amaz'd to hear him, and confess'd they were not able to answer him. That the Prince was never permitted to confer with his Mistress, and very rarely to see her, even when they pretended he was upon the Point of Marrying. That they never could obtain a more Satisfactory Answer in the Business of the Palatinate, than That it was not in the King of Spain's Power to restore it, tho' it had been taken by the sole Power of Spain, and still'd possess'd by their Forces; so that he was well assur'd there was no more real Intention in that Point of Restitution, than in the other of Marriage, and that there was no Hopes of recovering the Palatinate by any other Means than that of Force, which would easily effect it. Throughout his whole Discourse he frequently reflect'd upon the Earl of Bristol, as if he was privy to the Spanish Designs, and concurr'd with them; that therefore the King had recall'd him, that he might account for all his Miscarriages. Whereas in reality his Majesty had sent for him, rather to assist him against the Duke, than to expose him to his Malice and Fury.

The Parilament applaud him.

The Conference ended in an high Applause of the Prince's and Duke's Behaviour, and the Parliament, who had before look'd upon the Duke with a Malignant Eye, for tempting the Prince to so dangerous a Journey, when they found what extraordinary Effects it had produc'd, forgot all former Murmurings, and could scarce contain from acknowledging him the Preserver of the Nation: His Discovery was highly extoll'd, and he soon became the Favourite of the Multitude. But the King himself was infinitely offended, when he

he heard what the Duke had so confidently avow'd, without any Authority or Direction from him, a great Part of which himself knew to be false; so that he only wanted the Assistance of a resolute brisk Counsellor to destroy the Duke, and such a one he promis'd himself in the Earl of Bristol, whom he daily expected. However he resolv'd to comply in all things with his Parliament, who now wisely pass'd over all Reflections upon particular Persons; and having the Treaty of Marriage with Spain put into their Hands, they crush'd that Serpent in the Head, by advising the King to break the Treaty, and proclaim open War against the King of Spain, protesting to assist the King in the regaining the Palatinate, with their Lives and Fortunes. But the timorous King, apprehending that when the War was begun there would not be sufficient Means to maintain it, thank'd the Parliament for their Advice; and answer'd That he would consider better of it. The Parliament finding the King begin to stagger and sink, were resolv'd to rouse and keep up his Spirits; and therefore they offer'd him an extraordinary Aid of three intire Subsidies, and three Fifteenths and Tenths, payable in the Compass of one Year, and so closely urg'd him to the Beginning of the War, that he had no longer Room to make an Evasion, but was forc'd to declare both against the Emperor and the King of Spain, according to their Advice. Upon which it was resolv'd, shortly to send six thousand Men to join with the Forces of the States of Holland, that by weakning the Spaniards in the Netherlands, they might have a freer Access into Germany, for the Recovery of the Palatinate. They dissolve the Spanish Treaty.

The Dissolution of the Treaties with Spain, and the Preparations for War resounding in every Ear, gave such an Alarm to the Spanish Ambassador, the Marquess of Inoiosa, that he resolv'd to act his Revenge against the Duke of Buckingham. In order to effect it, by a Stratagem he thrust a Paper into the King's Hands, containing the Particulars of some strange and desperate Designs form'd by the Duke against his Majesty, in which the Prince himself wanted not his Share; which were so plausibly drawn up, as might have distracted a Mind far less timorous than his own. This Contrivance so prevail'd upon the King, that he became deeply thoughtful and melancholy, and would entertain the Prince and Duke with no Discourse but Riddles and broken Sentences, that like Flashes of Lightning from a dark Cloud, shew'd a Storm was gathering within. Immediately the Prince and Duke concluded themselves in Danger; and upon Enquiry found that the Spanish Ambassador, and Macstro a Jesuit of that Nation, had been with the King, and that some of the Ambassador's Family had boasted, That they had sensibly wounded the Duke, and laid such a Train as should blow the Parliament in pieces. The King, amidst these terrible Anxieties, prepar'd for Windsor, hoping to divert and ease his over-charg'd Imaginations: And at the End of April he took Coach together with the Prince, but made some slight Pretence to leave Buckingham behind him, as he was putting his Foot into the Coach: At which he broke out into Tears, and humbly begg'd of his Majesty To tell him his Crime, that he might confess it, or clear himself. To which the King only reply'd with a profound Sigh, That he was the most unhappy Wretch alive, to be forsaken by those who were dear to him: Which was follow'd by a Flood of Tears both from himself and the Prince; but the King drove away for Windsor, and left the disconsolate Duke behind him. This coming to the Ear of the Lord Keeper Williams, he hasten'd to the Duke's House, where with Difficulty he gain'd Admittance to his Grace, whom he found lying on a Couch in a melancholy unmovable Posture. But at length the Duke was persuaded to declare the Case, at which the Keeper advis'd him immediately to follow the King to Windsor, and never to stir from his Presence Night or Day; for the Danger was, lest any one should gain the King's Ear, and persuade him to dissolve the Parliament, and upon the Dissolution of it, get his Grace thrown into the Tower, and then God knows what would follow. The Duke follow'd the Keeper's Advice, while the The King suspects Buckingham.

He is reconcil'd to him.

other in the mean Time, by a nice Piece of Dexterity, and through the Means of a Mistress kept by the Spanish Secretary, found out the whole Occasion of the Disturbance: Which ended in a full and happy Reconciliation between the King, the Prince and Duke, at a Time when the Continuance of the Breach might have caus'd infinite Mischiefs to them all.

The Earl of Bristol imprison'd.

By this the Duke's Power was more firmly establish'd, notwithstanding the secret Resentments of the King, who contrary to his Promise was prevail'd upon to restrain the Earl of Bristol at his first Arrival, and without admitting him into his Presence, to throw him into the Tower, upon Suspicion of High-Treason; this noble Earl had left the Spanish Court with Honour and Reputation, where he was offer'd Places, Sums of Money, and Protection against his Enemies in England, all which he generously refus'd: But now finding Buckingham's Power and Popularity too mighty for him to oppose at this Instant, he was content with Submission to gain his Liberty, and retire himself to a Country Privacy. The Duke, swell'd with Grandeur, next turn'd the Weight of his Authority against Lionel Cranfield, a Gentleman of great Abilities, who by marrying a near Relation of the Duke's, was rais'd by him to be made a Privy-Counsellor, Master of the Wardrobe, Master of the Wards, and shortly Lord High-Treasurer of England, and Earl of Middlesex. This Lord had by his great Dexterity gain'd so much Credit with the King, that during the Duke's Absence in Spain, he not only refus'd to remit such Sums of Money as those unlimited Expences requir'd, but took the Courage to dispute his Commands, and appeal to the King, whose Ear was always inclin'd to him. Therefore when the Duke found his Interest in the present Parliament, he projected the Ruin of this bold Rival, and easily procur'd some leading Men in the House of Commons to send up an Impeachment of several Corruptions and Misdemeanors to the House of Lords against that great Minister. The discerning King readily foresaw the ill Consequences of such an Activity, which was a Breach upon his Royal Authority, and a dangerous Precedent against the Supports of Regal Power. He therefore sent for the Prince and Duke, who had both promoted the Matter, and earnestly conjur'd them to make use of their utmost Interest to restrain it, as a Wound to the Crown not easie to be cur'd; and finding the Duke unmov'd by all his Arguments and Commands, he with an angry Oath call'd him a direct Fool, and prophetically told him, That in this Fit of Popularity he was making a Rod to scourge himself. Then turning to the Prince with the same Foresight he said, That when he was dead, he would have his Belly-full of Parliament Impeachments, and would remember to his Sorrow how much he had contributed to the Weakning of the Crown, by the two Precedents he was so fond of; meaning as well the engaging the Parliament in the War, as the Prosecuting the Earl of Middlesex. But the Duke had gain'd so powerful an Interest in both Houses, that the King's Interposition was ineffectual, and the Earl, notwithstanding the good Defence he made, was at last condemn'd in a great Fine, to a long Imprisonment, and an Exclusion from his Seat in Parliament during Life: A Clause of such a Nature, as was never known before in any Judgment of Parliament, and indeed not to be inflict'd on a Peer but by Attainder.

*The Parliament
against Popery.*

The Lords being now at Leisure, began to consider how highly necessary it was that they should join with the Commons, in Petitioning the King to curb the Growth of Popery, and restrain the Aspiring Romanists. And after some Conferences between both Houses, the Petition was reduc'd to two Propositions, and presented to the King as two Petitions: The first was to beg his Majesty, 'That all the Laws might be put in Execution against Jesuits, 'Seminary Priests, and other Orders of the Church of Rome, and generally 'against all Popish Recusants. The second was, 'That his Majesty would be 'pleas'd to secure the Hearts of his Subjects, by the Engagement of his Royal 'Word, That upon no future Occasion of Marriage or Treaty, or any Request of Foreign Prince or State, he would remove or relax the Execution of his Laws against the foresaid Roman Catholicks. To both these the King gave a particular Answer viva voce before the Lords and Commons; and as to the first he protested before God, That his Heart had bled when he heard of the Increase of Popery, and that the Grief of it had been as Thorns in his Eyes, and Pricks in his Side; therefore he was ready by Proclamation to command all the Jesuits and Priests of the Nation to depart by a certain Day. As to the second he declar'd, That since it was against the Rule of Wisdom, that a King should suffer any Subject to transgress the Laws by the Intercession of other Princes, therefore he assur'd them, That he would be careful that no such Condition should be foisted in upon any other Treaty whatsoever. From these Proceedings many Papists were turn'd out of Places of Trust and Profit, which considerably crush'd their Party; 'till a new Treaty with France made a great Alteration, and gave them new Life and Incouragement. And now the Parliament having sat above three Months, given three Subsidies, three Fifteenths and Tenths, pass'd an Act of general Pardon, and thirty three other Acts of Consequence, upon the twenty ninth of May it was prorogu'd from time to time, 'till the King's Death dissolv'd it.

The King's Answer.
The Parliament ended.

During this Session, four Regiments of Foot, fifteen hundred in each Regiment, were transported into Holland under the Command of the Earl of Oxford, the Earl of Southampton, the Earl of Effex, and the Lord Willoughby, since Earl of Lindsey. But while the English, the great Supporters of the Dutch, were fighting for them in their own Country, there arriv'd News out of the East-Indies of such a horrid and barbarous Nature, as no Time nor Age could parallel. The Dutch grasping at the whole Spicery Trade in that Eastern World, and having industriously wrought out the Spaniards and Portuguese, endeavour'd to do the same by their best Friends the English, that they might engross the whole to themselves; which causing many Contests between them, at length they came to Terms of Agreement, and the English conceiving themselves secure, planted their Factories among them: Where after two Years, that they had reap'd the Fruit of their Dangers and Hazards, the Dutch began to attempt their utter Extirpation, not by the Sword of War or a Massacre, but by such cruel and savage Tortures, as could hardly be thought to proceed from Christians, or those of human Race. The Island of Amboyna was the bloody Stage where they acted this dismal Tragedy: For, pretending that Captain Gabriel Towerson, and the rest of the English Factory, had conspir'd to seize the Castle, and expel the Dutch out of the Island, they seiz'd upon them, and having no Witnesses against them but their Racks, they extended their Sinews to the full Length, and disjointed all the Limbs of their Bodies; and with their other Engines making them suck in Water with their Breath, they swell'd their Bodies to a vast Proportion, 'till their Skins were ready to burst, and their Eyes to start out of their Heads. And those whose Innocency and Courage could not be compell'd by those Torments to accuse themselves of unacted Crimes, they burnt the Soles of their Feet with Candles, 'till the dropping Moisture extinguish'd the Flame, and with those fiery Instruments made such Holes in their Sides, that they might see their Entrails, tho' the Monsters would not see their Innocence, but persisted in their exquisite Cruelties; which being horrible to express, must be insupportable to sustain. Having thus weary'd out the miserable Men with Tortures, and they being willing to die quickly, confess'd and gave under their Hands whatever their barbarous Tormentors dictated to them, and ended their Cruelties by cutting off their Heads. Ten of the English lost their Lives, and the rest, being near as many more, with rack'd, swell'd and macerated Bodies, were sent to the English Plantations; so the whole Factory was destroy'd, and the Dutch seiz'd that Trade into their Hands, which they have kept ever since.

The Dutch Cruelties at Amboyna.

King

A Treaty of Marriage with France.

The French insist upon high Terms.

King James receiving the Account of this barbarous Transaction, is said to have made a very cold Reply upon the Occasion, having his Thoughts more nearly imploy'd about his own Family, and the Marriage of his Son with the House of France; in Order to which, soon after the Breach with Spain, his Majesty sent over the Lord Kensington, newly made Earl of Holland, privately to find out the Inclinations of the French King, in relation to a Match between the Prince and the Lady Henrietta Maria, younger Daughter to King Henry the Great. He continu'd there a Month before he mov'd in that Matter; but as soon as he propos'd it to the French King, he was so desirous of the Match, that he told the Earl, He had rather have the Prince of England to be his Brother, than any other Man in the World, and was so ready to comply, that he seem'd indifferent in making Terms for the Catholics in England. But when he found King James, who dreaded a second Disappointment, to be immeasurably fond of this Alliance, he abated of his Forwardness, enlarg'd his Demands in Favour of Papists, and strain'd the King to such Concessions, as he had promis'd to his Parliament he would never grant upon the Mediation of Foreign Princes. The famous Cardinal Richlieu was now in the Infancy of his Rise and Favour, and was made the principal Manager of this great Affair in Behalf of France; and the Earls of Holland and Carlisle were sent Ambassadors Extraordinary from the Court of England in the Month of June. These represented to the Cardinal, 'That the Proposition they made of a Marriage being no new Thing, since it had been treated of many Years before to marry the Prince of Wales with Madam Christiana, who was afterwards marry'd to the Prince of Piedmont; they had nothing now to do, but to re-assume the Articles already made, and to continue on the same Foot with the Lady Henrietta. But the French answer'd, 'That the Face of Affairs was chang'd since that Time, and that they had different Thoughts at present; that it was the King of England's Interest to preserve the Reputation of the French King in this Marriage; that at present they could not be contented with what they had formerly offer'd about Religion, after what had happen'd in Spain, when there was a Treaty of Marriage between the Prince of Wales and the Infanta; urging, that it was necessary to begin the Negotiation by laying those Articles upon the Table, which the King of Great Britain had agreed with Spain upon that Occasion. The English Ambassadors rejecting this, one of the French answer'd, He was much surpriz'd that they were not come with Power to make the same Concessions to the Most Christian King, as their Master had granted to his Catholick Majesty, since they might easily imagine France would suffer no Inequality in this Affair.

*The English
agree.*

This put some Stop to the Negotiation, but in effect the Ambassadors of England soon consented to agree to all the Articles with Spain, except three; of which one was concerning a Toleration for the English Catholics; another for a publick Church for the Retinue of the Lady; and the last related to the Education of those Children who should be born of this Marriage, who 'till twelve Years of Age were to be in the Hands of the Queen, to educate them in her own Religion. The French represented it would do great Service to the King of England, by uniting to his Party all the English Catholics, who would oppose themselves to the Puritans and Presbyterians, by whom the King was not truly belov'd: But the Ambassadors would never consent to grant a Church to the Papists, which would endanger a Mutiny in London, tho' they agreed to the Article concerning the Education of Children; but yet rejected to have a Bishop sent with the Lady, as a Matter of no Use. As for the Dowry, the King of England insisted upon eight hundred thousand Crowns, of which one half was to be paid in London the Evening before the Marriage, two hundred thousand a Year after, and the rest in six Months after that. There was also a Proviso made, that if the Lady should die before the Prince without Children, he should be oblig'd only to restore the Moiety. All this being agreed, the main thing was to procure a Dispensation from the Pope to permit the Lady to marry with an Heretick Prince; for his Holiness was no ways pleas'd with the Marriage, lest it might occasion the Restitution of the Palatinate. Therefore Father Berulle, who was sent to Rome for that Purpose, us'd many Arguments with the Pope, and insisted upon the numerous Advantages that would accrue to the Catholick Religion by this Marriage; so that at length the Pope was mollify'd, and consented to a Dispensation, which in three Months Time was compleated.

While one Negotiation was carry'd on at Rome, another more secret was managing in England by the Arch-Bishop of Embrun, who was sent over by the French King in Favour of the Roman Catholicks in England, and likewise to sound King James about his Thoughts of the Romish Religion; of which remarkable Transaction we have this following Account from the Arch-Bishop himself, and from Monsieur D'Ageant, a prime Minister of State in France. This Prelate, who was a Man of great Knowledge and Experience, having receiv'd his Orders from the French King, took a Voyage into England, in the Habit and Name of a Counsellor of the Parliament of Grenoble, whom Curiosity had induc'd to see the Nation. He was soon met and discover'd by the Duke of Buckingham, who told him That there was no occasion for him to change his Name or conceal his Quality, for he should receive nothing but Honour, especially from the King his Master, who had a very particular Esteem for him. Shortly after he introduc'd him to the King at Royston, who entertain'd him very graciously, and order'd the Duke to be present all the Time of the Discourse, which lasted above two Hours. At this first Meeting he prevail'd so far, that Orders were immediately given to release many Roman Catholicks out of Prison, in London and other Places, and the Execution of many Laws against them was suspended; and further he was permitted to administer Confirmation to what Catholicks he pleas'd, in the House of the French Ambassador, while the Doors were open. Accordingly he confirm'd above ten thousand, in the Presence of a great Concourse of People at the Door and in the Street; at which many were extreamly offended, and complain'd of it to the King, but to no Effect, for his Majesty answer'd them, That he did nothing contrary to his Pleasure. This Arch-Bishop had several Conferences with the King, in which his Majesty testify'd his great Desire to be ally'd to France, and the other insisted upon a Toleration, as the most effectual Means to give Satisfaction to the Catholick Princes: Whereupon the King laying his Hand upon his Hand, said, I plainly see that you are a Person appointed by God, in whom I ought to confide, and to reveal the Secrets of my Heart.

The secret Treaty of the Arch-Bishop of Embrun in England.

He confirms ten thousand in London.

Afterwards, he very freely acknowledg'd to the Arch-Bishop the good Opinion he had conceiv'd of the Catholick Faith, and so particularly, that he omitted nothing; protesting to him, 'That during his Minority, his Tutors having perceiv'd his Inclination to that Religion, he ran great Hazards of being assassinated: As to a Toleration, he profess'd he had long design'd to grant it in his Dominions, and for that very Purpose, he intended to summon an Assembly of Prelates and other learned Men of England, together with an equal Number of Foreigners, and upon the Decisions there made, to found the said Liberty; adding, That he had already determin'd what Persons should be chosen among the English; and that if the Assembly could not meet at Dover, he would consent that it should be holden at Boloign, as soon as he should be in a Condition to rely upon the King of France, by the Means of the intended Marriage: And to procure these good Effects, he thought convenient that after the Consummation of it, the Arch-Bishop should return into England under the Pretence of accompanying the Princess, at which Time he would deliver to him two Letters written with his own Hand, one for the French King, and the other for the Pope, containing his serious Resolutions: He would also give him a distinct Memorial concerning his Intention, which he ‘ would Sign, that the Arch-Bishop being furnish’d with these Dispatches, he ‘ should go to Rome, under Colour of visiting the Apostolick See, there to treat ‘ with the Pope alone, for whom he said, he had a greater Respect and Affecti‘ on, ever since he understood he had compos’d Verses in his Youth of the vio‘ lent Death of the Queen of Scotland his Mother, in Commendation of her,

 ‘ and of the Family of the Stuarts, which he shew’d to the Arch-Bishop. He further declar’d, ‘ That in Case the Arch-Bishop return’d from Rome with the ‘ Approbation of his Holiness concerning the Convention, he would cause it ‘ forthwith to be assembled, whereupon extraordinary and admirable Events
 ‘ would ensue : But before he proceeded to discover his Design as to his own ‘ Person, he would negotiate with the Protestant Princes of Germany, and ‘ with the principal Puritan Lords of England and Scotland, and promis’d that ‘ all things should tend to a happy Conclusion, and to the great Advantage of ‘ the Catholick Church. This, says the Arch-Bishop, is the Substance of all the Discourses they had at several Times upon this Subject.

His Letter to the Pope.

Monfieur D’Ageant further tells us, that being satisfy’d as to all the Points in Controversie, the King wrote a long Letter to the Pope, by a Catholick Gentleman his Subject, whom he privately sent to him on purpose. ‘ In which ‘ he acknowledg’d him as the Vicar General of Jesus Christ on Earth, as the ‘ universal Father of the Christians, and the Chief of all Catholicks ; assuring ‘ him, that after he had taken Care of those things to which he had agreed, he ‘ would openly declare himself : In the mean Time he promis’d not to suffer ‘ any Search to be made in his Kingdom after Priests that were sent by his Ho-‘ linefs, or the Most Christian King, provided they were not Jesuits, in whom ‘ he protested he could not confide, for several Reasons ; principally because he ‘ accounted them the Authors of the Gun-Powder Treason, by which they ‘ were to have blown up him and the chief of the Nation. In his Letter, among other Particulars, he intreated the Pope ‘ To vouchsafe that the Goods ‘ of the Church that were enter’d into the Patrimony of the principal Families of ‘ England should not be taken from them ; but that they should be permitted still ‘ to enjoy them, because otherwise great Troubles and Commotions would ensue.
 He affirm’d moreover, ‘ That nothing could hinder him from making a pub‘ lick Profession of the Catholick Religion at this Time, but the Desire he had ‘ to gain the King of Denmark his Brother-in-Law, whom he had for that ‘ End, tho’ under another Pretence, solicited to come over into England, ‘ where he hop’d to convert him : That by doing this, he should be able to ‘ establish Peace in his own Dominions, which otherwise could hardly be main-‘ tain’d ; and that they two united in the same Design, would draw after them ‘ almost all the Northern Countries. The Duke of Buckingham, and the Gentleman he sent to Rome, were the only two Persons, that were Subjects, to whom he communicated these Intentions. The Duke had promis’d to follow him, and had made a considerable Progress in the Affair ; but all these remarkable Designs were made void by the Death of the King of England not long after, at which the French King, declaring the News to the Arch-Bishop of Embrun, express’d a very sensible Regret in these Words, All our Hopes of England are lost. Thus far the two French Authors, Monfieur D’Ageant, and William D’Hugues, Arch-Bishop of Embrun ; of whom we can say no more, than that the Credit of their Narrative must be left to all nice and impartial Readers of this Reign.

The Marriage-
Treaty concluded.

In the mean Time the Marriage-Treaty with France succeeded, and held fewer Months than the Years that were spent in that of Spain. In August the Match was concluded, and in November the Articles were sworn to by King James, Prince Charles, and the French King ; tho’ they were not fully concluded ‘till February following, nor the Match consummated ‘till after the King’s Death. Cardinal Richlieu, to prevent all Contests that might arise by Means of this Alliance, as in former Times had happen’d, oblig’d Madam the Princess

Princess to renounce all Successions, both Direct and Collateral, which might accrue to her; for which eight hundred thousand Crowns was to be given to her in Marriage. He also took care that her House should be compos'd of as great a Number of Officers, as any Queen of England ever had: That her Dowry should be sixty thousand Crowns per Annum, which should be assign'd her upon Lands, one of which should be a Dutchy or an Earldom: That if she became a Widow, she should have her Choice to stay in England, or come into France, whether she had Children or not; and if she return'd into France, the King of England should be oblig'd to conduct her at his own Charge, with agreeable Honours, as far as Calais. The publick Articles concerning Religion were not much short of those for the Spanish Match; besides which Rusworth mentions some private Articles in favour of the Roman Catholicks, which Nelson, upon rational Grounds, looks upon as fictitious, particularly for not being to be found in Monsieur D'Ageant's Memoirs, where the Secrets of the English Court were, or pretended to be discover'd. Yet the French Author of Cardinal Richlieu's Life in Effect declares as much as Rusworth, namely, that the King and Prince took a particular Oath to release all the Catholick Prisoners, as soon as the Marriage was consummated, and to prohibit for the future their being ill treated for their Religion: And further, that they both gave a Promise in Writing, by which they bound themselves, by no Way or Means whatsoever, to oblige the Princess to change her Religion. The Author likewise highly reflects upon the Wisdom of King James, and says, 'As this Match was against all the Maxims of good Policy, so it drew upon his Son King Charles those Mischiefs, which perhaps never befel any King succeeding to an Hereditary Crown; and his Sons born of that Marriage, and seduc'd by their Mother's Persuasions, have been most unfortunate since his Death. And several were of Opinion, that Cardinal Richlieu, who was then contriving a War against the House of Austria, sent this Princess into England, as a Ball of Dissention, that would create so much Trouble in that Nation, as would incapacitate them from disturbing their Neighbours Affairs.

Censures upon
it.

Yet still King James thought it a propitious Match, and a great Step towards the Restoration of the Palatinate, and his unfortunate Progeny; but this prov'd no more successful than another feeble Attempt this Year, made by Count Mansfield, who came into England for that Purpose, was receiv'd with great Splendor, and made Commander of an Army of twelve thousand Englishmen. These Forces were design'd to pass through France into Germany, the French having promis'd, as well an Addition of Strength, as a free Passage. The French, notwithstanding their Promise, and the Treaty of Marriage, delay'd, tho' not directly deny'd their Passage; nevertheless the whole Army was shipp'd off, and put over to Calais; and after a tedious Stay, in hopes yet to land and pass through the Country, they were forc'd to set sail for Zealand. Neither were they suffer'd to land there, coming so unexpectedly upon the States, and in a hard and scarce Time for Provision of Victuals. Thus they were long confin'd to their narrow Vessels, and suffer'd the want of all Necessaries, by which means a Pestilence broke out among them, and rag'd so extremely, that they were thrown into the Sea by Multitudes: Insomuch that scarce a third Part of the Men were landed, which also soon after decreas'd and dispers'd, and the whole Design vanish'd into Air. Thus continually unfortunate was the King in the deplorable Case of his Children; and neither he nor his Son saw the Restitution of the Palatinate, which happen'd not 'till twenty three Years after, when the Monarchy of England was under a fatal Eclipse, and its Sovereign Lord, by an unheard of Example, brought to the Scaffold to lose his Head.

His Expedition unfortunate.

Before King James could see the Misfortunes of Count Mansfield, or the Marriage of his Son, he was seiz'd with a Tertian Ague that prov'd fatal to him.

*The King's last

him. This was preceded by the Deaths of two great and worthy Men, Lodowick Duke of Richmond and Lenox, and James Marquess of Hamilton; which exceedingly affected the King, who being inform'd of the Death of the latter, said, If the Branches be thus cut down, the Stock cannot continue long: Which Saying was shortly verify'd. His great Indisposition meeting with a fat and unweildy Body, and daily increasing, he retir'd to Theobalds; and the Lord-Keeper Williams having Notice that they fear'd his Sickness was mortal, went and presented himself before his Majesty, endeavouring to divert him, and bring him to a chearful Discourse, but all in vain: Thus he continu'd by his Bed-side 'till Midnight, but the King found no Comfort. The next Morning, after a Consultation of Physicians, he saw no Hopes of Life, and therefore he ask'd leave of the Prince to acquaint his Father with his weak Condition, and put him in Mind both of his mortal, and immortal State. Having the Prince's Consent, he went into his Majesty's Chamber, and kneeling down told him, He knew he should neither displease, nor discourage him, if he brought him the Message of Isaiah to Hezekiah, to set his House in Order; for he concluded his Days to come would be but few in the World. At which the King calmly reply'd, I am satisfy'd, and I desire you to assist me in preparing to go hence, and to be with Christ, whose Mercies I pray for, and hope to find them. Finding himself much declining, he call'd the Prince his Son to his Bed-side, and recommended several useful Precepts to his future Consideration; while the Keeper continually watch'd with his Royal Master, and never so much as put off his Cloaths to go to Bed, 'till after his Death. His great Business was frequently to pray, read and discourse about Repentance, Faith, Remission of Sins, Resurrection, and Eternal Life; all which was the Preparation on Wednesday for the blessed Sacrament on Thursday, which his Majesty receiv'd with singular Comfort. On Friday he became sensibly weaker; so that now the Keeper stirr'd very little out of the Chamber, and that not only to comfort the departing King, but likewise to keep off some of the Romish Religion, who were watching about the Chamber-Door, whom, as a Privy-Counsellor, he commanded to keep at a greater Distance. As he drew near to his End, the Prayer usually said at the Hour of Death being ended, having repeated these Words, Veni, Domine Jesu, he gave up the Ghost without any Pangs, as are commonly seen in dying Persons, and the Keeper clos'd his Eyes with his own Hands. This was upon Sunday the twenty seventh of March, being fifty eight Years of Age, and having reign'd twenty two Years, and three Days. Many scandalous Rumours were spread concerning his Death; and some took the liberty to write that he was poison'd, as the Duke of Richmond, and the Marquess of Hamilton had been before him; which might be occasion'd by the too bold Officiousness of the Duke of Buckingham in administering his own Physick. But upon opening his Body, there was found no Mark or Sign of Poison, his inward Parts being all sound; only his Spleen was a little affected, which might be Cause enough to throw him into an Ague. His Body, for the greater State, was convey'd by Torch-Light from Theobalds to Somerset-House, where being deposited from the twenty third Day of April, to the seventh of May, it was carry'd to Westminster, where, according to Sir Richard Baker, it was interr'd with great Solemnity, but with greater Lamentation.

His Death.

His Character.

To come at last to the Person and Character of this Prince, we find it a hard Undertaking to draw the Picture of one who had so many different Aspects; especially where both Friends and Enemies have so far exceeded the Limits of Justice and Impartiality. As to his Person and Presence he made but an Ordinary Figure; his Countenance was homely, his Features harsh, tho' not altogether uncomely; his Stature was of the middle Size, his Body not ill compacted, but fat and unweildy in his latter Days, usually wearing his Cloaths plain, large, and different from the common Mode. But as to his Mind, he has receiv'd the highest Applauses and Commendations, particularly, That he was the Solomon of the Age for Knowledge, Learning and Wisdom; one, who knew how to catch the Inclinations of the People at the first Rebound, not suffering them to mount higher than he could reach them, nor grow so strong, but he could either alter or divert them: That he had an admirable Pregnancy of Wit, which being improv'd by continual Study, he acquir'd such a Promptness and Elegancy in expressing his Mind, that his extemporaneous Speeches were little inferior to his premeditated Writings: That he was a mild, peaceful and munificent Monarch, suitable to the English Genius and Nation. All which Particulars were really true, but still with a remarkable Mixture of Allay; and without that, Wilson acknowledges, that his high, towering and mastering Reason had been of a rare and sublim'd Excellency. Upon which Account, his Knowledge has been by some thought fitter for the Head of a Society, than the Governor of a Kingdom; his Learning to border more upon Pedantry, than rise to a compleat Understanding; his Wisdom to have more of Subtlety, or a Sagacity in discovering Mischiefs, than an Ability of surmounting them; and his Wit too often to descend to inferior Sorts of Jest and Quibbles, which was the common way of Wit in that Age. His Munificence was many Times a direct Profuseness, and a wasting of the Revenues of the Crown; and his peaceful Temper, which made him take Beati Pacifici for his Motto, had too much of a timorous Disposition, not to say Cowardize; which caus'd him not only to be often contemn'd by Foreign Princes, but also at home to be govern'd, and sometimes insulted by his Favourites, which was one of the greatest of his Weaknesses: And this led him to another Quality, or rather an Acquisition, which some thought as wicked, as the other was weak, which he call'd by the Name of King-Craft, others an exquisite Skill in Dissimulation; in which he so much delighted, that it seems to be the greatest of all his Blemishes. He had excellent Notions in Conception, but could bring but few into Action, tho' they tended to his own Preservation: And this was one of his Maxims, of which he made no timely Use; A Prince, who would avoid Conspiracies, ought to be rather jealous of such, whom his Favours have advanc'd, than of those whom his Frowns have discontented: For the latter want Means, while the Former have them at Pleasure, to execute their Designs. But to come to his moral Virtues, he was eminent for his Chastity, which was remarkable in a Court so loose and luxurious as his own. He was very temperate in his Exercises, and Diet, and not intemperate in his Drinking; yet he drank very often of the strongest sweet Wines, but always in very small Quantities, and rather out of a Custom than any Delight, as Weldon himself acknowledges. He was by Education patient, pious and religious; yet sometimes his Choler and Passion would prevail over all, and throw him into the profanest Oaths and Curses; for which he would afterwards shew himself heartily penitent: And indeed, he was not only ready to ask Forgiveness of God, but also of Men; and sometimes in such a peculiar Manner, that they could scarcely say whether it was a pious Condescension, or an abject Disposition. As to his Religion, in which he display'd the Height of his Parts and Learning, he was really Calvinist in most Points, excepting that of Episcopacy, as appears from some of his Books, and his Zeal for the Synod of Dort: Yet he gave unhappy Suspicions to the Nation, by making such Advances to the Pope and Papists, upon the Account of the Spanish and French Treaties. Notwithstanding his open Indulgences, and perhaps secret Inclinations to the Roman Catholics, yet in many publick Speeches he declar'd against them, and once in a very remarkable Manner, in the Presence of many Lords, as we find it in Croke's Reports; for having been charg'd with a Design of granting a Toleration to Papists, he made a solemn Protestation, That he would spend the last Drop of Blood in his Body before he would do it, and pray'd, That before any of his Issue should maintain any other Religion than his own, that God would take them out of the World. How far this Imprecation cation reach'd or affected himself, or any of his Family afterwards, we leave to the Determination of an omniscient Being.

was

His Reign in general.

To take some Notice of this Reign in general, it is highly remarkable, that tho' the Nation was warlike and ready to kindle at any Flame, yet this King kept it his whole Reign all in Peace, without any War from abroad, or Rebellion at home. It is true, there were some Heats between him and his Parliaments about the Prerogative; and it happen'd then, as it does in most Feuds, Things were carry'd to great Extremities: Yet impartial Writers think, that considering his Majesty's Circumstances, he was not well us'd, and that if the House had been freed from half a dozen popular and discontented Members, the Disturbances would soon have ended. It is also remarkable, that during this whole Reign the King never took away the Life of one Nobleman in England, but restor'd many; yet his artificial taking off Sir Walter Raleigh, by vertue of a former Condemnation, after an equitable Restoration, and his sparing the Earl and Countess of Somerset, after such Imprecations upon himself and Progeny, are both real Blemishes in this King's Conduct. He came to the Crown with all the Advantages of Power, Love and Reputation, and the former Part of the Reign was more active and laudable; but the latter, with the encreasing Weakness of the publick Ministry, became more passive, and declin'd in Vigour and Greatness to the last Moment of his Life. If we consider the whole Reign with the former, it will bear no Comparison; and tho' there was a great Increase of Affluence and Trade, the Reputation of England began sensibly to sink; so that the two Kingdoms of England and Scotland, when join'd under one Monarch, made a less Figure, than one of them had in former Ages. The martial Heat and Exercise of the Nation began gradually to decline, by the Example of a pacifick King; and Sir Richard Baker observes, that two Things in this Reign grew to lose their Lustre: One, the Exercise of Tilting, which in the last Reign was so much us'd, that no Year pass'd without special Solemnities in that Kind: The other, the Band of Gentlemen-Pensioners and Yeomen of the Guard, which in the Queen's Time consisted of the most select Persons of the Realm for Stature, and other Qualifications; and was so noble an Ornament in her Court, that no Prince in Christendom could show the like. But this King so little valu'd these Particulars, that both in his Time came utterly to be neglected; no Solemnity of Arms but by Accident, and no Regard had to what Persons were admitted into that Service. In short, the main Conduct of the Reign seems inconsistent with it self, and differing from the common Methods of Mankind: Therefore whatever may be said in Commendation of the Blessings of Peace and Plenty, and whatever Rhetorick has been us'd to extol the uninterrupted Pleasures of this Reign, it cannot be deny'd, but that this admir'd Calm was only the Fore-runner of a most dismal Storm, and that this peaceful Monarch was not only really unfortunate in himself and Daughter, but also left to his Son an unnecessary War, an exhausted Treasury, and a Crown of Troubles and Thorns. Of which we may be more particular, when, in another Volume, we come to trace the several Steps, and lay open the various Springs of those tumultuous and calamitous Times.
